JUDICIAL AND STATUTORY DEFINITIONS

OF

WORDS AND PHRASES.

VOLUME 2.

CASUAL.

"Casual" means that which happens by accident, or is brought about by an unknown cause. Lewis v. Lofley, 19 S. E. 57, 59, 92 Ga. 804.

CASUAL CONDITION.

A casual condition is that which depends on chance, and is in no way in the power either of the creditor or of the debtor. Civ. Code La. 1900, art. 2023.

CASUAL DEFICIENCY.

"Casual" means that which happens by accident, or is brought about by an unknown cause, and, as used in the Constitution, forbidding any county to incur a debt without first submitting the matter to a popular vote, "except for a temporary loan or loans to supply casual deficiencies of revenue," means some unforeseen and unexpected deficiency, and does not include a debt incurred for the building of a courthouse. Lewis v. Lofley, 19 S. E. 57, 59, 92 Ga. 804.

A casual deficiency of a state's revenue is one that happens by chance or accident, and without any design or intention to evade the constitutional inhibition of such state against increasing the authorized expenditures of such state above a certain amount. In re Appropriations by General Assembly, 22 Pac. 464, 467, 13 Colo. 316.

CASUAL EJECTOR.

The term "casual ejector" was used in the common-law action of ejectment to designate the person against whom the action was usually brought, who had no interest in the suit, but whose duty it was to give notice to the actual possessor, who on application to the court would be substituted as defendant on confessing the lease, entry, and ouster alleged by plaintiff, thus leaving the only fact to be proved by plaintiff the title of his lessor. French v. Robb, 51 Atl. 509, 510, 67 N. J. Law, 260, 57 L. R. A. 956, 91 Am. St. Rep. 433.

CASUAL POOR.

Casual poor "are such poor persons as are suddenly taken sick or meet with some accident when from home, and are thus providentially thrown upon the charities of those among whom they may happen to be. When in such cases parish officers or others afford relief, they have no remedy over for the money expended, not even against the parish where the person relieved was regularly chargeable." Force v. Haines, 17 N. J. Law (2 Har.) 385, 405.

CASUALTY.

See "Inevitable Casualty"; "Unavoidable Casualty."
Other casualty, see "Other."

"Casualty," like its synonyms "accident" and "misfortune," may proceed or result from negligence or other cause known or unknown. McCarty v. New York & E. R. Co., 30 Pa. (6 Casey) 247, 251.

An "accident" or "casualty," according to the common understanding, proceeds from an unknown cause, or is the unusual effect of a known cause. Either may be said to occur by chance or unexpectedly. Chicago, St. L. & N. O. R. Co. v. Pullman Southern Car Co., 11 Sup. Ct. 490, 493, 139 U. S. 79, 35 L. Ed. 97.

"Casualty," as used in Code, § 3154, authorizing the granting of a new trial for unavoidable casualty or misfortune, preventing the party from prosecuting or defending, is an inevitable accident—an event not to be foreseen or guarded against. Ennis v. Fourth St. Bldg. Ass'n of Clinton, 71 N. W. 426, 102 Iowa, 520.

"Casualty" means accident; that which comes by chance, or without design, or without being a foreseen contingency; and where the client was prevented by the dishonesty of his attorney from hearing and defending an action, so that judgment was rendered against him by default, it was such a casualty as entitled him to have the judgment set aside. Anthony v. Karbach, 90 N. W. 243, 244, 64 Neb. 509.

The word "casualty" as used in a statute providing that whenever a debtor shall cease to reside on his homestead it shall be liable for his debts, unless his removal be temporary by reason of some "casualty," refers to accident, as fire, flood, or social or family disaster or misfortune causing temporary absence. Thompson v. Tillotson, 56 Miss. 36, 38.

Deterioration in the value of land caused by the usual overflow of the Mississippi river is not a deterioration by any "casualty," within Ann. Code Miss. 1892, § 3799, authorizing a reduction of an assessment for taxation for such cause. Forsdick v. Quitman County Sup'rs, 25 South. 294.

Act Cong. May 28, 1880, c. 108, § 17, provides for an allowance for the loss of distilled spirits deposited in a bonded warehouse, not to exceed a fixed amount for given periods. Section 4, Act May 28, 1880, c. 108 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 2133], provides that when it shall appear that there has been a loss of such spirits, other than that provided for by Rev. St. U. S. § 3221, as amended [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 2087], which in the opinion of the commissioner of internal revenue is excessive, he may require the collector to instruct the withdrawal of such spirits, and to collect the tax accrued on the quantity originally deposited in the warehouse, though the time specified in the bond given for the withdrawal of the spirits has not expired. Rev. St. § 3221, provides for the abatement of the tax accruing on distilled spirits actually destroyed "by accidental fire or other casualty" while the same were in a bonded warehouse. Held, that the term "casualty," as used in this section, does not include the warping of barrels from unusual and excessive summer heat, abnormal evaporation caused by such heat, or the existence of undiscovered wormholes in the barrels; and, where a loss has occurred from these causes which the commissioner regards as excessive, he may order the withdrawal of the balance and payment of the tax on the whole, as provided by the act of May 28, 1880. Crystal Springs Distillery Co. v. Cox (U. S.) 47 Fed. 693, 695.

Injury.

As used in a policy of insurance providing that a company should not be liable for any loss occurring by the bursting of a boiler or by explosion from any cause, and if the premises be damaged or destroyed by the bursting of a boiler, or by explosion from any cause, the policy should be void the instant the casualty by explosion occurred, the word "casualty" did not mean fire, but referred to the damage or destruction of the insured premises, and not to a fire caused thereby. Waldeck v. Springfield Fire & Marine Ins. Co., 14 N. W. 1, 2, 56 Wis. 96.

Result of lawful act.

"Casualty," as used in a lease providing that rent shall cease if the premises become untenable by fire or through casualty, means some fortuitous interruption of the use, and does not include an interruption of possession which takes place in pursuance of established law, as where a portion of the premises are torn down for the purpose of widening a street. Mills v. Baehr's Ex'rs (N. Y.) 24 Wend. 254, 255.

The necessity for additional light, caused by the subsequent construction of elevated railroads, and the additional expense of gas and electric lights, caused by a combination of the gas and electric light companies, do not constitute accidents or casualties, so as to authorize a further appropriation under Rev. St. c. 24, § 90, providing that the expenditures of a city cannot lawfully exceed the amount provided for in the annual appropriation bill, unless an improvement is necessitated by an accident or casualty happening after such annual appropriation is made. City of Chicago v. Nichols, 52 N. E. 359, 360, 177 Ill. 97.

CASUALTY INSURANCE.

"The distinguishing feature of what is known in our legislation as 'accident insurance' is that it indemnifies against the effects of accidents resulting in bodily injury or death. Its field is not to insure against loss or damage to property generally, although occasioned by accidents. So far as that class of insurance has been developed, it has been with reference to boilers, plate glass, and perhaps domestic animals, and injuries to property by street cars, and is known as 'casualty insurance.'" Employers' Liability Assur. Corp. v. Merrill, 29 N. E. 529, 530, 155 Mass. 404.

"Casualty insurance" has a well-defined meaning as insurance against loss through accidents or casualties resulting in bodily injury or death. As applied to injuries resulting in death, casualty insurance is really but a contract of life insurance limited to specified risks. State v. Federal Investment Co., 48 Minn. 110, 111, 50 N. W. 1028.

CASUS FORTUITUS.

The term "casus fortuitus" means a loss happening in spite of all human effort and sagacity. The Majestic, 17 Sup. Ct. 597, 602, 166 U. S. 375, 41 L. Ed. 1039.

CAT.

A cat which is kept as a household pet may properly be considered a thing of value. It ministers to the pleasure of its owner, and serves ob vitæ solatium. Ford v. Glennon, 49 Atl. 189, 74 Conn. 6.

CAT-HOLE.

A "cat-hole" is a wet, low place in a farm, covered with grass, weeds, and underbrush, known as "waste land." Bolton v. Calkins, 60 N. W. 297, 102 Mich. 69.

CATALOGUE.

An expired lease according to the covenants of which, by an agreement of demise, the land was to be farmed, was not a "catalogue" containing conditions for the management of a farm, within a statute requiring such an instrument to be stamped. Strut v. Robinson, 3 Barn. & Adol. 395.

CATCH.

The word "catch" "is not aptly employed to express the idea of obtaining possession of inanimate or motionless things, but of taking captive live and moving ones." As used in Pub. Laws, c. 292, providing that it is unlawful to catch or possess for any purpose any lobster less than 10½ inches in length, "catch" is equivalent to the expression "catch and have possession," since catching necessarily involves at least a momentary possession, and so an indictment charging defendant with catching and having in possession certain short lobsters is not bad for duplicity as alleging distinct transactions. State v. Dunning, 22 Atl. 109, 83 Me. 178.

CATCHING BARGAIN.

"Catching bargains" are dealings with an expectant heir for the purchase of his expectancy. Whelen v. Phillips, 25 Atl. 44, 46, 151 Pa. 312.

CATCHINGS.

"Catchings," as used in a policy of insurance on a whaler, stipulating that the "catchings" shipped from a certain point should be at the risk of the insured, was employed in the ordinary sense, meaning the "things caught," and when the blubber or pieces of whale flesh are cut from the whale and are on the deck, or at least, when they are stowed under deck, they are, in the sense of the trade, "catchings." Rogers v. Mechanics' Ins. Co. (U. S.) 20 Fed. Cas. 1118, 1119.

CATHOLIC.

The term "Catholic" is a designation which, if not common to every branch of the Christian church, is certainly not exclusively applicable to a Roman Catholic church in a city. Dolan v. Mayor, etc., of Baltimore (Md.) 4 Gill, 394, 405.

"Catholic chapel," as used in a will bequeathing certain property to be used for the erection of a Catholic chapel, does not necessarily mean a place devoted to worship according to the terms of the Roman Catholic Church. The term "Catholic chapel" has no necessary, precise, and definite signification. The courtesy of private society, and all political and religious controversies, require us to concede to persons of any communion or party such appellations, by way of distinction, as they choose to assume for themselves. Large bodies of Christians not in communion with the Church of Rome assert in their creeds and daily worship a right to the name of "Catholic," and reject as heretical and schismatical any assumption that the terms "Catholic" and "Roman Catholic" are equivalent, or even allied in signification. Such term, when occurring in a will, therefore, must be explained by extrinsic evidence. O'Hear v. De Goesbriand, 33 Vt. 593, 608, 80 Am. Dec. 653.

CATTLE.

See "Beef Cattle"; "Neat Cattle"; "Stock Cattle"; "Working Cattle."
As merchandise, see "Merchandise."
Ordinary cattle, see "Ordinary Stock."

"Cattle" means live stock; domestic quadrupeds which serve for tillage or other labor, or as food for man. Mathews v. State, 39 Tex. Cr. R. 553, 554, 47 S. W. 647.

In the construction of statutes, "cattle" includes horse, mule, ass, sheep, hog, or goat, of any age or sex, bull, cow, calf, and ox. Ky. St. 1903, § 456.

The word "cattle" may be either singular or plural in number, so that the use of the term "cattle" may mean one cattle. In its sense of "live stock," domestic quadrupeds which serve for tillage or other labor, or as food for man, it includes a number of different kinds of live stock. An indictment charging defendant with the theft of cattle is supported by proof of the theft of one animal. Mathews v. State, 47 S. W. 647, 648, 48 S. W. 189, 190, 39 Tex. Cr. R. 553.

"Cattle," as used in a will by which testator gave to legatees all of his cattle except oxen, cannot be construed to include fattening cattle bought to be fattened for the market by testator, subsequent to the making of his will, in order to convert and utilize the corn raised, but means the stock of cattle proper belonging to the testator, though the term "cattle," as it is ordinarily understood, embraces all classes of animals of the cattle kind. Hawes v. Foote, 64 Tex. 22, 28.

Code, § 2901, making it grand larceny to steal any "cattle, swine, sheep or goats," means live animals, such as enumerated, and does not apply to a theft of the dead body of such animal. Golden v. State, 63 Miss. 466, 468.

"Cattle," in law, includes all of the domestic animals, so that an information charging the theft of "cattle" is too indefinite to support a charge for theft of steers. State v. Brookhouse, 38 Pac. 862, 10 Wash. 87.

As bovine species only.

The word "cattle," as used in the chapter relating to diseased cattle, means bovine cattle only, and does not relate to or include any other kind of domestic animals. Comp. Laws N. M. 1897, § 181.

"Cattle," as used in Code, § 1068, making it criminal to pursue, kill, or wound any horse, mule, jenny, cattle, hog, sheep, or goat of the property of another, is not used in its broad sense as embracing all such animals, but in the narrower and restricted but well-understood sense to "designate only that class of animals belonging to the bovine species as the bull, ox, cow, or heifer." State v. Credle, 91 N. C. 640, 645.

In common parlance "cattle" means bulls, cows, steers, yearlings, and calves of the bovine genus, which from time out of mind has been domesticated, and, while it may be true that an animal of the cattle species may be such as does not come within the meaning of domesticated animals of the bovine genus, still an allegation that the animal stolen was one of the cattle species sufficiently charges the theft of cattle. McIntosh v. State, 18 Tex. App. 284, 285.

The word "cattle" is defined by Webster to be a collected name for domestic quadrupeds, including the bovine tribe, also horses, mules, sheep, cattle, and goats, but is especially applicable to oxen, cows, and their young. The use of the word in an indictment charging the theft of "two cattle" does not render the indictment bad as being too indefinite, although it does not specify the kind of cattle. People v. Barnes, 2 Pac. 493, 494, 65 Cal. 16.

Buffalo.

"Cattle," as used in Rev. Code 1845, p. 364, § 2, making it criminal to willfully and maliciously kill, maim, or wound any cattle of another, is used in a general sense, and includes horses, but does not include a domesticated buffalo. State v. Crenshaw, 22 Mo. 457, 458.

Bulls and oxen.

"Cattle" is defined by Webster as meaning quadrupeds of the bovine tribe, and, used as a generic term, as including all domestic quadrupeds, as sheep, goats, horses, mules, asses, and swine, and, within a statute providing for damages for killing cattle, oxen are included. Randall v. Richmond & R. R. Co., 107 N. C. 748, 749, 12 S. E. 605, 11 L. R. A. 460; Id., 104 N. C. 410, 10 S. E. 691.

"Cattle," as used in St. 3 Geo. IV, c. 71, for preventing cruelty to cattle, does not include bulls, and bull-baiting is not punishable thereunder. Ex parte Hill, 3 Car. & P. 225.

"Cattle," as used in Pen. Code, art. 155, providing that any citizen taking up any estray cattle other than work oxen shall proceed in a certain manner, should be construed to include oxen which are not work oxen. State v. Moreland, 27 Tex. 726, 727.

Goats.

In Code, § 1003, making it a misdemeanor to willfully and unlawfully kill or abuse any horse, mule, hog, sheep, or other cattle, "cattle" is employed in its general sense, and embraces all domestic quadrupeds, including goats. State v. Groves, 25 S. E. 819, 820, 119 N. C. 822.

Hogs.

"Cattle," as used in a letter of credit, guarantying the drafts of a person against his shipments of cattle to a certain extent, included "hogs." Though the word "cattle" is often confined to cattle of the bovine genus, it is, according to Worcester, "also a collective name for domestic quadrupeds generally, including not only the bovine tribe, but horses, asses, mules, sheep, goats, and swine." In its limited sense it is used to designate the different varieties of horned animals, but it is also frequently used with a broader signification, as embracing animals in general which serve as food for man. In England, even in a criminal case (Rex v. Chapple, Russ. & R. 77), where there is a greater strictness of construction than in a civil controversy, pigs were held to be included within the words "any cattle." And in other cases in that country involving life and liberty, the word has been construed to embrace animals not used for food. First Nat. Bank of Decatur v. Home Sav. Bank of St. Louis, 88 U. S. (21 Wall.) 294, 299, 22 L. Ed. 560.

"Cattle" is a collective name for domestic quadrupeds generally, including not only the bovine tribe, but horses, mules, sheep, goats, and swine. As used in Rev. St. § 4848, which requires that a lawful partition fence should be such as could inclose and restrain sheep, unless the parties agreed to build a fence to restrain or inclose only horses, mules, or cattle, it is used, as it is commonly used in the United States, to signify only beasts of the bovine genus; that is, oxen, bulls, cows, and their young, and it does not, as there used, include hogs. Enders v. McDonald, 31 N. E. 1056, 1057, 5 Ind. App. 297.

The word "cattle," as used in Rev. St. 1889, § 3621, making it a misdemeanor for any one to maim, wound, beat, or torture any horse, ox, or other cattle, designates all domestic quadrupeds, including horses, sheep, and hogs, and hence pigs are within the statute. State v. Lawn, 80 Mo. 241; State v. Pruett, 61 Mo. App. 156, 157.

The term "cattle," in a statute in relation to cruelty to animals, includes hogs; hence pigs are within the statute. State v. Lawn, 80 Mo. 241; State v. Pruett, 61 Mo. App. 156, 157.

Hogs may be included under the term "cattle," which is a collective name for domestic quadrupeds generally, as used in a letter accrediting a certain person whose drafts on shipments of cattle were guaranteed by the writer. First Nat. Bank of Decatur v. Home Sav. Bank of St. Louis, 88 U. S. (21 Wall.) 294, 299, 22 L. Ed. 560.

Under Rev. St. § 4848, requiring that a lawful fence should be such as would restrain sheep, unless the parties agreed to build a fence to restrain and inclose only horses, mules, or cattle, hogs are not included under the term "cattle." Enders v. McDonald, 31 N. E. 1056, 1057, 5 Ind. App. 297.

Horses.

Horses are included in the term "cattle" in the primary sense of the latter term, but in popular use in the United States the word is not so understood. United States v. Mattock (U. S.) 26 Fed. Cas. 1208, 1209.

In the Revised Statutes of Missouri, making it a crime to willfully and maliciously kill cattle of another, "cattle" includes most domestic animals, and, for the purpose of the statute, horses are regarded as cattle. State v. Hambleton, 22 Mo. 452, 454; State v. Clifton, 24 Mo. 376.

In a statute requiring a railroad company to erect and maintain fences sufficient to prevent cattle, horses, sheep, and hogs from getting on such railroad, "cattle" includes horses and asses, as well as domesticated horned animals. Ohio & M. R. Co. v. Brubaker, 47 Ill. 462, 463.

The word "cattle" is a collective name for domestic quadrupeds, including the bovine tribe, and also horses, asses, mules, sheep, goats, and swine, but especially bulls, oxen, cows, and their young, and in a statute rendering a railroad company liable for killing stock it includes horses and sheep. Henderson v. Wabash, St. L. & P. Ry. Co., 81 Mo. 605, 606; Louisville & F. R. Co. v. Ballard, 59 Ky. (2 Metc.) 177, 183.

"Cattle" is defined as including all domestic quadrupeds, such as horses, mules, etc., as well as oxen, cows, etc. It has been held to bear a legal significance which includes horses. Where the Legislature expressly gives power in respect to infectious diseases among animals, there is no reason to limit the intention within narrower bounds than will be set by the acceptance of the words giving power in their natural meaning. Newark & S. O. H. C. Ry. Co. v. Hunt, 12 Atl. 697, 699, 50 N. J. Law (21 Vroom) 308.

Lexicographers give the word "cattle" two meanings—one restricted to domestic, bovine animals, the other covering any stock kept for use or profit. The first is ordinarily given as its common meaning, the second as a special signification, less frequent now than formerly, and, when used in an insurance policy where the occupation was stated to be "cattle shipper," the term did not include horses in shipment. Brock v. Brotherhood Acc. Co., 54 Atl. 176, 75 Vt. 249.

Mules.

A declaration for an injury to cattle is not supported by evidence of injury to mules. "Whatever may be the meaning given to the term 'cattle' elsewhere, it is certain that with us it never is construed in a common parlance to include either horses or mules." Brown v. Bailey, 4 Ala. 413.

"Cattle," as used in Act 1855, requiring railroad companies to make and maintain fences sufficient to prevent "cattle, horses," from getting on the road, and making them liable for injuries caused by such failure, should be construed to include a mule, for, though the term "cattle" in common parlance does not include horses or mules, yet the term "horses" embraces a mule. Toledo, W. & W. Ry. Co. v. Cole, 50 Ill. 184, 186.

Mules are included in the term "cattle," in the primary sense of the latter term, but in popular use in the United States the word is not so understood. United States v. Mattock (U. S.) 26 Fed. Cas. 1208, 1209.

Neat cattle.

The word "cattle," as used in the chapter relating to the inspection of cattle, shall be read and construed as if preceded by the word "neat." Code Va. 1887, § 2215.

Sheep.

As used in Act Cong. June 30, 1833, prohibiting any person from pasturing Indian lands with horses, mules, or cattle, the term "cattle" includes sheep, that being one meaning of the word in its primary sense. United States v. Mattock (U. S.) 26 Fed. Cas. 1208, 1209.

The term "cattle" includes sheep. Davis v. Collier, 13 Ga. 485, 491; Henderson v. Wabash, St. L. & P. Ry. Co., 81 Mo. 605, 606.

Steers and yearlings.

"Cattle," as used in Pen. Code, art. 766, making the theft of cattle an offense, should be construed to include a steer and yearlings, though they are described as "neat cattle," for all cattle are neat cattle. Arrington v. State, 13 Tex. App. 551, 553.

The term "cattle" designates domestic quadrupeds collectively, and charging the theft of a steer is sufficient under a statute making the stealing of cattle or neat cattle grand larceny. State v. Bowers (Mo.) 1 S. W. 288; State v. Lawn, 80 Mo. 241, 242; State v. Abbott, 20 Vt. 537, 538; State v. Lange, 22 Tex. 591.

CATTLE BEAST.

The expression "cattle beast," as used in an indictment charging the injury of a cattle beast in violation of Code, § 1068, making it criminal to pursue, kill, or wound any horse, mule, jenny, cattle, hog, sheep, or goat, is employed to "designate the singular number of the plural noun 'cattle,' as used in the statute, which only includes that class of animals belonging to the bovine species, as the bull, ox, cow, heifer, etc. It is a sufficient description of the animal killed." State v. Credle, 91 N. C. 640, 645.

CATTLE DROVER.

Any person who shall drive or bring neat cattle into or through the state shall be deemed a cattle drover. Cobbe's Ann. St. Neb. 1903, § 3119.

CATTLE GUARD.

As fence, see "Fence."

"Cattle guards," as used in statutes requiring railroads to erect cattle guards at certain places along their lines, "mean such an appliance as will prevent animals from going upon the land adjoining the right of way." Heskett v. Railway Co., 16 N. W. 525, 526, 61 Iowa, 467; Missouri Pac. Ry. Co. v. Morrow, 4 Pac. 87, 89, 32 Kan. 217; Ford v. Chicago, R. I. & P. Ry. Co., 59 N. W. 5, 8, 91 Iowa, 179, 24 L. R. A. 657; Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Gabbert, 8 Pac. 218, 223, 34 Kan. 132; Hurd v. Rutland & B. R. Co., 25 Vt. 116; Pittsburg & L. E. R. Co. v. Cunningham, 13 Am. & Eng. Ry. Cas. 529; Clarke v. Ohio River R. Co., 20 S. E. 696, 700, 39 W. Va. 732. The company, however, does not perform its duty when it constructs cattle guards which will be safe to turn back cattle, but which will be unsafe for the use of employes when required to use them, but must be constructed conformably to the safety of the traveling public and its employes, as well as to facilitate the turning back of the stock, though, in order to make it safe for the use of the public or employes, it was necessary to construct it that it would not be so efficient for turning stock as it otherwise would be. Ford v. Chicago, R. I. & P. Ry. Co., 59 N. W. 5, 8, 91 Iowa, 179, 24 L. R. A. 657. No particular form of appliance is prescribed by statute, but it cannot be contended that cattle guards should be so constructed that cattle could pass over them in safety, since this would defeat the very purpose of their requirement. Louisville, H. & St. L. R. Co. v. Beauchamp, 55 S. W. 716, 718, 108 Ky. 47. A pit under the track does not meet the requirement of the law. Kansas City, M. & B. R. Co. v. Spencer, 17 South. 168, 169, 72 Miss. 491.

A railroad is not bound to guard against unruly horses or other animals, and, if its cattle guards are reasonably sufficient to turn back such beasts as cattle guards are generally designed to restrain, it is sufficient, and the railroad will not be liable for not maintaining a better one. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Gabbert, 8 Pac. 218, 223, note 3, 34 Kan. 132.

"Cattle guards," as used in Laws 1869, c. 81, § 1, providing that any railroad running through any improved or fenced land shall make proper cattle guards on the railroad when it enters and leaves such improved or fenced lands, means such appliances as will prevent animals from going on the land adjoining the right of way, and is not limited to the track or roadbed merely, but extends the whole width of the right of way. Missouri Pac. Ry. Co. v. Manson, 2 Pac. 800, 803, 31 Kan. 337.

"Cattle guards," as used in How. Ann. St. § 3337, requiring railroad companies to construct and maintain cattle guards at highways and street crossings, does not mean such guards as will keep animals from getting over it in a great degree of excitement or in exceptional cases, but such as would turn back such beasts as are generally restrained under such ordinary circumstances as may occur at such places, or may be reasonably expected to occur there. Smead v. Lake Shore & M. S. Ry. Co., 24 N. W. 761, 762, 58 Mich. 200.

CATTLE RANGE.

A cattle range is a large stretch of country, consisting generally of many square miles, which is usually uninclosed, and has no definite or fixed boundaries, on which cattle are permitted to run at large during the entire year. Holcomb v. Keliher, 59 N. W. 227, 5 S. D. 438.

CAUCUS.

The word "caucus," as employed in the act relating to elections, shall mean a meeting of the legal voters of any political party assembled for the purpose of choosing delegates, or for the nomination of candidates for office. Pub. St. N. H. 1901, p. 140, c. 78, § 1.

In statutes relative to elections, the term "caucus" shall apply to any public meeting of the voters of a ward or a city, or of a town, or of a representative district, held under the provisions of the chapter relating to elections for the nomination of a candidate for election, for the election of a political committee, or of delegates to a political convention. Rev. Laws Mass. 1902, p. 104, c. 11, § 1.

CAUCUS OFFICER.

In statutes relative to elections, the term "caucus officers" shall apply to chairmen, wardens, secretaries, clerks, and inspectors, and, when on duty, to additional officers specially elected, or elected to fill a vacancy, and taking part in the conduct of caucuses. Rev. Laws Mass. 1902, p. 104, c. 11, § 1.

CAUGHT.

A statement that a certain person's moral character was not good, and that there was proof of his being "caught" with his house girl, will be construed to import that he was discovered in such a position that adultery would be inferred. Lovejoy v. Whitcomb, 55 N. E. 322, 174 Mass. 586.

CAUSA SINE QUA NON.

"Causa sine qua non," as used with reference to personal injury cases, means a cause, which, if it had not existed, the injury would not have taken place. Hayes v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 4 Sup. Ct. 369, 374, 111 U. S. 228, 28 L. Ed. 410.

Webster defines an "occasion," as distinguished from a "cause" to be that which incidentally brings to pass an event without being itself efficient cause or sufficient reason. Pennsylvania Co. v. Congdon, 33 N. E. 795, 796, 134 Ind. 226, 39 Am. St. Rep. 251.

"Cause," as used in statutes relating to contested elections, and requiring the person wishing to contest to give notice in writing, stating the "cause" of such contest briefly, means the fact or combination of facts which give rise to the right of contest or of action, as the case may be. Whitney v. Blackburn, 21 Pac. 874, 876, 17 Or. 504, 11 Am. St. Rep. 857.

As the phrase "cause to believe a trader insolvent" is used in the bankrupt and insolvent laws, it means knowledge of such a state of facts in respect to the affairs and pecuniary condition of the debtor as would lead a prudent business man to the conclusion that the debtor cannot meet his obligations as they mature in the ordinary course of business. Goldsworthy v. Roger Williams Nat. Bank, 10 Atl. 632, 633, 15 R. I. 586.

In contracts of mutual interest, the cause of the engagement is the thing given, or done, or engaged to be given or done, or the risk incurred by one of the parties; and in contracts of beneficence, the liberality which one of the parties wishes to extend to the other, is a sufficient consideration. The civilians used the term "cause" in relation to obligations, in the same sense as the word "consideration" is used in the jurisprudence of England and the United States. It means the motive, the inducement to the agreement Mouton v. Noble, 1 La. Ann. 192, 193.

For removal from office.

A cause which is sufficient to authorize a removal from office of a city officer means legal cause, and not any cause which the council may think sufficient. The cause must be one which specially relates to and affects the administration of the office, and must be restricted to something of a substantial nature directly affecting the rights and interests of the public. A cause must be one attaching to the qualifications of the officer or his performance of its duties, showing that he is not a fit or proper person to hold the office. State v. Common Council of City of Duluth, 55 N. W. 118, 120, 53 Minn. 238, 39 Am. St. Rep. 595.

In State v. Common Council of City of Duluth, 55 N. W. 118, 53 Minn. 238, 39 Am. St. Rep. 595, involving the construction of the provisions of the charter of the city of Duluth, under which any member of the board of fire commissioners might be removed by a vote of two-thirds of all of the members elected to the common council of said city for a sufficient cause, the Supreme Court of Minnesota used this language: "Cause," or "sufficient cause," means legal cause, and not any cause which the common council may think sufficient. The cause must be one which specially relates to and affects the administration of the office, and must be restricted to something of a substantial nature directly affecting the rights and interests of the public. The cause may be one touching the qualifications of the officer, or his performance of his duties, showing that he is not a fit or proper person to hold the office. An attempt to remove the officer for any cause not affecting his competency or fitness would be an excess of power, and equivalent to an arbitrary removal. In the absence of any statutory specification the sufficiency of the cause should be determined with reference to the character of the office and qualifications necessary to fill it." In re Guden, 75 N. Y. Supp. 794, 798, 71 App. Div. 422.

"For cause," as used in New York City Charter (Laws 1873, c. 335) § 25, authorizing the removal of certain municipal officers for cause, means "a cause founded on some act of omission or commission by the officer in regard to his duties or affecting his general character, which the law and the public opinion will pronounce to be sufficient to justify a forfeiture of the office, and not in the political bias or personal dislike of the city's chief executive, nor in his leaning to another individual for whom the place is desired. Removals for cause are distinguishable from removals which are in the arbitrary will of the officer vested with the power, and which generally follow the changes of the removing power or of party ascendancy. A removal for cause must be for a substantial, reasonable, and just cause." In re Nichols (N. Y.) 6 Abb. N. C. 474, 480.

New York City Charter 1873, providing that the heads of all departments and all other persons whose appointment is provided for therein may be removed by the mayor for cause, means that "a reason must exist which is personal to the individual sought to be removed, which the law and a sound public opinion will recognize as a good cause for his no longer occupying the place. The removal must be for cause—that is, for some good reason which actually exists—and not for a false reason which the removing power honestly or mistakenly believes to be true." People v. City of New York (N. Y.) 19 Hun, 441, 448.

The New York City charter of 1873, prohibiting the removal of a regular clerk or head of a bureau by the head of the department until he has been informed of the cause of the proposed removal, is to be construed as meaning "reasonable cause," and hence the statute does not give unlimited discretion to the heads of the departments. People v. Thompson, 94 N. Y. 451, 452.

In Syracuse City Charter, § 199, providing that the city marshal may be removed for "cause" on charges duly furnished, the word "cause" implies some valid reason for the removal arising out of the nonperformance or improper performance of official duties by the incumbent. People v. McGuire, 50 N. Y. Supp. 520, 522, 27 App. Div. 593.

Const. 1870, art. 6, § 6, provides that judges may be removed from office by a concurrent vote of both houses of the General Assembly, and that the names of the members voting for or against the judge, with the cause or causes of removal, shall be entered on the journal of each house, etc. Under this constitutional provision it was held that the word "cause," as used in removal clause, means legal cause, and not any cause which the legislators might think sufficient, so that under that section the Legislature has no power to remove a judge for economic reasons or on grounds of policy not personal to the incumbent or his administration of the office. McCully v. State, 53 S. W. 134, 137, 102 Tenn. 509, 46 L. R. A. 587.

"Cause," as used in the New York City charter of 1873, limiting the power of the removal of clerks, employes, etc., given the board of fire commissioners, by declaring that it cannot be exercised in respect to any regular clerk until he has been informed of the cause of the proposed removal, and has had an opportunity of making an explanation, means "some delinquency, general neglect of duty, or incapacity to perform the duties, or some delinquency affecting his general character and his fitness for the office. The cause assigned should be personal to himself and imply an unfitness for the place, and such cause being assigned, if unexplained, the removal may be made." People v. Fire Com'rs of City of New York, 72 N. Y. 445, 449.

A city charter providing that the council may remove any person from office appointed by them, for cause, meant such cause as may be satisfactory to the council, and did not constitute the council a judicial tribunal to hear and determine, so as to require notice to be served on the party removed before they could obtain jurisdiction of his person, and the words "for cause" did not intend a judicial proceeding requiring notice. City of Hoboken v. Gear, 27 N. J. Law (3 Dutch.) 265, 287.

The word "cause," in a city charter empowering the mayor to remove an appointed officer for cause, in legal intendment, means upon sufficient charges, notice thereof, and a hearing. State ex rel. Brennan v. Walbridge, 62 Mo. App. 162, 164 (citing State ex rel. Gallagher v. Brown, 57 Mo. App. 199); State ex rel. Bristol v. Walbridge, 69 Mo. App. 657, 669.

Act March 24, 1873, authorizing the board of finance and taxation of Jersey City to appoint a city collector and to remove the appointee for cause, means a just cause, and the power of removal can be exerted only after the officer has had an opportunity for defense. Haight v. Love, 39 N. J. Law (10 Vroom) 14, 22.

Pub. St. c. 237, § 3, declares that the Supreme Court, on the petition of any creditor interested in any assignment for the benefit of creditors, upon due notice and for cause shown, shall remove any assignee named who shall neglect to render an inventory, etc. Held, that the words "for cause shown" meant a cause connected with such neglect, and that the assignee could not, therefore, be removed for any other cause than a neglect to render an inventory, schedule, etc. Case v. Mason, 23 Atl. 48, 15 R. I. 51.

Of accident or injury.

Condition distinguished, see "Condition."

In Moulton v. Inhabitants of Sanford, 51 Me. 127, 134, Chief Justice Appleton, in speaking of the proximate cause of the injury, says: "Ordinarily that condition is usually termed the cause whose share in the matter is most conspicuous and is the most immediately preceding and proximate in the event." Maryland Clay Co. v. Goodnow, 51 Atl. 292, 298, 95 Md. 330; Sturges v. Kountz, 30 Atl. 976, 979, 165 Pa. 358, 27 L. R. A. 390.

The word "cause" has two meanings—one as that which brings a thing to be, and the other as that on which a thing under given circumstances follows. So it was said in an action for injury to a fireman in a fireboat, whose foot was caught in an eye-splice while casting off lines from two coal-boats belonging to defendant, which had tied to the fireboat: "Undoubtedly in this case, if the line of defendant had not been on the Seth Low, the accident could not have happened. It was a thing on which, under the circumstances, the thing happened, but it was not the thing which brought the thing to be, for that was the starting of the Seth Low. Or, in the more familiar language of the law, the placing of the rope upon the Seth Low was the causa sine qua non, but the starting of the Seth Low was the causa causans." It was held that the proximate cause of the injury was the starting of the fireboat, and not in the rope or eye-splice, and therefore plaintiff could not recover from the owner of the coalboat. Trapp v. McClellan, 74 N. Y. Supp. 130, 133, 68 App. Div. 362.

Everything which induces or influences an accident does not necessarily and legally cause it. It might be the agency, or medium, or opportunity, or occasion, or situation, or condition, as it is variously styled, through or by which the accident happened, but no part of its real and controlling cause. Much must depend upon the circumstances of each particular case and upon the common sense of the thing. Cleveland v. City of Bangor, 32 Atl. 892, 896, 87 Me. 259, 47 Am. St. Rep. 326 (citing Spaulding v. Inhabitants of Winslow, 74 Me. 528).

Of accusation.

The constitutional provision that in all criminal prosecutions the accused has the right "to be informed of the cause and nature of the accusation" against him, means that the offense must be set out with clearness and all necessary certainty to apprise the accused of the crime with which he stands charged. United States v. Noelke (U. S.) 1 Fed. 426, 431 (citing United States v. Cruikshank, 92 U. S. 542, 568, 23 L. Ed. 588).

In Cathcart v. Commonwealth, 39 Pa. (1 Wright) 108, Mr. Justice Strong, in speaking of the constitutional guaranty that in all criminal prosecutions the accused shall have a right to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation against him, says that "an indictment must exhibit the nature and cause of the accusation; that it must set out the crime laid to the charge of the accused; but the mode in which the crime was committed, the instrument with which the murder was effected, whether it was held in the right hand or the left, whether the wound was inflicted on the head or the body, are entirely apart from the nature and cause of the accusation." So it may be said of an indictment in which one who, in point of fact, was strictly an accessory before the fact, is charged as principal. It is not necessary to state the means or agency by which he accomplished the murder, whether it was done by his own hand or the hand of another employed by him for the purpose. It is sufficient if the charge be stated with such certainty that he may know what he is called upon to answer. Campbell v. Commonwealth, 84 Pa. 187, 199.

The word "cause" is defined to mean that which produces or effects a result; that from which anything proceeds, and without which it would not exist. It is said that the word is used in this sense in the usual constitutional provision that a person accused of crime is entitled to demand the nature and cause of the accusation against him, and that, inasmuch as the effect cannot exist without a cause, a good indictment cannot, as a rule, exist without a statement of the essential facts and circumstances which are the cause of the alleged crime or result. State v. Dougherty, 4 Or. 200, 203.

Const. art. 1, § 10, providing that in all criminal prosecutions the accused hath a right to demand the nature and cause of the accusation against him, means that the facts constituting the offense must be set forth in the indictment with sufficient certainty, that the accused may know what he is called on to answer, so that he may prepare his defense accordingly. Norris v. State, 33 Miss. 373, 376.

Of imprisonment.

"The cause of imprisonment," as used in Act 1845, relating to the relief of persons imprisoned for debt, and providing that the debtor may petition that his property be assigned so that he may have the benefit of the provisions of the act, and providing, further, that the debtor must set forth in his petition the cause of his imprisonment, would embrace the name or names of, or the sum or sums due to, the creditor or creditors at whose suit the debtor is imprisoned. Spear v. Wardell, 1 N. Y. (1 Comst.) 144, 155.

CAUSE (Verb).

To cause a thing to be done is one thing; to direct it to be done is quite another thing. What is caused to be done is done; what is directed to be done is by no means always actually done. Burnham v. Aiken, 6 N. H. 306, 328.

In a declaration charging that defendant maliciously caused and procured plaintiff to be declared a bankrupt, the words "caused and procured," are to be interpreted in their ordinary sense, and the words are satisfied if a false statement by the defendant in fact occasioned such result, though the statement was, as a matter of law, insufficient to cause the adjudication which the court erroneously made. An interpretation of the words that nothing was a consequence of the defendant's untrue statement which would not be a necessary and legal result of the truth was incorrect. Farley v. Danks, 4 El. & Bl. 493, 499.

The destruction of property is caused by the owner's illegal or improper conduct, within the meaning of the term "caused," as used in Pamph. Laws 1854, c. 1519, if without such conduct on his part the destruction would not have occurred. Palmer v. City of Concord, 48 N. H. 211, 97 Am. Dec. 605.

As compel.

In a statute providing that in an action of trover the sheriff shall cause the defendant to give security for the protection of the chattel sued for, the word "cause" is synonymous with "compel," and authorizes the taking and holding of the body of the defendant until he does the act required. Poole v. Vernon (S. C.) 2 Hill, Law, 667, 670.

Comp. Laws, § 3322, declaring that the state board of education shall have power, and that it is made their duty, to prescribe and cause to be adopted, a uniform series of textbooks in the principal studies pursued in the public schools, means that the board must not only prescribe or select the books, but see that such books are adopted. State v. Board of Education, 1 Pac. 844, 849, 18 Nev. 173.

As permit.

In a declaration in an action against a town for injuries caused by a defective highway, alleging that the town "caused" and suffered the highway to remain out of repair, the word "caused" does not necessarily imply active and affirmative misconduct on the part of the town, its servants and agents. In other words, it does not necessarily mean that the town actually dug or caused to be dug in the highway the hole in question, but simply that the negligence of the town resulted in or caused the defect in question. Carroll v. Allen, 37 Atl. 704, 705, 20 R. I. 144.

Rev. Civ. Code La., declaring that he who causes, assists, or encourages another to commit an unlawful act is responsible in solido with the person causing the damage by such act, is not limited to persons who actually engage in some active assistance or encouragement, but includes as well persons whose duty it was to prevent the act, and who, through omission, neglected to do so. Comitez v. Parkerson (U. S.) 50 Fed. 170, 171.

As procure.

9 Geo. IV, c. 31, § 11, making it a felony to cause to be taken, by any person, poison or other destructive thing, does not mean that there must be any manual delivery of the poison, and where a servant puts the poison in a coffeepot, and sets it out for her mistress, stating that the coffee is for her, and the mistress pours and drinks it, there is "causing to be taken," within the meaning of the statute. Rex v. Harley, 4 Car. & P. 369, 371.

Gen. St. c. 35, § 9, providing that any person who causes the intoxication of another shall be compelled to pay for his care while so intoxicated, means the act of participating in causing such intoxication; and hence a liquor dealer is liable, though he only sells a portion of the liquor causing such intoxication. Werner v. Edmiston, 24 Kan. 147, 152.

An alternative writ of mandamus requiring the authorities of the port of Mobile to assess, levy, and "cause" to be collected a sufficient tax to pay the relator's judgment means that, so far as the authorities have control over the performance of duties by the tax collector, they shall exercise that control in favor of the collection of the taxes. United States v. Port of Mobile (U. S.) 12 Fed. 768, 770.

"Cause to be run," as used in Act March, 1828, appointing commissioners to settle the boundary line between the county of Gloucester and the counties of Salem and Cumberland, and providing that such commissioners "shall cause the line of partition to be run, surveyed, marked, and ascertained" is equivalent to the expression "to run." The expression contemplates the fact that the commissioners might not be practical surveyors, and would in such case find the aid of professional artists requisite; but the work was to be performed under their inspection. State v. Coleman, 13 N. J. Law (1 J. S. Green) 98, 99.

CAUSE (In Practice).

See, also, "Case"; "Civil Action—Case—Suit—etc."; "Criminal Case or Cause."

The term "cause" is defined in Burrill's Law Dictionary as "the origin or foundation of a thing, as of a suit or action; a ground of action." United States v. Rhodes (U. S.) 27 Fed. Cas. 785, 786.

"Cause," in its ordinary legal acceptation, means the subject of difference between parties as settled by the pleadings, whether oral or written. Davidson v. Farrell, 8 Minn. 258, 262 (Gil. 225, 228).

A statute provided that "all actions upon any statute for any forfeiture or cause, the benefit and suit whereof shall be limited to the party aggrieved, shall be commenced," etc. The statute was entitled "of the time of commencing actions for penalties and forfeitures." Held, that the intention was that the word "cause" should be limited by the word "forfeiture," immediately preceding it, to mean "cause of the same or like nature." Corning v. McCullough, 1 N. Y. (1 Comst.) 47, 69, 49 Am. Dec. 287.

As action, case, or suit.

"Cause" is defined to be, in practice, any suit or action, or any question, civil or criminal, contested before a court of justice. Taylor v. United States (U. S.) 45 Fed. 531, 539; Erwin v. United States (U. S.) 37 Fed. 470, 479, 2 L. R. A. 229; In re Farnum, 51 N. H. 376, 383; Nacoochee Hydraulic Min. Co. v. Davis, 40 Ga. 309, 320.

"Cause" and "case" are used as synonyms in statutes and judicial decisions, each meaning a proceeding in court, a suit, an action. Blyew v. United States, 80 U. S. (13 Wall.) 581, 595, 20 L. Ed. 638; Erwin v. United States (U. S.) 37 Fed. 470, 479, 2 L. R. A. 229.

The word "cause," in a statute authorizing an aggrieved party to except to "any opinion, direction or judgment of a district court in any matter of law, in a cause not otherwise appealable," is sufficiently comprehensive to include suits by statutory process. A term more comprehensive could not have been readily selected. Inhabitants of Bridgton v. Bennett, 23 Me. (10 Shep.) 420, 425.

The word "cause," in a statute providing that no more than two new trials shall be granted in the same cause, is used as synonymous with the word "case"; that is, that no more than two new trials shall be granted to the same party in the same suit or case. Shirts v. Irons, 47 Ind. 445, 447; Roberts v. Robeson, 22 Ind. 456, 458.

The word "cause," as used in Rev. St. 1874, p. 785, providing that, if any party shall fail to file in the circuit court the transcript of an order reversing the judgment below within two years, the cause shall be considered as abandoned and no further action had therein, means the particular suit in which the order of reversal is made shall be considered as abandoned, and not the cause of action. A new suit may, after such period, be brought on the original cause of action. Koon v. Nichols, 85 Ill. 155, 156; Fish v. Farwell, 43 N. E. 367, 372, 160 Ill. 236.

The term "causes," as used in Code 1881, § 409, providing that issues of law and issues of fact in causes that, prior to a certain time, were of equitable jurisdiction, should be tried by a certain court, is equivalent to and means the same as the word "suits." The word "cause" as used does not mean subjects. A court of equity might have exclusive jurisdiction of a suit relating to a subject of which it has only concurrent jurisdiction. Hendricks v. Frank, 86 Ind. 278, 283.

"Causes," as used in Act Cong. April 9, 1866 (14 Stat. 27) § 3, providing that the District Courts of the United States, within their respective districts, shall have, exclusively of the courts of the several states, cognizance of all crimes and offenses committed against the provisions of this act, and also, concurrently with the Circuit Courts of the United States, of all causes, civil and criminal, affecting persons who are denied, or cannot enforce in the courts or judicial tribunals of the states where they may be, any of the rights secured to them by the act, must be understood in the sense of causes of civil action and causes of criminal prosecution. "Burrill in his Law Dictionary thus defines 'cause': 'The origin or foundation of a thing, as of a suit or action.'" United States v. Rhodes (U. S.) 27 Fed. Cas. 785, 786.

The word "cause," as used in St. c. 133, § 17, providing that the caption of depositions shall state the "cause in which the deposition is to be used," is applicable to every species of action. The intention was that the adverse party should be apprised of the particular action in which a deposition might be intended to be used. This would be effectually done by naming the parties and the court where the action was pending, if no other action was pending between the same parties, as if the kind of action was named. If two actions were pending in the same court between the same parties, something more might be necessary to designate the one in which the deposition was intended to be used. Scott v. Perkins, 28 Me. (15 Shep.) 22, 33, 48 Am. Dec. 470.

Attachment proceedings.

A cause is a suit, litigation, or action, any question, civil or criminal, contested before a court of justice, and thus includes an attachment proceeding. Gibson v. Sidney, 69 N. W. 314, 815, 50 Neb. 12.

The word "cause," as used in Rev. St. c. 69, § 4, allowing an application for the transfer of a cause from a justice court, means the civil action in the justice court, and not merely an attachment incident thereto, and hence the attachment alone cannot be removed, since the attachment is a proceeding in a cause, and not the cause itself. Curtis v. Moore, 3 Minn. 29, 34 (Gil. 7, 12).

Election contest.

A contest over the election of a mayor is not a "cause," within Act 1877, c. 97, enlarging the jurisdiction of the chancery court. Baker v. Mitchell, 59 S. W. 137, 138, 105 Tenn. 610.

Ex parte order or decree.

The word "cause," as used in Code, § 4192, enacting that either party in any civil cause in the superior courts of the state may except to any sentence, judgment, or decision or decree of such court, contemplates a hearing when both parties are before the judge, and does not embrace an ex parte order or decree. Nacoochee Hydraulic Min. Co. v. Davis, 40 Ga. 309, 320.

Indictment distinguished.

"Cause," as used in the statute providing that every recognizance entered into before any court having criminal jurisdiction shall remain in full force and effect until the cause in which such recognizance shall be entered into shall be finally determined, does not mean indictment. "The indictment is not the cause. The accusation of criminality is the cause, and the indictment is an incident in pursuing the accusation. It is true that the term 'cause' sometimes expresses a suit or action, but it has a broader signification, which comprises the prosecution of a purpose or an object, and, as used in this act, is to be taken in the sense of 'prosecution.'" State v. Hancock, 24 Atl. 726, 728, 54 N. J. Law (25 Vroom) 393.

Mandamus.

An action in mandamus, under the statute of Illinois, is a cause in law. People v. Board of Trade of City of Chicago, 62 N. E. 196, 193 Ill. 577.

Rev. St. § 1263, provides that clerks shall be paid a certain sum for indexing the judgment in each "cause." Held, that the word was used in the sense of an action or lawsuit, and did not authorize a fee for each party to the case, but only one fee for the whole action. Clark v. Lucas County Com'rs, 50 N. E. 356, 357, 58 Ohio St. 107.

As used in Act 1864, c. 109, removing all disqualifications of a witness founded on the interest of the party, except where an original party to a contract or cause of action was dead, means the contract or cause of action in issue and on trial, and includes only an original party to the contract, who is also a party to the suit. Robertson v. Mowell, 8 Atl. 273, 274, 66 Md. 530.

As question of law or fact.

A "cause," in its usual and natural meaning, includes all questions that have arisen or may arise in it; and, where a judge before whom a cause or question has been heard or tried in the District or Circuit Court is disqualified to sit on the trial or hearing in such case in the Circuit Court of Appeals, there is a strong reason for holding that a judge who has once heard the cause, either upon the law or upon the facts, is therefore disqualified to take part in the Circuit Court of Appeals at the hearing and decision of the cause or any question arising therefrom, and certainly a judge who has once heard the cause upon its merits is disqualified. Moran v. Dillingham, 19 Sup. Ct. 620, 622, 174 U. S. 153, 43 L. Ed. 930.

Special proceedings.

Rev. St. § 828 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 635], allowing a clerk of a Circuit Court of the United States fees for docketing and indexing the cause, cannot be construed to include proceedings for the removal of a prisoner from one district to another for trial. "The application to the judge is a summary one, and accompanied by a copy of the indictment, information, or commitment of the commissioner before whom he has been examined, and ordinarily no evidence is required, except as to the identity of the accused, when the judge issues a warrant for his removal, and no papers are required to be filed with the clerk." United States v. King, 13 Sup. Ct. 439, 441, 147 U. S. 676, 37 L. Ed. 328.

Tayl. St. 1323, § 84, providing that any cause or matter in the county court may be removed to the circuit court, in case the county judge shall be interested in the controversy, includes a proceeding for contempt. Lamonte v. Ward, 36 Wis. 558, 563.

"Cause," as used in Common Law Procedure Act 1852 (15 & 16 Vict. c. 76, § 148), enacting that a writ of error shall not be necessary or used in any cause, does not include informations in the nature of quo warranto. Regina v. Seale, 5 El. & Bl. 1, 7.

A contest over the election of a mayor is not a "cause," within Act 1877, c. 97, enlarging the jurisdiction of the chancery court of Tennessee. Baker v. Mitchell, 59 S. W. 137, 138, 105 Tenn. 610.

While a scire facias to revive a judgment is merely a continuation of the original suit, a scire facias upon a recognizance or to annul a patent, or for any other similar purpose, is as much an original cause as an action for debt upon a recognizance or a bill of equity to annul a patent. United States v. Payne, 13 Sup. Ct. 442, 443, 147 U. S. 687, 37 L. Ed. 332.

A "cause" is defined to be an action at law, a suit at law or in equity, a judicial proceeding. The filing of a transcript of a judgment of a justice is not a cause. State v. Gordon, 86 Pac. 498, 499, 8 Wash. 488.

CAUSE IN LAW.

The term "cause in law," as used in Const. 1870, art. 6, § 12, providing that the circuit courts shall have original jurisdiction of all causes in law and equity, should be construed to include an action in mandamus. People v. Board of Trade of City of Chicago, 62 N. E. 196, 193 Ill. 577.

CAUSE OF ACTION.

See "Good Cause of Action"; "New Cause of Action"; "Same Cause of Action"; "Separate Causes of Action."

The primary right belonging to plaintiff, and the corresponding duty belonging to defendant, and the delict or wrong done by the defendant, consisting in a breach of such primary right or duty, constitute a cause of action. Pom. Rem. § 452. Stated in brief, a cause of action may be said to consist of the right belonging to the plaintiff, and some wrongful act or omission done by the defendant by which that right has been violated. Veeder v. Baker, 83 N. Y. 156, 160; Goodrich v. Alfred, 43 Atl. 1041, 1042, 72 Conn. 257; Harvey v. Parkersburg Ins. Co., 16 S. E. 580, 581, 37 W. Va. 272; Rodgers v. Mutual Endowment Assessment Ass'n, 17 S. C. 406, 410; Kennerty v. Etiwan Phosphate Co., Id. 411, 414, 43 Am. Rep. 607; Id., 21 S. C. 226, 234, 53 Am. Rep. 669; Drake v. Whaley, 35 S. C. 187, 190, 14 S. E. 397; Suber v. Chandler, 18 S. C. 526, 530; Mercantile Trust & Deposit Co. v. Roanoke & S. R. Co. (U. S.) 109 Fed. 3, 8; Davis v. State, 22 N. E. 9, 10, 119 Ind. 555; Baker v. State, 9 N. E. 711, 718, 109 Ind. 47; Wildman v. Wildman, 41 Atl. 1, 2, 70 Conn. 700; Howell v. Young, 5 Barn. & C. 259, 266; Jackson v. Spittall, L. R. 5 Q. P. 542, 552; Clark v. Eddy, 10 Ohio Dec. 539, 544.

"Causes of action are very often confounded with remedies, and, being regarded as synonymous, the rules established with reference to one are sometimes supposed to be applicable to the other. This, however, is a mistaken view of the subject. Causes of action may be defined in general terms to be legal rights invaded without justification or sufficient excuse. Upon such invasion a cause of action arises which entitles the party injured to some relief, but the cause of action and the remedy sought are different matters. The one precedes, and, it is true, gives rise to, the other, but they are separate and distinct from each other, and are governed by different rules and principles." Emory v. Hazard Powder Co., 22 S. C. 476, 481, 53 Am. Rep. 730.

A "cause of action" is a wrong committed or threatened. It may consist of the wrongful conversion of property or of the nonperformance of an agreement. In one case the cause of action would sound in tort, and in the other in contract. Miller v. Hallock, 13 Pac. 541, 542, 9 Colo. 551.

A cause of action is that which produces or effects the result complained of. Noonan v. Pardee, 50 Atl. 255, 256, 200 Pa. 474, 55 L. R. A. 410, 86 Am. St. Rep. 722.

"Cause of action" implies a right to bring an action, and some one who has a right to sue and some one who may lawfully be sued. Patterson v. Patterson, 59 N. Y. 574, 578, 17 Am. Rep. 384.

A cause of action is that which produces the necessity for bringing action. A cause of action does not arise until there is a necessity for bringing the action. Shelby Steel Tube Co. v. Burgess Gun Co., 40 N. Y. Supp. 871, 873, 8 App. Div. 444.

"Cause of action" is defined by Bouvier's Law Dictionary to be matter for which an action may be brought. A cause of action does not accrue until the existence of such a state of things as will enable a person having the proper relations to the property and persons concerned to bring an action. A cause of action is generally held to be a union of the right of plaintiff and its infringement by the defendant. Columbia Bank v. Equitable Life Assur. Soc., 80 N. Y. Supp. 428, 434, 79 App. Div. 601.

"The elements of a cause of action are: First, the breach of duty owing by one person to another; second, the damage resulting to the other from the breach." Post v. Campau, 3 N. W. 272, 275, 42 Mich. 90. The commission or omission of an act by the defendant, and damage to the plaintiff in consequence thereof, must unite to give a good cause of action. No one of these facts by itself is a cause of action. Fields v. Daisy Gold Min. Co., 73 Pac. 521, 522, 26 Utah. 373.

To constitute cause or right of action, two elements must concur—a duty and a breach of it. There can be no actionable wrong unless there is a duty resting upon a person, and he breaks it. If there is no duty, though the act of the defendant may work harm or damage, there is no right of action; it is a case of damnum absque injuria. Clarke v. Ohio River R. Co., 20 S. E. 696, 697, 39 W. Va. 732.

The elements of a cause of action are: (1) A right possessed by the plaintiff; (2) an infringement of such right by the defendant. And it can make no difference that such infringement is accomplished partly by a direct and immediate force, as that denominated "a false imprisonment," and partly by fraud or indirect force, as that denominated "a malicious prosecution"; for prosecutions for wrongs committed by direct force and those committed without direct force and merely by fraud or indirection are not necessarily kept separate. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Rice, 14 Pac. 229, 233, 36 Kan. 593.

Cause of action consists not only of the right of the plaintiff, but of the wrong of the defendant; and in an action to recover property the right of the plaintiff consists in being entitled to the possession of the property which is owned by him, and the wrong of the defendant consists in withholding from the plaintiff that which is rightfully his. And hence a cause of action is not changed, the complaint in which alleged that the plaintiff was the owner of the land under written evidence of title, by an amendment setting up that plaintiff was the equitable owner of the land. McCandless v. Inland Acid Co., 42 S. E. 449, 451, 115 Ga. 968.

The cause of action in a supplemental proceeding, and in an action against a judgment debtor for fraudulently concealing, removing, and transferring his property to defraud and delay the judgment creditor in the collection of the judgment, are the same. The right of the creditor was to have the money in the possession of the debtor applied in satisfaction of the judgment. The duty of the debtor was to apply that money, and his wrong was in withholding it and refusing to apply it in payment of the judgment. The judgment in the proceeding supplemental to execution is a bar to the other action. Baker v. State, 9 N. E. 711, 718, 109 Ind. 47.

In Jackson v. Spittall, L. R. 5 C. P. 552, "cause of action" is defined as the act on the part of the defendant which gives the plaintiff his cause of complaint. Matz v. Chicago & A. R. Co. (U. S.) 85 Fed. 180, 187.

As used in the statute relating to uniting several causes of action in the same suit, the phrase "cause of action" relates to each transaction or class of transactions which form the foundation of the action. Of course, the subject of action is not the cause of action, or the cause of any action or any cause of action. It is simply one of the elements of each of the several causes of action, uniting and binding them together in one action. Thus, in an action by one tenant in common against another for ejectment, rents and profits, and partition, the subject of the action is the real property; the causes of the action are the infringement by defendant of plaintiff's rights in that property. Scarborough v. Smith, 18 Kan. 399, 406.

A "cause of action," within Rev. St. art. 1194, subd. 25, providing that foreign corporations doing business in the state may be sued in any county where the cause of action arises, is made up of the contract and the breach of it. It takes these two parts, at least, to constitute the whole cause of action, within the meaning of the statute quoted. Westinghouse Electric Mfg. Co. v. Troell, 70 S. W. 324, 326, 30 Tex. Civ. App. 200.

The phrase "cause of action," as used in statutes fixing the jurisdiction of courts according to where the cause of action arises, means that which creates the necessity for bringing the action. It arises when that is not done which ought to have been done, and that is done which ought not to have been done. Durham v. Spence, L. R. 6 Ex. Cas. 46; Hibernia Nat. Bank v. Lacombe, 84 N. Y. 367, 384, 38 Am. Rep. 518.

The term "cause of action," as used in Rev. St. art. 1198, subd. 21, regarding venue, means "not only the right which the plaintiff has, but also the injury thereto. Thus, when there is a breach of contract which by its terms was to have been performed in any particular county, the cause of action arose there, and the defendant can be sued there." Houston & T. C. Ry. Co. v. Hill, 63 Tex. 381, 51 Am. Rep. 642.

The expression "cause of action," as used in Code Proc. N. Y. § 362, providing that the people will not sue for lands by reason of right or title in them unless the cause of action accrued within 40 years before the action is commenced, means that at some time previous to the action the people acquired the title, and that some person has wrongfully withheld the possession from the people, and that such wrongful withholding has not continued on the part of the present occupant, or his predecessors to whom he stands in privity of estate, for the period of 40 years before the action begun. Wright v. Phipps (U. S.) 90 Fed. 556, 575.

Action and suit distinguished.

See "Action"; "Suit."

As applicable to relief demanded.

The cause of action refers entirely to the facts stated, and not the relief demanded; so that, if the facts stated in the complaint constitute a single cause of action, a prayer for various and inconsistent kinds of relief will not render the pleading demurrable on the ground of the misjoinder of causes of action. Colstrum v. Minneapolis & St. L. Ry. Co., 18 N. W. 94, 95, 31 Minn. 367.

"Cause of action," as used in Code, § 56, declaring that if a cause of action exist against a defendant, as well as other facts mentioned therein, the court may order a summons to be served by publication, includes an application by a judgment creditor to obtain leave of court to issue an execution on a judgment which has become dormant by lapse of time. Pursel v. Deal, 18 Pac. 461, 463, 16 Or. 295.

As cause of one action.

"Cause of action," as used in 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95, § 128, relating to cases of concurrent jurisdiction, meant cause of one action, and were not to be limited to an action on one separate contract; and where a tradesman has a bill against a party for an amount due, in which the items are so connected together that it appears that the dealing is not intended to terminate with one contract, but to be continuous, so that one item, if not paid, shall be united with another, and form one continuous demand, the whole together forms but one cause of action, and cannot be divided. Where the plaintiff, who was carrying on business within the jurisdiction of the county court of A., sued defendant, who resided within the jurisdiction of the county court of B., for a bill, some of the items of which consisted of goods which had been ordered in the A. district, but delivered in the B. district, the whole formed one cause of action, within the meaning of the act. Bonsey v. Wordsworth, 18 C. B. 325, 334, (citing Grimbley v. Aykroyd, 1 Exch. 479, 3 Dowl. & L. 701; Wood v. Perry, 3 Exch. 442, 6 Dowl. & L. 34).

As claim.

See "Claim."

As facts giving right of action.

A cause of action is the fact or combination of facts which gives rise to a right of action. Mason v. Union Pac. Ry. Co., 24 Pac. 796, 798, 7 Utah, 77; Full v. Northwestern Mut. Relief Ass'n, 39 N.W. 529, 530, 72 Wis. 430. "A cause of action is said to accrue to any person when the person first comes to a right to bring an action." Brull v. Northwestern Mut. Relief Ass'n, 39 N. W. 529, 530, 72 Wis. 430. A cause of action is the existence of those facts which give a party a right to judicial interference in his behalf. Billing v. Gilmer (U. S.) 60 Fed. 32, 334, 8 C. C. A. 645. The Century dictionary defines a cause of action to be the situation or state of facts which entitles a party to sustain an action. Matz v. Chicago & A. R. Co. (U. S.) 85 Fed. 180, 187.

When used with reference to the pleadings by which the cause of action is alleged, the phrase signifies the facts upon which the plaintiff's right to sue is based, and upon which the defendant's duty has arisen, coupled with the facts which constitute the latter's wrong. Hutchinson v. Ainsworth, 15 Pac. 82, 84, 73 Cal. 452, 2 Am. St. Rep. 823; Phoenix Lumber Co. v. Houston Water Co., 61 S. W. 707, 708, 94 Tex. 456.

A cause of action has been held to mean every fact which is material to be proved to entitle the plaintiff to succeed; "every fact which the defendant would have had right to traverse." It has also been held to mean, not the whole cause of action, but that which, in popular meaning, and for many purposes in legal meaning, is the cause of action, viz., the act on the part of the defendant which gives the plaintiff his cause of complaint. Williamson v. Chicago, R. I. & P. Ry. Co., 51 N. W. 60, 62, 84 Iowa, 583.

The cause of the action is the fact or facts that justify it and show the right to maintain it; hence, when a material fact necessary to the recovery is omitted from a petition, we say it does not state a cause of action. The cause of action is the entire state of facts that give rise to an enforceable claim. The phrase comprises every fact which, if traversed, the plaintiff must prove to obtain judgment. Read v. Brown, 22 Q. B. Div. 128. There is a distinction between the term "cause of action" as used abstractly and as used in pleadings. In a general sense the term means a claim which may be enforced. It is the right which a party has to institute and carry through an action, while in pleadings it is the fact which gives rise to the action. It was contended that in an action for personal injury the cause of action was the injury wrongfully inflicted by the defendant through the negligence of the defendant—that is, that the cause of action was based on the defendant's negligence—but it was held that it was not such injury, but the fact or facts, that justify the action or show the right to maintain it; so that a complaint which alleged negligence in using defendant's system of bumpers in the coupling of its trains states a different cause of action from an amendment charging negligence in having the bumpers loose and out of repair. Box v. Chicago, R. I. & P. Ry. Co., 78 N. W. 694, 696, 107 Iowa, 660.

A cause of action exists where the legal rights of one party have been invaded by another. Chalmers v. Glenn, 18 S. C. 469, 471. To allege a cause of action a person or persons must allege all the facts showing his right, and also those showing its invasion by the defendant; and the facts thus alleged must in law, on their face, on the one side entitle him to the right which he claims, and on the other amount to an invasion by the defendant. Oliver v. Columbia, N. & L. R. Co., 33 S. E. 584, 585, 55 S. C. 541.

As good cause of action.

"If a person have a legal right to sue, he must necessarily have a 'good' (using that word, as it obviously is always used in this connection, in the sense of 'legally sufficient') cause of action. If he have no legal right to sue, he has not merely a bad cause of action, but no cause of action, so 'good cause of action' can mean no more than 'cause of action,' and the word 'good' in that connection is clearly superfluous." Hence an instruction that if plaintiff in good faith supposed he had a cause of action against the defendant on account of personal injuries, and threatened to sue the defendant on account thereof, and defendant executed a note in consideration that the plaintiff would not sue him for such injuries, such compromise and settlement was a good consideration for such note, and was sufficient without using the word "good" before "cause of action." Parker v. Enslow, 102 Ill. 272, 276, 40 Am. Rep. 588.

Judgment.

See "Judgment."

Proceedings in error.

2 Rev. St. p. 362 (2d Ed.) § 1, authorizing every poor person who shall have a cause of action against another to prosecute the same in forma pauperis, does not include a writ of error. Moore v. Cooley (N. Y.) 2 Hill, 412.

A cause of action embraces the facts that entitle a party to relief in an original action—the facts ordinarily stated in a petition. The cause of an action does not embrace within its signification a proceeding in error. The latter usually grows out of the proceedings had in a cause of action, and is distinguished from it by the name adopted. Travelers' Ins. Co. v. Myers, 52 N. E. 831, 832, 59 Ohio St. 332 (citing Hobbs v. Beckwith, 6 Ohio St. 252; Bode v. Welch, 29 Ohio St. 19; Lafferty v. Shinn, 38 Ohio St. 46; O'Donnell v. Downing, 43 Ohio St. 62. 1 N. E. 438).

Real actions included.

"Cause of action," as used in Code Proc. § 33, giving to the superior court jurisdiction when the cause of action shall have arisen or the subject of the action shall be situated within the city of New York, refers to personal actions only, and not to those where the subject of the action was land in another state. Bennett v. Erving, 27 N. Y. Super. Ct. (4 Rob.) 671, 672.

As used in the statute of limitations, § 21, the term "cause of action" included actions concerning realty as well as personal actions, applying to all causes of action. Sutro Tunnel Co. v. Segregated Belcher Min. Co., 7 Pac. 271, 273, 19 Nev. 121.

A cause of action is defined to be the right which a party has to institute and carry through a proceeding. Actions may be real, personal, or mixed. Hence Sayles' Civ. St. art. 3218, providing that in the case of the death of any person against whom there may be a cause of action limitations shall cease to run for 12 months, applies as well to real as to personal actions. Morgan v. Baker (Tex.) 40 S. W. 27, 29.

An action is nothing less than the right or power to prosecute in a judicial proceeding what is owed to one, which is but to say an obligation. The action therefore springs from an obligation, and hence the cause of action is simply the obligation. The cause of action is to be distinguished from a remedy, which is simply a means by which the obligation or the corresponding action is effectuated, and also from a relief sought. Frost v. Witter, 64 Pac. 705, 707, 132 Cal. 421, 84 Am. St. Rep. 53.

As requiring person to sue or be sued.

A cause of action is the right to prosecute an action with effect. No one has a complete cause of action until there is somebody that he can sue. Douglas v. Forrest, 4 Bing. 686, 704.

A cause of action being the right to bring an action, it implies that there is some person in existence who can assert, and also a person who can be sued. Douglas v. Beasley, 40 Ala. 142, 147; Parker v. Enslow, 102 Ill. 272, 276, 40 Am. Rep. 588.

As right of action.

The term "cause of action" is defined as the right which a party has to institute and carry through a proceeding. It is a matter for which an action may be brought; the ground on which an action may be sustained. People v. Dodge, 38 Pac. 203, 204, 104 Cal. 487.

A cause of action is a right to bring an action. The cause of action is a claim which may be enforced. It is the right which a party has to institute and carry through an action. The term "cause of action" is synonymous with the term "right of action." Lewis v. Hyams, 63 Pac. 126, 127, 26 Nev. 68.

"A cause of action may be defined to be the right which a party has to institute and carry on, through an ordinary proceeding in a court of justice by one party against any other party for the enforcement or protection of a right; the redress or prevention of a wrong." Meyer v. Van Collem (N. Y.) 23 Barb. 230, 231; Douglas v. Beasley, 40 Ala. 142, 147; Davis v. State, 22 N. E. 9, 10, 119 Ind. 555; Morgan v. Baker (Tex.) 40 S. W. 27, 29. The unity of the right to be enforced or the wrong to be redressed constitutes the unity of the action. In an action to collect debts, the wrong is the detention and non-payment of the debt. The ordinary action or proceeding for the collection of a debt ends with the judgment and execution. If in such an action the plaintiff seeks also to set aside a fraudulent judgment confessed by the defendant, and asks for a receiver and injunction, it does not follow that the complaint contains another cause of action, or more than one cause of action, because these remedies are asked for the purpose of collecting the same debt, or, in other words, as means to redress but one wrong and the same wrong. Meyer v. Van Collem (N. Y.) 28 Barb. 230, 231.

"Cause of action is what gives rise to the remedial right, or the right of remedy, which is evidently the same as the term 'right of action,' frequently used by judges and text-writers. * * * The cause of action must always consist of two factors: First, the plaintiff's primary right and the defendant's corresponding primary duty, whatever be the subject to which they relate, person, character, property, or contract; and, second, the delict or wrongful act or omission of the defendant, by which the primary right and duty have been violated." Hayes v. Clinkscales, 9 S. C. (9 Rich.) 441, 453 (quoting Pom. Rem. & Rem. Rights, pp. 554, 555).

The Missouri statute giving an action to the representatives of a person killed by means of the negligence of a common carrier creates a new cause of action, since at common law the persons designated in the statute did not have the right to sue on the situation or state of facts as used in the first definition, nor the right to bring an action for injury resulting in death under the subsequent definition. Matz v. Chicago & A. R. Co. (U. S.) 85 Fed. 180, 187.

The right of the state, created by statute, to recover for a wrong done, and the wrong committed, constitute the very essence of a cause of action which survives against the personal representative of the wrongdoer. Davis v. State, 22 N. E. 9, 10, 119 Ind. 555.

A "cause of action," in the sense used in relation to the venue of an action, is synonymous with "right of action," and includes the act without which no right of recovery could exist. When a thing is done which ought not to have been done, or when a thing is not done which ought to have been done, a cause of action arises. Bach v. Brown, 53 Pac. 991, 992, 17 Utah, 435.

Code Proc. § 71, declares that no action shall be brought on a judgment rendered in any court in the state, except a court of a justice of the peace, between the same parties, without leave of the court, for good cause shown, on notice, etc. Held that, under this provision, leave to prosecute first obtained was a condition precedent to the right of action on the judgment, which leave must therefore be alleged, or the complaint fails to show a "cause of action" which term is synonymous with "right of action," and "right of recovery"; and a complaint which does not show right of recovery fails to show a cause of action. Graham v. Scripture (N. Y.) 28 How. Prac. 501, 507.

As subject-matter.

In applying the rule that in order that a judgment in a former action may be a bar to a recovery in another action the cause of the action in the two cases should be the same, care must be taken to distinguish between the identity of the subject-matter of litigation and identity of the cause of action. The subject-matter in litigation may be the same, and yet the cause of action entirely different. Therefore, there is a well-settled rule of law on the subject of res adjudicata, that a former adjudication never affects after-acquired rights. State of Wisconsin v. Torinus, 9 N. W. 725, 727, 28 Minn. 175.

A cause of action is the subject-matter of the controversy, and is for all the purposes of the suit, whatever the plaintiff declares it to be in his pleadings. Pirie v. Tvedt, 5 Sup. Ct. 1034, 1035, 115 U. S. 41, 29 L. Ed. 331. See, also, Borst v. Corey, 15 N. Y. 505, 509.

Subject of action distinguished.

See "Subject (of action)."

Cause of action for tort.

The term "cause of action" includes suits for slander. Jack v. Shoemaker (Pa.) 3 Bin. 280, 284.

Rev. Code, c. 104, § 19, provides that a writ of foreign attachment may be issued against a nonresident 10 days after a return of a summons showing that he cannot be found, and proof satisfactory to the court of the cause of action; or upon affidavit that defendant resides out of the state, and is justly indebted to plaintiff. Held, that the phrase "cause of action" does not embrace a cause of action for tort. Smith v. Armour (Del.) 40 Atl. 720, 721, 1 Pennewill, 361.

CAUSE OF ACTION WHICH SURVIVES.

The clause, "the cause of action which survives," as used in Pub. St. c. 165, § 12, providing that, when there are several plaintiffs or defendants in an action, the cause of which survives, and one of them dies before final judgment, the action shall proceed, means survives to the surviving plaintiffs or against the surviving defendants. Brown v. Kellogg, 65 N. E. 378, 182 Mass. 297.

CAUSE PENDING.

"Cause pending," as used in Act 1790, providing that perjury may be committed in any "suit, controversy, matter, or cause pending" in any of the courts of the United States, should be construed to mean a first indictment with issue joined upon a plea of not guilty, though the indictment does not allege acts constituting a public offense at the time of their commission, and that on a demurrer it would have been so held, because the subsequent proceedings of the court thereon, including the requiring of bail for the appearance of the defendant, were not void. United States v. Reese (U. S.) 27 Fed. Cas. 746, 748.

CAUSEWAY.

As part of bridge, see "Bridge."

"Webster defines a 'causeway' as 'A way raised above the natural level of the ground by stone, earth, timber, fascines, etc., serving as a dry passage over wet or marshy ground, or as a mole to confine water to a pond or restrain it from overflowing lower ground,' and such is substantially the definition of the Century Dictionary." Ocean Causeway v. Gilbert, 66 N. Y. Supp. 401, 404, 54 App. Div. 118; Omaha & R. V. R. Co. v. Severin, 46 N. W. 842, 843, 30 Neb. 318. As used in a statute requiring a railroad to make one "causeway" or other adequate means of crossing its tracks, the term indicates the legislative judgment that a causeway, when applied to a railroad, is an adequate means of crossing its track. Omaha & R. V. R. Co. v. Severin, 46 N. W. 842, 843, 30 Neb. 318.

"Causeway," as used in Act 1849, § 12, requiring a railroad to make one "causeway" for each property through which the railroad passes, if necessary and if demanded, means a crossing so as to afford access to the lands separated by the railroad. Port v. Huntingdon & B. T. R. R., 31 Atl. 950, 951, 168 Pa. 19.

"Causeway," as applied to railroads in Code, § 1268, requiring railroads to make and keep in repair a causeway, means a way raised above the road. State v. Burlington, C. R. & N. Ry. Co., 68 N. W. 819, 99 Iowa, 565; Gray v. Burlington & M. R. R. Co., 37 Iowa, 119, 123.

CAUTION.

See "Ordinarily Cautious Person"; "Ordinary Caution."

The caution which the law requires a man to exercise in order to excuse homicide by misadventure is not the utmost caution that can be used. The law is not so extravagant as to require that a man should always do what is right to the very letter. It is sufficient that a reasonable precaution be taken, such as is usual and ordinary in similar cases, such as has been found by long experience, in the ordinary course of things, to answer the end of safety of life and property. The Europa, 2 U. S. Law Mag. 497, 500.

CAUTIOUS.

"Cautious" differs in meaning from "prudent." It suggests the idea of timidity, and Webster gives its secondary meaning as overprudent; fearful; timorous. A man is cautious chiefly as a result of timidity; hence an instruction that probable cause means a reasonable ground of suspicion, supported by circumstances in themselves sufficiently strong to warrant a really cautious man in the belief that the person so accused is guilty of the offense charged, is erroneous in substituting cautious for prudent. Eggett v. Allen, 82 N. W. 556, 558, 106 Wis. 633; McClafferty v. Phillip, 24 Atl. 1042, 1043, 151 Pa. 86.

CAVEAT.

The act of April 22, 1858, providing "that the probate by the register of the proper county of any will devising real estate shall be conclusive as to such realty, unless with five years from the date of such probate those interested to controvert it shall by caveat and action at law, duly pursued, contest the validity of such will as to such realty," is badly worded, and hence difficult of comprehension. The framer of the act knew that it would not do to make the probate absolutely conclusive of the execution of the will, that some time must be given within which to contest that execution, but he evidently was not acquainted with the legal forms necessary to reach that end. This is evident from the manner in which he has used the word "caveat," and also that in which he has connected it with the words "and action at law." He evidently regarded a caveat as a means or process for contesting a will, and an action or issue at law as a continuation thereof. Taking this view of the matter—and it is the only one that can be adopted without the rejection of a word which was evidently deemed material by the framer of the act—and the difficulty is of easy solution. Thus, the caveat will then mean the initiatory process, or notice preceding a contest before the register, and the action at law an issue triable in the common pleas, directed by the orphans' court, after an appeal thereto from the decree of the register, and this appeal may be taken, in the ordinary form, at any time within five years. Wilson v. Gaston, 92 P. 207, 213, 215 (cited and approved in Appeal of McCort, 98 Pa. 33, 37).

A caveat "is an intimation given to some judge or officer notifying him that he ought to beware how he acts in some particular affair, and suspend the proceedings until the merits of the caveat are determined." Slocum v. Grandin, 38 N. J. Eq. (11 Stew.) 485, 488.

A caveat is a caution entered in the court of probate to stop probates, administrations, faculties, and such like from being granted without the knowledge of the party that enters. Ex parte Crafts, 5 S. E. 718, 720, 28 S. C. 281 (citing Williams, Ex'rs, 581).

The office of a caveat, in proceedings to probate a will or other paper, is to arrest the proceedings until the truth of the facts alleged or affecting the validity of the will can be determined, and it inures to the benefit of all parties interested in the subject. In re Miller's Estate, 31 Atl. 58, 62, 166 Pa. 97.

CAVEAT EMPTOR.

The rule of law that the purchaser buys at his own risk is usually expressed in the maxim caveat emptor. Wood v. Ross (Tex. Civ. App.) 26 S. W. 148, 149.

Caveat emptor is an ancient rule of the common law, and stands in contradistinction to the rule of caveat venditor, and means that where a sale of goods is not accompanied with an express warranty by the seller, or there is fraud on his part, the buyer must stand all losses arising from latent defects. Hargous v. Stone, 5 N. Y. (1 Seld.) 73, 82.

Caveat emptor means, "Let the purchaser beware." It is one of the best settled maxims in the law, applying exclusively to a purchaser who is bound by actual as well as constructive knowledge of any defect in the thing purchased which is obvious, or which might have been known by proper diligence. Wissler v. Craig's Adm'r, 80 Va. 22, 32; Burwell's Adm'r's v. Fauber, 21 Grat. 446, 463; Tilley v. Bridges, 105 Ill. 336, 339.

The maxim caveat emptor signifies that it is the business of the buyer to be upon his guard, and that he must abide the loss of any imprudent purchase unless the goodness and soundness of the thing sold are warranted by the seller. It is said, however, that this principle is now exploded, and a more reasonable principle has succeeded, to wit, that a fair price implies a warranty, and that a man is not supposed in the contract of sale to part with his money without expecting an adequate compensation. Lynch v. Postlethwaite (La.) 7 Mart. (O. S.) 69, 186, 12 Am. Dec. 495.

Caveat emptor is a rule of the common law which implies that the purchaser must take care to examine and ascertain the kind or quality of the article he is purchasing, or provide against any loss he may sustain from his ignorance of the kind or quality of the article sold and from his inability to examine it fully, by an express agreement of warranty. Wright v. Hart (N. Y.) 18 Wend. 449, 453.

The rule is that every man dealing with another in reference to property that the other may have in his possession must take care. The property may be stolen or borrowed or pledged or in the possession of the bailee for some specific purpose, and, if so, the party in possession can convey no better or further right than he has himself. There are some exceptions, however, to this rule, as where the property is money or promissory notes not due, and also cases where the conduct of the true owner is such that he is estopped from setting up his title against an innocent purchaser. First Nat. Bank of Macon v. Nelson, 38 Ga. 391, 399, 95 Am. Dec. 400.

Caveat emptor means that where there is neither fraud nor warranty, and the buyer receives and retains the goods without objection, he waives the right to object afterwards, and is finally concluded, and the fact that he paid a full price for the goods does not raise an implied warranty that the goods were sound. Miller v. Tiffany, 68 U. S. (1 Wall.) 298, 309, 17 L. Ed. 540.

"As applied to sales of personalty in the absence of express warranty, where the buyer has an opportunity to inspect the commodity, and the seller is guilty of no fraud and is not the manufacturer or grower of the article he sells, the rule of caveat emptor applies, and the seller is not liable for defects in the article sold. If the purchaser distrusts his judgment, he can require of the seller a warranty as to quality or condition, and he cannot relieve himself and charge the seller on the ground that the examination will occupy time and is attended with labor and inconvenience. The rule applies even in the case of sales by sample, since the buyer may in such case protect himself by requiring a warranty that the goods to be delivered shall be the same as the sample exhibited." Barnard v. Kellogg, 77 U. S. (10 Wall.) 383, 388, 19 L. Ed. 987.

The doctrine of caveat emptor is that where the means of information are at hand, and are equally open to both parties, and no concealment is made, an attempted misrepresentation on the part of the vendor furnishes no ground for a court of equity to refuse to enforce the contract of the parties, providing such misrepresentation was not relied on by the vendee, and he judged for himself without availing himself of the means of knowledge at his command. Slaughter v. Gerson, 80 U. S. (13 Wall.) 379, 383, 20 L. Ed. 627.

The rule caveat emptor applies to the making of the contract of purchase, the negotiations, the agreement, the inducements upon which the purchaser acts, the grounds on which the minds of the parties meet, but not to the formal, clerical process of giving the purchaser written evidence of the completed bargain. Hitchins v. Pettingill, 58 N. H. 8 (citing Monroe v. Skelton, 36 Ind. 302).

In judicial sales.

"It may be regarded as a general and well-settled rule that the doctrine caveat emptor applies to all judicial sales." Tilley v. Bridges, 105 Ill. 336, 339.

The rule caveat emptor applies to the purchase of lands at a sheriff's sale, not only as to existing incumbrances, or paramount titles, but as to whether or not there is in fact any judgment sufficient to support the sale and deed. Brookfield v. Morse, 12 N. J. Law (7 Halst.) 331, 333.

In sales of land.

The maxim is used with reference to sales of property with respect to which the buyer must use proper diligence to inform himself as to its quality, and, in the case of real estate, as to its location. The quality of land on which its value depends, and which is too various for a market standard, the purchaser can see, if he will but look. No action lies against the vendor of real estate for false and fraudulent representations as to the location of lands. Land is not like a ship at sea; it has a known location and can be approached, and, even should it be necessary to purchase the land unseen, covenants may be inserted respecting the quality as well as seisin or title. Sherwood v. Salmon, 2 Day, 128, 136. He must look to the title papers under which he buys, and is charged with notice of all the facts appearing upon their face, or to the knowledge of which anything there appearing will conduct him. He may not shut his eyes or his ears to the inlet of information, and then say he is a bona fide purchaser without notice. Burwell's Adm'rs v. Fauber, 21 Grat. 446, 463.

CAVEAT VENDITOR.

Caveat venditor is a rule of the civil law, and means that, if the seller wishes to secure himself from future responsibility in case the article sold should afterwards be found to be different in kind or quality from what the party supposed it to be, he must take care or provide against such responsibility by a particular agreement with the purchaser. Wright v. Hart (N. Y.) 18 Wend. 449, 453.

CAVING.

Caving, as applied to land, means the falling in of the surface by reason of the taking away of its supports, either natural or artificial. Schultz v. Bower, 59 N. W. 631, 632, 57 Minn. 493, 47 Am. St. Rep. 630.

CAYENNE PEPPERS.

The genuine Cayenne peppers are a product of Cayenne, South America. The article commercially known as "Cayenne pepper" is composed of capsicum, rice flour, and other mixtures. The Encyclopedia Britannica, in describing Cayenne pepper, says: "Cayenne pepper is manufactured from the ripe fruits, which are dried, ground, mixed with wheat flour, and made into cakes with yeast. The cakes are baked hard, until like biscuit, and then ground and sifted. The pepper is sometimes prepared by simply drying the pods, and pounding them fine in a mortar." Cruikshank v. United States (U. S.) 59 Fed. 446, 447, 8 C. C. A. 171.

Cayenne pepper, as used in Tariff Act 1890, par. 326, relating to the duties on Cayenne pepper, unground, does not include Sierra Leone chilies, or bird peppers, whole, but in a dried state. Cruikshank v. United States (U. S.) 59 Fed. 446, 448, 8 C. C. A. 171.

CEASE.

The word "ceased," when used in speaking of a statute as having ceased to have any existence, means that it has passed out of existence as if repealed by a valid act of the Legislature. When it ceased to have existence, it was recalled or revoked. Oakland Paving Co. v. Hilton, 11 Pac. 3, 6, 69 Cal. 479.

"To cease is to put a stop to; to be done away with; to be an extinction. Webst. Dict. Thus, where a constitution declared that a statute should cease, it extinguished the statute as thoroughly as a legislative repeal would have done." Thomason v. Ruggles, 11 Pac. 20, 26, 69 Cal. 465.

Where a contract recited that a sum of money was loaned to a certain seminary, to be repaid when such seminary should cease, the word "cease" had no reference to the physical existence of the institution, but meant cease to be conducted as an institution of learning. Trustees of Canandarqua Academy v. McKechnie, 90 N. Y. 618, 626.

Existence of what is to cease implied.

"Cease," as used in Rev. St. c. 11, § 33, providing that a schoolhouse lot shall revert to the owner when the schoolhouse has ceased to be thereon for two years, requires that a schoolhouse should have been once maintained on the lot; and hence the statute does not cause the land to revert to the owner in a case where there never has been a schoolhouse on the lot, and the ground is allowed to remain without a schoolhouse for a period exceeding two years. Jordan v. Haskell, 63 Me. 189, 191.

As be forfeited.

The word "cease," in a corporation charter declaring that its corporate power shall cease for nonuser, etc., is equivalent to the phrase "shall be forfeited." Wallamet Falls C. & L. Co. v. Kittridge (U. S.) 29 Fed. Cas. 85, 86.

A policy of life insurance providing that, if the premium was not paid on the days named and in the lifetime of the insured, the policy should cease and determine, should be construed as meaning that it is suspended; that it ceases to bind the company and to protect the assured without any act or declaration on the part of the company. It does not require a formal forfeiture. It is voidable at the election of the company, and that election can be exercised without notice to the assured, for the reason that the policy itself is notice that his rights cease with the nonpayment of the premium. As to him it is a dead policy. Lantz v. Vermont Life Ins. Co., 21 Atl. 80, 82, 139 Pa. 546, 10 L. R. A. 577, 23 Am. St. Rep. 202.

CEASE TO BE OPERATED.

An insurance policy conditioned that the policy shall be forfeited if the property insured has ceased to be operated, except to set up new machinery or make repairs, does not apply to a temporary suspension of the principal work of a cotton factory, the watchman and others still being employed, whether such suspension was to set up machinery or repair, or not. American Fire Ins. Co. v. Brighton Cotton Mfg. Co., 17 N. E. 771, 775, 125 Ill. 131.

A fire policy on a sawmill providing that if the insured ceases to operate the mill it shall be void is to be construed as meaning its operation in the usual method, and is not violated by a temporary suspension of work by reason of sickness. Ladd v. Aetna Ins. Co., 24 N. Y. Supp. 384, 386, 70 Hun. 490.

A policy of insurance on a steam tannery, stipulating that the policy should be void in case of the assured "ceasing to operate the establishment," did not mean a mere temporary suspension of the business of the establishment for the purpose of repairing or from want of a supply of materials. Lebanon Mut. Ins. Co. v. Leathers (Pa.) 8 Atl. 424, 425.

A policy of insurance providing that, if the mill insured cease to be operated without the consent of the company, the policy should be void, meant something more than a temporary suspension. It meant a closing with the intention of ceasing operation, not a shutting down for a few days or weeks because of the happening of events incident to the conducting of a mill in that locality and which might be reasonably expected. City Planing & Shingle Mill Co. v. Merchants' Manufacturers' & Citizens' Mut. Fire Ins. Co., 40 N. W. 777, 778, 72 Mich. 654, 16 Am. St. Rep. 552.

"Ceased to be operated," as used in a fire policy on the machinery, tools, etc., of a manufacturing company which provided that it should become void if the establishment should cease to be operated without special agreement indorsed thereon, meant a permanent cessation of operations, and did not apply to a mere temporary interruption of operations occasioned by the prevalence of an epidemic. Poss v. Western Assur. Co., 75 Tenn. (7 Lea) 704, 707, 40 Am. Rep. 68.

Where a policy on a manufacturing establishment was renewed at the request of the assignee for the benefit of the assured's creditors, many days after the operation of the machinery ceased, but while the premises were occupied by the foreman, who was engaged in putting together and selling engines and other articles belonging to the assigned estate, the establishment has not "ceased to be operated," within the meaning of the policy providing that it should become void if the factory ceased to be operated for more than 10 consecutive days. Bole v. New Hampshire Fire Ins. Co., 28 Atl. 205, 206, 159 Pa. 53.

CEASE TO OCCUPY.

"Cease to occupy," as used in the homestead exemption laws of this state in reference to the act of an owner in ceasing to occupy the premises, means "a cessation of actual occupancy and residence, though accompanied with an intention to return and resume such occupancy." Quehl v. Peterson, 49 N. W. 390, 391, 47 Minn. 13.

CEASE TO RESIDE.

A provision in the charter of the city of Camden, § 11 (Laws 1871, p. 210), that when any officer elected at any election under this act shall cease to reside in the city, or, if elected for any ward, shall cease to reside in such ward, his office shall thereby become vacant, means the loss of such a residence therein as will disqualify him to be an elector. When the officer removes himself and his family out of the city or ward for a mere temporary residence elsewhere, as to a cottage at the seaside for residence during the summer, he does not cease to reside in such city or ward. State v. City Council of City of Camden, 39 N. J. Law (10 Vroom) 57, 58.

"Ceasing to reside," as used in Const. providing that the commission of any justice of the peace shall become vacant upon his ceasing to reside in the township in which he is elected, means the changing of his residence, and he does not cease to reside in the town or ward in which he was elected by the changing of such town or ward and the throwing it into a new municipality. State v. Dilloway, 31 N. J. Law (2 Vroom) 42, 43.

CEDAR.

The expression "cedar and other cabinet woods," as used in Tariff Act Aug. 27, 1894, par. 673, does not include lumber manufactured from the tree botanically known as "thuja gigantea," and commonly called "red cedar" or "canoe cedar." In re Myers (U. S.) 69 Fed. 237, 238.

CEDE.

Where one nation cedes territory to another, it hands over the title and sovereignty good against all the world, but this does not necessarily determine in what way it shall be held by the new sovereign. Goetz v. United States (U. S.) 103 Fed. 72, 77.

"Cede," as used in Act 1825, c. 105 (Pub. Loc. Laws for Baltimore City, art. 4, § 818), providing that the president, directors, and companies of the different turnpike companies owning roads running into the city of Baltimore may cede to said city such parts of the roads as lie within the corporate limits of said city, is not synonymous with, and to be interpreted in the same sense as, the word "grant." This is a word in no sense a technical one, but one in everyday use, and about which there ought not to be any difficulty as to its natural import and meaning. Like many other words, its precise meaning and signification depend somewhat upon the subject-matter in connection with which it is used. In some instances, it may, it is true, be used in the sense of grant, but ordinarily it means to yield, surrender, give up. In this statute it means to surrender. City of Baltimore v. Baltimore & Y. Turnpike Road, 31 Atl. 420, 421, 80 Md. 535.

A will giving a life estate to testator's wife, and at her death the lands to "cede" to his son, his heirs and assigns, to all intents and purposes means to yield up. Somers v. Pierson, 16 N. J. Law (1 Har.) 181.

CEDULE.

In the jurisprudence of France, "cedule" is the peculiar name of an act under private signature. "Obligation," when opposed to "cedule," means, in that jurisprudence, a notarial act. Campbell v. Nicholson, 3 La. Ann. 458, 461.

CELEBRATE.

"Celebrate" is equivalent to "solemnize," as used in Rev. Laws, 181, providing that every justice of the peace of the state, every stated and ordained minister of the gospel, and every religious society according to its rules shall be empowered to solemnize marriage, and means "nothing more than to be present at a marriage contract in order that it may have due publication before a third person or persons for the sake of notoriety and the certainty of its being made, and may be done before parents, friends, or strangers able to testify to the fact. In point of mere legal competency for witnessing or solemnizing a contract of marriage the law has made no distinction of persons." Pearson v. Howey, 11 N. J. Law (6 Halst.) 12, 19.

CELESTIAL MARRIAGE.

See, also, "Sealed."

In the Mormon Church, instead of the ordinary marriage, the parties are said to be sealed for time and all eternity, and such part of the sealing as relates to eternity is called "celestial marriage." Hilton v. Roy-lance, 69 Pac. 660, 664, 25 Utah, 129, 58 L. R. A. 723, 95 Am. St. Rep. 821.

CELLAR.

As building, see "Building."

CEMENT.

As merchandise, see "Merchandise."

CEMETERY.

See, also, "Burial Place"; "Burying Grounds."

Lexicographers define a cemetery "to be an area or place where the dead are buried." Metairie Cemetery Ass'n v. Board of Assessors, 37 La. Ann. 32, 35 (citing Wor. Dict.).

The word "cemetery" is defined by Webster to be a place or ground set apart for the burial of the dead, and this is the popular idea. What creates the cemetery is the act of setting the ground apart for the burial of the dead—marking and distinguishing it from adjoining ground as a place of burial. Concordia Cemetery Ass'n v. Minnesota & N. W. R. Co., 12 N. E. 536, 541, 121 Ill. 199.

"Cemetery" is synonymous with "burial ground." Jenkins v. Inhabitants of Andover, 103 Mass. 94, 104.

Six or more human bodies buried at one place constitutes the place a cemetery. Pol. Code Mont. 1895, § 2881.

Under Pol. Code, § 3016, a cemetery is created where six or more human bodies are buried at one place. City of Stockton v. Weber, 33 Pac. 332, 333, 98 Cal. 433.

A cemetery includes not only lots for depositing the bodies of the dead, but also avenues, walks, and grounds for shrubbery and ornamental purposes. All must be regarded as consecrated to a public and sacred use. Evergreen Cemetery Ass'n v. City of New Haven, 43 Conn. 234, 243, 21 Am. Rep. 643.

All burial places.

"Cemetery," in its legal meaning and as commonly used, comprehends all Christian burial grounds. Regina v. Justices of Manchester, 5 El. & Bl. 701, 707.

By reasonable implication the words "cemetery" and "burial place" include both public and private cemeteries and burial places, and an indictment that a person removed certain gates from the fence of a cemetery or burial place reasonably implies that they were removed from a public or private cemetery or burial place; and hence the indictment is sufficient to charge a violation of Rev. St. 1894, § 2041 (Rev. St. 1881, § 1962), prohibiting the removal of any fence or other work in or around any public or private cemetery or burial place under penalty of fine. Lay v. State, 39 N. E. 768, 769, 12 Ind. App. 362.

"Cemetery," as used in Act 1852, § 71, defining misdemeanors and declaring it a misdemeanor to disfigure any tombstone, fence, tree, etc., in any cemetery, means only such burying grounds as are established as provided for by statutory enactment, and does not apply to any place where the dead bodies of human beings are buried. Winters v. State, 9 Ind. 172, 174.

As a public place.

A cemetery is as public a place as a courthouse or market. It may not be frequented as much, but visits to it are as necessary and as certain, and the accommodation of the public requires a highway to it over which all must travel, so as to permit its dedication by public use. Cemetery Ass'n v. Meninger, 14 Kan. 312, 313.

CEMETERY LOT.

"It is commonly understood, when a cemetery lot is spoken of, that a plot of ground larger than that embraced within a single grave is meant. It is common knowledge that, in the division of cemeteries, 'lots' and 'single graves' have a separate and distinct meaning. To refer to a grave as embraced within the term 'lot' would do violence to the language; and therefore a contract requiring the payment of a certain sum for lots and a less sum for each grave opening does not require payments for graves on lots sold." Bennet v. Washington Cemetery, 62 N. Y. Supp. 87, 90, 47 App. Div. 365.

CEMETERY VAULT.

As building, see "Building (In Criminal Law)."

CENSO.

"Censo" is a term of the Spanish civil law, meaning "ground rent." It is also used by some authors as an equivalent of annuity, or a contract by which one person sells and another purchases a right to receive an annual pension or sum. It is further defined to be an incumbrance which one imposes on his property in favor of another who advances him a certain capital, and in that sense it is a right to receive an annual pension to secure the payment of which some other property is pledged. There are three species of censo, as known to the laws of Spain, to wit, the emphyteutic, the consignativo, and the reservativo. The emphyteutic is the right which one has to exact from another a certain annual pension or sum, by virtue of a transfer to him of the usufructuary right of real property, the legal title remaining in the grantor. The censo consignativo is the right to exact from another an annuity in virtue of having advanced money, and which money is made a charge upon lands of the person who promises to pay the annuity, the full title to such lands remaining in the grantor of the annuity. The censo reservativo is the right to receive from another an annual pension by virtue of having transferred land to him by full and perfect title. Trevino v. Fernandez, 13 Tex. 630, 635, 655.

CENSO AL QUITAR.

The expressions "censo al quitar" and "censo redimible" are identical with each other, and mean a redeemable annuity. Trevino v. Fernandez, 13 Tex. 630, 655.

CENSO ENFITEUTICO.

"Censo enfiteutico" is a term used in the Spanish law. "Eschriche says that the censo enfiteutico is the right which we retain to require of another a certain annual charge or rent by reason of having transferred to him forever, or for a great length of time, the useful ownership of some real estate, reserving to ourselves the direct dominion. Again, the same author says the direct owner or imposer of the censo is he who transfers the useful dominion of the real estate, while the grantee of enfiteutico is he who acquires the useful ownership of the thing charged." Hart v. Burnett, 15 Cal. 530, 557.

CENSO REDIMIBLE.

See "Censo al Quitar."

CENSORIOUSNESS.

"Censoriousness is defined by Webster to be a disposition to blame and condemn; the habit of censure and reproaching. And such is its meaning in the definition of a libel as a censorious and ridiculing writing towards an individual. The degree of censure does not enter into the definition." Cooper v. Greeley (N. Y.) 1 Denio, 347, 359.

CENSURE.

The word "censure" is synonymous with the words "reproach" and "obloquy." Bettner v. Holt, 11 Pac. 713, 716, 70 Cal. 270.

CENSUS.

See "State Census."

A "census" is the official registration of the number of the people; an official enumeration of the inhabitants of a state or country with details of sex and age; in the Roman law, a numbering or enrollment of the people with the valuation of their fortunes; the official counting or enumeration of the people of a state or nation with statistics, etc.; official reckoning or enumeration of the inhabitants and wealth of a country. City of Huntington v. Cast, 48 N. E. 1025, 1026, 149 Ind. 255.

The word "census," as used in the statute directing the board of education to make a complete census of the inhabitants, showing the number of inhabitants in each district, the number of each sex, and such other particulars as the board may direct, does not authorize the board to make a census of the wealth of the inhabitants. Republic v. Paris, 10 Hawaii, 579, 581.

CENSUS CHILDREN.

"Census children," as used in Gen. St. p. 337, relating to the organization of school districts out of parts of two counties, and providing that the commissioners of the county having the larger number of census children shall appoint two trustees, etc., means the number of children officially registered, as "census" means the official registration of the number of the people. State v. Sweeney, 55 Pac. 88, 90, 24 Nev. 350.

CENTER.

2 Rev. Laws, 283, providing that in case of persons meeting each other on any road or public highway, traveling with carriages, sleighs, or wagons, the persons so meeting shall seasonably turn to the right of the center of the road, means the center of the worked part of the road, irrespective of the smooth or traveled track, although the whole of the smooth or traveled path may be on one side of that center. Earing v. Lansingh (N. Y.) 7 Wend. 185, 187.

1 Rev. St. p. 695, § 1, providing that whenever any persons traveling with carriages shall meet on any public highway, the persons so meeting shall seasonably turn to the right of the center of the road, must be construed to mean, when the center of the road is obscured by snow, to be the center of the beaten or traveled track, without reference to the worked part of the road. Smith v. Dygert, 12 Barb. 613, 616.

CENTER LINE.

The center line of a road or railroad is the line equidistant from each of the side lines, and is usually the line surveyed when the road is laid out. The term is used in distinction from the side lines of the road, as all public roads and highways and railroads are regarded as having three lines—the center line and the two side lines. Maynard v. Weeks, 41 Vt. 617, 619.

A deed describing land as lying adjoining and parallel with a certain railroad, the nearest part of the land being 20 feet distant from the center line of the railroad, should be construed to refer to the center of the track, and to indicate the track as a monument which aids in determining a certain boundary, and not to the right of way. Peoria & P. U. Ry. Co. v. Tamplin, 40 N. E. 960, 962, 156 Ill. 285.

CENTRAL TIME.

What is known as simple standard time—central time—is merely the solar time of the ninetieth meridian west of Greenwich. It is used and extends between the ninetieth meridian running west to the one hundred and fifth. Ex parte Parker, 29 S. W. 480, 481, 35 Tex. Cr. R. 12.

CENTS.

See "C.—Ct.—Cts."

In construing a contract made in one of the rebellious states in 1864, requiring the payment of a certain sum in dollars and cents, it was said on appeal that the trial court erred in refusing to give an instruction that the legal meaning of the terms "dollars and cents" is specie—that is, gold or silver, or whatever thing or article, or paper, the laws of the United States declared to be a legal tender—and that the word "dollars," in the note, means specie or legal tender notes of the United States. Miller v. Lacy, 33 Tex. 351, 353.

"Dollars and cents" have a well-recognized meaning as commonly used. The common definition is the unity of money by which values of commodities are measured. It is thus apparent that a defendant must have understood that he was charged with having in his possession, custody, and control money of the amount and value specified by the allegation in an indictment charging him with having in his possession and control a certain number of dollars and cents. People v. Lammerts, 58 N. E. 22, 23, 164 N. Y. 137.

CERA IMPRESSA.

"Cera impressa" means a seal. "It need not necessarily refer to an impression on wax, but an impression made on wafers or other adhesive substances capable of receiving an impression, will come within the definition of 'cera impressa.' If, then, 'wax' be construed to be merely a general term, including within it any substance capable of receiving and retaining the impression of a seal, we cannot perceive why paper, if it have that capacity, should not as well be included in the category. The simple and powerful machines now used to impress public seals do not require any soft or adhesive substance to receive or retain their impression. The impression made by such a power on paper is as well defined as durable, and less likely to be destroyed or defaced by vermin, accident, or intention, than that made on wax. It is the seal which authenticates, and not the substance on which it is impressed; and, where the court can recognize its identity, they should not be called upon to analyze the material which exhibits it." Pierce v. Indseth, 1 Sup. Ct. 418, 421, 106 U. S. 546, 27 L. Ed. 254.

CEREBRAL EMBOLISM.

Cerebral embolism, according to Gould's Dictionary of Medicine, is the obstruction of an artery or capillary, usually by a blood clot or embolus brought from another point by the blood current, and that, around the seat of an embolus, thrombosis occurs, with the production of an infarct. In other words, using simply plain English, that in such case there is some lesion of the brain; and, where such lesion has rendered the party incapable of continuous or connected thought, he will be considered of unsound mind or insane. Cundall v. Haswell, 51 Atl. 426, 428, 23 R. I. 508.

CERTAIN.

See "Place Certain"; "Reasonably Certain."

A writing acknowledging the receipt of a note as collateral security for certain notes held by the receptor against the giver, on which the time was extended, means all notes and not a particular portion or description of those notes of the giver in the hands of the receiver. Martin v. Bell, 18 N. J. Law (8 Har.) 167.

"Certain powers and privileges," as used in Act Feb. 10, 1883 (Acts 1882-83, p. 342), entitled an act to establish a separate school district and for the appointment of a board of trustees therefor with certain powers and privileges, has no force under the constitutional provision that each law shall contain but one subject, which shall be clearly expressed in its title, nor does it enlarge the comprehensiveness of the subject expressed in its title—the establishment of a separate school district without expressing the appointment of trustees in the title. Provisions for their appointment with proper powers and privileges follow as a compliment to the general subject necessary or proper to the control and management of the public schools in the district, and the full accomplishment of the purposes indicated. The words "certain powers and privileges" would not apprise either the Legislature or the public that the act contained provisions authorizing the organization of a local police government, and conferring the power on the trustees to enact and enforce in the district police regulations foreign to the natural purposes and objects of a separate school district. Glenn v. Lynn, 7 South. 924, 89 Ala. 608.

"Certain and determinate," in the rule that, before a remainder is vested, the person taking the same must be certain and determinate, imports that the person must be one to whose competency to take no further or other condition attaches; one in respect to whom it is not necessary that any event shall occur or condition be satisfied save only that the precedent estate shall determine. Bunting v. Speek, 21 Pac. 288, 291, 41 Kan. 424, 3 L. R. A. 690.

As capable of being rendered certain.

In matters of obligations, a thing is certain when its essence, quality, and quantity are sufficiently described, such as one hundred dollars, such a house, or such a horse. Civ. Code La. 1900, art. 3556, subd. 7.

In a deed containing the usual clauses of warranty, but excepting from the warranty and the covenant against incumbrances "a certain mortgage," the date and amount thereof and the mortgagee's name being left blank, the description of the mortgage excepted is sufficient where there was only one mortgage on the premises. That is certain which can be made certain, and, until two mortgages appear, there is no ambiguity. Cooper v. Bigly, 18 Mich. 463, 479.

A contract is certain when the thing to be done is supposed to depend on the will of the party, or when in the usual course of events it must happen in the manner stipulated; hence a contract for the purchase of crops of fruit to be grown in subsequent years is a certain contract. Losecco v. Gregory (La.) 32 South. 985, 986.

CERTAIN ATTORNEY.

The words "certain attorney," in an appeal bond made payable to the appellee corporation or its certain attorney, mean its authorized attorney. Such a bond is not subject to the objection that it is in the alternative, as such attorney could have enforced the bond, in the absence of such provision, as the representative of the appellee. Brazoria County v. Grand Rapids School Furniture Co. (Tex. Civ. App.) 43 S. W. 900, 901.

CERTAIN DEMAND.

The term "certain demand" has been held in Duncan v. Magrette, 25 Tex. 245, to have the same meaning as debt. Worley v. Smith, 63 S. W. 903, 904, 26 Tex. Civ. App. 270.

CERTAIN DUTY.

A duty is certain when by law it must be absolutely performed, and the occasion and mode of its exercise are fixed, so that nothing remains subject to the discretion of the officer. Morton v. Comptroller General, 4 S. C. (4 Rich.) 430, 473.

CERTAIN PIECE OF LAND.

Pub. St. c. 146, § 3, authorizes the shell-fish commissioners to lease "any piece of land in certain ponds not exceeding one acre in one lot or parcel to any one person." A lease described premises, consisting of 10 acres lying together in a single parcel, as "a certain piece of land." Held, that the words quoted prima facie signified a single parcel or lot of land, and hence it could not be presumed that the 10-acre piece was divided into separate lots and leased together, by reason of which the lease was void. State v. Burdick, 2 Atl. 764, 766, 15 R. I. 239.

CERTAIN RENT.

Within the meaning of the statute declaring that it shall be unlawful to commence or prosecute any proceedings to obtain possession of any land or tenement under the provisions of Act Dec. 14, 1863, unless such proceeding shall be founded upon a written lease or contract, or upon a parol agreement by which the relation of landlord and tenant is established between the parties and a certain rent is therein reserved, a reservation of interest and taxes accruing on land is not a certain rent. Davis v. Davis, 7 Atl. 746, 115 Pa. 261.

"Certain," as used in the law authorizing landlords to distrain for rent where the same is certain, means such rent as is capable of being rendered certain, as where it was a certain sum per acre, and the number of acres demised was capable of being ascertained by proof. Smith v. Fyler (N. Y.) 2 Hill, 648, 649.

"Certain rents," as used in Act March 21, 1772 (1 Smith's Laws, 370), relating to lands and tenements leased to any person for a term of years or at will, paying certain rents, and the method of procedure to be followed by the landlord to repossess himself of the estate on the termination of the lease, should be construed to include the payment of taxes, and daubing and chinking a house of certain dimensions, as rent, for there was certainty in the rent, the taxes could be exactly ascertained, and the work to be done on the house accurately described. Shaffer v. Sutton, 5 Bin. 228, 230.

CERTAIN SUM OF MONEY.

A "definitive or certain sum of money," within the meaning of a statute imposing a duty on bonds given as security for the payment of any definitive or certain sum of money, not exceeding, etc., means the principal of the bond, to be ascertained from the bond itself, and does not include interest thereon. Barker v. Smark, 7 Mees. & W. 590, 592.

CERTAINTY.

See "Convenient Certainty"; "Moral Certainty"; "Reasonable Certainty."

"Certainty" may be defined to be "the clear and distinct setting down of facts so that they may be understood by the party who is to answer the matters stated against him, the counsel who are to argue them, the jury who are to decide on their existence, and the court, who are the judges of the law arising out of them. State v. Hayward, 83 Mo. 299, 309; State v. Terry, 19 S. W. 206, 211, 108 Mo. 601.

"'Certainty' means the absence of doubt." Gulf, C. & S. F. Ry. Co. v. Harriett, 15 S. W. 556, 558, 80 Tex. 73; State v. Shaw, 49 N. C. 440, 443.

"Certainty" means that which, upon a fair and reasonable construction, may be called certain without recurring to possible facts. Spencer v. Southwick, 9 Johns. 314, 317.

It has been held that by the term "certainty," as applied to the degree of proof required, is meant generally that there must be sufficient positive facts proved to take the matter out of the realm of conjecture and presumption. Reynolds v. Blaisdell, 49 Atl. 42, 43, 23 R. I. 16.

"The principal rule as to the certainty required in an indictment must be stated thus: That where the definition of an offense, whether by a rule of common law or by statute, includes general terms, it is not sufficient that the indictment should charge the offense in the same terms as in the definition, but it must state the species—it must descend to particulars. State v. Burke, 52 S. W. 226, 227, 151 Mo. 136, 143.

Certainty in pleadings includes both precision and particularity, but these words are used in a sense opposed to ambiguity and generality. Reasonable certainty of description is all that can be required, even in reference to written instruments, involving such particularity only as would lead to the identification of the property, and enable the sheriff to seize it under process. David v. David's Adm'r, 66 Ala. 139, 148.

CERTAINTY TO A CERTAIN INTENT IN GENERAL.

In the case of Rex v. Mayor, etc., of Lyme Regis, 1 Doug. 149, 158, Mr. Justus Buller says, "Certainty to a certain intent in general means what upon a fair and reasonable construction may be called certain, without recurring to possible facts which do not appear, and is what is required in declarations, replications, and indictments in the charge or accusation, and returns to writs of mandamus." "The charge must contain such a description of the crime, etc., that, without intending anything but what appears, the defendant may know what he is to answer, and what is intended to be proved, in order that the jury may be warranted in their verdict and the court in the judgment they are to give." United States v. Watkins (U. S.) 28 Fed. Cas. 419, 427 (quoting Rex v. Horne, Cowp. 682). See, also, State v. Schmitt, 9 Atl. 774, 775, 49 N. J. Law (20 Vroom) 579; Moseley v. White (Ala.) 1 Port. 410, 417.

CERTAINTY TO A COMMON INTENT.

"Certainty to a common intent," as it is technically called, can mean no more than that. David v. David's Adm'r, 66 Ala. 139, 148.

"Certainty to a common intent," as the term is used in relation to indictments for larceny, when applied to description of stolen property, means such certainty as will enable the jury to say whether the chattel proved to be stolen is the same as that upon which the indictment is founded, and will judicially show to the court that it could have been the subject-matter of the offense charged. State v. Parker, 34 Ark. 158, 159, 36 Am. Rep. 5.

CERTIFICATE.

See "Headright Certificates"; "Liquor Tax Certificate"; "Location Certificate"; "Official Certificate"; "Teacher's Certificate."

A certificate is a declaration in writing. Ticonic Bank v. Stackpole, 41 Me. 302, 305.

A certificate is defined (1) as a documentary declaration regarding facts from the public authority, as an attestation of facts contained in a public record; (2) in law, a writing so signed and authenticated as to be legal evidence. Stand. Dict. It is defined by Bouvier as a writing by which testimony is given that the fact has or has not taken place. A statement of the vote of the town on the question of local option over the signature of the town clerk is a certified copy of the statement of the result of the vote within the definition of the term "certificate." People v. Foster, 58 N. Y. Supp. 574, 579, 27 Misc. Rep. 576.

"Certificate," as used in Rev. St. § 5392 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3653], declaring that every person who, having taken an oath that he will certify truly any declaration, deposition, or certificate, wilfully subscribes to any material matter which he does not believe to be true, is guilty of perjury, is not used as a term of art or in any technical sense, but is used in its ordinary popular sense to signify a certificate to any statement or material matter of fact, sworn to and certified by the party charged with perjury. United States v. Ambrose, 2 Sup. Ct. 682, 684, 108 U. S. 336, 27 L. Ed. 746.

When a person delivers to the officer whose duty it is to issue marriage licenses a paper purporting to be a request from the father of the girl to issue a license to marry her, such paper is not a "certificate," within Code 1873, §§ 3917, 3918, inflicting penalties for falsely making, altering, forging, etc., or uttering and publishing, any attestation or certificate of any public officer or other person in relation to any matter wherein such attestation or certificate is required by law, or may be received or be taken as legal proof, as section 2191 provides that, if either party is a minor, the consent of the parent or guardian must be filed in the clerk's office after being acknowledged by the said parent or guardian or proved to be genuine; and the writing contemplated by the section is not mere proof of a fact. It is the act or deed itself constituting the consent of the parent or guardian which must be filed with the clerk, and the proof of that consent is the acknowledgment of the person who gave it or other competent evidence. State v. Rhine, 50 N. W. 676, 677, 84 Iowa, 169.

A certificate of acknowledgment by a notary public or other authority is simply an additional solemnity in the execution of a deed or mortgage, and is required by statute chiefly for the purpose of affording proof of the due execution of the instrument by the grantor, sufficient to authorize the recorder to make the same matter of public record. Read v. Toledo Loan Co., 67 N. E. 729, 730, 68 Ohio St. 280, 62 L. R. A. 790, 96 Am. St. Rep. 663.

Jurat.

The term "certificate," as used in the statute fixing the fees of officers, means a formal certification of some fact, such as the certificate attached to a judgment roll, or to a certified copy of a record or paper, and does not embrace a jurat. Comstock Mill & Min. Co. v. Allen, 31 Pac. 434, 436, 21 Nev. 325. See, also, United States v. Julian, 16 Sup. Ct. 801, 162 U. S. 324, 40 L. Ed. 984.

A jurat, when spoken of as the certificate of an officer who administers an oath, is included in the term "certificate." United States v. McDermott, 11 Sup. Ct. 746, 747, 140 U. S. 151, 35 L. Ed. 391.

License.

The term "certificate," in Act July 1, 1897, entitled "An act to provide for licensing of plumbers, and to supervise and inspect plumbing," which directs a certificate to be issued by a board of the city to a plumber on examination and payment of a fee of $5, is to be construed as meaning a license, which Webster defines to be a formal permission from proper authority to perform certain acts or carry on a certain business, which without such permission would be illegal; and therefore the act operates to preclude the city from exacting a higher license fee. Wilkie v. City of Chicago, 58 N. E. 1004, 1007, 188 Ill. 444, 80 Am. St. Rep. 182.

Protest.

"Certificate," as used in Act 1841, c. 44, § 6, which provides that every notary public shall record at length in a book of record all acts, protests, depositions, and other things by him noted or done in his official capacity, and that all acts or "certificates" by him granted shall be under his hand and seal, and shall be received as evidence of such transaction, is equivalent to the word "protest," as used in section 12, which provides that the protest of any foreign or other bill of exchange shall be legal evidence of the facts stated in such protest. Ticonic Bank v. Stackpole, 41 Me. 302, 305.

Warrant.

The word "certificates," as used in a will giving the testatrix's certificates in the hands of her brother to her husband, does not include warrants for a large amount of bounty lands which belonged to the testatrix, as the words "certificates" and "warrants" are not synonymous. Edmonson v. Bloomshire, 78 U. S. (11 Wall.) 382, 388, 20 L. Ed. 44.

CERTIFICATE OF DEPOSIT.

A certificate of deposit, like a deposit credited in a passbook, represents money actually left with the bank for safekeeping, which are to be retained until the depositor demands them. Bank of Commerce v. Harrison (N. M.) 66 Pac. 460, 461. And it is generally made negotiable. Reed v. Board of Education, 39 Ohio St. 635, 638.

A certificate of deposit is simply an acknowledgment of so much money deposited with a bank, and has the same force and effect as a receipt for money. The word "certify" adds no additional force to the instrument, as purporting a contract. A certificate or acknowledgment that another has deposited a sum of money has the effect of an acknowledgment by one party that he has received a sum of money from another, and such certificate is not the basis of an action, like a promise in writing, but, like a receipt, would be evidence of an implied promise to pay in an action for money had and received. Hotchkiss v. Mosher, 48 N. Y. 478, 482.

A certificate of deposit is a subalisting chose in action, and represents the funds it describes, as in case of notes, bonds, and other securities, so that delivery of it as a gift constitutes an equitable assignment of the money for which it calls. Commonwealth v. Compton, 20 Atl. 417, 418, 137 Pa. 138.

The phrase "certificate of deposit," as used in Rev. St. § 5413 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3662], defining the words "obligation or other security," and directing that they shall mean, among other things, certificates of indebtedness and certificates of deposit, includes a certificate issued by an army paymaster to an enlisted man, acknowledging the receipt of money deposited under the provision of Rev. St. § 1305 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 925]. It is true it does not contain all the incidents which belong to a "certificate of deposit," as that term is understood in banking, but it acknowledges the receipt of money from the depositor for deposit with the United States, and the date, place, and amount thereof, but it does not state the time when it is repayable. Notwithstanding this omission, the paper is substantially a certificate of deposit. Neall v. United States (U. S.) 118 Fed. 699, 706, 56 C. C. A. 81.

As current funds or money.

See "Current Funds"; "Money."

As a promissory note.

See, also, "Promissory Note."

A "certificate of deposit" is a negotiable security, and to that extent is upon the same footing as promissory notes. McCully v. Cooper, 46 Pac. 82, 83, 114 Cal. 258, 35 L. R. A. 492, 55 Am. St. Rep. 66.

A certificate of deposit is a receipt of a bank or banker, generally framed in such a form as to constitute a promissory note payable to the depositor or order, or to bearer. It is a negotiable paper, within the definition of the instruments which are made subject to forgery. State v. Patch, 55 Pac. 108, 109, 21 Mont. 534.

A certificate of deposit "is neither more nor less than an ordinary promissory note, to be paid on presentation, like any other note, to any one who has become the holder, and is totally different from a deposit account, which no one but the depositor can withdraw. It negatives the idea that the amount which it represents is a fund on deposit belonging to any one as depositor." City of Lansing v. Wood, 23 N. W. 769, 773, 57 Mich. 201; Talladega Ins. Co. v. Woodward, 44 Ala. 287, 289.

A certificate of deposit is ordinarily defined to be a written acknowledgment by a bank or banker of the receipt of a sum of money on deposit, which the bank or banker promises to pay to the depositor, to bearer, to the order of the depositor, or to some other person or to his order, and its form must determine its negotiability. To give to an instrument the character of a certificate of deposit, the deposit on which it is based must be one of money, and, when this appears to be the case from the face of the paper, the word "payable," as used in such certificates, becomes certain as to the mode or medium in which payment must be made; for the law implies, under such a state of facts, a promise to pay money for money deposited and to pay a sum equal to the deposit. It has frequently been said that certificates of deposit have most of the characteristics of promissory notes, and this seems to be true; but a paper, to be entitled to the force and effect which paper of those classes has, whether negotiable or nonnegotiable, must contain a promise in writing by one person to pay another person therein named, or to his order, or to bearer, a specified sum of money absolutely and at all events. First Nat. Bank v. Greenville Nat. Bank, 19 S. W. 834, 84 Tex. 40 (citing Daniel, Neg. Inst. 28); Welton v. Adams, 4 Cal. 87, 40, 60 Am. Dec. 579.

Certificates of deposit are understood to represent money left with the bank or banker, and which is to be retained until the depositor demands it; a certificate being in the nature of a receipt executed by the bank therefor, in which is usually recited the fact that the money has been deposited in the bank by the person to whom the certificate is issued. A certificate of deposit issued by a bank is not known as a promissory note, though it is negotiable and for a sum certain, payable to a specified person's order, and, no time of payment being specified, it is payable immediately. Murphy v. Pacific Bank, 62 Pac. 1059, 1061, 130 Cal. 542.

A certificate of deposit reciting that the company had on that day executed and delivered to defendant a certificate of deposit payable 12 months from date, with interest, is a promissory note, no matter what names the parties may give it, since it is an engagement to pay a certain sum of money to the persons named therein at a specified time and at all events. Leavitt v. Palmer, 3 N. Y. (3 Comst.) 19, 35, 51 Am. Dec. 833.

As security.

See "Security."

CERTIFICATE OF INCORPORATION.

The instrument by which a private corporation is formed is called "articles of incorporation" or "certificate of incorporation." Civ. Code S. D. 1903, § 404.

CERTIFICATE OF INDEBTEDNESS.

The term "certificate of indebtedness," as used in Gen. Laws 1899, c. 351, § 10, authorizing the issuance of "certificates of indebtedness" for the purpose of a permanent improvement revolving fund, is used as equivalent to the term "bond," as employed in the latter part of the section, and not as a special form of obligation different from a bond. Christie v. City of Duluth, 84 N. W. 754, 755, 82 Minn. 202.

CERTIFICATE OF MEMBERSHIP.

The certificate of membership issued by a mutual benefit association constitutes the contract, but it is to be construed and governed by the company's charter. Supreme Council Catholic Knights of America v. Densford, 56 S. W. 172, 176, 21 Ky. Law Rep. 1574, 49 L. R. A. 776 (citing Van Bibber's Adm'r v. Van Bibber, 82 Ky. 347, 350).

CERTIFICATE OF PURCHASE.

A certificate of purchase of land from the state is a mere evidence of a contract to convey, and gives merely an equitable interest in the land. Taylor v. Weston, 20 Pac. 62, 65, 77 Cal. 534.

A certificate of purchase of real estate at a foreclosure sale does not purport to convey title, but on its face shows the contrary by stating the amount of the bid, and when the holder will be entitled to title if the premises are not redeemed. Lightcap v. Bradley, 58 N. E. 221, 226, 186 Ill. 510.

CERTIFICATE OF QUALIFICATION.

The words "license," "diploma," and "certificate of qualification," in a statute making it criminal to practice medicine without having first obtained a license or diploma or certificate of qualification, were considered in the case of Brooks v. State, 6 South. 902, 88 Ala. 122, in which it was held that the words did not refer to and mean the same thing. Nelson v. State, 12 South. 421, 422, 97 Ala. 79.

CERTIFICATE OF SALE.

See "Sheriff's Certificate."

As conveyance, see "Conveyance."

A certificate of sale executed by a sheriff does not pass title. At most it is only evidence of an inchoate estate, which may or may not ripen into an absolute title. De Roberts v. Stiles, 64 Pac. 795, 798, 24 Wash. 611; Singly v. Warren, 51 Pac. 1066, 1069, 18 Wash. 434, 445.

In a judicial sale the sheriff is required to give the purchaser a certificate of sale containing a specification of the facts enumerated in the statute. A certificate is a memorial signed by the sheriff, in which what has taken place at the sale is set forth. It is the evidence of the sale, whereby, subject to the right of redemption and of possession in the judgment debtor for the time allowed therefor, the entire equitable title is conditionally vested in the purchaser, subject to be defeated by redemption. The sheriff's certificate to the purchaser is evidence of the equitable interest which the purchaser has in the land, and is an instrument whereby an interest or title is created. Foorman v. Wallace, 17 Pac. 680, 682, 75 Cal. 552.

CERTIFICATE OF STOCK.

A certificate of stock is the evidence of the shareholder's right to a share of the net proceeds of all the property of the corporation. Donnell v. Wyckoff, 7 Atl. 672, 674, 49 N. J. Law (20 Vroom) 48. Or to a given share in the property and franchises of a corporation. Certificates of stock are not securities for money, nor are they negotiable instruments. Barstow v. Savage Min. Co., 1 Pac. 349, 351, 64 Cal. 388, 49 Am. Rep. 705.

The certificate of stock in a corporation is only evidence of title thereto. It partakes of the nature of a deed to real estate; is simply evidence of title—nothing more. The stock certificates are the declarations in writing by the company's officers as to who are entitled to participate in its benefits—its profits or losses, the latter being limited by the extent of stock owned. It is then a misuse of terms to designate certificates of stock as "negotiable paper," in the sense in which such term is applied to commercial notes, bonds, and the like. Differing, however, from other muniments of title, the stock is considered as transferred when the certificate (the paper evidencing such title) is assigned. Watson v. Sidney F. Woody Printing Co., 56 Mo. App. 145, 151.

Certificates of stock are the written representations of the interest which the stockholders have in the capital of the corporation. In the issuance of stock the corporation parts with nothing, but simply gives an evidence of ownership of that which he receives in trust from the stockholders, which forms the capital of the company with which it does business. Gibbons v. Mahon, 10 Sup. Ct. 1057, 1062, 136 U. S. 549, 34 L. Ed. 525.

A stock certificate operates merely as evidence to the stockholder of his ownership of the stock, which he may require for his own satisfaction, or to enable him to effect the transfer of his interests. It is not necessary to constitute him a stockholder but he becomes a stockholder on subscribing for the corporation stock, and therefore stock so subscribed for is corporation stock, within the meaning of statutes authorizing the taxation of such stock. American Pig Iron Storage Co. v. State Board of Assessors, 29 Atl. 160, 161, 56 N. J. Law (27 Vroom) 389.

Stock, whether preferred or common, is capital, and, generally speaking, a "certificate of stock" merely evidences the amount which the holder has contributed to or ventured in the enterprise. Such a certificate, representing nothing more than the extent of his ownership in the capital, cannot well be treated as indicating that he is, by virtue of it alone, also to the same extent a creditor, who may compete with other creditors in the distribution of the funds arising from the conversion of the corporation's assets into money. Heller v. National Marine Bank, 43 Atl. 800, 801, 89 Md. 602, 45 L. R. A. 438, 73 Am. St. Rep. 212.

A certificate of stock is not the evidence of a debt, but of an interest in some business enterprise. Skillman v. Wiegand, 33 Atl. 929, 931, 54 N. J. Eq. 198.

Stock certificates are written evidences of a certain interest in corporate property, but in the business world they are treated as something more than mere muniments of title. They are daily bought and sold like ordinary chattels; they may be pledged, and are generally classified as personal property. Merritt v. American Steel-Barge Co. (U. S.) 79 Fed. 228, 235, 24 C. C. A. 530.

Certificates of stock are treated by business men as property for all practical purposes. They are sold in the market, and they are transferred as collateral security for loans, and they are used in various ways as property. They pass by delivery from hand to hand, and are the subject of larceny. Such certificates of stock are subject to attachment. Simpson v. Jersey City Contracting Co., 58 N. E. 896, 898, 165 N. Y. 193, 55 L. R. A. 796.

Shares of stock are usually represented by "certificates." Although these certificates are in their origin merely evidences of the holders' rights, they are really something more. They are treated in many respects as if they were shares themselves, and, when passed from hand to hand, are considered as passing to the assignee all the equitable rights of the holder. The certificates thus have a value in themselves, and may be rightly treated as property. They are similar in this respect to negotiable paper. Succession of Sinnot v. Hibernia Nat. Bank, 30 South. 233, 236, 100 La. 705.

The authors with common unanimity hold that certificates of stock are not, strictly speaking, negotiable instruments. And the term "quasi negotiable" is not considered altogether satisfactory, although, as said in Daniel on Negotiable Instruments, it describes, better than any other shorthand expression, the nature of those instruments which, while not negotiable in the sense of the law merchant, are so framed and so dealt with as frequently to convey as good a title to the transferee as if they were negotiable. Real Estate Trust Co. v. Bird, 44 Atl. 1048, 1050, 90 Md. 229.

"Certificates of stock are not securities for money in any sense, much less are they negotiable securities. They are simply the muniments and evidence of the holder's title to a given share in the property and franchises of the corporation." Barstow v. Savage Min. Co., 1 Pac. 349, 351, 64 Cal. 388, 49 Am. Rep. 705; Mechanics' Bank v. New York & N. H. R. Co., 13 N. Y. (3 Kern.) 599, 627.

A certificate of stock in an incorporated company is not negotiable paper. Hawes v. Gas Consumers' Benefit Co., 9 N. Y. Supp. 490.

A certificate of stock is in some respects like a bill of lading or a warehouse or a wharfinger's receipt. They are all alike transferable by indorsement and delivery, and the title of the property thus represented passes by such transfer. Bills of lading and wharfingers' receipts are commercial instruments, but certificates of stock are not, and the title to the property they represent passes in equity only by indorsement and delivery where, by any law or rule of the corporation, the transfer is required to be made on the books. Mechanics' Bank v. New York & N. H. R. Co., 13 N. Y. (3 Kern.) 599, 627.

A "certificate of stock" is treated by business men as property for all practical purposes. They are sold in the market, and they are transferred as security for loans, and they are used in various ways as property. They pass by delivery from hand to hand, and they are the subject of larceny. Page v. Boggess, 83 N. Y. Supp. 569, 571, 41 Misc. Rep. 46.

A certificate of stock is a certificate which is evidence that the holder is entitled to a share in the capital stock of some corporation or unincorporated association. It is a chose in action and is not negotiable. Appeal of Henke (Pa.) 14 Atl. 45, 48.

A certificate in common form purports to represent a perfect title to corporate stock.

The transfer of the certificate transfers the title as against all parties, including attaching creditors, within a statute providing that delivery of a stock certificate shall be a sufficient delivery to transfer title. Clews v. Friedman, 66 N. E. 201, 202, 182 Mass. 555.

Certificates of stock are frequently spoken of as "securities." They are not such in the proper signification of the term. They have none of the characteristics of negotiable paper. They are simply paper evidence of the right of the holder to the interest in the corporation described in them. Culp v. Mulvane, 71 Pac. 273, 276, 66 Kan. 143.

Share of stock distinguished.

See "Share of Stock."

CERTIFICATE CREDITORS.

Certificate or warrant creditors of a city are those that become creditors from the fact that the money is not on hand, derived from the revenues, to pay them when the debt is created. Johnson v. City of New Orleans, 15 South. 100, 101, 46 La. Ann. 714.

CERTIFICATION.

"Certification," as applied to bank checks, means a doing of everything needed to bind the bank, and, among other things, a redelivery by the bank of the possession of the check, if the law supposes such redelivery a necessary element. United States v. Potter (U. S.) 56 Fed. 83, 91.

CERTIFY.

See "Duly Certify"; "This is To Certify."

The term "to certify," as used with reference to legal documents, means to testify to a thing in writing; and, in the absence of statutory provision declaring the particular form of certification, any form which affirms the fact in writing is sufficient. State v. Brill, 59 N. W. 989, 990, 58 Minn. 152; Kipp v. Dawson, 60 N. W. 845, 846, 59 Minn. 82; State v. Schwin, 26 N. W. 568, 570, 65 Wis. 207.

St. 1792 (1 Dig. 310) declares that a husband and wife may acknowledge and subscribe a deed in the presence of two justices of the peace in the county where they reside, and that the said justices, having examined the wife and ascertained that she fairly relinquished her right to dower, should certify the same. Held, that the expression "certify" should be construed as meaning everything which prior provisions required to be done. Kay v. Jones, 30 Ky. (7 J. J. Marsh.) 38, 40.

To certify means to testify in writing; to make a declaration in writing; so that, as used in Hill's Ann. Laws, requiring a road supervisor to certify to his accounts for labor performed and materials furnished to the county court, it does not require any particular form, nor is it necessary to use the word "certify" or certified, but it is sufficient if the required statutory fact be made known in writing under the hand of the writer. State v. Gee, 42 Pac. 7, 9, 28 Or. 100.

To certify is to testify in writing; to make known or establish a fact. State v. Schwin, 65 Wis. 207, 26 N. W. 568. And a verbal statement by commissioners of highways as to the amount of a levy necessary was not a certificate, within the statute requiring the commissioners to certify the amount needed. Chicago & E. I. R. Co. v. People, 65 N. E. 701, 704, 200 Ill. 237.

Horner's Rev. St. 1897, § 649, requiring that the clerk on appeal shall transmit the transcript of the record in the cause certified and sealed, means that the statements contained in the certificate should be authenticated by the clerk subscribing his name thereto and affixing the seal of the court. Watson v. Finch, 48 N. E. 245, 160 Ind. 183 (citing Conkey v. Conder, 37 N. E. 132, 137 Ind. 441).

The words "certified as authentic," in a recital in a warrant that a demand for the arrest of fugitives was accompanied by a copy of the affidavit on which it was based, duly certified as authentic, is equivalent to the phrase "certified as authentic by the Governor of the state who made the demand," as it could not be certified by any other authority. Ex parte Stanley, 8 S. W. 645, 647, 25 Tex. App. 372, 8 Am. St. Rep. 440.

The statute which directs that the "foreman of the grand jury shall certify" under his hand that the indictment is a true bill is sufficiently complied with when the foreman indorses on the back of the indictment "A true bill," and subscribes his name to such indorsement. McDonald v. State, 8 Mo. 283, 284.

CERTIFIED CHECK.

"I assume that the practice of having the drawee mark and certify upon the face of the check that it is good for the sum therein expressed is of recent origin, for I find nothing said of it by the early writers, and but few reported cases where the practice is referred to. It is, however, at the present day, a prevalent custom. Checks drawn upon banks or bankers, thus marked and certified, enter largely into the commercial and financial transactions of the county. The paper upon which the certificate is impressed is negotiable by delivery or by indorsement, and designed for circulation, and in respect to all the subsequent holders the party making and uttering the certificate stands in the position of an acceptor, with all the responsibilities incident to that relation. The certificate means nothing less than this, but it means something more. It imports that the drawer has funds or means convertible into funds in the hands of the drawee at the time, which shall be retained and devoted to the payment of the paper on presentation." Farmers' & Mechanics' Bank v. Butchers' & Drovers' Bank, 28 N. Y. 425, 427.

A certified check is a check certified to be good, by the bank on which it is drawn. Such a certification is equivalent to an acceptance. "It implies that the check is drawn upon sufficient funds in the hands of the drawee, that they have been set apart for its satisfaction, and that they shall be so applied whenever the check is presented for payment. It is an undertaking that the check is good then, and shall continue good, and this agreement is as binding on the bank as its notes of circulation, a certificate of deposit payable to the order of the depositor, or any other obligation it can assume." Merchants' Bank v. State Nat. Bank, 77 U. S. (10 Wall.) 604, 645, 19 L. Ed. 1008.

A certified check is a check drawn on a bank by a depositor, which is recognized and accepted by the proper officer of the bank as an appropriation of the amount specified therein to the payee named. Security Bank v. National Bank of the Republic, 67 N. Y. 458, 462, 23 Am. Rep. 129; Clews v. Bank of New York Nat. Banking Ass'n, 89 N. Y. 418, 421, 42 Am. Rep. 303; Bank of British North America v. Merchants' Nat. Bank, 91 N. Y. 106, 111.

"The object of the certification is to indicate the assent of the bank, at the request of the drawer, that the drawee will pay the sum mentioned in the check." Security Bank v. National Bank of the Republic, 67 N. Y. 458, 462, 23 Am. Rep. 129.

The usual method of certification is for the cashier or teller to write his name across the face of the check. A certification binds the drawee bank to have and to hold sufficient funds to pay the check; in other respects it still remains merely a depositary, liable to pay only on demand. A certified check cannot be sued on without demand. Bank of British North America v. Merchants' Nat. Bank, 91 N. Y. 106, 111.

"By the certification is guaranteed the genuineness of the drawer's signature, and there is a representation that the bank has funds of the drawer sufficient to meet the check, and that the funds shall not be withdrawn from it by the drawer. The certification does not import that the body of the check is genuine; and hence, where a check has been raised by some one without authority before certification, the certifying bank cannot be called on, in consequence of its certification, to pay the amount of the raised check." Clews v. Bank of New York Nat. Banking Ass'n, 89 N. Y. 418, 421, 42 Am. Rep. 303.

The word "certify," as commonly understood, implies that the check upon which the words of certification have been written has passed from the custody of the bank and into the hands of some other party, and when the charge is that the defendant did unlawfully, knowingly, and willfully certify a certain check, the import of that accusation is not simply that he wrote certain words on the face of the check, but that he did it in such a manner as to create an obligation of the bank in such a way as to make an instrument which can properly be called a "certified check." Potter v. United States, 15 Sup. Ct. 144, 146, 155 U. S. 438, 39 L. Ed. 214.

CERTIFIED COPY.

A certified copy of a deed imports that it is an office copy taken from the record of deeds and certified by the proper officer. Doremus v. Smith, 4 N. J. Law (1 Southard) 142, 143.

"Certify" is defined by the Standard Dictionary as: "To give certain knowledge or information of; make evidence; to vouch for the truth of; attest to; to make statement to as matter of fact; to testify in writing; give a certificate of, or make a declaration about, in writing under hand or under a seal." So that a statement of a vote of the town on the question of local option over the signature of the town clerk is a certified copy of the statement of the result of the vote in compliance with the law. People v. Foster, 58 N. Y. Supp. 574, 579, 27 Misc. Rep. 576.

The term "certified copy," is not synonymous with "duplicate." A duplicate must be executed by the same parties with the same formalities as the original. Where the law requires a duplicate of a certificate of incorporation to be filed, it is not complied with by filing a certified copy. Nelson v. Blakey, 54 Ind. 29, 36.

CERTIORARI.

Certiorari, at common law, was a prerogative writ; a mandate issued by a court vested with a plenitude of power over all inferior courts of the realm, which had a right to command them to return authenticated records and proceedings in a particular case for trial or correction of errors. The courts of the United States derive authority to issue such a writ from the Constitution and from acts of Congress. State of North Carolina v. Sullivan (U. S.) 50 Fed. 593.

Certiorari at common law was an original writ issuing out of chancery or the king's bench, directed in the king's name to the judges or officers of inferior courts, commanding them to return the record of a case pending before them, to the end that the party may have the same sure and speedy justice before him or such other justices as he shall assign to determine the case. Dean v. State, 63 Ala. 153, 154 (citing 2 Bac. Abr. 165); In re Saline County Subscription, 45 Mo. 52, 53, 100 Am. Dec. 337; State v. Valliant, 27 S. W. 379, 123 Mo. 524.

The writ of certiorari does not owe its existence to constitutional provision or statutory enactment. It is a common-law writ, of ancient origin, and one of the most valuable and efficient remedies which comes to us with that admirable system of jurisprudence. The Supreme Court, the highest tribunal in the state, with appellate and supervisory jurisdiction over proceedings and judgments of all inferior courts, has the inherent power to grant it whenever necessary in the exercise and enforcement of its jurisdiction. Tennessee Cent. R. Co. v. Campbell, 75 S. W. 1012, 109 Tenn. 640.

At common law the writ of certiorari is used for two purposes: First, as a valid proceeding for the re-examination of some action of an inferior tribunal; second, as an auxiliary process to enable the court to obtain further information in respect to some matter already before him for adjudication. It is for the latter purpose that the writ of certiorari is usually fastened upon, employed by the Supreme Court. The removal of a proceeding by a writ of certiorari at common law might have been both before and after final judgment. Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Louisville Trust Co. (U. S.) 78 Fed. 659, 661.

Certiorari is a writ issuing from a superior court to an inferior court, tribunal, or officer exercising judicial powers, whose proceedings are summary, or in a course different from the common law, commanding the return of the records of a cause to the superior court. California & O. Land Co. v. Gowen (U. S.) 48 Fed. 770, 771.

Certiorari is a writ issued by a superior court directing the removal of a cause from an inferior to a superior court. "A certiorari, however, can only issue as original process to remove a cause and change the venue when the superior court is satisfied that a fair and impartial trial will not otherwise be obtained. It is sometimes used as auxiliary process, where, for instance, diminution of the record is alleged on a writ of error; but in such cases the superior court must have jurisdiction of the controversy." Fowler v. Lindsey, 3 U. S. (3 Dall.) 411, 413, 1 L. Ed. 658.

A proceeding by a writ of certiorari is a judicial proceeding in the technical sense, as distinguished from a quasi judicial one, and, apart from its ancillary use, its main performance and commonest use is to supervise, control, review, and correct the proceedings of quasi judicial tribunals, or where such proceedings are different from the court of common law. State v. South Penn Oil Co., 24 S. E. 688, 692, 42 W. Va. 80.

Certiorari is a writ issued by a superior court directing an inferior court to send up to the former some pending proceeding or the record and proceeding in a cause, before verdict, for review or trial. A certiorari is appellate in the sense that it involves a limited review of the proceedings of an inferior jurisdiction. It is original in the sense that the subject-matter of the suit or proceeding which it brings before the court is not reinvestigated, tried, and determined on the merits generally, as upon appeal at law or writ of error. A common-law writ of certiorari is not ancillary or auxiliary to appellate jurisdiction, as it is when used to supply a deficiency in the transcript or a record of a judgment from which an appeal is taken or to which a writ of error is sued out, nor is it used to remove a case for trial, but upon such writ the appellate court neither affirms or reverses a judgment nor tries the case upon its merits, but must quash the proceeding of the lower court or quash the certiorari. Basnet v. City of Jacksonville, 18 Fla. 523, 526.

Certiorari is in the nature of an appeal from the judgment and judicial determination of inferior tribunals and officers acting under statutory authority, or when the proceeding is not according to the common law. The writ lies only to inferior courts and officers exercising judicial powers affecting the property or right of a citizen, and is directed to the court, magistrate, or board exercising such powers, requiring them to send into the Supreme Court from which the writ issued the proceedings in a cause or matter already terminated. People v. Walter, 68 N. Y. 403, 408 (citing Stone v. City of New York [N. Y.] 25 Wend. 157; People v. Same [N. Y.] 2 Hill, 9; Lynde v. Noble (N. Y.) 20 Johns. 80; Lawton v. Commissioners of Highways [N. Y.] 2 Caines, 179, 182; Starr v. Trustees of Village of Rochester [N. Y.] 6 Wend. 564; Ex parte City of Albany [N. Y.] 23 Wend. 277; Hamilton v. Spiers, 2 Utah, 225, 228.

The writ of certiorari, under the constitutional provisions of Missouri, is strictly the common-law writ of that name. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. v. State Board of Equalization, 64 Mo. 294, 308; State ex rel. Teasdale v. Smith, 14 S. W. 108, 101 Mo. 174; State ex rel. Kansas & T. Coal Ry. v. Shelton, 55 S. W. 1008, 1012, 154 Mo. 670, 50 L. R. A. 798; State ex rel. Ballew v. Woodson, 61 S. W. 252, 255, 161 Mo. 444.

Certiorari is a writ adopted in Ohio to correct such proceedings in inferior courts as are not in conformity with the common law. Walpole's Lessee v. Ink, 9 Ohio, 142, 144.

Appeal distinguished.

See "Appeal."

As judicial proceeding.

See "Judicial Proceeding."

As commencement of new suit.

A certiorari sued out to reverse a judgment of a justice of the peace, like a writ of error, is the commencement of a new suit, and not the continuation of an old one. Hence the covenant of the surety for a non-resident plaintiff, on suing out a summons, to pay any sum that may be adjudged against plaintiff in that suit, does not extend to the costs of a reversal on certiorari of the judgment recovered by plaintiff before the justice in the suit commenced by the summons. Fenno v. Dickinson (N. Y.) 4 Denio, 84, 85.

As discretionary writ.

The writ of certiorari was not a writ at common law, but was known as a discretionary writ; not an arbitrary discretion, but a sound discretion. Bouv. Law Dict. As a general rule the writ will not be granted to review a proceeding where the right of appeal exists. Gifford v. Board of Com'rs of Jasper County, 67 N. E. 509, 510, 160 Ind. 654 (citing McCrory v. Griswold, 7 Iowa [7 Clarke] 248, 249).

The writ of certiorari, as known to the common law, is not a writ of right. It is not issued as of course. Whether it shall issue rests in the sound judicial discretion of the judge or court to whom the application for the writ may be made. Guscott v. Roden, 21 South. 313, 314, 112 Ala. 632.

Certiorari is an extraordinary remedy for the review of a cause by a proceeding instituted in the appellate court, directing the record to be certified to the latter court for review. "It is not a writ of right, but dependent on the sound discretion of the court or judge granting the writ." O'Brien v. Dunn, 5 Tex. 570, 574.

At common law, certiorari is not a writ of right, but may be granted or refused at the discretion of the court. Before allowing or acting upon the writ the court should be satisfied that it is essential to prevent some substantial injury to the applicant, and that the object aimed at by him would not, if accomplished, be productive of great inconvenience or injustice. It should seldom, if ever, be allowed to enable a party to take advantage of mere technical objections. People v. City of New York (N. Y.) 5 Barb. 43, 45.

The writ of certiorari is not granted as a matter of right. The application for it is addressed to the discretionary powers of the court, and it must be made to appear that the applicant has rights or a valid defense of which he has been deprived by the erroneous action of the justice of the peace, or that he has been unable to present them from no want of diligence or fault on his part. The errors complained of should be distinctly stated, and not consist of mere irregularities in the proceedings. A statement of all the facts proved should be embraced in the application, and, if he have rights that he has not been able to present, they should be averred, with the excuse for not presenting them, so that the court can determine for itself whether the applicant has any merits in his case and has been unjustly deprived of them and injured. Clark v. Hutton, 28 Tex. 123, 125.

To grant a certiorari for the purpose of reviewing the acts of the special jurisdiction created by statute, which do not proceed according to the course of the common law, rests in the discretion of the court. Dixon v. City of Cincinnati, 14 Ohio, 240, 244.

Injunction distinguished.

The office of the writ of certiorari is in no sense that of a restraining order. It is not the purpose of the writ to restrain or prohibit, but to annul. Gauld v. City and County of San Francisco, 54 Pac. 272, 273, 122 Cal. 18.

Limited to judicial action.

At common law or under the Code of Civil Procedure a writ of certiorari is only allowed where the object sought is to review a judgment or a judicial determination of the inferior tribunal or an officer acting under statutory authority, exercising judicial power. The writ lies only to inferior courts and officers exercising judicial power affecting the property or rights of the citizen. People v. Walter, 68 N. Y. 403. In People v. Queens County Sup'rs, 30 N. E. 488, 131 N. Y. 468, the court says: "The writ of certiorari is appropriate only to review the judicial action of inferior courts or of public officers, or bodies exercising under the laws judicial functions, and there is no authority to be found in the reports of this state sanctioning its use for any other purpose. When the action of a public officer or of a public body is merely legislative, executive, or administrative, although it may involve the exercise of discretion, it cannot be reviewed by certiorari." Certiorari will not lie to review the action of the city or state civil service commission in making a classification under Laws 1899, c. 370, § 10, requiring the mayor of each city of the state to appoint and employ suitable persons to prescribe rules for the classification of the offices and employments in the classified service in such city, as the statute only confers administrative powers, and not judicial. People v. Burt, 72 N. Y. Supp. 567, 568, 65 App. Div. 157. Following such rule it was held that the action of the Albany board of control and apportionment, in investigating and rescinding a contract for street improvements, is therefore not subject to review by certiorari. People v. Van Alstyne, 65 N. Y. Supp. 451, 454, 53 App. Div. 1. So, too, the action of the board of commissioners of the department of public works of the city of New York in consenting to the construction by the Suburban Rapid Transit Company of an elevated railroad bridge across the Harlem river, and entering into a contract with that company for the building of the bridge at its own expense, was not judicial in its character, and not subject to review by certiorari. People v. Commissioners of Department of Public Parks of City of New York, 97 N. Y. 37, 43. Thus, also, the action of the board of estimate and assessment in the allowing of claims is not judicial, and therefore not reviewable on certiorari. People v. Gilroy, 25 N. Y. Supp. 878, 879, 72 Hun. 637. The creation of a fire district by the board of supervisors is a legislative act, and not reviewable by certiorari. People v. Queens County Sup'rs, 43 N. Y. Supp. 1121, 1122, 14 App. Div. 608.

At common law a certiorari was an original writ issued out of chancery or the king's bench, directed in the king's name to the judges or officers of the inferior courts, commanding them to return the records of the cause pending before them, to the end that the party might have the more sure and speedy justice. In the absence of statute, the writ issues only to inferior courts and to review only judicial action. The action of a county court in subscribing to a railroad stock and issuing bonds for payment thereof is a discretionary, and not a judicial, proceeding, and therefore not the subject of review by writ of certiorari. In re Saline County Subscription, 45 Mo. 52, 53, 100 Am. Dec. 337.

Certiorari is a judicial process directed to an inferior court or tribunal, and brings up simply the record of the proceedings of such inferior tribunal. The office of the writ of certiorari is to bring up for review in a superior court the record of an inferior court or of a tribunal exercising judicial functions, and it is not the office of the writ to bring up the proceedings of any other bodies or classes of public officers. People v. Livingston County Sup'rs (N. Y.) 43 Barb. 232, 234.

The writ issues only to inferior courts and to review only judicial actions. In re Saline County Subscription, 45 Mo. 52, 53, 100 Am. Dec. 337.

Primarily the province of the writ of certiorari is to pronounce on the validity of a judicial proceeding. Code Prac. art. 228, cl. 3, and article 855. This writ is granted only in case the suit is to be decided in the last resort, and where there lies no appeal, by means of which proceedings absolutely void may be set aside. Id. art. 857. The writ issued under the supervisory jurisdiction of the Supreme Court cannot be employed for the purposes of inquiring into the correctness of a judgment rendered when the forms of law have been followed, but only to pronounce upon the validity of a judicial proceeding. State ex rel. Wells-Fargo Exp. Co. v. Martin, 20 South. 729, 731, 48 La. Ann. 1249.

Limited to jurisdictional questions.

At common law the function of a writ of certiorari is simply to bring up for review questions affecting the jurisdiction of the inferior tribunal, there being no other adequate remedy. State ex rel. Ballew v. Woodson, 61 S. W. 252, 255, 161 Mo. 444.

Certiorari goes only to the jurisdiction. It does not go to any errors of judgment that may have been committed by the justice in the progress of the exercise of that jurisdiction. Harris v. Barber, 9 Sup. Ct. 314, 316, 129 U. S. 366, 32 L. Ed. 697.

The writ of certiorari may be granted only when there has been an excess of jurisdiction, and the review upon the writ cannot extend further than to determine whether the tribunal, board, or officer exercising judicial functions has regularly pursued its or his authority, and has acted with or without jurisdiction. State v. Second Judicial District Court, 62 Pac. 820, 821, 24 Mont. 494.

In City of Nashville v. Pearl, 30 Tenn. (11 Humph.) 249, it is said that "the writ of certiorari ex debito justitiae has been adopted as the almost universal method by which the circuit courts of general jurisdiction, both civil and criminal, exercising control over all inferior jurisdiction, however constituted and whatever their course of proceeding, as well where they have attempted to exercise a jurisdiction not confirmed as where there has been an irregular or erroneous exercise of jurisdiction, and in criminal proceedings as well as in civil. Instead of restricting the use of certiorari to the proceedings of inferior courts which are not according to the course of common law, and where for that reason a writ of error will not lie, it is held that it lies to remove the proceeding of a tribunal exercising jurisdiction under statutory regulation, whether in a summary way or by a mode of proceeding not according to the common law." Hayden v. City Council of Memphis, 47 S. W. 182, 100 Tenn. 582.

The writ of certiorari is never used to correct a mere error, but to test the jurisdiction of the tribunal or the legality of its action. By suing out the writ a party does not affirm that the rulings made by the trial court during the progress of the trial were correct. Porter v. Butterfield, 89 N. W. 199, 200, 116 Iowa, 725.

In California the writ of certiorari brings up for review but one question, and that is whether the inferior tribunal or court exceeded its jurisdiction. It cannot be used to correct error of law or fact committed by the inferior tribunal within the limits of its jurisdiction. Sherer v. Superior Court, 96 Cal. 653, 31 Pac. 565.

The writ of certiorari will not lie to review any discretion in an action of any tribunal, nor is it within the proper scope of a writ to review the decisions of inferior tribunals upon the merits. The court awarding it, therefore, will not look into the evidence on which the inferior tribunal may have acted, except as may be necessary to the determination of jurisdiction of any question that may depend upon it. Tomlinson v. Board of Equalization, 12 S. W. 414, 415, 88 Tenn. 1, 6 L. R. A. 207.

A writ of certiorari, when addressed to an inferior tribunal, can only bring up for review on the record questions of jurisdiction, power, and authority of such inferior tribunal, and the appellate court is confined to the question whether the inferior court had jurisdiction and acted within its limits. Jacksonville, T. & K. W. Ry. Co. v. Boy, 16 South. 290, 291, 34 Fla. 389.

Prohibition distinguished.

The writ of certiorari can be issued only to a tribunal or person exercising judicial functions, whereas the writ of prohibition can be issued against one exercising either judicial or ministerial functions. The certiorari can be issued only when there is no appeal, nor, in the judgment of the court, any plain, speedy, and adequate remedy; whereas the statute says that prohibition may be resorted to where there is not a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy in the ordinary course of law. People v. House, 10 Pac. 838, 841, 4 Utah, 369.

A writ of certiorari brings up the record only. Appeal of Long, 19 Atl. 806, 807, 134 Pa. 641, 26 Wkly. Notes Cas. 81, 82.

The writ of certiorari only brings up the record, and only such matters as appear from the face thereof, and which go to the jurisdiction of the tribunal to which the writ is sued out, can be reviewed by such writ. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. v. State, 64 Mo. 294, 308; Ward v. Board of Equalization of Geny County, 36 S. W. 648, 650, 135 Mo. 309; State ex rel. Teasdale v. Smith, 14 S. W. 108, 101 Mo. 174; State ex rel. Kansas & T. Coal Ry. v. Shelton, 55 S. W. 1008, 1012, 154 Mo.

670, 50 L. R. A. 798; State ex rel. Ballew v. Woodson, 61 S. W. 252, 255, 161 Mo. 444.

The writ of certiorari removes nothing but the record or entries in the nature of a record, and if it contains anything more it cannot be regarded. People v. Metropolitan Board of Police of New York, 39 N. Y. 506, 509.

A writ of certiorari, when used as a substantial remedy, is issued for the purpose of removing into court a record of some proceeding had before an inferior court or tribunal, in order that upon inspection of such record an action taken by the inferior court or tribunal may be judicially reviewed. The court acts upon the records brought before it, and either reverses or affirms the action below, and the only way to obtain such record is by way of return. Logically it cannot pass judgment upon the record until the record is brought before it by means of the return. State v. Lien, 87 N. W. 1113, 1114, 112 Wis. 282.

The writ of certiorari, when issued for the purpose of enabling a court to exercise its supervisory power over inferior tribunals, removes nothing but the record or other entry in the nature of a record of the proceedings in the court below, and, if the return contains the evidence, such evidence cannot be considered. Gilbert v. Salt Lake City Police & Fire Com'rs, 40 Pac. 264, 266, 11 Utah, 378.

At common law the writ of certiorari was issued to remove a record from an inferior court into the Supreme Court, to be there examined and affirmed or reversed according to law, and, when so removed, it remained in the Supreme Court until remitted by order of that court, though the writ be quashed. Cougill v. Farmers' & Merchants' Ins. Co., 35 Pac. 975, 25 Or. 360.

As special proceeding or suit.

See "Special Proceeding"; "Suit."

As stay of proceedings.

A common-law certiorari carried with it a stay as a matter of course, or rather it was unnecessary to secure a separate stay, as that was involved in the writ itself, which literally removed the record out of the inferior tribunal, and thus rendered all proceedings on it there impossible in theory of law and erroneous in practice. People v. Sturgis, 80 N. Y. Supp. 194, 197, 39 Misc. Rep. 448.

As substitute for appeal.

Certiorari is a revisory writ, and may be issued by a superior to correct the erroneous action of an inferior court where the law has provided no remedy by appeal. "Certiorari at common law is an extraordinary legal remedy. It can be invoked only when there is a legal right, and no other adequate legal remedy. When an appeal lies, certiorari is not the proper remedy." Alabama G. S. R. Co. v. Christian, 1 South. 121, 82 Ala. 307; Memphis & C. R. Co. v. Brannum, 11 South. 463, 469, 96 Ala. 461.

Certiorari is a writ employed for review in cases where an appeal is improperly denied, or the party is deprived of it by fraud, accident, or mistake, in which case he may have his whole case reviewed by certiorari, both as to matters of law and fact, or it granted where the right of appeal is not allowed or does not exist. Saunders v. Sloux City Nursery Co., 24 Pac. 532, 534, 6 Utah, 431.

In its nature certiorari is a revisory remedy, intended only for the correction of errors of law apparent on the record. Lamar v. Commissioners' Court of Marshall County, 21 Ala. 772; Glaze v. Blake, 56 Ala. 379. It was not a substitute for an appeal, nor intended for a correction of errors of fact. State v. Steuart (S. C.) 5 Strobb. 29. Indeed, it would not lie where an appeal was given, if the objection be not to the want of jurisdiction but to the merits, for that is more properly the subject of an appeal. Dean v. State, 63 Ala. 153, 154 (citing 2 Bac. Abr. 165); Farmington River Water Power Co. v. County Com'rs, 112 Mass. 206, 217.

The writ of certiorari to remove the record from an inferior jurisdiction is designed to correct errors in law and not of fact, and it is not a substitute for appeal. State v. Steuart (S. C.) 5 Strobb. 29, 32.

In Burgett v. Apperson, 52 Ark. 213, 12 S. W. 559, the court said the writ of certiorari "is granted in two classes of cases: First, when it is shown that the inferior tribunal has exceeded its jurisdiction; and, second, when it appears that it had proceeded illegally, and no appeal will lie, or that the right has been unavoidably lost. Mere errors are never reviewable on certiorari, at the instance of one who has lost the right of appeal by his own fault, or who neglects to apply for the writ as soon as possible after it becomes necessary to resort to it. It cannot be used as a substitute for appeal to correct errors, where an appeal is provided, except by a party who could have appealed." Thus, certiorari will not lie, at the instance of creditors of a decedent's estate, to review the action of the probate court in classifying claims against the probate estate. Merchants' & Planters' Bank v. Fitzgerald, 33 S. W. 1064, 1065, 61 Ark. 605.

The writ was issued at common law, not only for the purpose of reviewing the proceedings of the lower court, as a writ of review after final judgment, but as a means of removing the entire cause for hearing and determination in another court. The writ was not one of right, but was always allowed or refused in the discretion of the judge or chancellor. The writ of certiorari is not used so much in this country, and is not available to review an interlocutory order of the circuit court in a proceeding in which it has jurisdiction, before the final determination of such proceeding, on the alleged ground that the circuit court had no jurisdiction to make the order. State ex rel. Walbridge v. Valliant, 27 S. W. 379, 123 Mo. 524.

"Certiorari" is only a mode of redress where the remedy by appeal is not provided. Thompson v. Reed, 29 Iowa, 117, 118.

Writ of error distinguished.

Certiorari is a remedy for the review of the decision of a lower tribunal by a writ issued from an appellate court, requiring the record of the lower court to be certified up for review. "In some respects there is a difference between a writ of error and a writ of certiorari, and in some respects there is a strong resemblance. The former lies where the proceedings are according to the course of the common law; in other cases a writ of certiorari is the proper writ. A writ of error is a writ of right; a writ of certiorari is not. It is a matter of sound discretion to grant or refuse it. There are several other points of difference. They are like in this: that no one but a party to the record, or one who has a direct and immediate interest in it or is privy thereto, can maintain either of the writs." Bath Bridge & Turnpike Co. v. Magoun, 8 Me. (8 Greenl.) 292, 293; Inhabitants of Levant v. Penobscot County Com'rs, 67 Me. 429, 433.

The difference between writs of error and certiorari is not well defined in our practice, but, so far as there is any general rule on the subject, the former is the appropriate remedy where the proceedings are according to the course of the common law; the latter where the proceedings are of a different character. In either case there must have been, however, what is equivalent to a final order or judgment of the inferior tribunal, before the writ can be issued. Ewing v. Hollister, 7 Ohio (7 Ham.) 138, 140, pt. 2.

A writ of certiorari is in the nature of a writ of error. The court is bound to determine, upon an inspection of the whole record, whether the proceedings are legal or erroneous. The right will not be granted for the correction of merely harmless, technical, or formal errors, which are not shown to have resulted prejudicially or to have caused substantial injustice to relator. The matter to be determined is substance, and not form. McAloon v. License Com'rs of Pawtucket, 46 Atl. 1047, 1048, 22 R. I. 191.

A writ of certiorari, when sued out to review the decision of a lower judicial tribunal, is in the nature of a writ of error, and therefore the proper practice is to confine the review to errors of law, and not to determine disputed questions of fact. McAdam v. Block, 44 Atl. 208, 209, 63 N. J. Law, 508.

While the writ of certiorari is not a writ of error, it is nevertheless a means by which the power of the court in the premises can be inquired into. McClatchy v. Superior Court of Sacramento County, 119 Cal. 413, 419, 51 Pac. 696, 39 L. R. A. 691.

The writ of certiorari, except in cases otherwise specifically provided by statute, is in the nature of a writ of error, with this difference: that defendant brings up only the record of the inferior tribunal for inspection, and the trial upon it is a trial of questions jurisdictional in their nature, and not a trial de novo, except of matters affecting the jurisdiction of the court. The writ can only issue on final judgment, and accordingly a proceeding to obtain a dram-shop license cannot be removed from a county court by certiorari until it has been finally disposed of by that court. State v. Schneider, 47 Mo. App. 669, 675.

A writ of error is the appropriate remedy to obtain a review where the proceedings are according to the course of the common law; certiorari where the proceedings are of a different character. In either case, however, there must have been what is equivalent to a final order or judgment of the inferior tribunal, before the writ can be issued. Ewing v. Hollister, 7 Ohio (7 Ham.) 138, 140, pt. 2.

A writ of certiorari, when its object is not to remove a case before trial or to supply defects in a record, but to bring up after judgment the proceedings of an inferior court or tribunal whose procedure is not according to the course of common law, is in the nature of a writ of error. Staffords v. King (U. S.) 90 Fed. 136, 141, 32 C. C. A. 536 (citing Harris v. Barber, 9 Sup. Ct. 314, 129 U. S. 366, 369, 32 L. Ed. 697).

The writ of certiorari is the appropriate writ for the removal of a cause before judgment, and the writ of error is the writ which removes it afterwards. Commonwealth v. Simpson (Pa.) 2 Grant, Cas. 438, 439.

Writ of review or inquiry.

See "Writ of Review."

A writ of certiorari to inquire into the cause of detention, and the writ of certiorari to review the determination of an inferior tribunal, are two separate and distinct writs. The latter writ can be issued only by the court in general or special term, and is directed to the inferior tribunal. The return is made to the clerk, and the argument upon the return must be heard at general term.

It is, as its name indicates, a writ of review under which the determination arrived at may be reviewed at the general term, and the evidence before the tribunal may be examined, to see if it authorizes the conclusion reached. The writ of certiorari to inquire into the cause of detention, however, is not in its nature essentially a writ of review. The writ is directed to the sheriff or person having the prisoner in custody. He is required to return to the judge issuing the writ by what right he holds the custody of the person detained. Under this requirement he returns simply the commitment. He has not possession of the evidence upon which the commitment was granted. He cannot certify any such evidence, nor is he required to. Upon such writ the same questions arise, the same facts appear for determination, and the same limitation rests upon the power of the court as upon the writ of habeas corpus. People v. Seaman, 29 N. Y. Supp. 329, 330, 8 Misc. Rep. 152.

CESSAVIT.

Cessavit was an ancient process of the common law, in use in the law of landlord and tenant, for the collection of rent from a tenant. "By such process the landlord could seize the land itself for the rent in arrear, and hold it until payment was made. It has been obsolete for ages, and exists only in the memory of legal antiquaries." Emig v. Cunningham, 62 Md. 458, 460.

CESTUI QUE TRUST.

A cestui que trust is a person for whose benefit the trust is created. Dillenbeck v. Pinnell (Iowa) 96 N. W. 860, 861.

CHAFER.

A chafer is the name applied to a covering of old material over the hatchway of a vessel. The Hyades (U. S.) 124 Fed. 58, 59, 59 C. C. A. 424.

CHAIN OF CIRCUMSTANCES.

The expression "chain of circumstances," in an instruction in a criminal case, conveys substantially the same idea as would that of "inculpatory facts." Where a chain of circumstances is the means by which the guilt of a defendant is to be established, each necessary link in that chain must be established beyond a reasonable doubt, for the reason that the chain without the necessary links would be incomplete and ineffectual. State v. Myers, 40 Pac. 626, 627, 12 Wash. 77.

To constitute a chain of circumstances sufficient to establish guilt, each independent fact in the chain relied on must be established to a moral certainty or beyond a reasonable doubt. People v. Phipps, 39 Cal 326, 333.

It is incorrect to speak of a body of circumstantial evidence as a "chain," and allude to the different circumstances as the "links" constituting such chain, for a chain cannot be stronger than its weakest link, and if one link fails the chain is broken, and it is not true that each and every of the minor circumstances introduced to sustain ultimate facts must be proven with the same degree of certainty. Clare v. People, 9 Colo. 122, 123, 10 Pac. 799.

CHAIN OF TITLE.

Where a grantor of land agreed to show and present to the grantee a perfect "chain of title from the U. S. government," the words "chain of title from the U. S. government" mean the successive links, each perfect in itself, to communicate to the grantee, and invest in him, the title of the government, and not merely a colorable title, with possession and payment of taxes, sufficient to bar a recovery by an adverse claimant under the statute of limitations. Payne v. Markle, 89 Ill. 66, 69.

CHAIN OF TRANSFER.

The phrase "chain of transfer," as used in Rev. St. art. 3192, providing that the term "title," as used in the preceding article, means a regular chain of transfer, means consecutive written transfers. Finch v. Trent, 22 S. W. 132, 134, 3 Tex. Civ. App. 568.

CHAIR.

The term "chair," within the meaning of a statute exempting chairs, includes a barber's chair. Terry v. McDaniel, 53 S. W. 732, 733, 103 Tenn. 415, 46 L. R. A. 559.

CHAIRMAN.

6 & 7 Wm. IV, c. 79, providing that proceedings of all meetings should be entered in a book and signed by the chairman of such respective meetings, authorizes the signing of the minutes of the meeting by the chairman of the next succeeding meeting, where he was also the chairman at the first meeting. West London R. Co. v. Bernard, 3 Q. B. 873.

CHALLENGE.

A challenge to fight a duel is a writing which, when connected with the circumstances of the quarrel and conduct of the parties, shows an intention to write or solicit a meeting or intervention in order to fight with deadly weapons, and it is not necessary that the writing should expressly state that a meeting is requested with a view to fight, and to describe the weapon which the parties are to use. Commonwealth v. Hart, 29 Ky. (6 J. J. Marsh.) 119, 121.

A challenge to fight a duel is a requisition, demand, or request to fight with deadly weapons. Expressing a willingness or readiness to fight, should the other party desire such an encounter, is not a challenge. Commonwealth v. Tibbs, 31 Ky. (1 Dana) 524.

"Challenge to fight," as used in St. 1796, providing that if any person shall challenge another to fight a duel with a dangerous weapon he shall be punished, is an offense composed of the forming, sending, and offering on the one side of the offer to fight such duel, and the receiving or knowing the contents, and then rejecting, on the other side. State v. Gibbons, 4 N. J. Law (1 Southard) 40, 56.

Any word spoken or written, or any sign uttered or made, to any person, expressing or implying, or intended to express or imply, a desire, bequest, invitation, or demand to fight a duel, or to meet for the purpose of fighting a duel, is deemed a challenge. Gen. St. Minn. 1894, § 6490.

"Challenging," as used in section 21, Act March 4, 1797, declaring that if any person shall in any manner disturb the peace by threatening, quarrelling, challenging, etc., he shall be liable, etc., means some verbal abuse, and does not embrace the giving of a written challenge. State v. S. S., 1 Tyler, 180, 181.

CHALLENGE (In Practice).

See "Peremptory Challenge"; "Principal Challenge."

A challenge is an objection made to the swearing in and impaneling of the grand jury, and not an objection made after they are sworn in and impaneled. People v. Fitzpatrick, 1 N. Y. Cr. R. 425, 426, 432.

A challenge of a grand juror is a preliminary objection to the qualification of the juror, and its purpose is to prohibit the juror from sitting and inquiring into the charges against the party interposing the challenge, and, if the challenge be allowed, the juror cannot be present at or take part in the considerations of the charge against the defendant who interposed the challenge. Therefore, after the grand jury had completed its work and been discharged, the conditions which make a challenge possible no longer exist. People v. Travers, 26 Pac. 88, 89, 88 Cal. 233.

A challenge is an objection made to the trial jurors, and is of two kinds: (1) To the panel; (2) to an individual juror. Pen. Code

Cal. 1903, § 1055; Pen. Code Idaho 1901, § 5414; Rev. St. Utah 1898, § 4816; Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 8142; Code Cr. Proc. S. D. 1903, § 317.

A challenge is an objection to a particular juror, and may be either (1) peremptory or (2) for cause. Ann. Codes & St. Or. 1901, § 117.

CHALLENGE FOR CAUSE.

Under the common-law practice challenges for cause of jurors were divided into two classes: Principal challenges, or challenges for principal cause; and challenges to the favor. The principal challenge showed a cause which positively, or by necessary legal implication, disqualified the juror from sitting in the case. The challenge to the favor was grounded on circumstances raising a suspicion of the existence of actual bias in the mind of a juror for or against a party. Turner v. State, 40 S. E. 308, 114 Ga. 421.

A challenge for cause is an objection to a particular juror, and is either (1) general, that the juror is disqualified from serving in any case; or (2) particular, that he is disqualified from serving in the case on trial. Cr. Code N. Y. 1903, § 374.

A challenge for cause is an objection to a juror, and may be either (1) general, that the juror is disqualified from serving in any action, or (2) particular, that he is disqualified from serving in the action on trial. Ann. Codes & St. Or. 1901, § 119.

CHALLENGE PROPTER AFFECTUM.

Challenges propter affectum are for suspicion of bias or partiality, and may be either a principal challenge, or to the favor. Harrisburg Bank v. Forster (Pa.) 8 Watts, 304, 306. See, also, State v. Baldwin (S. C.) 1 Tread. Const. 289, 296.

Challenges propter affectum were of two kinds: (1) For principal cause; and (2) to the favor. A challenge is called principal "because, if it be found true, it standeth sufficient of itself, without leaving anything to the conscience or discretion of the triors." Co. Litt. 156b. It is "the naming of some exception, which, being found true, the law presently allows." Term de la L. "Challenge"; Temple v. Sumner, Smith, 226, 228; State v. Howard, 17 N. H. 171, 191. It admits of no answer, counterplea, or qualification. If it be for kindred, it is immaterial that the juror is also of kin, though in a nearer degree, to the other party, or that, notwithstanding the kinship, the triors find him to be in fact indifferent. St. 7 Edw. IV., p. 4, pl. 12; Brooke, Abr. "Challenge," 167; Co. Litt. 157a; Hunsdon v. Baker, Cro. Eliz. 663; 21 Vin. Abr. 237, 238. No evidence is heard or considered except such as tends to show the existence or nonexistence of the particular fact alleged as the ground of the challenge. The triors are sworn to well and truly try whether the juror is a cousin, servant, or tenant, etc., as the case may be, of the party. Barrett v. Long, 3 H. L. Cas. 395, 400; Rex v. Dolby, 1 Car. & K. 238. A fact which, if established, was not, in judgment of law, inconsistent with indifference—which admitted of qualification, and might be explained away by other evidence—was never a ground of principal challenge. State v. Sawtelle, 32 Atl. 831, 836, 66 N. H. 488.

In his classification of challenge to the police, Lord Coke says, of the challenge propter affectum, that the right exists "if the juror be of blood to either party, and this is a principal challenge that the law presumeth that one kinsman doth favor another before a stranger, and how far remote soever he is of kindred yet the challenge is good, and if the plaintiff challenge a juror for kindred to the defendant it is not counterplea to say that he is of kindred also to the plaintiff, though he be in nearer degree; for the words of the venire facias forbiddeth a juror to be of kindred to either party." Jewell v. Jewell, 24 Atl. 858, 859, 84 Me. 304, 18 L. R. A. 473.

Challenge propter affectum is a challenge on account of the relationship of the juror to one of the parties to the case. "By the common law any one related by blood or marriage, as remotely as the ninth degree even, is subject to challenge propter affectum, and no evidence to the contrary will be heard. The fact constitutes disqualification." State v. Williams (Del.) 18 Atl. 949, 950, 9 Houst. 508; State v. Williams (Del.) 18 Atl. 949, 950, 9 Houst. 508.

CHALLENGE TO THE ARRAY.

A challenge to the array is a challenge to the entire panel summoned and returned to the sheriff as jurors, and, if allowed, the entire jury or panel is discharged. If not allowed when it should have been, it vitiates and renders void the trial by a jury selected from this improper array. This objection to the panel or challenge to the array can only be taken when there is partiality or misconduct of the sheriff, or some irregularity in making out the lists. Moore v. Navassa Guano Co., 41 S. E. 293, 294, 130 N. C. 229 (citing State v. Speaks, 94 N. C. 865).

A challenge to the array is an objection to all of the jurors collectively, because of some defect in the panel as a whole. If for any reason the impartiality of any one or more of the jurors whose names appear on the panel is suspected, the proper method of determining the state of feeling of such juror or jurors is by challenge to the polls. Thompson v. State, 34 S. E. 579, 580, 109 Ga. 272.

"A challenge to the array is an irregular form of pleading by which exception is made to all the jurors upon the venire for some original defect in making the return thereto. 1 Chit. Cr. Law, 537. It must relate to some defect or partiality in arraying the panel." Durrah v. State, 44 Miss. 789, 796 (quoting Coke, Litt. "A").

Challenges to the array are exceptions to the whole panel, and are generally founded on a charge of partiality, or some default of the sheriff or other officer who summoned the jury. Boyer v. Teague, 11 S. E. 665, 678, 106 N. C. 576, 19 Am. St. Rep. 547.

CHALLENGE TO THE FAVOR.

A challenge to the favor is one grounded upon facts giving rise rather to a suspicion of partiality than to a positive presumption or belief. Thompson v. State, 34 S. E. 579, 580, 109 Ga. 272.

Challenge for favor is where the person challenged is so situated because of connection by marriage that a suspicion is raised against his impartiality, which continues until removed. Waterhouse v. Martin, 7 Tenn. (Peck) 374, 377.

Challenge to the favor is when the party alleges any such exception against one or more of the jurors, which is not forthwith sufficient upon acknowledgment of the truth thereof, but rather arbitrable and considerable by the rest of the jurors, as if the son of the juror had married the daughter of the adverse party. Term. de la L. "Challenge." It sheweth causes of favor which must be left to the conscience and discretion of the triors, upon hearing their evidence, to find him favorable or not favorable. It raises no question of law, but the question of fact whether the juror stands indifferent between the parties. State v. Sawtelle, 32 Atl. 831, 836, 66 N. H. 488.

"Challenges to the favor are where the party hath no principal challenge, but objects only to some probable circumstance of suspicion, as acquaintance and the like, the validity of which must be left to the determination of the triors whose office is to decide whether the juror be favorable or unfavorable." State v. Baldwin (S. C.) 1 Tread. Const. 289, 292.

CHALLENGE TO THE PANEL.

A challenge to the panel is an objection made to all the jurors returned, and may be taken by either party. Pen. Code Cal. 1903, § 1058; Pen. Code Idaho 1901, § 5417; Rev. St. Utah 1898, § 4819.

A challenge to the panel is an objection made to all the trial jurors returned, and may be taken by either party. Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 8145; Code Crim. Proc. S. D. 1903, § 320; Rev. St. Okl. 1903, § 5455.

A challenge to the panel is an objection made to all the jurors returned. Rev. St. Utah 1898, § 3139.

A challenge to the panel is an objection made to all the trial jurors returned, and may be taken as well to the panel returned for the term, as to an additional panel ordered to complete the jury. Cr. Code N. Y. 1903, § 361.

CHALLENGE TO THE POLLS.

Challenges to the polls in capita are exceptions to particular jurors, and reducible to four heads: Propter honoris respectum; propter defectum; propter affectum; and propter delictum. Harrisburg Bank v. Forster (Pa.) 8 Watts, 304, 306.

CHAMBER.

See "At Chambers."

A room or apartment in a house; a private repository; a treasury. Sometimes used to designate a court, a commission or an association of persons habitually meeting together in an apartment, e. g., the "Star Chamber," "Chamber of Deputies," "Chamber of Commerce." Black, Law Dict.

CHAMBER BUSINESS.

All business done out of court by the judge is called "chamber business." But it is not necessary to be done in what is usually called "chambers." Chamber business may be done, and often is done, on the street, in the judge's own house, at the hotel where he stops, when absent from home, or it may be done in transitu, on the cars, in going from one place to another within the proper jurisdiction to hold court. For the purposes of jurisdiction, the chambers of the judge are wherever he happens to be in his circuit or district, when the exigencies of the case call for the transaction of chamber business, and a judge is as clearly engaged in the discharge of the duties of his office, when going from one place of holding court to another, for the purpose of holding court, and just as much entitled to protection from his own government against murderous or other assaults from desperate suitors, on account of his judicial action, as when actually engaged in business at chambers, or in holding court. In re Neagle (U. S.) 39 Fed. 833, 855, 5 L. R. A. 78.

CHAMBER SURVEY.

At an early date in Pennsylvania surveyors often made drafts on paper of pretended surveys, and returned them to the land office as duly surveyed, instead of going into the fields and establishing the lines and marking corners upon the ground, and these false and fraudulent pretenses of surveys never made were called "chamber surveys." Schraeder Min. & Mfg. Co. v. Pack-er, 9 Sup. Ct. 385, 388, 129 U. S. 688, 32 L. Ed. 760.

CHAMBERS.

Formerly in England there were four terms of court in each year, and their duration was so fixed that there were only 91 days in each year during which courts could be in session, and there consequently grew up a practice of hearing many matters out of court, with the same effect as if held while the court was in session. At a later day the practice arose of disposing of such matters at certain hours during term time when the court was not in formal session, and subsequently certain hours of each day were fixed in which one of the judges would hear these matters while the court was actually in session. The motions and orders thus made were said to be held and disposed of at his "chambers" rather than in the courtroom, but the term "chambers" finally became extended so as to include any place, either in or out of the courtroom, at which a judge might hear allegations or make orders, while the court is not in session, in matters pending in that court. Von Schmidt v. Widber, 34 Pac. 109, 110, 99 Cal. 511.

As used in Const. art. 6, § 15, and Gen. St. 1894, § 824, relating to the power and jurisdiction of a judge at chambers, the word "chambers" means the private room or office of a judge, where for the convenience of parties he hears matters and transacts business which do not require a hearing by the judge as a court. Hoskins v. Baxter, 66 N. W. 969, 970, 64 Minn. 226.

Chambers "are places in which the work of the judges out of court is performed, and do not have any local habitation. All business done out of court by the judge is called 'chamber business,' but it is not necessary to be done in what is usually called 'chambers.' The chambers of the judge, where chambers are provided, are not an element of jurisdiction, but are a convenience to the judge and to suitors—places where the judge at proper times can be readily found and business conveniently transacted; but the chambers of the judge, as a legal entity, are something of a myth. For the purposes of jurisdiction, the chambers of the judge are wherever he happens to be in his circuit or district when the exigencies of the case call for the transaction of chamber business. The Justices of the Supreme Court at Washington have in fact no chambers, as they study and do their work out of court, at a room in their own residences. In some courthouses there are rooms that are called 'chambers,' in which the work of the judges out of court is in part performed." In re Neagle (U. S.) 39 Fed. 833, 855, 5 L. R. A. 78.

CHAMBRES.

A will reserving two of the "chambres" of the house, given to another to the use of and during the life of a certain other person, should not be construed as meaning sleeping rooms or rooms in the upper story, but as equivalent to the English word "room," meaning rooms as well in the lower story as the apartment above, whether sleeping rooms or otherwise. Wusthoff v. Dracourt (Pa.) 3 Watts, 240, 242.

CHAMFER.

A chamfer is a small gutter or furrow; a groove; the slope or bevel produced by cutting off the edge of anything which was originally right angled. Syracuse Chilled Plow Co. v. Robinson (U. S.) 35 Fed. 502, 503 (citing Webster).

CHAMPERTY.

See "Maintenance (Of Suits)."

"The word 'champerty' is derived from an old French law term, 'champart,' which was used to denote a customary field rent, consisting of a certain part of the crops in kind, or what is customarily known in this country as 'share rent.' 'Champerty,' therefore, was probably first used in England as a law term by the followers of William of Normandy and their successors to denote a legal agreement by a stranger to assist in the prosecution of suit in consideration of the subsequent receipt of a part of the produce or fruits of the litigation." Small v. Mott (N. Y.) 22 Wend. 403, 405.

"Champerty is the unlawful maintenance of a suit, in consideration of some bargain to have part of the thing in dispute, or some profit out of it." Brown v. Beauchamp, 21 Ky. (5 T. B. Larue*, 14 Ky. (4 Litt.) 411, 413, 418, 14 Am. Dec. 172; Holloway v. Lowe (Ala.) 7 Port. 488, 490; Ware's Adm'r v. Russell, 70 Ala. 174, 179, 45 Am. Rep. 82; *Price v. Champerty, by the common law, consisted in a person's upholding a controversy, he having no interest in it, under a contract to have a part of the property or subject in dispute. Preston v. Breckinridge, 86 Ky. 619, 632, 10 Ky. Law Rep. 2, 6 S. W. 341, 644; Waller's Adm'x v. Marks, 100 Ky. 541, 552, 39 Ky. Law Rep. 121, 38 S. W. 894; Scott v. Harmon, 109 Mass. 237, 238, 12 Am. Rep. 685. It covers all transactions and contracts, whether by counsel or others, to have the whole or some part of the thing or damages recovered. A contract between parties to two litigated attachment suits and their attorneys is not champertous, which, settling and adjusting the matters of controversy between the parties to the suits, provides that judgments should be rendered for one-half of the proceeds of property which had been levied on and sold under the attachments, and then in the hands of the sheriff; that designated parts of the fund, when collected, should be paid to the plaintiffs, and the balance divided in stated proportions between the attorneys of the parties plaintiff and defendant as compensation to them for services rendered in the suits, and in other controversies between the parties, and to be rendered in the prosecution of suits for the recovery of the funds from the sheriff or his sureties; and that one of the attorneys should have the control of the judgments, and of the fund to be realized from the sheriff or his sureties, until the agreement has been fully executed. Price v. Carney, 75 Ala. 546, 553. A contract by which a defendant in attachment transfers and assigns to his attorney the personal property attached, in consideration of professional services rendered and to be rendered in defense of the suit, and in the prosecution of a contemplated action to recover damages for the wrongful suing out of the attachment, stipulating for his own diligence in defense of the suit and the recovery of the attachment lien, and giving the attorney the entire control and management of the suit, is not champerty. Ware's Adm'r v. Russell, 70 Ala. 174, 179, 45 Am. Rep. 82. A contract between an heir at law of a testatrix and certain devisees and legatees under the will, by which the first party agreed to abandon a proposed contest of the will in consideration of which he was to be paid the amount of a bequest intended to be given to him, but omitted from the will by mistake of the draftsman, is not in violation of the law against champerty. Waller's Adm'x v. Marks, 100 Ky. 541, 552, 38 S. W. 894, 19 Ky. Law Rep. 121.

Champerty is an agreement on the part of the champertor to carry on the party's suit at his own expense, and for remuneration by sharing the money or thing to be recovered. Jewel v. Neldy, 16 N. W. 141, 61 Iowa, 299. It is an agreement to prosecute at one's own risk and expense, and take part of the thing received in compensation. Weakly v. Hall, 13 Ohio, 167, 175, 42 Am. Dec. 194. As the term is used in American law, it "is the unlawful maintenance of a suit in consideration of some bargain to have a part of the thing in dispute, or some profit out of it, and covers all transactions and contracts whereby counsel or others have the whole or part of the thing or damages recovered." Poe v. Davis, 29 Ala. 676, 683. It is an aggravated species of maintenance, and was "punishable at the common law as well as forbidden by various statutes." Barnes v. Strong, 54 N. C. 100, 103; Thurston v. Percival, 18 Mass. (1 Pick.) 415, 416. "The gist of the offense is the maintenance and unlawful meddling with another suit, which was supposed to suppress justice and truth, or at least to work a delay." Bayard v. McLane (Del.) 3 Har. 139, 208; Davis v. Settle, 26 S. E. 557, 560, 43 W. Va. 17.

In defining "maintenance," Mr. Greenleaf says: "This crime is said to consist in the unlawful taking in hand or upholding of quarrels or sides, to the disturbance or hindrance of common right. It is of two kinds, namely, 'ruralis,' or in the country, and 'curialis,' or in the courts. The former is usually termed 'champerty,' and is committed where one upholds a controversy under a contract to have part of the property or subject in dispute. The latter alone is usually termed 'maintenance,' and is committed where one officiously, and without just cause, intermeddles in and promotes the prosecution or defense of a suit, in which he has no interest, by assisting either party with money or otherwise." Wheeler v. Harrison, 50 Atl. 523, 526, 94 Md. 147.

As defined by Blackstone, "champerty" is the officious interference in a suit, not in any way belonging to any one, by maintaining or assisting either party with money or otherwise to prosecute or defend. The ground upon which contracts were held, as against the policy of the law, voidable for champerty or maintenance, were that there might be combinations of powerful individuals to oppress others, which might influence or even overawe the court; that they tended to the promotion of unfounded claims, and to disturb the public repose, to promote litigation, and to bring strife and quarrel among neighbors. With the progress of society these reasons have everywhere lost much of their force, and the whole doctrine has been rejected in several states of the Union as antiquated and incongruous with the present state of society. Manning v. Sprague, 18 N. E. 673, 148 Mass. 18, 1 L. R. A. 516, 12 Am. St. Rep. 508.

Champerty is a species of maintenance, which is defined as the "officious intermingling in a lawsuit by a mere stranger, without profit. Champerty involves the element of compensation for such unlawful interference by bargain for part of the matter in suit or some profit growing out of it, or, according to some of the authors, as well also for the whole of the thing in dispute." Maintenance was an indictable offense at common law, but has fallen into disuse. Gilman v. Jones, 5 South. 785, 786, 87 Ala. 691, 4 L. R. A. 113.

Champerty is a species of maintenance, which is defined as the "officious intermeddling with a suit which in no way belongs to one, or maintaining or assisting either party with money or otherwise." It is of the essence of the offense that there shall be a suit or any antagonistic proceeding between the parties, in which assistance is to be rendered in litigation. Hence a contract by which one of two heirs, who are having a controversy over the appointment of an administrator, agrees to pay a third person half of what he can save by buying out the interest of the other, is not champertous. Joy v. Metcalf, 37 N. E. 671, 161 Mass. 514.

There are two essential elements in a champertous agreement: First, there must be an undertaking by one person to defray the expenses, in whole or in part, of another's suit; and, second, an engagement or promise on the part of the latter to divide with the former the proceeds of the litigation in the event it proves successful. In the case of an absolute sale and transfer of an undivided interest which the grantor has or may afterwards acquire in land in the adverse possession of others, the grantor having no suits pending to recover his interests until an agreement that the grantee should institute legal proceedings in his own name and at his own expense for the purpose of recovering and establishing the title of the grantor so conveyed, no part of which is to be divided between them, but by which agreement the grantor is to be paid a given price per acre for the land recovered, and nothing if the litigation prove unsuccessful, both the essential elements to a champertous agreement are wanting, and the transaction, therefore, is not void for champerty. Torrence v. Shedd, 112 Ill. 466, 475.

An obliging advance made by attorneys upon an order upon them, given by their client under his misapprehension that their debt had been paid, is not champerty. The essential ingredient of champerty is the intent to promote litigation. The J. Carl Jackson (U. S.) 29 Fed. 396, 397.

A contract may be champertous and void although there be no stipulation as to the expenses of the suit, and an agreement by which an attorney is to receive, for his services in recovering a claim, a part of the thing or claim to be recovered, is void. Scobey v. Ross, 13 Ind. 117, 119.

Champerty is a species of maintenance, being a bargain with a party to divide the land or other matter sued for between them if they prevail in the suit, though if a man have any interest, however slight, in the subject-matter, it is not maintenance. Reece v. Kyle, 49 Ohio St. 475, 481, 31 N. E. 747, 16 L. R. A. 723.

To maintain the suit of another is unlawful, unless the person maintaining it has some interest in the subject thereof, distinct from what he may acquire by agreement to maintain, or his connection with the suitor in some social relation; but where one has such an interest, whether it be great or small, vested or contingent, certain or uncertain, he may maintain the suit. So, also, where there is consanguinity or affinity between the suitor and him who gives aid to the suit, the latter may maintain. Thalhimer v. Brinckerhoff (N. Y.) 3 Cow. 623, 648, 15 Am. Dec. 308.

According to the usual definition of "champerty," it is that species of maintenance which consists of a bargain with the plaintiff or defendant for a part of the thing recovered in a suit in law or chancery, whether land or something else, which suit the champertor undertakes to carry on or prosecute at his own expense, and at common law champerty was a public offense. Casserleigh v. Wood (U. S.) 119 Fed. 308, 312, 56 C. C. A. 212.

Under the statute of that state, it is held in Colorado that no such offense as "champerty" exists, except as defined by implication of statute. O'Driscoll v. Doyle, 73 Pac. 27, 28, 31 Colo. 193.

Contingent fee.

A contract of an attorney to procure defendant's release from a corporate subscription contract, in consideration of receiving a certain sum if he procures the release, and an additional sum for costs and compensation of the attorney, does not constitute either champerty or maintenance. Wheeler v. Harrison, 50 Atl. 523, 526, 94 Md. 147.

Where the owner of land has suits pending between him and others claiming the same lands, and employs counsel to prosecute his suit to recover the same, under a contract to pay him certain fees for his services, the amount of which are wholly or in part contingent upon the recovery of the amount in controversy, the contract is not champertous. Anderson v. Caraway, 27 W. Va. 385, 396.

Champerty is a species of maintenance, "being a bargain with the plaintiff or defendant to divide land or other matter sued for between them if they prevail at law, whereupon the champertor is to carry the party suit at his own expense." Lewis v. Broun, 14 S. E. 444, 445, 36 W. Va. 1 (citing 4 Bl. Comm. 125); Key v. Vattier, 1 Ohio (Ham.) 132, 143; McIntyre v. Thompson (U. S.) 10 Fed. 531, 532; Spicer v. Jarrett, 61 Tenn. 454, 457; Duke v. Harper, 2 Mo. App. 1, 4; Duke v. Harper, 66 Mo. 51, 56, 37 Am. Rep. 314; Thalhimer v. Brinckerhoff (N. Y.) 3 Cow. 623, 625, 15 Am. Dec. 308; Sedgwick v. Stanton, 14 N. Y. (4 Kern.) 289, 294; Ogden v. Des Arts, 11 N. Y. Super. Ct. (4 Duer) 275, 283 (citing 2 Bl. Comm.; 1 Bouv. Law Dict. 218); Thompson v. Reynolds, 73 Ill. 11, 13; Scott v. Harmon, 109 Mass. 237, 238, 12 Am. Rep. 685; Burnham

v. Heselton, 24 Atl. 955, 956, 84 Me. 578; Reece v. Kyle, 31 N. E. 747, 748, 49 Ohio St. 475, 16 L. R. A. 723; Bayard v. McLane, 3 Har. (Del.) 139, 208; Nickels v. Kane's Adm'r, 82 Va. 309, 312; Wheeler v. Pounds, 24 Ala. 472, 473; Hamilton v. Gray, 31 Atl. 315, 67 Vt. 233, 48 Am. St. Rep. 811; Meeks v. Dewberry, 57 Ga. 263, 264; Allard v. Lamirande, 29 Wis. 502, 508; Johnson v. Van Wyck, 4 App. Cas. (D. C.) 294, 315, 41 L. R. A. 520; Backus v. Byron, 4 Mich. 535, 538.

The text-writers are not entirely agreed in their definitions of the term "champerty." Lord Coke defines it thus: "To maintain and have part of the land, or anything out of the land, or part of the debt, or anything in plea of suit." Mr. Chitty defines it thus: "Champerty is the purchasing a suit or right of action of another person, or, ordinarily, it is a bargain with the plaintiff or defendant to divide the land or other matter between them if they prevail at law, whereupon the champertee is to carry on the party's suit at his own expense." Mr. Blackstone defines it thus: "A bargain with the plaintiff or defendant to divide the land or other matter sued for between them if they prevail at law, whereupon the champertor is to carry on the party's suit at his own expense." Omaha & R. V. Ry. Co. v. Brady, 57 N. W. 767, 772, 39 Neb. 27 (citing 4 Bl. Comm. 135); Aultman v. Waddle, 19 Pac. 730, 734, 40 Kan. 195.

Champerty is not a criminal offense, nor is a champertous contract illegal under our statutes; and, if a contract is champertous and voidable, it is because it is contrary to public policy to enforce it. An agreement whereby attorneys are to prosecute an action for personal injuries, and that the attorneys are to receive an amount equal to one-half of the amount recovered as compensation, is not champertous, for in order to constitute champerty the contract between the attorney and his client must not only provide that the attorney shall have a part of the money or thing recovered in the action, but it must also provide that the attorney shall at his own expense support the suit, be responsible for the costs, and take all the risks of the litigation. Omaha & R. V. Ry. Co. v. Brady, 57 N. W. 767, 772, 39 Neb. 27.

Where an attorney at law agreed with judgment creditors that he would proceed to collect the judgments in his own name, and when collected pay the several judgment creditors 50 per cent. of the amount collected on each judgment, the judgment creditors advancing to him a certain amount as indemnity against costs, the agreement is not void for champerty; for the mere agreement for a contingent fee does not fall within any of the rules of champerty, nor is it generally regarded to be unlawful for an attorney to carry on a suit for another for a percentage or share of the thing to be recovered, unless he assumes the risk of the litigation by relieving or indemnifying his client from all costs and expenses of the same. Aultman v. Waddle, 19 Pac. 730, 734, 40 Kan. 195.

A mere implied agreement or understanding that an attorney conducting a case shall save his client harmless from all costs and expenses of the litigation, and have the judgment for costs recovered, if any, the action being in behalf of all taxpayers, of which such attorney is one, comes far short of being champerty, since such implied understanding is entirely consistent with the theory that such attorney representing the taxpayers will see that all interested parties contribute a sufficient amount to relieve the plaintiff from any pecuniary burden of litigation. Gilbert-Arnold Land Co. v. O'Hare, 67 N. W. 38, 40, 93 Wis. 194.

It has been said that, where an attorney contracts in advance for a part of the property sued for as compensation for his services, he does, in a certain sense, by the act of rendering the service, carry on the suit at his own expense, in part at least, although he has not contracted in terms to pay any part of the expenses of the litigation. It has therefore been adjudged that a written agreement between an attorney and his client to the effect that the attorney will conduct the action as attorney, and perform all reasonable services therein until a final judgment, for which services the client agrees to convey to the attorney a portion of the property recovered, is champertous; but, on the other hand, there are cases of equal authority which hold that an attorney may lawfully contract with his client for part of the property sued for as compensation for his services, providing he does not also agree to pay the expenses, or any portion thereof, and this court holds that such contract is not champertous. Al-lard v. Lamirande, 29 Wis. 502, 508.

Maintenance distinguished.

Champerty is the intermeddling in a suit by a stranger having no interest therein, under an agreement with one of the parties by which the intermeddler is to receive a part of the thing in dispute. It is distinguished from "maintenance," which is the offense of intermeddling where there is no agreement to share the proceeds. Stotsenburg v. Marks, 79 Ind. 193, 196.

Champerty is the act of a stranger intermeddling to aid a litigant in a suit in which he has no interest, under an agreement by which he is to receive part of the thing in suit. It is distinguished from "maintenance," in that the latter is the intermeddling by a stranger without an agreement to divide the thing in suit. Quigley v. Thompson, 53 Ind. 317, 320.

The distinction between "maintenance" and "champerty" seems to be this: That, where there is no agreement to divide the thing in suit, the party intermeddling is guilty of "maintenance" only; but where he stipulates to receive a part of the thing in suit, he is guilty of "champerty." Lytle v. State, 17 Ark. 608, 624. Arden v. Patterson (N. Y.) 5 Johns. Ch. 44; Bouv. Law Dict. tit. "Champerty." "So odious in the eyes of the law are these contracts, that they confer no rights on the parties making them, and if one pay out money under them he cannot recover it." Wheeler v. Pounds, 24 Ala. 472, 473 (citing Burt v. Place [N. Y.] 6 Cow. 431).

Maintenance by personal services.

Maintenance and champerty are deemed illegal, not from the consideration that all the expenses of the litigation are to be borne by a stranger, but in reference to the evils resulting from officious meddling and upholding another's litigation by personal services as well as money; hence an agreement that A. should prosecute and manage a suit at law as B.'s agent and receive a certain per cent. of the amount recovered for his services, and only his actual expenses if he did not recover, amounted to "champerty." Lathrop v. Amherst Bank, 50 Mass. (9 Metc.) 489, 492.

Hawkins defines "champerty" to be "an unlawful maintenance of a suit in consideration of an agreement to have part of the thing in dispute, or some part out of it." Lord Coke says it is "to maintain; to have part of the land or part of the debt, or other thing in plea or suit." Chitty defines it to be a "bargaining for the land or other subject of dispute, on condition of his carrying it on at his own expense." Sir William Grant says "champerty is the unlawful maintenance of a suit, in consideration of a bargain for a part of the thing sued for, or some profit out of it." Bouvier in his Institutes of American Law says, "By champerty is meant a bargain with the plaintiff or defendant to divide the land or other things sued for between them, if they prevail at law, the champertor agreeing to carry on the suit at his own expense." It differs from "maintenance" in this: That in the latter the person assisting the suitor receives no part of the benefit, while in the former he receives one-half, or other proportion, of the thing sued for. Mr. Taylor in his Law Glossary defines it to be "the purchasing of a right or pretended right, under a condition that a part, when obtained by suit, shall belong to the purchaser." When it is considered that champerty is a species of maintenance, it is clear that all these definitions import that the party bargaining for an interest in the thing in dispute undertakes to aid in the prosecution of the suit for its recovery, and whether such aid is furnished in money by a layman who pays the expenses of the suit, or by an attorney or solicitor in services rendered in its prosecution, it is the same, and each alike in effect and in contemplation of law, is a maintainer of the suit, and prosecutes it, in whole or in part, at his own expense. Bacus v. Byron, 4 Mich. 535, 538.

Maintenance by stranger without interest.

Champerty is an agreement by a stranger, having otherwise no interest with the plaintiff or defendant in a suit, to supply money, services, information, or evidence by which to aid in maintaining and carrying on a suit, in consideration that he shall receive a part of the matter in suit, as commission or otherwise, if the party with whom the agreement is made prevails; the purchasing a suit, or a right of suing; "maintenance, with the addition of an agreement to divide the thing in suit." Burnham v. Heselton, 24 Atl. 955, 956, 84 Me. 578 (citing Webst. Dict.).

Champerty is an agreement between an attorney and client by which the attorney is to prosecute an action for a sum of money in which he has himself no previous interest, and to receive in case of success a certain amount of the sum recovered, and such a contract is void as contrary to public policy. Ackert v. Barker, 131 Mass. 436, 437; Williams v. Fowle, 132 Mass. 385, 388.

Champerty is a bargain by a stranger to carry on the suit of another for a portion of the proceeds thereof. "The doctrines of champerty and maintenance were designed to prevent any mere officious intermeddling by strangers in lawsuits in which they had no pecuniary interest. Where one has such an interest, there is no principle of public policy or law which would forbid his furnishing funds with which to aid the prosecution of the suit, or which would prohibit his participation in the division of the subject-matter of litigation when recovered." Johnston v. Smith's Adm'r, 70 Ala. 108, 118.

If a man has an interest, however slight, in the subject of the matter about which the suit is to be brought or is depending, the aid given is not champertous. Reece v. Kyle, 31 N. E. 747, 49 Ohio St. 475, 16 L. R. A. 723.

The general purpose of the law against champerty and maintenance was to prevent officious intermeddlers from stirring up strife and contention by vexatious and speculative litigation which would disturb the peace of society, lead to corrupt practice, and work to prevent the remedial progress of the law. A contract which necessarily and manifestly tended to produce these results ought still to be held void on the ground of public policy. It is doubtless the more modern doctrine that the mere taking of a case on a contingent fee does not constitute champerty, and that it is not unlawful for an attorney to carry on a suit for another for a share of what may be recovered, at least unless he assumes the risks of litigation by indemnifying his client against all costs and expenses of the same. But where it appears that the plaintiff and another who were strangers to the party and to the claim which were the subject of such contract, and who had no object in intermeddling with the matter except a speculative one, enter into a systematic scheme to hunt up claims or supposed claims to which the original holder would probably never have asserted any right or brought any action, and start up wholesale litigation, and induce the landowners to allow him to bring action by agreeing to prosecute the suit at their own expense, indemnifying these clients against costs and expenses of litigation, accept for their compensation a share of what might be recovered, and not to charge anything for their services unless they succeed in collecting the claims, the vice in the conduct of these parties lies deeper and much farther back than merely entering into a champertous contract for their compensation for lawful service performed in the prosecution of the suit legitimately instituted. According to the facts it consists of unlawful, barratrous, and systematic scheming to work up and instigate wholesale and vexatious litigation in the names of parties and concerning subjects to whom and which they were entire strangers. Such contracts will be held champertous and void. Gammons v. Johnson, 78 N. W. 1035, 1037, 76 Minn. 76.

Payment by share only.

Where an attorney did not agree to pay any of the costs, nor to take any part of the land which was the subject of the suit, for his compensation, and did not agree to take anything but money, the mere fact that he agreed to wait for his money until complainant could sell the land, and to receive a fixed sum out of the purchase money, does not make the contract void for "champerty." McPherson v. Cox, 96 U. S. 404, 416, 24 L. Ed. 746.

Champerty "is an agreement by an attorney to prosecute a suit for a part of the amount recovered, and cases where the right to compensation is not confined to an interest in the thing recovered, but gives a right of action against the party, though pledging the avails of the suit or a part of them as security for payment, are not champertous." Blaisdell v. Ahern, 11 N. E. 681, 685, 144 Mass. 303, 59 Am. Rep. 99.

Champerty "is an agreement to prosecute the litigation at the expense of the attorney for a share of the proceeds of the suit, but if the payment be by any other means than a share of the proceeds, or if the expenses of the suit be not borne by the attorney, the agreement is not champertous." Phillips v. South Park Com'rs, 10 N. E. 230, 233, 119 Ill. 626.

The employment of an attorney under an agreement that he shall receive a part of the recovery does not constitute champerty, unless it also contains a further element that the attorney's services shall not constitute a debt due from the client either before or after the recovery, but that the attorney must look solely to the recovery for his compensation. Hadlock v. Brooks, 59 N. E. 1009, 1011, 178 Mass. 425.

Purchase of Litigation.

Purchase distinguished, see "Purchase."

The purchase of a lawsuit by an attorney is champerty in its most odious form. Appeal of Maires, 189 Pa. 99, 108, 41 Atl. 388, 989.

Champerty "is an agreement to maintain another in a suit, furnishing all or a part of the means of prosecuting the same, for a part of the subject-matter recovered by the suit. A purchase or gift of land with reference to which a suit is pending, if not the consummation of a previous bargain nor founded on the ties of blood, is champertous. Even a bona fide purchase pending in a suit has been held to be champerty by intentment of law, since a purchaser must and would aid the suit to save himself from loss." Jackson v. Ketchum (N. Y.) 8 Johns. 479, 483.

Blackstone says "champerty" signifies the purchasing of a suit or right of suing, and he adds: "These pests of civil society that are perpetually endeavoring to disturb the repose of their neighbors, and officiously interfering in other men's quarrels, even at the hazard of their own fortunes, were severely animadverted on by the Roman Law, and they were punished by a forfeiture of a third part of their goods, and perpetual infamy." Lytle v. State, 17 Ark. 608, 624 (citing 4 Bl. Comm. 135).

Champerty is a bargain to divide the thing sued for, whereupon the champertor is to carry on the suit at his own expense, purchasing a suit or right to sue. Thus where a stranger to the suit, having no interest, direct or remote, as far as evidence discloses, in the controversy, secures by assignment, without paying a nominal consideration, an agreement to pay expenses and divide what he recovers, and claims which the holders are not willing to prosecute, a distinction is drawn between lawyers and laymen generally, on the ground that the former are authorized to prosecute and render professional service in this behalf, in themselves valuable. The Clara A. McIntyre (U. S.) 94 Fed. 552, 556.

Where an action to determine the title to land had been carried on for a number of years, and in order to carry it on the defendant has been compelled to transfer one-half of it to his attorney, such purchase does not constitute champerty. Davis v. Settle, 23 S. E. 557, 560, 43 W. Va. 17.

CHANCE.

See "Game of Chance"; "Last Clear Chance."

Accident distinguished, see "Accident—Accidental."

"Chance" implies possibility. An instruction that the jury, in a criminal prosecution, must be satisfied of defendant's guilt beyond a reasonable chance of mistake, is equivalent to an instruction that they must be satisfied beyond the possibility of mistake, "chance" being equivalent to "possibility"; and, since a reasonable possibility means no more than possibility, such an instruction requires too high a degree of proof. Bonner v. State, 18 South. 226, 228, 107 Ala. 97.

The word "chance," in the definition of a lottery as "a scheme for the distribution of prizes by lot or chance," may be defined as "an accident; fortuity; casualty; an event without an assigned cause." Holt v. Wood, 14 Pa. Co. Ct. R. 499, 501.

CHANCE VERDICT.

The word "chance," as used in a statute prohibiting juries from arriving at a verdict by chance or lot, must be deemed to have been used by the Legislature in its popular sense; and, according to the generally accepted and ordinary use of the word, anything is said to have happened by "chance" to any one when it was neither understandingly brought about by his act, nor pre-estimated by his understanding. Goodman v. Cody, 1 Wash. T. 329, 335, 34 Am. Rep. 808.

"Chance" may be defined to be hazard, risk, or the result or issue of uncertain and unknown conditions or forces. Where a jury agreed that each member thereof should write out the sum which he thought plaintiff was entitled to recover, and then divide the aggregate of such sums by twelve, pursuant to an agreement that the quotient should be their verdict, the verdict was obtained by a resort to the determination of chance. Dixon v. Plums, 33 Pac. 268, 269, 98 Cal. 384, 20 L. R. A. 698, 35 Am. St. Rep. 180; Gordon v. Trevarthan, 34 Pac. 185, 186, 13 Mont. 387, 40 Am. St. Rep. 452; Flood v. McClure (Idaho) 32 Pac. 254, 255; Hunt v. Elliott, 20 Pac. 132, 133, 77 Cal. 588; Pawnee Ditch & Improvement Co. v. Adams, 28 Pac. 662, 1 Colo. App. 250. Contra, see Boyce v. California Stage Co., 25 Cal. 460, 473 (citing Turner v. Tuolumne County Water Co., 25 Cal. 397); Ulrich v. Dakota Loan & Trust Co., 49 N. W. 1054, 1056, 2 S. D. 285.

Such verdicts are condemned because they are the result of chance and of lottery, rather than of the deliberation of the jurors. As well put in one case: "It substitutes the fluctuating and uncertain hazards of the lottery for the deliberate conclusions of their reflections and interchange of views." Pawnee Ditch & Improvement Co. v. Adams, 28 Pac. 662, 1 Colo. App. 250.

CHANCING BARGAIN.

Where stock running at large upon a range was sold as an entirety, the number being merely estimated, it was what is termed by the court a "chancing bargain," without warranty, and which, in the absence of fraud or misrepresentation, would not entitle the vendor to additional compensation for excess, nor the vendee to any abatement for deficiency. Cockrell v. Warner, 14 Ark. 345, 352.

CHANCELLOR.

A chancellor was originally an ecclesiastic, and the keeper of the King's conscience, and was the guardian of all infants. Butterick v. Richardson, 64 Pac. 390, 391, 39 Or. 246.

CHANCERY.

Const. art. 4, § 4, declaring the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court to extend over cases of chancery, means such cases as were cognizable by the courts of equity of the state existing at the time of the adoption of the Constitution. Sullivan v. Thomas, 3 S. C. (3 Rich.) 531.

"Chancery jurisdiction" may be defined to be a judicial power to hear and determine all cases wherein the law, for its universality, cannot afford relief. Early in the history of jurisprudence the administration of justice in the ordinary courts was found to be incomplete, and hence arose the necessity of separate courts of equity, which were organized about the reign of Edward III, for the purpose of correcting that wherein the law was defective; and matters of fraud were among the objects to which the jurisdiction of chancery was originally confined. Soon after these courts were established in England, a fierce struggle arose between the law and equity courts in relation to the jurisdiction and powers of each; but, as we trace the history of English jurisprudence, we find the prejudice which at first existed on the part of the common-law courts yielding to the necessity and utility of a distinctive equity jurisprudence. Kenyon v. Kenyon, 24 Pac. 829, 830, 3 Utah, 431.

CHANCERY COURT.

See "Court of Chancery."

CHANGE.

"Change" means to put one thing in the place of another; to exchange; to alter, or make different; to cause to pass from one place to another. Territory v. Scott, 20 N. W. 401, 422, 3 Dak. 357 (dissenting opinion of Edgerton, C. J.).

The word "changed," when used in a statute, is but a repetition of the idea expressed by the word "altered." Wallace v. Blair (Pa.) 1 Grant, Cas. 75, 79.

"In commercial language, 'change' means a fixed place where merchants meet at certain hours for the transaction of business with each other, subject to such general rules or understanding as they think proper to be governed by. There may be property belonging to this body derived from the payment of dues or fines, or consisting of the furniture of the room where the board meets, but the possession of it is a mere incident, and not the main purpose or object of the association." White v. Brownell (N. Y.) 4 Abb. Prac. (N. S.) 162, 192.

A building contract, providing that "changes, additions and alterations" in the work may be ordered and paid for as extra work, means only such changes, additions, and alterations as may be incidental to the complete execution of the work as described in the plans and specifications, and therefore of only minor and trifling importance. Any material departure from such plans and specifications resulting in a new and substantially different undertaking is not within the meaning of the phrase. Cook County v. Harms, 108 Ill. 151.

A building contract requiring additional payments for "changes, additions, alterations," will be construed to mean such changes as are incidental to the complete execution of the work as described in the plans and specifications, and therefore of only minor or trifling importance; if otherwise, some different mode of determining what prices should be paid for them would also have been prescribed by the writer. We think any material departure from the plans and specifications with reference to which the contract was made, which resulted in a new and substantially different undertaking, cannot be regarded as within the meaning of this language. Cook County v. Harms, 108 Ill. 151, 159.

The expression "change in the interest," as used in a fire insurance policy providing that it should be void if there was any change in the interest, title, or possession of the subject of insurance, is substantially synonymous with the words "change in the title," and neither event occurs until the sale of property on an execution. The delivery of the execution to an officer, followed by a levy thereof on a stock of goods, does not effect a change in the interest. The interest which a person may have in property is affected in many ways without producing a change in such interest as that term is generally understood. When he contracts a debt or incurs an obligation, this, in a broad sense, may affect such interest, as the property constitutes the means of payment, and his pecuniary condition, in a general sense, depends on what he has left after discharging all his debts and obligations, but it does not effect a change in the interest, within the meaning of an insurance policy. Wallerad v. Phoenix Ins. Co., 32 N. E. 1063, 1064, 136 N. Y. 875, 32 Am. St. Rep. 752.

"Interest," as used in a policy of fire insurance, providing that if the interest of the insured in the property is not truly stated in the policy, or if any change takes place in the interest, whether by sale, transfer, or conveyance, in whole or in part, or by legal process, or by judicial decree, the policy should be void, means, as defined in Abbott's Law Dictionary, "any right in the nature of property, but less than title." Its chief use seems to designate some right attached to property which either cannot or need not be defined with precision. East Texas Fire Ins. Co. v. Clarke, 15 S. W. 166, 79 Tex. 23, 11 L. R. A. 293.

A policy of fire insurance providing that if the property should be sold or conveyed, or the interest of the parties therein "changed," the policy should be null and void, contemplates an actual change of interest, and not a merely nominal one; and an assignment of a title bond of the property by the insured as collateral security, which did not increase the pledgee's right nor decrease the right of the insured, did not change his interest so as to defeat the policy. Ayres v. Home Ins. Co., 21 Iowa, 185, 188.

A fire insurance policy providing that the policy should be void if any "change in the interest" takes place, whether by sale, transfer, or conveyance, should be construed to include the execution of a mortgage on the insured property, for a mortgage conveys an interest in the property mortgaged to the mortgagee. East Texas Fire Ins. Co. v. Clarke, 15 S. W. 166, 79 Tex. 23, 11 L. R. A. 293.

A contract under seal to sell property, accompanied by a receipt of a part of the purchase price, is a "change of interest" in such property, within the meaning of the clause of an insurance policy which provided that if the property insured should be sold or conveyed, or the interest of the parties therein changed, the policy should be null and void. Germond v. Home Ins. Co. (N. Y.) 2 Hun, 540, 541.

The execution of a chattel mortgage on partnership property by one of the partners to secure his individual debt works a change of interest in the property within the meaning of an insurance policy, placed thereon by the partnership, which provides that the policy shall become void if any change other than by death of the insured takes place in the "interest, title, or possession" of the property insured. Olney v. German Ins. Co., 50 N. W. 100, 101, 88 Mich. 94, 13 L. R. A. 684, 26 Am. St. Rep. 281.

Where what purports to be an absolute conveyance and reconveyance is shown to be in fact a mortgage only, there is no violation of an insurance policy providing that it shall be void if any change takes place in the "interest" of the property insured. Bemis v. Harborcreek Mut. Fire Ins. Co., 14 Pa. Super. Ct. 528, 534.

The word "interest," as used in a fire policy to the effect that the policy should be void if any change should take place in the interest in the property insured, whether by legal judgment or process, or by voluntary act of the insured, or otherwise, means a change in the insurable interest of the owner of the property, which is not affected by the execution of a mortgage on the property. Wolf v. Theresa Village Mut. Fire Ins. Co., 91 N. W. 1014, 1016, 115 Wis. 402.

A fire policy contained a provision that if any change should take place in the title, interest, or possession of the property, without consent of the insurer, the policy should become void. Held, that the word "interest" meant a change in insurable interest of the owner, and a mortgage given by him, inasmuch as it did not affect such interest, did not avoid the policy. Sun Fire Office of London v. Clark, 42 N. E. 248, 250, 53 Ohio St. 414, 38 L. R. A. 562.

In location of highway.

"Change in the location of a highway," according to the ordinary meaning of the term, is a removal of the highway from one place to another. After the removal the highway does not exist in its former place. Leighton v. Concord & M. R. R., 55 Atl. 938, 939, 72 N. H. 224.

In property insured.

In the law of insurance, "change" means a permanent or habitual change in the property insured, or its use or occupation, and does not mean the temporary absence of the watchman, of which the insured has no knowledge. King Brick Mfg. Co. v. Phoenix Ins. Co., 41 N. E. 277, 279, 164 Mass. 291.

As used in Rev. St. § 3643, providing that in the absence of any change increasing the risk without the consent of the insurers, etc., the whole amount mentioned in the policy etc., shall be void, "change" refers to some physical change in the insured property, its use, or its surroundings, and does not relate to a change respecting incumbrances. Webster v. Dwelling House Ins. Co., 42 N. E. 548, 549, 53 Ohio St. 558, 30 L. R. A. 719, 53 Am. St. Rep. 658.

"Change by which the degree of risk is increased," as used in an insurance policy providing that it shall be void if any change occurs in the buildings by which the degree of risk is increased without the written consent of the company, refers only to a change produced by the act of the insured, such a change as the company could consent to upon the application of the insured, and not to one occasioned by accident, or a cause over which the insured had no control. Breuner v. Liverpool & L. & G. Ins. Co., 51 Cal. 101, 107, 21 Am. Rep. 703.

"Change," as used in Rev. St. U. S. § 3326 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 2169], making it an offense to "change or alter distillery warehouse stamps," means to obliterate or render illegible a portion of it, or to erase part of it and substitute something else in lieu of the part erased. United States v. Bardenheier (U. S.) 49 Fed. 846, 847.

Of beneficiaries.

"Changing," as used in the by-laws of a beneficial association authorizing the changing of beneficiaries, means and refers to the express act of naming and specifying some other person or persons in place of those previously designated, who shall be entitled to receive the benefits of the certificate. Hanson v. Minnesota Scandinavian Relief Ass'n, 60 N. W. 1091, 1093, 59 Minn. 123.

Of citizenship.

"Change of citizenship" means an actual removal from one state to another; an actual change of domicile, with a bona fide intention of abandoning the former place of residence and establishing a new one. Kemna v. Brockhaus (U. S.) 5 Fed. 762, 764.

Of districts.

To "change the districts," as used in the judicial article of the Constitution, § 15, authorizing the General Assembly to change the districts of the court of common pleas, "has reference to altering the territorial limits of the districts." In re District Court Case, 34 Ohio St. 431, 437.

Of domicile.

To state it in its briefest form, a change of domicile is accomplished by a change of residence to a new place, combined with the animus manendi. Marks v. Germania Sav. Bank (La.) 34 South. 725, 728.

To constitute a new domicile, two things are essential: First, residence in a new locality; second, the intention to remain there. The change cannot be made except facto et animo. Both are alike necessary. Mere absence from a fixed home, however long continued, cannot work the change. There must be the animus to change the prior domicile for another. Tuttle v. Wood, 88 N. W. 1056, 115 Iowa, 507 (citing Mitchell v. United States, 88 U. S. [21 Wall.] 350, 22 L. Ed. 584); In re Williams (U. S.) 99 Fed. 544, 545.

A change of domicile is not effected until the intention to change is consummated by the actual removal. Bangs v. Inhabitants of Brewster, 111 Mass. 382, 385.

Where a domicile has once been fixed, it continues there until a determination to reside elsewhere has been carried into effect. Inhabitants of Wayne v. Inhabitants of Greene, 21 Me. (8 Shep.) 357, 361.

Change of domicile does not depend so much on the intention to remain in the new place for a definite or indefinite period, as on its being without an intention to return. An intention to return, however, at a remote or indefinite period, to the former place of actual residence, will not control, if the other facts which constitute domicile all give the new residence the character of a permanent home and place of abode. The intention and actual fact of residence must concur, when such residence is not in its nature temporary. There is a right of election by expressed intention, only where the facts of residence are to some extent ambiguous. Hallet v. Bassett, 100 Mass. 167, 171 (citing notes to Guler v. O'Daniel, 1 Am. Lead. Cas. [4th Ed.] 747, 750; Shaw v. Shaw, 98 Mass. 158; Inhabitants of Wilbraham v. Inhabitants of Ludlow, 99 Mass. 587).

A change of domicile means a moving from one place to another with intention to remain absent from the place removed from, and by selecting and occupying a home in the new locality. McLean v. Janin, 12 South. 747, 749, 45 La. Ann. 664.

"Change of domicile consists of an act done with an intent. The act is an actual change of residence. The intent to effect the change must be to acquire a new domicile, either permanent in purpose or of indefinite duration. A temporary habitation, without intent to make it a permanent home or one of indefinite duration, is not a change of domicile." Young v. Pollak, 5 South. 279, 280, 282, 85 Ala. 439.

Where there has been an actual removal with intent to make a permanent residence, and the acts of the party correspond with the purpose, the change of domicile is complete, and the law forces upon him the character of a citizen of the state wherein he has chosen his domicile, although he may have formally declared that he considered himself a citizen of the state he has left. Pacific Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Tompkins (U. S.) 101 Fed. 539, 543, 41 C. C. A. 488.

"It has long been settled law that every person has a domicile somewhere. If he has not acquired one elsewhere, he retains his domicile of origin, and to effect a change of domicile the fact and intent must concur; that is, there must be not only a change of residence, but an intention to abandon the former domicile, and where one has the sole domicile." In re Town of Hector, 24 N. Y. Supp. 475, 481.

A person can have but one domicile, or legal residence, at one time. A domicile, once acquired, continues until another is acquired elsewhere. The fact that a person leaves his domicile with an intention never to return does not change it, but it remains the same until it is changed by the party acquiring the intention of permanently residing in some other place. Ayer v. Weeks, 18 Atl. 1108, 1109, 65 N. H. 248, 6 L. R. A. 716, 23 Am. St. Rep. 87.

"Domicile" means the place of a person's residence, when he has no intention of removal. Mere absence, however long, effects no change of domicile. Lindsay v. Murphy, 76 Va. 428, 430.

Personal absence for a while does not necessarily change one's domicile, and personal presence in a place for a somewhat prolonged period does not necessarily establish domicile there. Olivieri v. Atkinson, 46 N. E. 422, 168 Mass. 28 (citing Viles v. City of Waltham, 32 N. E. 901, 157 Mass. 542, 34 Am. St. Rep. 311; Borland v. City of Boston, 132 Mass. 89, 42 Am. Rep. 424; Inhabitants of Chicopee v. Inhabitants of Whately, 88 Mass. [6 Allen] 508; Harvard College v. Gore, 22 Mass. [5 Pick.] 370, 374).

Domicile is the true, fixed, permanent home of a person, to which, whenever he is absent, he has the intention of returning. Residence and intention to make it a home must concur to constitute a "domicile," and when a person has actually removed to another place with the intention of remaining there for an indefinite time, and as a place of present domicile, it becomes his place of domicile, notwithstanding he may have a following intention to return at some future period. State v. Casnova, 1 Tex. 401, 407.

The place where a person lives is held to be his domicile until the contrary appears, and this is made to appear when it is shown by positive or presumptive proof that at the time of the apparent change of domicile he had no intention of remaining for an unlimited time at the place to which he removed. Dow v. Gould & Curry Silver Min. Co., 31 Cal. 629, 630, 651.

Domicile is in no way affected by a temporary residence elsewhere, and to effect a change there must be not only a change of residence, but an intention to abandon the former domicile, accompanied by an actual abandonment with the intention not to return, and the taking up of a residence in another place with the intention of staying there permanently. In re Dimock, 32 N. Y. Supp. 927, 929, 11 Misc. Rep. 610.

If a seaman without family or property sails from the place of his nativity, which may be considered his domicile of origin, although he may return only at long intervals, or even be absent many years, yet if he does not, by some actual residence or other means, acquire a domicile elsewhere, he retains his domicile of origin. The actual change of one's residence with his family, and the taking up of a residence elsewhere, without any intention of returning, is one of the strong indications of change of domicile, and, unless controlled by other circumstances, is decisive. Thorndike v. City of Boston, 42 Mass. (1 Metc.) 242, 245.

Of duties.

A written contract was entered into at San Francisco for the sale of goods to arrive from Calcutta, B. I. The contract provided that any "change in duties" should be for or against purchasers. The rate of duty on the bags constituting the subject-matter of the contract was not changed since the contract was made. The amount of duty actually paid was, however, considerably less than the amount which it would have been necessary to pay on the same goods if they had been entered at the time when the contract was made, owing to a change meanwhile in the estimated value of the rupee, on the basis of which the ad valorem duty was computed. Held, that the phrase "change of duty" meant a change in the rate of duty by authority of Congress, and not a difference in the amount of duty merely. Detrick v. Balfour (U. S.) 8 Fed. 468.

Of employment.

Within the provisions of an insurance policy providing that, in case of an injury received in any occupation classed as more hazardous than that for which the party was insured, he shall receive a less amount, it was held that individual acts outside the statute occupations do not constitute a change of employment within the meaning of such provision. The provision may well be construed to permit the actual doing of various acts of recreation, exercise, and accommodation, and duties which are recognized as proper incidents in the lives of men of all occupations. The merchant spends a day in hunting; the teacher looks after the men who are building his barn; the manufacturer visiting his relative assists in loading hay; but where one insured as proprietor of a gristmill goes to his father's farm to assist temporarily, during the absence or disability of his father, in overseeing the work of haying, and who is injured while riding on a horse rake, he receives his injury in an occupation other than that for which he is insured. Estabrooks' Adm'rs v. Union Casualty & Surety Co., 52 Atl. 1048, 74 Vt. 473, 93 Am. St. Rep. 916.

"Changing his occupation," as used in an insurance policy providing that the insured shall give immediate notice to the company in the event of changing his occupation, means engaging in another employment as a usual business, and a teacher out of employment who built one or two houses by contract did not thereby become a builder by profession. Stone's Adm'rs v. United States Casualty Co., 34 N. J. Law (5 Vroom) 371, 373.

"Change of grade," as used in a city charter providing that to authorize a change of grade it must be asked for on petition of the owners of two-thirds in value of the property on both sides of the street where the change is desired, means a change of the surface of the street at the proper grade line. The elevation of the surface of the street by the addition of the material used for macadamizing it is not a change of grade, the surface of the street being left at its proper grade line to receive the material. Warren v. Henly, 31 Iowa, 31, 35.

The change of grade of a street includes a change from the natural grade, as well as a change previously made by the authorities; so that, where a party sustains damage by reason of a change from the natural grade of the street, he may recover therefor the same as though it was changed from a grade previously fixed by the authorities. Appeal of Hendrick, 103 Pa. 358, 361, 13 Wkly. Notes Cas. 553, 554 (citing Borough of New Brighton v. United Presbyterian Church, 96 Pa. 331, 339).

"Change of grade," as used in a statute providing that a grade once established may be changed, but only upon certain conditions, one of which is that the damages occasioned thereby, after being established as therein directed by tender to the property owners or their agents before any such change of grade shall be made, has no direct reference to actual work upon the street, which may not take place for months, or even years, after the change is made, but merely to the ideal rise and fall or elevation of the surface between given points as re-established, considered in comparison with the old grade, and shown by proper profile, and to which it may thereafter be lawfully brought, either by cutting down or falling in, or both. Goodrich v. City of Omaha, 4 N. W. 424, 425, 10 Neb. 98.

"Changes of grade are of two different classes, one where a grade other than that which has before existed is prescribed by boards or officers who have jurisdiction to order alteration or specific repair, the other where the change occurs, without adjudication, in so repairing the way as to make or keep it safe or convenient, and to better adapt it for uses for which it had before been intended. The former is not in a strict sense a repair, but a permanent change or alteration—as when a road is lowered or raised to pass under or over a railroad—and is really a substitution of one way for another, although both are within the same location." In either case an adjacent owner damaged by such a change is entitled to compensation therefor. Proctor v. Stone, 33 N. E. 704, 705, 158 Mass. 564.

A change in the grade of a highway is a lawful act, and does not necessarily cause a legal damage to the property of adjoining owners; and, even when legal damage may result, such damage is not compensation for property taken. Nicholson v. New York & N. H. R. Co., 22 Conn. 74, 56 Am. Dec. 390; Fellowes v. City of New Haven, 44 Conn. 240, 26 Am. Rep. 447; Callender v. Marsh, 18 Mass. (1 Pick.) 418. A mere change of grade in a highway is clearly distinguishable from the appropriation of the highway to another use from the imposition of an additional servitude. Gilpin v. City of Ansonia, 35 Atl. 777, 778, 68 Conn. 72.

The phrase "change of grade," as used in a city charter, Laws 1870, c. 519, § 17, providing that, when a city shall change the recorded grade of any street, the owner of a lot fronting thereon may within one year claim damages therefor, means change by the common council by a formal determination. It does not mean every change in a street, or any portion of the soil, even if made under some resolution of the council, nor changes which are incidental to the performance of some other public work. The actual surface of a street often remains for a long time unconformed to the established grade. Erecting an embankment in a street does not itself alter the legal grade. A bridge, a trestle, or an embankment constructed by a railroad company on the street of a city, under a permit from the city council to occupy such street, is not a "change of grade" where no change of grade has been officially determined. Reining v. New York, L. & W. R. Co., 13 N. Y. Supp. 238, 243.

Merely extending the level of a street by filling in the sides thereof as far as the front line of an abutting lot, without raising the level of the street above the established grade, is not a "change of grade" within the meaning of Laws 1897, c. 414, § 159, providing that a change of grade, to the extent of damages resulting therefrom, shall be a taking of adjacent property for public use. In Whitmore v. Village of Tarrytown, 33 N. E. 489, 490, 137 N. Y. 409, the court say: "The grade of the street having been established in 1882, it was not altered or changed by the cutting down of the embankment on either side of the street for the purpose of making the whole street conform to the grade thus established. Such an improvement of a street is not, within the fair meaning of the statute, a change or alteration of the grade thereof." Bissell v. Village of Larchmont, 67 N. Y. Supp. 962, 965, 57 App. Div. 61.

Any elevation or depression of the surface of a highway as it in fact exists, resulting from an attempt to establish a grade, is a change of grade. McGar v. Borough of Bristol, 42 Atl. 1000, 1002, 71 Conn. 652.

Of ground of action.

A statute authorizing amendments which do not "change the ground of the action" justifies the court in authorizing an amendment of an action for breach of a covenant against incumbrance on land, by permitting the plaintiff to add a new and distinct count setting forth another incumbrance on the land conveyed to him, which existed at the time of his deed, since the ground of action may be fairly considered as for breach of the covenant against incumbrances, and, so long as the amendments are confined to mere specifications of this breach, the court is justified in allowing them. Spencer v. Howe, 26 Conn. 200, 201.

Of liability

"Change," as used in Laws 1867, p. 165, § 1, providing that a railroad company shall not change or limit its common-law liability as a common carrier except by written contract, etc., is used as synonymous with "lessen" or "abridge." Feige v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 28 N. W. 685, 687, 62 Mich. 1.

Of money.

Where a person is given money to "change," the idea conveyed is to procure bills or silver coins, or some of each, of lesser denominations, in an amount of equal value, without any intent that the party to whom the money is given should become the owner. Murphy v. People, 104 Ill. 528, 535.

Of moorings.

A vessel bound on a voyage to London with a cargo of fruit and wine, the former to be delivered at Coxe's Quay, which was higher up the river Thames than the London Docks, where the wine was to be delivered, put into the London Docks, and while there application was made to the consignees of the fruit to allow the same to be landed there, but, they refusing, the vessel proceeded from the London Docks toward Coxe's Quay under the charge of a pilot, and ran afoul of a brig and sunk it. Held that, the vessel not having reached the place at which she was to commence the delivery of her cargo, her removal from the London Docks to that place was not a "change of mooring" within St. George IV, c. 125, § 63, and the master was therefore bound to have a pilot on board, and the owners were not liable for the collision. McIntosh v. Slade, 6 Barn. & C. 657.

Of occupants.

"Change of occupants," as used in a policy of fire insurance on a stock of goods providing that any change of possession, except change of occupants, without increase of hazard, should avoid the policy, is not inapplicable because the subject of insurance is personality only, though the term is not the most natural and appropriate, since the change of possession stated must refer to the place where the goods are kept. Walradt v. Phoenix Ins. Co., 32 N. E. 1063, 1065, 136 N. Y. 375, 32 Am. St. Rep. 752 (affirming 19 N. Y. Supp. 293, 296, 64 Hun, 129).

Of ownership.

Under an insurance policy providing that if the insured property should be alienated by sale or otherwise, or if it should be transferred by any contract or "change of ownership," the policy should be void, it was held that a contract for the sale of the property, under which no deed was made and only a part of the purchase money paid, was not an alienation or change of ownership within the meaning of the policy. Hill v. Cumberland Valley Mut. Protection Co., 59 Pa. (9 P. F. Smith) 474.

Of possession.

"Change in possession," as used in a policy of fire insurance providing that any change in possession of the subject of insurance, except change of occupants, should avoid the policy, does not mean every change of possession that may take place in the property. A change in the possession of a stock of goods must refer to the place where the goods are situated. A levy of an execution on a stock of goods does not necessarily, and of itself, effect a change of possession within the meaning of the statute. Walradt v. Phoenix Ins. Co., 32 N. E. 1063, 1064, 136 N. Y. 375, 32 Am. St. Rep. 752.

A policy of insurance, containing the condition that if any "change of possession" of the property take place the policy shall be void, refers to the insured's possessory right, and not to his occupancy. The leasing of premises is not such a change of possession as will avoid the policy. Rumsey v. Phoenix Ins. Co. (U. S.) 1 Fed. 396, 398; Ramsey v. Phoenix Ins. Co. (U. S.) 2 Fed. 429, 431.

Where the effect of the appointment of a receiver for a firm, in an action brought by one of the partners for a dissolution thereof as well as the effect of a final judgment, was to divest all the partners, as such, of all control of the property, there was, in legal contemplation, a "change of possession," within the meaning of a fire insurance policy providing that if any change should take place in the title or possession of the property insured, whether by legal process, judicial decree, or voluntary transfer or conveyance, without written permission, the policy should be void. Keeney v. Home Ins. Co. of Columbus (N. Y.) 3 Thomp. & C. 478, 480.

The word "possession," as used in a fire policy to the effect that the policy should be void if any change should take place in the possession of the property insured, whether by legal judgment or by process, or by voluntary act of the insured or otherwise, means an actual change of the possession in law and equity, which is not affected by a mortgage on the property. Wolf v. Theresa Village Mut. Fire Ins. Co., 91 N. W. 1014, 1016, 115 Wis. 402.

"Change of possession," within the meaning of a fire policy containing a provision that it shall be void in case of a change of possession, cannot be predicated of a mere temporary absence of the insured, the property being left in possession of a care-taker. Shearman v. Niagara Fire Ins. Co., 46 N. Y. 526, 532, 7 Am. Rep. 380.

Gen. St. 1878, c. 41, § 15, declares that the sale of chattels without actual and continued change of possession is presumptively fraudulent as to creditors, etc., of the seller. Held, that the statute required an actual change of possession, and not a mere constructive change. Thus, where the debtor remained in possession of the property which once belonged to him, the mere manual or constructive taking of possession by the buyer from such vendor, by stating that he took possession and put the original owner in charge of the business for him, was insufficient. Murch v. Swensen, 42 N. W. 290, 291, 40 Minn. 421.

As to what is a sufficient change of possession of chattels sold, as against the seller's creditors, see Valley Distilling Co. v. Atkins, 7 S. W. 137, and note, 50 Ark. 289; Peters Saddlery & Harness Co. v. Schoelkopf, 9 S. W. 336, and note, 71 Tex. 418; Hopkins v. Partridge, 10 S. W. 214, and note, 71 Tex. 606; Wolcott v. Hamilton, 17 Atl. 39, and note, 61 Vt. 79; Fitzgerald v. Meyer, 41 N. W. 123, 25 Neb. 77.

"Change of possession means any delivery of a chattel with intent to give it to another. The term is a mere paraphrase of the word 'deliver,' and every delivery with intent to give operates a 'change of possession,' and transfers dominion over the subject of the gift to the donee." Sims v. Sims' Adm'r (Ala.) 8 Port. 449, 33 Am. Dec. 293.

A "change of possession," within the meaning of a statute relative to sales, means an actual and continued change of possession, and not subject to some secret trust between the seller and buyer, and requires that the sale shall be open and public, that the world may be apprised of the change of ownership. Swartsburg v. Dickerson, 73 Pac. 282, 12 Okl. 566.

Where what purports to be an absolute conveyance and reconveyance is shown to be in fact a mortgage only, there is no violation of an insurance policy providing that it shall be void if any change takes place in the possession of the property insured. Bemis v. Insurance Co., 14 Pa. Super. Ct. 528, 534.

Of road.

As used in Rev. Code, c. 60, § 4, providing that the Court of General Sessions shall have jurisdiction to change public roads, "change" should be construed to mean "alter," but is restricted by section 5, providing a procedure on a petition for changing the course of a public road, to mean "change the course of," and does not include widening a road. In re Alston, 40 Atl. 938, 1 Pennewill, 359.

Of title.

Under a fire policy void in case of any "change of title" in the property, unknown to the company, a change of title by the natural death of the insured was not a change contemplated, as the words refer only to voluntary acts on the part of the assured himself. Forest City Ins. Co. v. Hardesty, 55 N. E. 139, 140, 182 Ill. 39, 74 Am. St. Rep. 161.

"Change of title," as used in a policy of fire insurance, providing that, in case of any sale, transfer, or change of title in the property insured, the insurance should be void, means more than a nominal change or transfer of title. "The object of the insurance company is that the interest shall not change so that the assured shall have a greater temptation or motive to burn the property, or less interest and watchfulness in guarding and preserving it from destruction by fire. Any change in or transfer of the interest of the assured in the property of a nature calculated to have this effect is in violation of the policy. But if the real ownership remains the same, if there is no change in the fact of title, but only in the evidence of it, and if this latter change is merely nominal, and not of a nature calculated to increase the motive to burn, or diminish the motive to guard the property from loss by fire, the policy is not violated." Hence an assignment of the title bond of the property insured as collateral security is not such a change or transfer of the title as to violate the policy. Ayres v. Hartford Fire Ins. Co., 17 Iowa, 176, 181, 85 Am. Dec. 553.

"Changed or transferred," as used in an insurance policy providing that the title to the property insured shall not be changed or transferred, means an act whereby the policy is made another's, or whereby the ownership of the policy is made from one person to another, but does not include a transfer, under the bankrupt law, to an assignee. Starkweather v. Cleveland Ins. Co. (U. S.) 22 Fed. Cas. 1091, 1092.

A dissolution of partnership before loss and division of the goods, so that each partner owns a distinct portion, is a "change of title" within the conditions of an insurance policy. Card v. Phoenix Ins. Co., 4 Mo. App. 424.

"Change of title," as used in a fire policy declaring that it shall be void if the property insured shall undergo any change of title, means a change in actual legal ownership, so that a void sale which does not operate to change the legal ownership is not a change of title. Pearman v. Gould, 5 Atl. 811, 814, 42 N. J. Eq. (15 Stew.) 4.

"Change of title," as used in a fire policy providing that the policy shall be void if any change takes place in the title or possession thereof, should be construed to include an agreement between the owner and lessee by which the latter leased the property for a term of years with option to buy the property at any time during the term, and which absolutely bound him to buy and pay the purchase money at the end of that time, since such contract gave the lessees an equitable title in the land. Smith v. Phenix Ins. Co. (Cal.) 23 Pac. 383, 384.

Putting a lessee in possession of insured property under a contract that he shall buy the property on the expiration of the lease, or at his option at any time during his continuance, does not violate the condition of the policy that it shall become void if any change takes place in the title or possession, when on application for insurance the building was in process of erection and untenanted, and the company had knowledge of the contemplated lease and change of possession, though not of the agreement to convey contained in the lease. Smith v. Phoenix Ins. Co., 27 Pac. 738, 739, 91 Cal. 323, 13 L. R. A. 475, 25 Am. St. Rep. 191.

"Change in the title," as used in a policy of fire insurance providing that any change in the title of the subject of insurance should avoid the policy, is substantially synonymous with the words "change of interest" and is not brought about by the delivery of an execution to an officer, followed by a levy thereon on a stock of goods. There is no change of title until the sale on the execution. Walradt v. Phoenix Ins. Co., 32 N. E. 1063, 1064, 136 N. Y. 375, 32 Am. St. Rep. 752.

"Change in the title," as used in a policy providing that it should become void if a change occur in the title or possession of the property, means such a sale, transfer, or alienation as passes the title and carries with it the right to possession, and does not include a sale on execution, since such sale confers a mere right which may or may not ripen into a change of title. German-American Ins. Co. of New York v. Barwick, 54 N. W. 519, 521, 36 Neb. 223.

An insurance policy provided for an immediate termination of the risk if the property be sold or transferred, or any alienation or change take place in the title or possession, whether by legal process or judicial decree, or voluntary transfer or conveyance. It was held that the words "sold, transferred, alienated," do not ordinarily include a sale upon execution, and the words "change in the title of possession" do not extend the meaning, and this would be the meaning were it not for the words "by legal process or judicial decree," but where under a sale on execution the owner of the land has full rights of possession and occupancy for 15 months after the sale, and for 12 months of that time he has an absolute right to redeem, so that neither possession nor title passes before the end of 15 months, such sale on execution does not violate the provisions of the policy. Hammel v. Queen's Ins. Co., 11 N. W. 349, 355, 54 Wis. 72, 41 Am. Rep. 1.

As used in a policy forbidding change of title in whole or in part, the words "change of title" apply to a termination of the assured's interest, and a mortgage is not a sale, transfer, or change of title, since the mortgagor is still interested to the full value of the property, and there is no such change in title or interest as would be effected by a sale. The effect of a mortgage is to appropriate a certain portion of the property to the payment of some one creditor, and does not change the title previous to foreclosure, being a mere incumbrance, which might or might not afterwards have that effect. Judge v. New York Bowery Fire Ins. Co., 132 Mass. 521, 523; Hartford Fire Ins. Co. v. Walsh, 54 Ill. 164, 5 Am. Rep. 115.

Foreclosure on insured premises of an existing mortgage, and a sale by the purchaser at the foreclosure sale, constitute a change of title in the property within the meaning of a provision in the policy declaring it void in case "any change takes place in the title, whether by legal process or judicial decree or voluntary transfer or conveyance." Commercial Union Assur. Co. v. Scammon, 102 Ill. 46, 49.

Within the meaning of an insurance policy providing that if the property be sold or transferred, or any change takes place in title or possession, the policy should be void, the term "change in title" means a change in ownership which carries the legal right of possession and property. Such a change does not take place on the foreclosure of a mortgage, until the period for redemption has expired. Loy v. Home Ins. Co., 24 Minn. 315, 318, 31 Am. Rep. 346.

A "change of title," within the meaning of a fire policy providing that when property insured by the policy shall be alienated or incumbered, or in case of any transfer or change of title to the property insured, without the consent of the insurer, the policy shall cease, does not arise where the assured, before the loss, contracted to sell the house insured for a consideration of $850, $100 of which was paid down, the balance to be paid in 15 equal installments, the purchaser going into possession, but none of the installments being due when the house was destroyed by fire. Grable v. German Ins. Co., 49 N. W. 713, 714, 32 Neb. 645.

A fire policy provided that if any change should take place in the title, interest, or possession of the property insured, by sale, transfer, or conveyance, without the consent of the insurer, the policy should become void. Held, that the words "title or possession" meant an actual change in law and equity, and a mortgage of the property by the insured did not avoid the policy. Sun Fire Office of London v. Clark, 42 N. E. 248, 250, 53 Ohio St. 414, 38 L. R. A. 562.

The word "title," as used in a fire policy to the effect that the policy should be void if any change should take place in the title of the property insured, whether by legal judgment or process, or by voluntary act of the insured or otherwise, means an actual change in the title in law and equity, which is not effected by the execution of a mortgage on the property. Wolf v. Theresa Village Mut. Fire Ins. Co., 91 N. W. 1014, 1016, 115 Wis. 402.

A title to property is not changed by the execution of a mortgage, within the meaning of the charter of an insurance company providing that, "when the title of any property insured shall be changed by . . . mortgage or otherwise, the policy shall thereupon be void." Shepherd v. Union Mut. Fire Ins. Co., 38 N. H. 232, 240.

Where what purports to be an absolute conveyance and reconveyance is shown to be in fact a mortgage only, there is no violation of an insurance policy providing that it shall be void if any change takes place in the title of the property insured. Bemis v. Harborcreek Mut. Fire Ins. Co., 14 Pa. Super. Ct. 528, 534.

Of use and occupation.

A change from occupancy to disuse of a building insured is a change in its use and occupation within the meaning of St. 1861, c. 34, § 4, providing that no insurance company shall avoid payment of a loss by reason of any change in the use and occupation unless it materially increased the risk. Cannell v. Phoenix Ins. Co., 59 Me. 582, 586.

The conversion of ordinary sleeping apartments into a house of assignation and prostitution kept in a disorderly manner was a "change in the nature and character of occupation," within the meaning of a stipulation in a policy of insurance declaring that such change would render it void. Indiana Ins. Co. v. Brehm, 88 Ind. 578, 582.

CHANGE BILL.

The ordinary dray ticket used in commercial cities as a mode of keeping accounts of drayage between merchants and draymen is not a "change bill" within the sense of the law forbidding the issuance and circulation of change bills. State v. Fisk, 35 Tenn. (3 Sneed) 695, 696.

CHANGE OF VENUE.

Application for, as special proceeding, see "Special Proceeding."

As an action, see "Action."

"Change of venue" and "removal of causes," in statutes authorizing the transfer of causes, are interchangeable and of the same significance. "Change of venue," strictly speaking, means a change of the place of trial to another county, but is sometimes used to denote the transfer of the cause to another court or judge within the county or district in which it is pending. Thus "the removal of a cause," within the meaning of Act April 14, 1834, authorizing either party, in a suit brought by or against canal companies and railroad companies, to remove the same to the court of another adjacent county, and the phrase "change of venue," in Act March 30, 1875, entitled "An act relating to and authorizing change of venue in civil cases," are of the same meaning. Felts v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co., 45 Atl. 493, 494, 195 Pa. 21.

A change of venue is not a constitutional right. It is entirely competent for the Legislature to provide the terms upon which a change, if any, shall be granted. The Legislature has used the words "change of venue" and "the removal of a cause" as interchangeable and of the same significance, so that, whatever technical signification the word "venue" had at one time, the words "change of venue" will not be held to mean a change from a circuit or county, but will include as well a removal from one place in a county to another. State v. Wofford, 24 S. W. 764, 765, 119 Mo. 375.

CHANNEL.

See "Main Channel"; "Natural Channel"; "Regular Channel"; "Ship Channel"; "Steamboat Channel"; "Usual Channel."

A "channel" is the bed of a stream of water. The thread of a stream is the middle line of the channel, and, where a running stream which is a boundary changes its channel by a gradual and progressive washing away of one of its banks, the boundary follows the thread of the stream, though the change is caused by instantaneous and obvious dropping into the river of quite large portions of the bank, when such portions are not carried down the stream or lodged on the opposite shore in solid masses, but disintegrate and separate into particles of earth, borne onward by the flowing water. Willey v. Lewis, 11 Ohio Dec. 607, 611, 28 Wkly. Law Bul. 104.

A channel is defined by the Century Dictionary to be the deeper part of the river or bay where the current flows, or which is most convenient for the track of ships. The Northern Queen (U. S.) 117 Fed. 906, 915.

The channel of a river is the bed of the stream over which its waters run; a passage-way between banks through which flow the waters of the stream. Benjamin v. Manistee River Imp. Co., 4 N. W. 483, 484, 42 Mich. 628.

The channel is that portion of a body of a river or canal which furnishes uninterruptedly, through its course, the deepest water. The Sarah (U. S.) 52 Fed. 233, 235, 3 C. C. A. 56.

As boundary.

The "channel" of a river forming a boundary line between states means the space within which ships can and usually do pass. State of Iowa v. State of Illinois, 13 Sup. Ct. 239, 243, 147 U. S. 1, 37 L. Ed. 55.

By the word "channel" is meant the place where the river flows. State of Alabama v. State of Georgia, 64 U. S. (23 How.) 505, 513, 16 L. Ed. 556.

"The 'channel' of a river, bay, or sound, in boatmen's parlance, means the course over its bed along which the water is deepest and the navigation safest. This must be irrespective of the current or distance from the shore. In questions of geography or boundaries, however, it is more generally used to designate the depression of a bed below permanent banks, forming a conduit along which waters flow, and which may be at some times full, and at others nearly, if not quite, dry. In this sense it is of common use in law. It is the more obvious signification in connection with boundaries, inasmuch as it presents something of a permanent nature, and at least at all times visible, and, when changed, leaving traces of old landmarks. They have permanent features independent of water, whereas channels, in the sense of the river pilots, are ever shifting, invisible, discoverable only by patient sounding, and then imperfectly." Cessill v. State, 40 Ark. 501, 504.

In navigation of rivers.

The word, when applied to rivers generally, without the purpose of describing their currents or navigable characters, means the bed in which the stream of the river flows; but it is, like many other words in our language, controlled in its signification by the subject under discussion. As used when treating all subjects connected with the navigation of rivers, it indicates the line of the deep water which vessels follow. In this sense it is familiarly used by the boatmen of the Mississippi river. Dunlieth & D. Bridge Co. v. Dubuque County, 8 N. W. 443, 446, 55 Iowa, 558.

The definition of "channel" given in the most recent edition of Webster's Dictionary is "the bed of a stream of water, especially the deeper part of a river or bay where the main channel flows." The word "channel," when employed in treating subjects connected with the navigation of rivers, indicates the line of the deep water which vessels follow. Buttenuth v. St. Louis Bridge Co., 17 N. E. 439, 444, 123 Ill. 535, 5 Am. St. Rep. 545.

In navigation of tide waters.

"The term 'channel' sometimes refers to the current of a running stream, and means that part of the stream in which the current flows. But in tide waters the term refers to the movement of vessels, and means that part of the water on which vessels move. Buoys do not mark the limits of channels to vessels of lighter draft. They are usually placed at the edge of that part of the channel in which the water is deep enough for vessels of large size, called the 'ship channel.'" The Oliver (U. S.) 22 Fed. 848, 849.

CHANNEL OF COMMERCE.

The channel of commerce of a navigable stream is the channel upon which commerce by steamboats or other vessels is usually conducted. State of Iowa v. State of Illinois, 13 Sup. Ct. 239, 243, 147 U. S. 1, 37 L. Ed. 55.

CHAPEL.

7 & 8 Geo. IV, c. 29, § 10, relating to the breaking and entering a church or chapel, does not refer to or include a Wesleyan chapel, but only chapels of the Church of England. Rex v. Nixon, 7 Car. & P. 442.

CHAPTER.

The words "title," "chapter" and "section," when used by way of reference, mean a title, chapter, or section of the Vermont statutes. V. S. 1894, 16.

CHAR.

"The definition of 'char' is to reduce wood to a coal by burning." It constitutes a sufficient burning to render a person, knowingly and willfully setting fire to a building, guilty of the crime of arson. State v. Sandy, 25 N. C. 570, 574.

Wood is said to be charred when it is reduced to coal and its identity changed. State v. Hall, 93 N. C. 571, 573.

Like character, see "Like."

Character is the actual qualities which belong to an individual. Boak v. State, 5 Iowa (5 Clarke) 430.

"Character" is defined to be peculiar qualities impressed by nature or habit on a person which distinguish him from others. Webst. Dict. A libeler seeks to deprive a man of these and give him a fictitious character. Cox v. Strickland, 28 S. E. 655, 661, 101 Ga. 482.

Character is the estimation in the community in which a witness is held. Smith v. State, 7 South. 52, 53, 88 Ala. 73; State v. Turner, 15 S. E. 602, 604, 36 S. C. 534; Fahnestock v. State, 23 Ind. 231, 238.

The opinion and estimation of a person's neighbors, in order to establish his character, must be in regard to the traits of his moral character; as, for instance, that he was regarded by his neighbors generally as a thief, or regarded as an honest man, etc. State v. Parker, 9 S. W. 728, 732, 96 Mo. 382.

Character is the result of personal observation and intercourse and the information derived from others. The opinion must be the result of a knowledge of the general reputation of the party, not of particular facts nor of an estimate of the character of the party founded on personal knowledge of many facts. Ford v. Ford, 26 Tenn. (7 Humph.) 92, 100.

As conduct or habits.

Conduct synonymous, see "Conduct."

"Character and conduct," as used by Mr. Justice Story in the case of Jencks v. Coleman, 13 Fed. Cas. 442, when he speaks of the character and conduct of passengers who are guilty of gross and vulgar habits of conduct, or who make disturbance on board, or whose characters are doubtful or dissolute or suspicious, and whose characters are unequivocally bad, mean habits and conduct that are injurious to the other passengers in the sense that they subject them to loss at the hands of the thief or gambler, to discomfort by reason of personal trespass and insult, or to annoyance by the exhibition of coarse and vulgar habits. Brown v. Memphis & C. R. Co. (U. S.) 7 Fed. 51, 56.

"Character," as used in an instruction that the presumption of law is that the life and previous character of the prosecuting witness were chaste, means manner of living, habits of life, conduct. Bradshaw v. People, 38 N. E. 652, 653, 153 Ill. 156.

As general character.

Character which would discredit a witness is general character. It may happen that a man may have knowledge of a particular fact which would induce him to disbelieve another on oath, but such disbelief would not be evidence as to his character. Wike v. Lightner (Pa.) 11 Serg. & R. 198, 199.

"Where a witness is sought to be impeached on the ground of his bad character, persons called for that purpose may testify that they are acquainted with his general character, and may give evidence as to whether, from such general character, they would believe the witness on oath, although they expressly disclaim all knowledge of the witness' character for truth and veracity. In this sense, therefore, character is used as meaning general character, and not character with respect to certain particular characteristics." Johnson v. People (N. Y.) 3 Hill, 178, 38 Am. Dec. 624.

As reputation.

The word "character," in provisions that the character of a witness may be proved for the purpose of testing his credibility, means reputation. State v. Egan, 13 N. W. 730, 59 Iowa, 636; Bucklin v. State, 20 Ohio, 18, 24; Rudsdill v. Slingerland, 18 Minn. 330, 382 (Gil. 342, 343); Powers v. Leach, 26 Vt. 270, 278; Knobe v. Williamson, 84 U. S. (17 Wall.) 586, 588, 21 L. Ed. 670.

Character is the estimation in which one is held in the community; reputation, the estimate put upon it. This estimate may be just or unjust, true or false; still it is character. It is judged by many things, some of which it would be difficult, if not impossible, to define. What the public generally say of a person, and the manner in which he is received and treated in society, are among the tests by which his character is determined. Sullivan v. State, 6 Ala. 48, 50; Haley v. State, 63 Ala. 83, 86.

When a witness knows another's character, though he may have no personal knowledge of any act of his life, he is competent to testify in regard to it. But these are not the only sources of the witness' information. He may know his character although he never heard it canvassed, and does not even know a majority of his neighbors. Haley v. State, 63 Ala. 83, 86.

"The term 'character' in law is not synonymous with 'disposition,' but simply means reputation, or the general credit which a man has obtained in public opinion." Taylor, Ev. 350. Where character evidence is admissible, it has generally been found that that which is least talked about is generally the best character, and it has therefore been necessary to permit witnesses to give negative evidence on the subject, and to state that they never heard anything against the character of the person on whose behalf they are called; and "some of the judges," says Mr. Taylor, "have gone so far as to assert that the evidence in this negative form is the most positive proof of a man's good reputation"—citing Reg. v. Rowton, 10 Cox, Cr. Cas. 25, where Cockburn, C. J., observes: "I am ready to admit that negative evidence, such as 'I never heard anything against the character of the person of whose character I come to speak,' should not be excluded. I think, though it is given in a negative form, it is the most positive evidence of a man's good character and reputation, because a man's character does not get talked about until there is some fault to be found with him. It is the best evidence of his character that he is not talked about at all." Hussey v. State, 6 South. 420, 423, 87 Ala. 121.

Generally speaking, "character" is a word of broader significance than "reputation." However, the character which affected the question of guilt or of the credibility of witnesses is almost a synonym of reputation—the estimate placed upon the party by the public. Sullivan v. State, 66 Ala. 48, 50.

The word "character" has an objective and subjective import which are quite distinct. As to the objective, character is its quality; as to man, it is the quality of his mind and his affections, his capacity and temperament; but, as a subjective term in the minds of others, one's character is the aggregate or abstract of other men's opinions of one, and in this sense, when a witness speaks of the character of another witness for truth, he draws not upon his memory alone, but his judgment. It is the conclusion of the mind of the witness in summing up the amount of all the reports he has heard of the man, and declaring his character for truth as held in the mind of his neighbors and acquaintances, and, in this sense, character, general character, and general report or reputation are the same. Powers v. Leach, 26 Vt. 270, 278.

"Character," in the sense in which the term is used in jurisprudence, means the estimate attached to the individual by the community, not the real qualities of the individual as conceived by the witness. In other words, it is not what the individual in question really is, but what he is held to be in the society in which he moves. Whart. Cr. Ev. c. 2, § 58. Character is a fact which is proved by another fact—general reputation. It cannot be shown by evidence of particular and specific facts, but may be proved by negative testimony. It must therefore be proved by witnesses who are acquainted with the general reputation of the person whose character is in issue, which must be shown before the evidence is admissible. Berneker v. State, 59 N. W. 372, 374, 40 Neb. 810.

Where witnesses in their depositions, when testifying of the reputation of other witnesses for truth and veracity, used the terms "character for truth" and "general character for truth," it was held that character, general character, report, or reputation, so used, were synonymous. Powers v. Leach, 26 Vt. 270, 275.

"The character for truth of a witness is a report concerning such witness. Character and reputation are the same. The reputation which a man has in society is his character. General report is general reputation, and general reputation is general character. The knowledge of a witness' character is not a personal, individual knowledge of facts, but a knowledge by reputation or general report." Kimmel v. Kimmel (Pa.) 3 Serg. & R. 336, 337, 8 Am. Dec. 653.

Evidence of defendant's character means evidence of his general reputation. State v. Pearce, 15 Nev. 188, 190.

The word "character" has been variously used in legal proceedings, sometimes denoting personal, official, or special character in which a party sues or is sued; but it more frequently refers to reputation or common report, and is seldom used as synonymous with mere inclination or propensity or even secret habit, nor as descriptive of the mere qualities of individuals, only so far as others have formed opinions from their conduct. In a prosecution for seduction, reputation of incontinency alone will constitute a defense. Safford v. People, 1 Parker, Cr. R. 474, 478.

The character of a person for peace and quiet is the estimate which the public places on the person—his reputation. When a witness is called to testify in regard to it, he must not speak from his individual knowledge of the acts or conduct of the person inquired about. His reputation or standing, whether good or bad, is the matter to be deposed to. Character is the estimation in which one is held by the public who know his standing. His character manifests itself by the manner in which one is estimated, spoken of, or received in society. It is always permissible on cross-examination to ascertain the extent of the witness' information and the data from which he draws his conclusion. A man may have a bad character for peacefulness without being bloodthirsty, quarrelsome, turbulent, revengeful, and disorderly. De Arman v. State, 71 Ala. 351, 360.

"Character" is used in two senses. In the one it is used to refer to one's actual life, and in the other it is the reputation which one bears in the community. In a libel case, reputation may be shown as indicating character. Edwards v. Kansas City Times Co. (U. S.) 32 Fed. 813, 816.

"Character" as used in Acts 23d Gen. Assem. c. 35, § 12, providing that on the trial of any proceeding against any person for selling, giving away, or keeping intoxicating liquors in violation of law, evidence of "the character and habits of sobriety or otherwise" may be given, includes reputation. State v. Fleming, 53 N. W. 234, 235, 86 Iowa, 294.

"Character" is a synonymous term with "reputation," as used in Act 1864, c. 38, providing that evidence of facts, or reputation proving that a person is habitually and by practice a thief shall be sufficient for his conviction, as satisfactorily establishing the fact that he is a common thief. World v. State, 50 Md. 49, 66.

"Character," as used in Pub. St. c. 80, § 3, providing that the notorious character of any premises on which liquors are sold shall be evidence that such premises are nuisances, is synonymous with the word "reputation," meaning merely what is reported or understood from report. State v. Wilson, 1 Atl. 415, 416, 15 R. I. 180.

Reputation distinguished.

The term "character," as used in a statute, signifies that which the person really is, in distinction to that which she may be reported to be. Andre v. State, 5 Iowa (5 Clarke) 389, 394, 68 Am. Dec. 708; State v. Lapage, 57 N. H. 245, 296, 24 Am. Rep. 69.

"Character consists of the qualities which constitute the individual; reputation, the sum of opinions entertained concerning him. The former is interior; the latter external. One is the substance; the other the shadow." In re Spenser, 7 Cent. Law J. 84, 85.

"'Character' and 'reputation' are not synonymous terms. Character is what the man is morally, while reputation is what he or she is reputed to be. Reputation is the estimate which the community has of the person's character, and it is the belief that moral character is wanting in the individual that renders him unworthy of belief; that is to say, that reputation is evidence of character, and if the reputation is bad for truth, or reputation is bad in other respects affecting the moral character, then the jury may infer that the character is bad and the witness not reliable." Leverich v. Frank, 6 Or. 212, 213.

Doubtless there is a distinction observed by careful writers between character and reputation; character, where the distinction is observed, signifying the reality, and reputation merely what is reported or understood from report to be the reality about a person or thing. The word "character," however, is often used as synonymous with and in the sense of "reputation." State v. Wilson, 1 Atl. 415, 416, 15 R. I. 180.

"Character," as used in Code, § 2586, providing a punishment for the seduction of an unmarried woman of previously chaste character, is not synonymous with "reputation," and is used in its accurate sense as signifying that which the person really is, in distinction from that which she may be reported to be. "According to Webster, 'character' signifies the peculiar qualities impressed by nature or habit upon a person, which distinguish him from others. These constitute real character, and the qualities which he is supposed to possess constitute his estimated character or reputation. And then he defines 'reputation' to be good name, the credit, honor, or character which is derived from a favorable public opinion or esteem, and character by report. It is very true that the word 'character' is often used colloquially in the same sense as 'reputation,' but such is not its true signification." Andre v. State, 5 Iowa (5 Clarke) 389, 394, 68 Am. Dec. 708.

"Character," as used in Code, § 3867, providing punishment for the seduction of any unmarried woman of previously chaste character, does not mean her reputation, but her real moral qualities. "To determine whether the crime has been committed, the true character of the woman must be ascertained. The reputation of a man or woman does not always accord with the true character of the individual." State v. Prizer, 49 Iowa, 531, 532, 31 Am. Rep. 155.

"Character" is defined by Webster to be "the peculiar qualities impressed by nature or habit on a person, which distinguish him from others." These constitute real character, and the qualities he is supposed to possess constitute his estimated character or reputation. Carpenter v. People, 8 Barb. 603, 608.

CHARBON.

Charbon is a disease caused by the infection upon the body of putrid animal matter containing poisonous bacillus anthrax. Bacon v. United States Mut. Acc. Ass'n, 25 N. E. 399, 123 N. Y. 304, 9 L. R. A. 617, 20 Am. St. Rep. 748.

CHARCOAL.

"Charcoal," as used in the internal revenue act exempting charcoal from taxation, does not mean boneblack, but means only that produced from wood. In commercial contracts and in legal phraseology the simple term "charcoal," without the word "animal" before it, would not be held to include bone-black or animal charcoal; and, if we look to the ordinary and popular use of the term "charcoal," it clearly would not include bone-black. Schrieffer v. Wood (U. S.) 21 Fed. Cas. 737, 738.

CHARGE.

See "Average Charges"; "Engineer in Charge"; "Free of All Charges"; "Lawful Charges"; "Necessary Charges"; "Port Charges"; "Prison Charges."

A complaint in an action by an attorney for commissions, alleging that the plaintiff charged a certain amount, but which does not allege that the charge was true, or that the services for which he made the charge were worth that or any other sum, is not to be construed as an allegation that the charge was true, or that the services were worth such sum, and hence the allegation is not sufficient to authorize the introduction of evidence of the value of the services. Farlington v. Wright, 1 Minn. 241, 245 (Gil. 191, 195).

The word in its legal acceptance has a very broad meaning. It includes payments charged on land by devise, as legacies; those by deed, as rents, annuities, and mortgages; those by operation of law for public purposes, as taxes and assessments; those by effect of law in private suit, as judgments. In the dictionaries and digests of the common law, by no means the best expounders of the reason of the law, but of necessity the best interpreters of its vocabulary, the word "charge" is used in this latitude. Darling v. Rogers (N. Y.) 22 Wend. 483, 491.

Charge is the price required or demanded for services rendered, or less frequently for goods supplied. It is a word of very general and varied use. Fulmer v. Southern Ry. Co., 45 S. E. 196, 198, 67 S. C. 262.

The words "charge" and "custody" are frequently used as synonymous. The lexicographers give them as synonyms. State v. Clark, 29 Atl. 984, 86 Me. 194.

The use of the words "charging and collecting," in a contract to transport coal through a canal, charging and collecting a certain toll therefor, does not exclude the idea of collecting compensation at a date after the coal has been transported, or limit the canal company to the special remedy of retaining or excluding the boats. Pennsylvania Coal Co. v. Delaware & H. Canal Co., 40 N. Y. 72, 73, 79.

As appointment as guardian.

The term "take charge of," in a will providing that E. should take charge of the testator's children and receive annually from the testator's estate the sum of $500 for her services, constituted an appointment of a testamentary guardian of the persons, and should be so construed, and entitled E. to the annual bequest until the youngest child of the testator became of age, but did not entitle E. to the sum of $500 per annum during her lifetime. The devise was not a bequest of an entire sum for the performance of the trust, nor was it a legacy to an executrix, but merely constituted a direction for the payment of a certain sum annually for services for taking charge of the children of the testatrix. Acceptance and performance were necessary on the part of the devisee, and her right to receive payment ended with the termination of her relation to the children of the testatrix. Appeal of Hewson, 102 Pa. 55, 58.

Assessment for benefits.

"Taxes, charges, and impositions," as used in a charter exempting the property of a corporation, are the taxes, charges, and impositions imposed for public use, and do not include assessments for benefits. City of Paterson v. Society for Establishing Useful Manufactures, 24 N. J. Law (4 Zab.) 385, 400.

As burden or onerous condition.

The term "charge," as used in a statute prohibiting any "charge" on foreigners emigrating to the country, means any onerous condition; it being the evident intention of the act to prevent any such condition from being imposed upon any person emigrating to the country which is not equally imposed upon all other emigrants, at least upon all others of the same class. In re Ah Fong (U. S.) 1 Fed. Cas. 213, 218.

As command or direction.

A will providing that, upon the death of testatrix's husband, she gave, devised, and bequeathed all of her estate in such manner as he might by his last will and testament, or by an instrument in the nature of a last will and testament, devise and bequeath, trusting entirely to his discretion to carry into execution such "charge and instruction" as she might during her life have expressed to him in regard thereto, expresses more than hope or wish, or advice or recommendation. The words "charge and instruction" have an imperative significance, which may not rightfully be resisted. Their inherent force is not impaired by testatrix's expression of entire trust in her husband's discretion to carry out her injunctions. Condit v. Reynolds, 49 Atl. 540, 541, 66 N. J. Law, 242.

As control or regulation.

Under Rev. St. 1879, art. 2851, providing that during the marriage the husband shall have sole management of the wife's property, the husband is the "person in charge" of sheep belonging to the wife, within the meaning of Act April 4, 1883, making a person in charge of sheep liable for fees for their inspection. Abbott v. Stanley, 14 S. W. 62, 77 Tex. 309.

Pilot Act 6 Geo. IV, c. 175, providing that an unlicensed pilot, who shall continue in the charge or conduct of any ship or vessel after any duly licensed pilot shall have offered to take charge of such ship, shall forfeit a certain sum, does not include a person employed to tow or move a vessel, if the bona fide object of the employment by the moving power, as such person is not a pilot, and has not the conduct or charge of the vessel. The words mean the taking the charge and direction of a pilot, whose proper and sole duty is to select the course, and take the management and conduct of the vessel for the purpose of directing her in that course. Bellby v. Scott, 7 Mees. & W. 93, 100.

The act to regulate and license the sale of intoxicating liquors, approved March 17, 1875, declares "that no city or incorporated town shall charge any person who may obtain a license under the provisions of this act more than the following sums for license to sell," etc. This section was not intended to, and did not, confer any power or authority upon either cities or incorporated towns to regulate and license the sale of intoxicating liquors within their corporate limits. From the language of the section cited and from the title of the act it is manifest that the Legislature merely intended in and by said section to impose a limit upon the amount to be charged for license by the corporate authorities of cities and incorporated towns, wherever they might be authorized by law to grant such license. By the general law the corporate authorities of cities have been authorized to regulate and license the sale of intoxicating liquors; but this authority has not been given to towns incorporated under the general law, and is not given to them by the act referred to. Walter v. Town of Columbia City, 61 Ind. 24, 28.

A section foreman, whose duty it is to keep the track in repair, is "a person in charge or control of any part of the track of a railway," within Employers' Liability Act, subd. 5. Alabama G. S. R. Co. v. Davis, 24 South. 862, 866, 119 Ala. 572.

As a debt or liability.

A charge is defined as an obligation directly bearing on the individual thing or person to be affected, and appointing him or it to the discharge of the duty or claim imposed, so that an act of the Legislature making certain warrants a county charge converts prima facie evidence of debt into incontestible obligations of the maker, so that the statute is invalid as an exercise of judicial power. Felix v. Wallace County Com'rs, 62 Pac. 667, 669, 62 Kan. 832, 84 Am. St. Rep. 424.

The word "charge," as a technical word of legal use, conveys the idea of obligation. The distinct signification of the term rests in the idea of obligation, directly bearing upon the individual, thing, or person to be affected, and binding him or it to the discharge of the duty or satisfaction of the claim imposed. In this view, a charge will, in general terms, denote a responsibility peculiar to the person or thing affected and authoritatively imposed. It means an exaction or demand which must be met, and, though in common phrase, as applied to a single instance, it may at times imply a demand made on the one hand without power to enforce it, which may or may not be compelled with on the other, yet in a complaint charging that a charge of 1 per cent. was made in addition to the lawful rate of interest on certain loans and advances, "it carries with it the fuller meaning of an obligation imposed and taken," and is sufficient to show usury. Merchants' Exch. Nat. Bank v. Commercial Ware House Co., 49 N. Y. 635, 639.

In a bond conditioned to keep a constable harmless from all charges by reason of a levy made under execution, the word "charges" means liability. Bancroft v. Winspear (N. Y.) 44 Barb. 209, 214.

In the construction of revenue statutes, it is a general rule that, if a duty is charged on any article, the word "charged" means that the owner shall be personally debited with that sum. United States v. Lyman (U. S.) 28 Fed. Cas. 1024, 1030; Attorney General v. —, 2 Anst. 559, 560.

"Charged," in a statute providing that gifts charged in writing by an intestate or his order shall be deemed advancements, implies that the donee shall be charged or in a manner made debtor to the testator or intestate's estate, or that the memorandum given shall indicate the nature of the gift as an advancement. Mowry v. Smith, 5 R. I. 255, 260.

An officer serving a writ, not being in the employ of the defendant named in the writ, and such defendant not by law becoming liable to the officer for his fees for the service of the writ, either before or after final judgment in the case, cannot properly, within the ordinary meaning of that word, "charge" his fees against such defendant, but can only render his services upon the credit of, and charge his fees for such services against, the person who has employed him, within the meaning of Gen. St.

§ 955, enacting that every officer who demands or receives more than his legal fees shall pay threefold the amount thereof to the one against whom the illegal charge is made, so that a defendant cannot recover excessive fees from a sheriff which he has paid to the plaintiff on the settlement of the case. Littlefield v. Cowles, 50 Atl. 737, 739, 74 Conn. 241.

In Public Health Act 1848, 11 & 12 Vict. c. 3, § 89, providing that the local board may make and levy special and general district rates in order to raise money for the payment of future charges and expenses which may have been incurred at any time within six months before the making of the rate, the term "charge" includes a judgment obtained against a local board, and a rate might be made to defray it within six months of that charge. Queen v. Rotherham Local Board, 8 El. & Bl. 905, 913.

As demand or require.

Code, § 1966, imposes a penalty on any railroad which shall charge for the transportation of any freight over its road a greater sum than shall be charged at the same time by it for an equal quantity of the same class of freight transported in the same direction over any portion of the same railroad of equal distance. Held, that the phrase "charge for the transportation of any freight" means to require or demand of the shipper as of right such compensation for the transportation of any freight already transported or delivered to the company to be transported. Hines v. Wilmington & W. R. Co., 95 N. C. 434, 440, 59 Am. Rep. 250.

As duty or obligation.

In Act 1853, c. 239, § 1, constituting and declaring the county commissioners a corporation and body politic, and enacting that they shall have charge and control over public roads and bridges and the property owned by the county, the phrase "charge and control" should be construed as equivalent to "duty and obligation," since the statute conferred a power upon the corporation to be exercised for the public good, the exercise of which is not discretionary, but imperative, and the commissioners are not at liberty to exercise a discretion as their sense of duty to their constituents dictate, without coercion or liability for its nonuser. The power vested in the county commissioners was a ministerial one, which they were obliged to exercise for the public good, and in default of its proper exercise they are liable to an action for damages at the suit of one injured by a defect in a road or bridge. Anne Arundel County Com'rs v. Duckett, 20 Md. 468, 475, 83 Am. Dec. 557.

Laws 1883, c. 321, § 1, giving the board of claims authority to hear and determine all claims against the state for damages resulting or arising from the negligence or conduct of any "officer of the state having charge of the canals" includes a lock tender, for it should be construed as embracing all those persons in the employ of the state intrusted with the performance of duties relating to the canals, and from the neglect or omission to perform which damages might occur to individuals. It is unreasonable to suppose that the state intended to confine its liability to cases arising from the negligence of those officers having the duty of general supervision only to perform, and deny relief in cases where damages arose from the neglect of others having practical control of its operations. Sipple v. State, 1 N. E. 892, 893, 99 N. Y. 284.

"Charged," as used in a statute declaring that a certain official shall be charged with certain duties, means to put upon as a task or duty, to burden, to commission, to intrust, to lay on or impose, to load or burden, as a task or duty or trust. It imposes imperative duties and personal responsibilities. It defines his status. People v. Angle (N. Y.) 47 Hun, 183, 189.

As expenses.

In Rev. St. 1838, p. 57, authorizing a township meeting to vote such sums of money as they should judge necessary for the purpose of supporting and maintaining the poor, and for all proper and necessary charges arising in the township, "charges" means any matters which were supposed likely to require expenditures in amounts, either definite or indefinite. Marathon Tp. v. Oregon Tp., 8 Mich. 372, 381.

In a mercantile contract for the purchase and shipment of tobacco, the term "charges" comprehends only the real expenses paid. Alexander v. Morris (Va.) 3 Call, 89, 99.

In an agreement by one who bought certain lands for the benefit of others to sell such lands, and that if, on the sale thereof, he should realize any profit after paying the purchase money, costs, and charges, he might be at by reason of such purchase, he would hold the same for the use and benefit of such other persons, the word "charges" means only expenses paid out by him in attending to the business, and does not include any claim to commissions or other compensation for his services. Green v. Jones, 78 N. C. 265, 268.

Charges and expenses allowed to a trustee under a trust deed are moneys paid out in the discharge of the duties of his office. Whitaker v. Old Dominion Guano Co., 31 S. E. 629, 630, 123 N. C. 368.

As lien or incumbrance.

"Charge," as used in Code 1899, c. 74, § 2, providing that every transfer or charge by an insolvent with intent to prefer a creditor shall be void, is defined as including every confessed judgment, deed of trust, mortgage, lien, and incumbrance. Nuzum v. Herron, 44 S. E. 257, 262, 52 W. Va. 499.

The word "charge" is of very large signification, and in the statute its proper signification is every lien or incumbrance or claim the purchaser may have upon the premises, and for which at common law or in equity he would be entitled to hold the lands as security and to the satisfaction of which a court of equity would condemn them. Anniston First Nat. Bank v. Elliott, 125 Ala. 646, 651, 27 South. 7, 9, 47 L. R. A. 742, 82 Am. St. Rep. 268 (citing Grigg v. Banks, 59 Ala. 311).

"Charges," as used in the mortgage of a railroad authorizing a sale of the property on default, and an application of the proceeds to pay preferred stock, after providing for and paying all prior or lawful charges thereon, will not be construed in any technical sense, or "as importing legal liens upon the property and franchises of the company, but rather in the general acceptance of equitable claims, which, proper steps being taken therefor, may be charged thereon." Miller v. Ratterman, 24 N. E. 496, 499, 47 Ohio St. 141.

"Charge," as applied to the power of a married woman as to her separate property, is used in the sense of rendering her estate generally liable for a debt, and, when it is said that a married woman may charge her separate estate in the same manner as if unmarried, it means that, as when unmarried, in contracting a debt she charges all her property, no matter what was her intention, so a married woman in contracting a debt charges all her separate property, no matter what was her intention. Radford v. Carwile, 13 W. Va. 572, 658.

The word "charge," when used in connection with a married woman's property and her attempt to affect it by contract, simply means that the property is made liable for her debts under execution, as if she were a feme sole. It does not mean, where she has contracted in a manner to affect her separate estate, that a lien which prevents the free transfer of the property afterwards, and before judgment, is created. Wachovia Nat. Bank v. Ireland, 37 S. E. 223, 224, 127 N. C. 238.

Of administration.

"Charges of administration," as used in Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1631, 1632, requiring an administrator to itemize the charges or expenses of administration, does not include expenses incurred by carrying on a business with the funds of the decedent, which the administrator is not authorized to do. In re Rose's Estate, 22 Pac. 86, 87, 80 Cal. 166.

Of engine or train.

Within the meaning of Code, § 2590, subd. 5, making the master liable for injury to a servant caused by the negligence of one in the master's employ having charge or control of an engine, the engineer, while running the engine, performing the labor himself, has charge and control of it, but not a superintendence of the engine. Culver v. Alabama Midland Ry. Co., 18 South. 827, 831, 108 Ala. 330.

The words "person in charge or control of the train," within the meaning of section 1, cl. 3, of the employers' liability act, no doubt for many purposes applies to the conductor; but, if the statute is to be of any use in the cases of running down or collision, the engineer must be regarded as the person in charge, so far as giving signals or slackening speed at the approach of danger are concerned. Davis v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co., 34 N. E. 1070, 1071, 150 Mass. 532.

St. 1887, c. 270, § 1, subd. 3, authorizing a recovery for a railroad employé injured by the negligence of any person in the service of the employer in "charge or control" of a train, includes the engineer of the train, but does not include the station agent and the tower man in charge of the track, since they have charge of the switches. Fairman v. Boston & A. R. Co., 47 N. E. 613, 617, 169 Mass. 170.

St. 1887, c. 270, providing that an employé of a railway company may recover for injuries due to the negligence of the person in charge or control of a train, etc., means a person who for the time being, at least, has immediate authority to direct the movements and management of the train as a whole, and of the men engaged upon it, and hence a brakeman on cars which are moving from the impetus imparted by a locomotive shortly detached therefrom has not "charge or control" of the cars within the meaning of the statute. Caron v. Boston & A. R. Co., 42 N. E. 112, 113, 164 Mass. 523.

In construing the statute relative to the liability of a railroad company for personal injuries by reason of the negligence of any person who has charge or control of any train upon a railroad, it was held that it was a question for the jury whether the brakeman, who, in signaling a train to back when he and the engineer were the only persons on the train, was not acting under the orders of any immediate superior, was to be considered a person in charge or control of a train; the court saying that the language of the statute implies that some one is to be regarded as in charge. Steffe v. Old Colony R. Co., 30 N. E. 1137, 1138, 156 Mass. 262.

The term "person in charge of a train," within the meaning of a statute in reference to the liability of a railroad company for injuries resulting from the negligence of a person in charge of a train, applies to a conductor having charge of a train, who, with intent to put two cars belonging thereto in a certain place, carelessly directs how the engine should operate against them, resulting in their being kicked on a siding with too great force, which caused the injury of plaintiff. Devine v. Boston & A. R. Co., 34 N. E. 539, 540, 159 Mass. 348.

The term "person in charge or control of any locomotive or train" in the masters' liability act, in reference to injuries caused by the negligence of persons having charge or control of any railroad locomotive, engine, or train, does not include the conductor of a switch engine having charge of making up freight trains in the yard, in so far as his negligent acts in making up the train relate to and are the cause of an accident occurring after it is started on the road and outside of his control. Thyng v. Fitchburg R. Co., 30 N. E. 169, 170, 156 Mass. 13, 32 Am. St. Rep. 425.

Of imprisonment.

Charges of imprisonment, as used in Rev. St. c. 8, section 5 as amended, providing that, when any person committed for the nonpayment of taxes shall be discharged by taking the poor debtor's oath, the collector shall be liable to pay the tax with the charges of imprisonment, cannot be construed to include the support of the prisoner while imprisoned. Inhabitants of Townsend v. Walcutt, 44 Mass. (3 Metc.) 152, 153.

On cargo or importation.

A receipt given by common carrier by water in full for freight and charges on a certain boat means only such expenses as the master of the boat has paid and for which he has a lien upon the cargo, and does not include demurrage. Huntley v. Dows (N. Y.) 55 Barb. 310, 312.

Charges which are to be added to the purchase price to determine the dutiable value of merchandise include the cost of sacks in which salt is imported. Barnard v. Morton (U. S.) 2 Fed. Cas. 837.

On estate.

A provision in a will, "I charge the estate inherited from my late husband with a life annuity of $250 to M.," is a charge on all the estate received from the husband, and takes precedence over other bequests, though testatrix gave a large number of legacies, manifestly desired that her husband's home place should remain in his family name, made no other provisions for priorities, made a residuary bequest, and apparently thought the estate would be sufficient to pay all legacies in full. Young v. Benton, 46 Atl. 51, 70 N. H. 268.

The term "charges," as used in a will by which testator provided that all debts and charges should be paid out of his estate, after which he made disposition of the remainder, did not include bequests. Cairns v. Smith (Tex.) 49 S. W. 728, 733.

As used in the statute (title 60, c. 1, § 22, p. 269, St. 1808) authorizing the sale of real estate by a decedent to pay debts and charges beyond the personal estate, the word "charges" has the precision of a technical term, and comprises merely the expenses incurred in the settlement of an estate. Goodwin v. Chaffee, 4 Conn. 163, 166.

On land.

"Charge," as used in a statute requiring a mortgagor, on redeeming real estate, to pay the sum bid, with interest and all other lawful charges, is a word of very large signification, and in the statute its proper signification is any lien or incumbrance or claim the person may have on the premises, and for which at law or in equity he would be entitled to hold the lands as security, or to the satisfaction of which a court of equity would condemn them. Harris v. Miller, 71 Ala. 26, 34; Parmer v. Parmer, 74 Ala. 285, 289; Grigg v. Banks, 59 Ala. 311, 317; Lehmann, Durr & Co. v. Collins, 69 Ala. 127, 132; Holden v. Rison, 77 Ala. 515, 518.

A "charge" on the lands for the payments of debts in England makes the land liable to debts for which they would not be liable but for the act of the testator. If a testator should think proper to use that word here, there would be nothing ambiguous about it. Every one would at once understand it to mean that the burden of the debts should be thrown on the real estate in exemption of the personalty. It would be a direction to pay the debts out of that estate, and equivalent to a devise for the payment of debts. Warley v. Warley (S. C.) Bailey, Eq. 397, 407.

"Charge," as used in Code, c. 74, § 2, providing that "every gift, sale, conveyance, assignment, transfer or charge made by an insolvent debtor to the trustee, or otherwise giving or attempting to give a prior deed or preference to a creditor or creditors of such insolvent debtor," shall be void as to such priority, has a specific technical and also a broad legal meaning, under which it includes any lien on property of any description, and includes a confessed judgment. Mack v. Prince, 21 S. E. 1012, 1013, 40 W. Va. 324.

Code 1876, §§ 2881-2887, providing for the redemption of lands sold at execution sale on demand or tender to the purchaser of the purchase price and all other lawful charges thereon, should be construed to embrace not only costs of conveying, but the value of all permanent improvements made by the purchaser. Posey v. Pressley, 60 Ala. 243, 250.

"Charge," as used in 8 Hen. VI, c. 7, providing for the registration as a voter of one having an interest in land to the value of 40s. by the year at the least, above all charges, would include annual interest payable on a mortgage on the land by a parol agreement, though the mortgage on its face called only for the payment of a certain principal, and did not express interest. Lee v. Hutchinson, 8 C. B. 16, 24.

"Charges," as used in a statute relating to the conditions entitling one to be a registered voter, and requiring that he be possessed of an interest in land to a certain value beyond all charges, is understood to mean and include interest payable in respect of a mortgage. Copland v. Bartlett, 6 C. B. 18, 27.

"Charges," as used in Gantt's Dig. § 2697, authorizing an execution debtor to redeem lands sold under execution at any time within 12 months by paying the purchase money with 15 per cent. interest and all lawful charges, "includes taxes paid by the purchaser after the sale and before redemption, and costs of the clerk connected with the act of redemption." Fuller v. Evatt, 42 Ark. 230, 232.

"Charges," in the covenants of a lease providing for the payment of charges by the tenant, include assessments for the paving of a street, though the expenditure was for a permanent benefit extending beyond the term. Bleecker v. Ballou (N. Y.) 3 Wend. 263, 267.

The term "charges," as used in an express covenant to pay ground rent clear of all charges and assessments whatsoever, includes taxes, so that the grantee cannot deduct them from the ground rent itself. Peart v. Phipps (Pa.) 4 Yeates, 386, 387.

A "charge" on land is distinguished from a "trust" of the land, in that in the case of the former the land is devised generally for the beneficial enjoyment of the devisee, subject, however, to the payment by him of a specific sum or sums of money or the performance of a particular duty, while in the case of a trust the devise is limited to some particular purpose, with no beneficial interest in the devisee. Where testator gave his wife all his property for life if she should remain his widow so long, on condition that she should, out of the income, maintain his children during minority, the will expressly stating that the devise was in lieu of dower, a trust estate for testator's children was not created, but a life estate in the widow charged with the children's support was created. Lang v. Everling, 23 N. Y. Supp. 329, 331, 3 Misc. Rep. 530.

CHARGE (In Criminal Law).

See "Criminal Charge"; "Offense Charged."

The expression "charged with," as applied to a crime, is sometimes used in a limited sense, intending the accusation of a crime which preceded a formal trial. In a fuller and more accurate sense the expression includes the responsibility for the crime. Anderson's Law Dict. And it is in this latter sense that the expression is used in Const. U. S. art. 4, § 2, requiring to be delivered up a person charged in any state with a crime, who shall flee from justice and be found in another state. Drinkall v. Spiegel, 36 Atl. 830, 831, 68 Conn. 441, 36 L. R. A. 486.

"Charged," as used in Const. art. 6, § 4, does not mean only the offense named in the indictment, but also offenses of the same nature, but of a lesser degree, than that distinctly named, and the offense charged in the indictment is to be determined by the offense of which the accused is found guilty; and hence, under the section above quoted, providing that in all criminal cases in which the offense charged amounts to a felony the Supreme Court shall have jurisdiction of an appeal, the court has not such jurisdiction in a case where the indictment was for assault with intent to murder, but the accused was found guilty thereunder of a simple assault. State v. Quinn, 16 Nev. 89, 91.

The words "charged with murder and being a fugitive from justice," as used in treaty of March 23, 1868, between the United States and Italy, providing for the extradition of persons charged with murder and being fugitives from justice, do not require that the person shall commit the murder in the future, but includes one who has committed a murder and fled from justice before the making of the treaty, and after the making thereof is charged with the crime; and hence, if one had committed a murder in Italy before the making of the treaty, and after the making of it was charged with the crime and found within the United States, he was a fugitive from justice, within the meaning of the statute. In re De Giacomo (U. S.) 7 Fed. Cas. 366, 367.

"Charged with crime," in legal parlance, means charged in the regular course of judicial proceedings. A man cannot be legally charged with crime when there is no jurisdiction to try him. The fact that he is so legally charged means that he is charged by an authority having a right to try. Ex parte Morgan (U. S.) 20 Fed. 298, 308.

According to military usage and practice, a charge before a court-martial is in effect divided into two parts, the first technically called a "charge," and the second "specification." The charge proper designates the military offense of which the accused is alleged to be guilty; the specification sets forth the acts or omissions which form the legal constituents of the offense. Carter v. McClaughry, 22 Sup. Ct. 181, 189, 183 U. S. 365, 46 L. Ed. 236.

Both the Constitution of the United States and of Maryland use the terms "indictment," "presentment," and "charge" interchangeably, and as referring to the first step in the prosecution of a crime. State v. Kiefer, 44 Atl. 1043, 1044, 90 Md. 165.

As any accusation.

One is not charged with a crime authorizing his extradition under the law where the charge is upon suspicion. Ex parte Smith (U. S.) 22 Fed. Cas. 373, 379.

"Charge and accuse," as used in an indictment charging that the defendants conspired to seduce and entrap one B., and then "willfully charge and accuse him of the crime of adultery," does not mean a charge actually made before a grand jury or magistrate, but simply imputes to him these offenses falsely as a means of inducing him to pay money to avoid actual prosecution. Commonwealth v. O'Brien, 66 Mass. (12 Cush.) 84, 90; Commonwealth v. Andrews, 132 Mass. 263, 264.

"Charge," as used in a declaration in an action of slander alleging that the defendant said, "I have made a charge against him," imports an accusation of criminality, and, when made against a party in relation to his oath and evidence in the trial of a cause, imports an accusation of the only species of criminality which could have been incurred by him in the character of a witness. Thompson v. Lusk (Pa.) 2 Watts, 17, 22, 26 Am. Dec. 91.

"Charge," as used in a statute as to the form of an indictment, is synonymous with "accusation," which, while it includes a crime in legal contemplation, also includes the circumstances to a reasonable extent. United States v. Ross (Iowa) Morris, 164, 166.

As formal complaint.

Charge signifies an accusation, made in a legal manner of legal conduct, either of commission or omission, by the person charged. Tompert v. Lithgow, 64 Ky. (1 Bush) 176, 180.

"Charged," as used in Pen. Code, § 32, providing that all persons who harbor and protect a person charged with felony are accessories, means a formal complaint, information, or indictment filed against the criminal, or possibly an arrest without warrant. Mere general rumors and common talk that a person has committed a felony are wholly insufficient. People v. Garnett, 61 Pac. 1114, 1115, 129 Cal. 364.

"As it is usually used and understood, 'charged with crime' means something more than suspected or accused of crime by popular opinion or rumor, and implies that the offense has been alleged against the party according to the forms of law." It is used in such sense in Gen. St. c. 117, § 7, giving the selectmen authority to offer a suitable reward to be paid by the town to any one who, in consequence of such offer, secures any person charged with a capable crime or other high crime or misdemeanor committed in such place. Day v. Inhabitants of Otis, 90 Mass. (8 Allen) 477, 478.

Alken, Dig. p. 124, § 63, providing that, if the owner or any other person having the charge or government of any slave who shall be charged with any capital crime shall conceal or carry away such slave, the person so offending shall forfeit the sum of $500, means a charge made in legal form. State v. Duncan (Ala.) 9 Port. 260, 263.

A "charge," within a charter authorizing a police board to retire a police officer after a certain number of years when there are no charges pending against him, may as well be an existing accusation made by a citizen against the officer and entertained by the board, as a formal presentment by the board itself, with notice from it to the officer. The words "charge" and "pending" are indeed susceptible of two interpretations—the legal and technical or the popular and liberal. To the lawyer's mind a "charge" would mean an accusation as to which formal notice was brought to the accused, and "pending" would suggest the state of an undetermined proceeding after such notice had been given to the party proceeded against; but in the popular sense "charge" and "accusation" are practically synonymous, and the word "pending," if we have recourse either to the vernacular or to the derivation of the term, means "hanging"; and a complaint filed against a police officer by a citizen is a "charge pending," within the meaning of the act. People v. Roosevelt, 34 N. Y. Supp. 228, 229, 12 Misc. Rep. 622.

The term "charges," as used in Syracuse City Charter, § 199, providing that the city marshal may be removed for cause on charges duly furnished, implies an accusation of official misconduct. In re Freeman, 50 N. Y. Supp. 520, 522, 27 App. Div. 593.

"Charges," as used in Act May 28, 1873, providing that courts of special sessions shall, in addition to the power already possessed by them, have also exclusive jurisdiction in the first instance to hear and determine charges for assault and battery not alleged to have been committed riotously, means an original complaint made in the first instance preliminary to a formal trial for a crime; and hence, where an indictment had been regularly found in a prosecution for assault and battery, and had been sent to the general sessions for trial, the latter court had jurisdiction of the case, for when the act was passed the case was not in a condition where a charge could be made. An indictment is, in an enlarged sense, a "charge," yet it would not be included in that term as used in ordinary legal language or as used in this act; and hence the special sessions could not deprive the other court of jurisdiction to hear and determine a prosecution for assault and battery pending at the time of the passage of the act conferring jurisdiction on the courts of special sessions. Ryan v. People, 79 N. Y. 593, 598.

A statute requiring the judge to order a special term of court on being informed that a person is "charged with crime and confined in jail" does not mean that such person is confined in jail on an indictment, but includes cases in which he is charged with crime before a magistrate, and committed to jail by the latter for safekeeping. Mary v. State, 5 Mo. 71, 79.

As in hands of jury.

"Charged" means after the prisoner has been placed in the hands of the jury for trial. This, in England, was always done immediately after the jury was sworn, and before the bill of indictment was read or any of the testimony heard. It means, therefore, charged with the fate of the prisoner, and not with the testimony or law of the case. Ward v. State, 20 Tenn. (1 Humph.) 253, 260, State v. Connor, 45 Tenn. (5 Cold.) 311, 313.

"Charged," as applied to a trial, does not mean after the jury are sworn and have heard the testimony or a part of it, but after the prisoner has been placed in the hands of the jury for trial; and a discharge of the jury after they were sworn and so charged, against the consent of the prisoner, operated his discharge. Dilworth v. Commonwealth (Va.) 12 Grat. 689, 702, 65 Am. Dec. 264.

The jury is said to be charged with the prisoner when the 12 jurors are duly impaneled and sworn, and, when they are thus sworn to try the accused on the charge preferred, jeopardy attaches. Formerly, and now in England, the act of submitting the cause to the jury, or charging them with the accusation as contained in the indictment against a defendant, was quite formal. The clerk of the court directed them to look on the prisoner and hearken to the evidence, and read or stated to them the substance of the indictment, the plea, and their duty to find the defendant guilty or not guilty. Scott v. State, 20 South. 463, 469, 110 Ala. 48 (citing Whart. Cr. Pl. & Prac. § 961).

Code Civ. Proc. § 2060, providing that a person who stands charged upon a criminal accusation with a bailable offense may be bailed upon an appeal, cannot be construed to mean a person who has been convicted. "The word 'charged' implies that the person is alleged to be guilty, not proved or adjudged to be so." People v. Bauman (N. Y.) 3 N. Y. Cr. R. 454, 457.

"Charge," as used in Const. U. S. art. 4, § 2, subd. 2, providing that "a person charged in any state with treason, felony, or other crime, who shall flee from justice and be found in another state, shall * * * be delivered up to be removed to the state having jurisdiction of the crime," does not admit of a narrow or strained construction. It is broad enough to include all classes of persons duly accused of crime. A person can be said to be charged with crime as well after his conviction as before. The conviction simply establishes the charge conclusively. An unsatisfied judgment of conviction still constitutes a charge, within the true intent and meaning of the Constitution. In re Hope, 10 N. Y. Supp. 28, 29, 7 N. Y. Cr. R. 406.

CHARGE (To Jury).

See "General Affirmative Charge."

See, also, "Instruction."

"A 'charge,' as defined by Bouvier, is the exposition by the court to the jury of those principles of the law which the latter are bound to apply in order to render such a verdict as will, in the state of facts proved at the trial to exist, establish the rights of the parties to the suit." Equitable Fire Ins. Co. v. Trustees C. P. Church, 18 S. W. 121, 122, 91 Tenn. (7 Pickle) 135; Dodd v. Moore, 91 Ind. 522, 523.

"Bouvier, in defining the word 'charge,' says charging is stating the precise principles of law applicable to the case immediately in question." It is synonymous with "instruction." Lehman v. Hawks, 23 N. E. 670, 671, 121 Ind. 541.

The essential idea of a charge is that it is authoritative as an exposition of the law, which the jury are bound by their oath and by moral obligation to obey. Dodd v. Moore, 91 Ind. 522, 523.

The charge of a court to a jury is a decision made by the court, during the trial, that the law thus declared must be applied by the jury, through the facts established by the evidence. Sharp v. Hoffman, 21 Pac. 846, 847, 79 Cal. 404.

The term "charge," as used in Code, § 244, relating to instructions to juries, embraces any and all instructions addressed by the court to the jury for the purpose of governing their action in making, or aiding to make, a final disposition of the case in favor of one litigant or the other. Harris v. McArthur, 15 S. E. 758, 90 Ga. 216.

As used in a statute requiring instructions to be given in writing, the term "charge" does not include any and every question and answer passing between the court and jury. It refers to the address made by the judge after the case has been closed, when he comments on the evidence or instructs the jury in any matter of law arising upon it. Millard v. Lyons, 25 Wis. 516, 517.

"Charge," as used in Laws 1868, c. 101, providing that the charge to a jury shall be in writing, cannot be construed to include the direction to the jury to find for one of the parties. Grant v. Connecticut Mut. Life Ins. Co., 29 Wis. 125, 136.

The bare statement to the jury of the penalty authorized by a statute is not a charge, within the meaning of the statute requiring an instruction to be in writing. Bush v. State (Tex.) 70 S. W. 550.

CHARGE AT LAW.

A charge in an attorney's bill for attending at a lockup house and obtaining defendant's release and filling up the bail bond is a "charge at law," within St. 2 Geo. II, c. 23, rendering the bill subject to taxation. Fearne v. Wilson, 6 Barn. & C. 86.

CHARGE UPON THE FACTS.

In determining an objection to a charge of a judge in which he recited the uncontradicted testimony in the case, the objection being that he violated a provision of the Constitution forbidding a judge from charging upon the facts, the court quotes the following from the case of Moore v. Columbia & G. R. Co., 16 S. E. 781, 791, 38 S. C. 1: "What is meant by the judge charging upon the facts? It seems to us it may be said to occur when, in the progress of a trial, the circuit judge conveys by word his opinion of the sufficiency or insufficiency of certain testimony necessary to the determination by the jury of some fact at issue between the parties litigant. This court, in construing this section of the Constitution, has held that any expression of the circuit judge in his charge that did not relate to the issues being tried by the jury, that were not pertinent to such issues, did not fall within the interdicted action on the part of the judge. This court has decided that, while he may not charge upon the facts, yet he may state the testimony in its logical order, and as bearing upon certain issues. The stating of the testimony means more than repeating it. It includes the idea of stating it in its logical relations to the propositions it is to support or contradict, as well as to the principles of law by which its bearing and force ought to be controlled, or, as it is expressed by the technical phrase, 'summing up.'" State v. Ezzard, 18 S. E. 1025, 1028, 40 S. C. 312.

CHARGEABLE.

The term "chargeable," as applied to taxes when used in a tax deed declaring that the sum for which the land was sold was the amount of taxes for a certain year, with the cost chargeable to the tract of land, meant that the taxes were properly a lien on the land; but the word "chargeable" was not synonymous with "delinquent," and therefore the deed did not show sufficiently that the taxes for which the land was sold were delinquent by the expression used. Gillilan v. Chatterton, 37 N. W. 583, 584, 38 Minn. 335.

As relating to poor persons.

"The word 'chargeable,' in its ordinary acceptance, as applicable to the imposition of a duty or burden, signifies capable of being charged, subject to be charged, or liable to be charged, or legally liable to be charged." It is used in such sense in Gen. St. c. 20, § 19, making the kindred of any poor person who shall become chargeable to any town liable for his support, and also in section 20, prescribing a method of enforcing such duty upon the kindred. Walbridge v. Walbridge, 46 Vt. 617, 625.

Rev. St. 1866, p. 621, § 22, declaring that when any pauper becomes chargeable to a town the selectmen are to send notice of his condition to the town to which he belongs, means "subjecting the town to expense." Town of Beacon Falls v. Town of Seymour, 44 Conn. 210, 217.

The expression, "without becoming chargeable to such town," as used in Gen. St. § 3288, which provides that no person shall claim a legal settlement in any town unless he shall have continually resided four years therein without becoming chargeable thereon, means without subjecting the town to actual expense for the support of a person during the four years. Town of Ridgefield v. Town of Fairfield, 46 Atl. 245, 246, 73 Conn. 47.

CHARGED IN EXECUTION.

32 Geo. II, c. 28, § 13, enacting that any prisoner may, before the end of the first term which shall be next after any such prisoner shall be "charged in execution," petition, etc., means being detained within the walls of the prison. Vaughan v. Durnell, 4 Term R. 367.

CHARGING LIEN.

Attorneys have two kinds of liens in their relations with their clients—one a lien on the papers of the client, which is called a "retaining lien." An attorney also has a lien on the fund or judgment which he has recovered for his compensation as attorney in recovering the fund, and that is denominated a "charging lien." Goodrich v. McDonald, 19 N. E. 649, 651, 112 N. Y. 157; Schreyer v. Deering, 52 N. Y. Supp. 203, 206, 30 App. Div. 602.

At common law an attorney had a lien upon the fund or judgment which he recovered for payment as attorney in recovering the fund or judgment called a "charging lien." Young v. Renshaw, 78 S. W. 701, 705, 102 Mo. App. 173.

An attorney has a lien on a judgment or decree obtained for a client to the extent of the compensation the client has agreed to pay him, or, if there has been no specific agreement of compensation, to the extent to which he is entitled to recover from the client reasonable compensation for the services rendered. The lien of an attorney rests on the theory that he is to be regarded as the assignee of the judgment or decree, to the extent that is fair, from the date of the rendition of the judgment or decree, and is subject to all set-offs existing against his client at the time. Ex parte Lehman, Durr & Co., 59 Ala. 631, 632.

Liens of attorneys are retaining liens and charging liens; the former existing as against moneys or papers in the hands of the attorney, and the latter being one which gives the creditor the right to collect such debt as a priority out of property in the hands of another. Whart. Ag. § 623 et seq. It is not necessary that the attorney should have obtained a judgment for his client in order to enforce his lien in a suit in equity. Koons v. Beach, 46 N. E. 587, 147 Ind. 137.

An attorney's charging lien is that which he has upon a judgment recovered by him for moneys payable thereon or upon some fund in court. It entitles the attorney to take active steps to secure payment for what may be expended beyond the services and expenses in the suit itself, or any other proceeding by which the judgment or fund has been recovered, or in the same subject-matter. In re Wilson (U. S.) 12 Fed. 235, 239.

A charging lien, as applied to an attorney's lien, is the right of an attorney to recover his taxable costs from a fund recovered by his aid, and also the right to have the court interfere to prevent payment by the judgment debtor to the creditor in fraud of his right to the same, and also to prevent or set aside assignments or settlements made in fraud of his rights. It does not usually attach until the recovery of judgment, and then does not prevent an honest settlement, nor a payment to his client, until the attorney has notified the debtor of his intention to claim a lien. The charging lien has never been extended beyond the charges and fees in the suit in which the judgment was recovered. It does not extend to the general balance due the attorney from the client for professional services. Weed Sewing Mach. Co. v. Boutelle, 56 Vt. 570, 576, 48 Am. Rep. 821.

CHARGÉ D'AFFAIRES.

"Chargé d'affaires" is the title of an office in the diplomatic service. Hollander v. Balz (U. S.) 41 Fed. 732, 734.

"Chargés d'affaires" are persons invested with the affairs of their government at the seat of a foreign government. Generally used as synonymous with ministers, diplomatic agents, envoys, etc. In re Balz, 10 Sup. Ct. 854, 858, 135 U. S. 403, 34 L. Ed. 222.

CHARIOT.

Johnson defines a chariot as "a half coach with four wheels, used for convenience and pleasure." Cincinnati, L. & S. Turnpike Co. v. Neil, 9 Ohio (9 Ham.) 11, 13.

Funds supplied from the gift of the crown, or from the gift of the Legislature, or other private gift, for any legal, public, or general purpose, are charitable funds, to be administered by courts of equity. It is not material that the particular public or general purpose is not expressed in the statute of Elizabeth, other legal, public, or general purposes being within the equity of that statute. Thus, a gift to maintain a preaching minister, a gift to build a session house for a county, a gift by parliament of a duty on coal imported into London for the purpose of rebuilding St. Paul's Church after the fire in London, have all been held to be charitable uses, within the equity of the statute of Elizabeth. It is the source from which the funds are to be derived, and not the mere purpose to which they are to be dedicated, which constitutes the use charitable, and funds derived from the gift of the crown or the gift of the Legislature, or from private gift for paving, lighting, cleaning, and improving a town, are, within the equity of the statute of Elizabeth, charitable funds, to be administered by a court of equity. But where an act of parliament passes an act for paving, lighting, cleaning, and improving a town, to be paid for wholly by rates or assessments to be levied upon the inhabitants of that town, the funds so raised are in no sense derived from bounty or charity, in the most extensive sense of that term, and are not charitable funds to be administered by a court of equity. Attorney General v. Heelis, 2 Sim. & S. 67, 77.

CHARITABLE INSTITUTION.

See, also, "Charity."

Where a trust deed provided that after the death of the settlor a trust fund should be applied by the trustees to such charitable purposes as should be determined by a board named in the deed, or, in their discretion, transferred to a corporation organized for like charitable purposes to those which such board might wish to carry out, a corporation organized pursuant to the latter provision is a "charitable institution," within Pub. St. c. 11, § 5, cl. 3, exempting charitable institutions from taxation. Balch v. Shaw, 54 N. E. 490, 492, 174 Mass. 144.

A "charitable institution," within the meaning of Const. art. 8, §§ 11, 14, and the statutes enacted in pursuance thereof (Laws 1895, c. 71, and Laws 1896, c. 546), creating and conferring on the state board of charities the right of visitation and inspection of all charitable institutions, must be one which in some form or to some extent receives public money raised by taxation, either in the state at large, or in any city, county, or town, for the support and maintenance of indigent persons. People v. New York Soc. for Prevention of Cruelty to Children, 56 N. E. 1004, 162 N. Y. 429.

CHARITABLE SOCIETY.

CHARITABLE TRUST.

See, also, "Charity."

Private trusts are for the benefit of certain designated individuals in which the cestui que trust is a known person or class of persons. Public, or, as they are frequently termed, charitable, trusts are those created for the benefit of an unascertained, uncertain, and sometimes fluctuating body of individuals, in which the cestui que trust may be a portion or class of a public community; as, for example, the poor or the children of a particular town or parish. In private trust the beneficial interest is vested absolutely in some individual or individuals, who are, or within a certain time may be, definitely ascertained, and to whom, therefore, collectively, unless under some disability, it is, or, within the allowed limit, will be, competent to control, modify, or end the trust. Private trusts of this kind cannot be extended beyond the legal limitations of a perpetuity. But a trust created for charitable or public purposes is not subject to similar limitations, but it may continue for a permanent or indefinite time. Doyle v. Whalen, 32 Atl. 1022, 1025, 87 Me. 414, 31 L. R. A. 118.

"Charitable trusts include all gifts for religious or educational purposes, in their ever-varying diversity." Beckwith v. St. Philip's Parish, 69 Ga. 564, 569 (quoting 2 Perry, 687).

A charitable trust is simply an indefinite or uncertain trust; that is, a trust without a beneficiary. Such a trust is void by the rules of the common law. Knox v. Knox's Ex'rs, 9 W. Va. 124, 148.

CHARITABLE USE.

See "Mistaken Charitable Use."

See, also, "Charity."

To constitute a "charitable use," there must be a donor, a trustee competent to take, a use restricted to a charitable purpose, and a definite beneficiary. In case of a grant or demise, where there is no party or parties designated who can take the property, or where they are so uncertain that the court cannot direct intelligibly the execution of the trust, the property remains undisposed of, and falls to the heir or next of kin. Grimes' Ex'rs v. Harmon, 35 Ind. 198, 252, 9 Am. Rep. 690.

A "charitable use," in legal parlance, means a use for some object within the purview of the statute. Chittenden v. Chittenden, 1 Am. Law Reg. 538, 547 (citing 43 Eliz. c. 4).

"Charitable use," in legal contemplation, is a convertible term with "charity," and there can be no charitable use without a trust. Owens v. Missionary Soc. of Methodist Episcopal Church, 14 N. Y. (4 Kern.) 380, 385, 67 Am. Dec. 160.

A charitable use, where neither law nor public policy forbids, may be applied to almost anything that tends to promote the well-doing and well-being of social men. Ould v. Washington Hospital for Foundlings, 95 U. S. 303, 311, 24 L. Ed. 450.

CHARITY.

See "Definite Charity"; "Private Charity"; "Public Charity"; "Pure Charity"; "Purely Charitable Purposes."

Property exclusively used for charitable purposes, see "Exclusively Used."

"Charity," in its widest sense, denotes all the good affections which men ought to bear towards one another, and in that sense embraces what is generally understood by benevolence, philanthropy, and good will. In its more restricted sense it means merely relief or alms to the poor. Morice v. Bishop of Durham, 9 Ves. 399, 400, 405; State v.

Laramie County Com'rs, 55 Pac. 451, 456, 8 Wyo. 104; Town of Hamden v. Rice, 24 Conn. 350, 355.

Mr. Binney, in his great argument in the case of Vidal v. Girard's Ex'rs, 43 U. S. (2 How.) 127, 11 L. Ed. 205, defined a pious or charitable gift to be whatever is given for the love of God, or for the love your neighbor, in the catholic and universal sense, given from these motives and to these ends, free from the stain or taint of every consideration that is personal, private, or selfish. The love of God is the basis of all that is bestowed for His honor, the building of His church, the support of His ministers, the religious instruction of mankind. The love of neighbor is the principle that prompts and consecrates all the rest. This definition was approved by the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. Pennoyer v. Wadhams, 25 Pac. 720, 722, 20 Or. 274, 11 L. R. A. 210 (citing Price v. Maxwell, 28 Pa. [4 Casey] 23, 35); Boyd v. Philadelphia Insurance Patrol, 6 Atl. 536, 539, 113 Pa. 269; Jackson v. Phillips, 96 Mass. (14 Allen) 539, 556; Ford v. Ford's Ex'r, 16 S. W. 451, 452, 91 Ky. 572; Johnson v. De Pauw University, 76 S. W. 851, 852, 25 Ky. Law Rep. 950; Harrington v. Pier, 82 N. W. 345, 357, 105 Wis. 485, 50 L. R. A. 307, 76 Am. St. Rep. 924; St. Clement v. L'Institut Jacques Cartier, 50 Atl. 376, 377, 95 Me. 493; Allen v. Stevens, 49 N. Y. Supp. 431, 435, 22 Misc. Rep. 158.

A "charity," in a legal sense, may be defined as a gift to be applied, consistently with existing law, for the benefit of an indefinite number of persons, either by bringing their hearts under the influence of education or religion, by relieving their bodies from disease, suffering, or constraint, by assisting them to establish themselves for life, or by erecting or maintaining public buildings or works, or otherwise lessening the burdens of government. It is immaterial whether the purpose is called charitable in the gift itself, if it is so described as to show it is charitable in its nature. Webster v. Sughrow, 45 Atl. 139, 140, 69 N. H. 380, 48 L. R. A. 100 (citing Jackson v. Phillips, 96 Mass. [14 Allen] 539, 556); Pennoyer v. Wadhams, 25 Pac. 720, 722, 20 Or. 274, 11 L. R. A. 210; State v. Dobbins, 29 N. J. Eq. (2 Stew.) 36, 44; Livesey v. Jones, 35 Atl. 1064, 55 N. J. Eq. 204; Protestant Episcopal Education Soc. v. Churchman's Representatives, 80 Va. 718, 762; In re Hinckley's Estate, 58 Cal. 457, 497; People v. Fitch, 47 N. E. 983, 988, 154 N. Y. 14, 38 L. R. A. 591; Hoeffer v. Cloghan, 49 N. Rep. 924; Stuart v. City of Easton (U. S.) 74 Fed. 854, 858, 21 C. C. A. 146; Clayton v. Hallett, 70 Pac. 429, 438, 30 Colo. 231, 59 L. R. A. 407; Troutman v. De Boissiere Odd Fellows' Orphans' Home & Industrial Ass'n (Kan.) 64 Pac. 33, 36 (citing Jackson v. Phillips, 96 Mass. [14 Allen] 539); Doughten v. Vandever, 5 Del. Ch. 51, 65 (citing Justice Gray in Jackson v. Phillips, 96 Mass. [14 Allen] 539, 556); Haggerty v. St. Louis, K. & N. W. R. Co., 74 S. W. 456, 462, 100 Mo. App. 424.

Its signification in the court of chancery in the construction of a will must be chiefly derived from the statute of Elizabeth, and those purposes are considered charitable which that statute enumerates, or which by analogies are deemed within its spirit and intentment. Morice v. Bishop of Durham, 9 Ves. 400, 405. "Charitable use," in legal parlance, means a use for some object within the purview of the statutes of Elizabeth respecting charities. Chittenden v. Chittenden, 1 Am. Law Reg. (O. S.) 538, 547; Troutman v. De Boissiere Odd Fellows' Orphans' Home & Industrial School Ass'n, 71 Pac. 286, 292, 293, 66 Kan. 1.

Charitable purposes for which gifts or devises of property may be made were considered at common law to consist only of those purposes enumerated in St. 43 Eliz., or which by analogy were deemed within its spirit and intentment. The preamble of that statute mentioned three classes of charitable gifts: (1) For the relief and assistance of the poor and needy, specifying only sick and maimed soldiers and mariners; education and preferment of orphans; marriages of poor maids; supportation, aid, and help of young tradesmen, handicraftsmen, and persons decayed; relief or redemption of prisoners and captives, and assistance of poor inhabitants in paying taxes, either for civil or military objects. (2) For the promoting of education, of which the only kind specified in the statute beyond the education and preferment of orphans, which seems more appropriately to fall within the first class, are those for maintenance of schools of learning, free schools, and scholars of universities. (3) For the repair and maintenance of public buildings and works, under which are enumerated repairs of ports, havens, and sea banks, for permitting commerce and navigation, and protecting the land against the encroachments of the sea, of bridges, causeways, and highways, by which the people may pass from one part of the country to another, of churches in which religion may be publicly taught, and of houses of correction. At common law any purpose was construed to be charitable which was within the principle and reason of the statute, though not expressly named in it, and many objects have been held as charities which the statute neither mentions nor distinctly refers to. The term is given a much wider operation at the present day than during the reign of Elizabeth. Jackson v. Phillips, 96 Mass. (14 Allen) 539, 551. See, also, Town of Hamden v. Rice, 24 Conn. 350, 355.

In Missouri Historical Soc. v. Academy of Science, 94 Mo. 459, 8 S. W. 346, it is said that any gift, not inconsistent with existing laws, which is promotive of science, or tends to the education, enlightenment, benefit, or amelioration of the condition of mankind, or the diffusion of useful knowledge, or is for the public convenience, is a "charity," within the meaning of the authorities, whether so denominated in the instrument which evidences the gift or not. Harrington v. Pier, 82 N. W. 345, 347, 105 Wis. 485, 50 L. R. A. 307, 76 Am. St. Rep. 924.

"A charitable use, where neither law nor public policy forbids, may be applied to almost anything that tends to promote the well-doing and well-being of social man." Ould v. Washington Hospital for Foundlings, 95 U. S. 303, 311, 24 L. Ed. 450; Tilden v. Green, 28 N. E. 880, 882, 130 N. Y. 29, 14 L. R. A. 33, 27 Am. St. Rep. 487.

Lord Camden defined "charity" to be the gift to a general public use which extends to the poor as well as the rich. People v. New York Soc. for Prevention of Cruelty to Children, 58 N. Y. Supp. 953, 955, 42 App. Div. 83.

A charity is a gift to the general public, which extends to the rich as well as the poor. Charity, says Sir William Grant in Morice v. Bishop of Durham, 9 Ves. 399, denotes all the good affections men ought to bear to each other; in its most restricted sense, relief of the poor. State v. Addison, 2 S. C. (2 Rich.) 499, 505.

"The definition of 'charity' has been steadily broadening. It was once held to be whatever is given for the love of God, or for the love of your neighbor, free from any taint or stain of any consideration that is personal or selfish. But the purity and unselfishness of the motive came to be regarded by the courts as important only in the moral aspects of the act, and was not insisted on in determining whether a gift was to a charitable use. In Appeal of Donoghugh, 86 Pa. 306, 312, 'charity' was defined as something done out of good will, benevolence, and a desire to add to the happiness or improvement of our fellow beings." Trustees of Academy of Protestant Episcopal Church v. Taylor, 25 Atl. 55, 56, 150 Pa. 565.

The test which determines whether an enterprise is charitable or otherwise is its purpose. If its purpose is to make profit, it is not a charitable enterprise. Long v. Rose-dale Cemetery (U. S.) 84 Fed. 135, 136 (citing Union Pac. R. Co. v. Artist [U. S.] 60 Fed. 365, 9 C. C. A. 14, 23 L. R. A. 581); Haggerty v. St. Louis, K. & N. W. R. Co., 74 S. W. 456, 462, 100 Mo. App. 424.

Antislavery cause.

A gift to promote the antislavery cause, and to assist fugitive slaves, is a gift to a charity. Jackson v. Phillips, 96 Mass. (14 Allen) 539, 540.

Asylums and hospitals.

"Charity," in its widest sense, denotes all the good affections which men ought to bear toward each other, and in this sense embraces all that is usually understood by the words "benevolence," "philanthropy," and "good will." A gift to a home for the friendless is a gift to charity. Taylor v. Keep, 2 Ill. App. (2 Bradw.) 368, 377.

The word in legal parlance has a much wider signification than in common speech, and as used in Gen. St. 1878, c. 11, § 5, which provides that all buildings belonging to institutions of purely public charity, including public hospitals, etc., shall be exempt from taxation, includes an institution established, maintained, and operated for the purpose of taking care of the sick without any profit or view to profit, but at a loss which has to be made up by benevolent contribution. Hennepin County Brotherhood of Gethsemane, 8 N. W. 595, 596, 27 Minn. 460, 38 Am. Rep. 298.

Const. art. 10, § 6, exempting from taxation lots and buildings used exclusively for "purposes purely charitable," exempts a hospital conducted by a religious community who devote themselves to the gratuitous care of the sick, paid patients being also received, but the whole object of the institution being charity, nobody connected with it deriving any profit from the work carried on there, and any profit derived from paid patients being applied exclusively to the charitable purposes of the institution, and every part of the building used exclusively for a hospital. The object being clearly charitable, and exclusively so, and all idea of private gain, profit, or advantage being excluded, the purpose is "purely charitable," within the meaning of the law. State ex rel. Alexian Bros. Hospital v. Powers, 10 Mo. App. 263, 266.

A gift of property in trust to provide a home for orphans or children of deceased Odd Fellows is a "charitable gift." Troutman v. De Boissiere Odd Fellows Orphans' Home & Industrial School Ass'n (Kan.) 64 Pac. 33, 36.

The term "charitable bequest" includes a bequest for the establishment of an orphan asylum, and a hospital for sick and infirm persons. Attorney General v. Moore's Ex'rs, 19 N. J. Eq. (4 C. E. Green) 503, 506.

A hospital incorporated under special act to furnish medical treatment and care for the sick, without capital stock, and from which it means to derive no profit, is a charitable corporation. Hearns v. Waterbury

Hospital, 33 Atl. 595, 596, 66 Conn. 98, 31 L. R. A. 224.

A charitable devise includes a gift to a society incorporated for the relief of distressed widows and the schooling and maintaining of poor children, and a devise of land to use and appropriate the rents and profits for the support of the schools and charities of said institution, without their being at any time liable to debts or contracts of said society. Jones v. Habersham, 107 U. S. 174, 185, 2 Sup. Ct. 336, 27 L. Ed. 401.

An institution for the education of the blind, a considerable portion of whose pupils are indigent, is to some extent a charitable institution, and subject to visitation. People v. Fitch, 47 N. E. 983, 988, 154 N. Y. 14, 88 L. R. A. 591.

Swan & S. St. p. 761, providing that all buildings belonging to "institutions of purely public charity," together with the land actually occupied by such institutions, not leased or otherwise used with a view to profit, and all moneys and credits appropriated solely to sustaining and belonging exclusively to such institutions, shall be exempt from taxation, should be construed to include a corporation created for the sole purpose of affording an asylum for destitute men and women and the incurable sick and blind, irrespective of their nationality or creed. "The right to the exemption depends upon the public nature of the charity, and not upon whether the corporation or institution which administers it is a public or private organization. If the charity which the institution is created to administer and which it does administer is purely public, it comes within the exemption, although it may have a private foundation and be governed by private authority. In one sense such an institution is public. It is public as respects the uses it subserves and the benefits it confers, but it is private as respects its organization and management. By the term 'institution' is to be understood an organization which is permanent in its nature, as contradistinguished from an undertaking which is transient and temporary." Humphries v. Little Sisters of the Poor, 29 Ohio St. 201, 206.

"Charity," as used in Const. art. 9, § 1, exempting institutions of purely public charity from taxation, means a gift to promote the welfare of others. A Masonic home for aged and decrepit Masons is a charity. City of Philadelphia v. Masonic Home of Pennsylvania, 28 Atl. 954, 955, 160 Pa. 572, 23 L. R. A. 545, 40 Am. St. Rep. 736.

As used in 1 Gav. & H. St. p. 70, providing that every building erected for the use of any benevolent or charitable institution, and the tract of land on which such building is situated, not exceeding 20 acres, shall be exempt from taxation, "charitable institution" should be construed to include a Masonic hall used for the relief of suffering humanity wherever it may be found, but more immediately and especially for the relief of distressed and worthy Free Masons, their widows and orphans, and the support of the latter without reward, though the order confines its benefaction to those who have become members of the Masonic order, having paid the fees demanded for that purpose, for it is not essential to a charity that it shall be universal. City of Indianapolis v. Grand Master of Grand Lodge of Indiana, 25 Ind. 518, 519.

"That an institution limits the disposition of its blessings to one sex, or the inhabitants of a particular city or district, or to the membership of a particular religious or secular organization, does not deprive it, either in a legal or popular comprehension, of the character of a 'charitable institution.' If that only be charity which relieves human want, without discriminating amongst those who need relief, then it is a rarer virtue than has been supposed." City of Indianapolis v. Grand Master of Grand Lodge of Indiana, 25 Ind. 518, 519.

A corporation without capital stock, and without any provision for making dividends or profits, and the object of which is to provide a general hospital for sick and insane persons, deriving its funds mainly from public and private charity, and holding them in trust for the object of sustaining the hospital, conducting its affairs for the purpose of administering to the comfort of the sick without expectation or right on the part of those immediately interested in the corporation to receive compensation for their own benefit, is a public, charitable corporation. McDonald v. Massachusetts General Hospital, 120 Mass. 432, 435, 21 Am. Rep. 529.

The maintenance of a hospital, an institution for the sole purpose of relieving sick and injured employes, without expense to them, and without any intention on the part of the employer to make profit out of the undertaking, is a charitable institution. Sawdey v. Spokane Falls & N. R. Co., 70 Pac. 972, 973, 30 Wash. 349, 94 Am. St. Rep. 880.

A hospital maintained by a railroad company for the free treatment of its employes, supported partly by monthly contributions from its employes and partly by the company, and not maintained for profit, is a charitable institution. Union Pac. R. Co. v. Artist (U. S.) 60 Fed. 365, 369, 9 C. C. A. 14, 23 L. R. A. 581.

An act, to be charitable in a legal sense, must be designed for some public benefit open to an indefinite and vague number; that is, the persons to be benefited must be vague, uncertain, and indefinite until they are selected or appointed to be the particular beneficiaries of the trust for the time being. "Money contributed by the members of a club to a common fund, to be applied to the relief and the assistance of the particular members of the club when in sickness, in want of employment, or other disability, is not a charitable fund. It is not charity to give to your friend because of friendship, nor to your associate in a society because of your duty imposed by the laws of that society. 'Charity,' in the legal sense, has been illustrated by a reference to the customs of the ancient Jews to leave at random a sheaf of corn here and there in a field for the poor gleaners who follow the harvesters, it being unknown who would get it." Franta v. Bohemian Roman Catholic Cent. Union, 63 S. W. 1100, 1101, 164 Mo. 304, 54 L. R. A. 723, 86 Am. St. Rep. 611.

A common fund created by voluntary contributions, the benefits being restricted to the members of the association, has not ordinarily been considered a charitable fund. Where the common fund of an unincorporated association organized for the purpose of nursing and caring for sick members, providing for maintenance and medical attention during illness and of burying such as should die, was created by initiation fees and monthly contributions, such fund is not a charitable trust. Burke v. Roper, 79 Ala. 138, 142.

A charitable use is one of a public nature, tending to the benefit or relief in some shape or other of the community at large, not restricted to the mutual aid of a few. An association whose objects are stated to be the employment of its funds in purposes of mutual benevolence amongst its members and families does not make it one whose object is a charitable use. Babb v. Reed (Pa.) 5 Rawle, 151, 158, 28 Am. Dec. 650; St. Clement v. L'Institut Jacques Cartier, 50 Atl. 376, 377, 95 Me. 493.

Payment of sickness and funeral benefits for members only, out of an income chiefly derived from regular compulsory dues paid by such members, is not a use for a benevolent or charitable purpose, within Pub. St. c. 11, § 5, cl. 3, exempting from taxation real estate of societies devoting their entire income to benevolent, charitable, and other purposes. Young Men's Protestant Temperance & Benevolent Soc. v. City of Fall River, 36 N. E. 57, 160 Mass. 409.

A statute exempting the moneys and properties of an "institution of purely public charity" from taxation cannot be construed to exempt a charitable or benevolent association which extends relief only to its own sick and needy members and to the widows and orphans of its deceased members. Morning Star Lodge, No. 26, I. O. O. F. v. Hayslip, 23 Ohio St. 144, 146.

A fraternal benefit society having a lodge system, with ritualistic work, and paying benefits in case of death of its members, is in the nature of an insurance organization, and is not a society of purely public charity within the exemption laws. State Council of Catholic Knights v. Board of Review of Effingham Co., 64 N. E. 1104, 1105, 193 Ill. 441.

Within the meaning of Const. art. 10, § 3, empowering the Legislature to exempt all property from taxation which is used for charitable purposes, is not limited to public purposes, but applies to the purposes of an association which uses its entire revenues for paying current expenses and assisting indigent members and their families. City of Petersburg v. Petersburg Benevolent Mechanics' Ass'n, 78 Va. 431, 436.

The words "charitable and benevolent," as used in a bequest in trust for charitable and benevolent institutions, should be construed as having been employed to indicate that such institutions as would be entitled as beneficiaries under the will must be both charitable and benevolent, and should not be construed as indicating that the words "benevolent" and "charitable" were used synonymously. People v. Powers, 41 N. E. 432, 433, 147 N. Y. 104, 35 L. R. A. 502.

"Charitable," when used in a will conveying property for charitable purposes, has had a technical meaning since the enactment of St. 43 Eliz., which specifically mentioned certain trusts which would be upheld and executed by the Lord Chancellor, which were designated as "charitable and Godly uses," and is to be construed to only include purposes which were there designated. The word is not synonymous with "benevolent," for, while it is true that there is no charitable purpose which is not also a benevolent purpose, yet the converse is not quite true, for there may be a benevolent purpose which is not charitable in the legal sense of the term. Adair v. Smith, 44 Ky. (5 B. Mon.) 426, 428.

Charity may be benevolence, but all benevolence is not necessarily charity. The word "charitable," as used in the residuary clause of a will giving the property to trustees to be expended for benevolent and charitable purposes, is synonymous with "benevolent." Fox v. Gibbs, 29 Atl. 940, 942, 86 Me. 87.

A bequest in trust for such objects of benevolence and liberality as the trustee should most approve should not be supported as a charitable legacy. Morice v. Bishop of Durham, 9 Ves. 400, 405; Id., 10 Ves. 522, 538.

"Charity," as used in a will devising property for the furtherance and promotion of piety and good morals, and for the purposes of benevolence or charity or temperance, or for the education of deserving youths, "is not to be interpreted in its largest technical sense, but is used in its limited and ordinary popular acceptance, and is synonymous with 'benevolence.'" Saltonstall v. Sanders, 93 Mass. (11 Allen) 446, 470.

Education.

The term "charitable bequest" includes a bequest to a school district for the schooling of its children, and to a county for the support of its poor. The rudiments of the law of charitable bequests were undoubtedly derived from the civil law. "It was a fixed maxim in Roman jurisprudence that legacies to pious uses, which included all legacies destined for works of piety or charity, whether they related to spiritual or temporal concerns, were entitled to peculiar favor, and to be deemed privileged testaments. 2 Story, Eq. Jur. 489, § 1137. A long and uninterrupted course of decisions under the English statute of charitable uses (43 Eliz. c. 4) shows most conclusively that bequests of the nature of those in the will in question have received the use of the unqualified sanction of the English Court of Chancery. They are held to be within the letter and spirit of the statute, for in the preamble thereto are enumerated devises for poor people, for schools of learning, free schools, and scholars of universities." Heuser v. Harris, 42 Ill. 425, 430.

"The meaning of the word 'charity,' in its legal sense, is different from the signification which it ordinarily bears. In its legal sense it includes not only gifts for the benefit of the poor, but endowments for the advancement of learning, or institutions for the encouragement of science and art, and, it is said, for any other useful and public purposes. 3 Steph. Comm. 229." A school established by private donation, which is carried on for the benefit of the public, and not with a view to profit, is a charity. Gerke v. Purcell, 25 Ohio St. 229, 243.

The word "charitable," as used in the provisions of the Constitution and the statutes, as applied to institutions, should be given its usual and ordinary meaning. It is not necessary that an institution should be wholly charitable to fall within that definition. It is enough if an institution is partly charitable in its character and purpose, even if its purpose is partly educational. People v. Fitch, 154 N. Y. 14, 47 N. E. 983, 38 L. R. A. 591. And an institution incorporated to maintain an industrial school for the sustenance of male orphan children is a charitable institution. That such an institution, and similar institutions throughout the state, are benevolent and charitable institutions, has been almost universally recognized by committing magistrates, overseers of the poor, and judges who have committed children guilty of minor offenses to such institutions, as required by Pen. Code, § 713. Corbett v. St. Vincent's Industrial School, 79 N. Y. Supp. 369, 375, 79 App. Div. 334.

Gifts for the promotion of education are charitable in the legal sense. "Schools of learning, free schools, and schools and universities are among the charities enumerated in the statute of Elizabeth, and no trusts have been more constantly and uniformly upheld as charity than those for the establishment and support of schools and colleges." Russell v. Allen, 2 Sup. Ct. 327, 334, 107 U. S. 163, 27 L. Ed. 397.

All gifts for the promotion of education are "charitable," in a legal sense, where the element of private gain is wanting, and where the scheme is in part supported by public or private contributions. Alfred University v. Hancock (N. J.) 46 Atl. 178.

A bequest to the inhabitants of a town for the purpose of founding and establishing a literary institute for the use and benefit of all the inhabitants of such town is clearly a public charity. Drury v. Inhabitants of Natick, 92 Mass. (10 Allen) 169, 178.

A gift to the educational society of a church for the education of poor young men for the ministry is a valid charitable gift. Protestant Episcopal Education Soc. v. Churchman's Representatives, 80 Va. 718, 762.

A trust for the promotion of education or science, such as the establishment of a school or a chair in a university, is a trust for charity. Spence v. Widney (Cal.) 46 Pac. 463, 466 (citing Jackson v. Phillips, 96 Mass. [14 Allen] 539); Yates v. Yates (N. Y.) 9 Barb. 324, 334.

A bequest to be expended in the purchase of a lot and erection of a college or university, with library rooms, together with testator's library, and $6,000 additional to be expended in the purchase of useful books for the library, is a gift to charity. Miller v. Porter, 53 Pa. (3 P. F. Smith) 292, 297.

"In Kendall v. Granger [5 Beav. 300], it was said by Lord Langdale that a 'charitable purpose' 'must be either one of those purposes denominated charitable in the statute of Elizabeth, or one of such purposes as the court construes to be charitable by analogy to those mentioned in that statute.' Among the purposes denominated 'charitable' in that statute were gifts for relief of aged, impotent, and poor people, and for schools of learning, free schools, scholars in universities, education and preferment of orphans, aid and help of young tradesmen, handicraftsmen, etc. So, according to Mr. Berry, charitable trusts include all gifts in trust for educational purposes in their ever varying diversity, as well as gifts for the relief and comfort of the poor, the sick, and the afflicted. The purpose of establishing a school in O. or some place in a certain county for the education of young persons in the domestic and useful arts was a 'charitable purpose' within the judicial sense." Webster v. Morris, 28 N. W. 353, 366, 66 Wis. 366, 57 Am. Rep. 278.

The Constitution and statutes, exempting from taxation all "institutions of learning, benevolence and charity," do not exempt an incorporated college, founded and endowed by the gifts of citizens, managed by a certain board, whose chief object is to furnish education to both sexes at as reasonable a rate as possible, but not granting absolutely free tuition, and into which neither the public, nor any class thereof, have an absolute right of admission. Thiel College v. Mercer County, 101 Pa. 530, 533.

A gift to a sectarian college, the expense of the erection and equipment of which is to be borne by the churches of the denomination to which the proposed college belongs, is a devise to a charity. In re Stewart's Estate, 66 Pac. 148, 149, 26 Wash. 32.

A gift to Harvard College, to hold as a permanent fund and apply the net income is one to a charitable institution. Dexter v. Harvard College, 57 N. E. 371, 374, 176 Mass. 192.

The public educational institutions of the state will be held "charitable institutions," within the provisions of the statute giving the board of control control of charitable institutions. State v. Board of Control of State Institutions, 88 N. W. 533, 538, 85 Minn. 165.

"Charitable societies," as used in the act of 1848, entitled "An act for the incorporation of charitable societies," and authorizing any five or more persons possessing the qualifications prescribed by the act to associate themselves for charitable purposes, cannot be construed to include societies for the purpose of carrying on of medical or other colleges, or any institution whatever which is primarily and exclusively educational, and especially one in which a compensation is demanded for the instruction furnished. An institution of the latter kind could hardly be regarded as a "charitable institution" within the ordinary meaning of those terms. People v. Cothran (N. Y.) 27 Hun, 344, 345.

Money devoted to the support of a college or academy, which is incorporated wholly for the purpose of general education, and so operated without any capital stock or purpose of profit, and tuition is charged only for its maintenance, is given and used for "charitable uses," within the meaning of the statute exempting from taxation "real and personal estate granted, sequestered, or used for public, pious or charitable uses." The popular misapprehension as to what constitutes a "charity" is certainly very great if money given for education is not a charitable use of it. Williard v. Pike, 9 Atl. 907, 915, 59 Vt. 202.

A religious denominational school which does not limit the admission of pupils to children of members of its own denomination, though it gives a preference to such children, and which is not maintained for pecuniary profit, is exempt under Const. art. 9, § 1, as a charity. Trustees of Academy of Protestant Episcopal Church v. Taylor, 25 Atl. 55, 56, 150 Pa. 565.

"In determining whether a bequest is a mere gift or charitable use, it is necessary to ascertain the intention of the testator. Where the purpose of a will is to provide for the endowment of an institution of learning for all time, where the testator's own descendants and those of his brothers and sisters as a class might have a preference, and then, if the fund was sufficient, the poor of a certain county might partake of its benefits, it is a bequest for a charitable use. While the children who were to be educated were the beneficiaries, they were to have no interest or control over the property. In the course of time the descendants of the testator's brothers and sisters might become so numerous that all of them could not be educated, and it would be uncertain who of them would be selected. If all could be received, it would be uncertain who of them would submit to the conditions imposed. There is no difference in the interest conferred on those and on such poor children as might also be received. The beneficiaries are also uncertain by reason of the continued fluctuations of those who are to be its recipients. The fact that a preference is given to the blood of the testator does not take from the bequest the character of a charity, and although the relief of the poor, or a benefit to them in some way, is in its popular sense a necessary ingredient in a charity, this is not so in view of the law, by which it is defined to be a gift to a general public use, which extends, or doubtless may do so, either to the rich or to the poor. An institution of learning for the education of gentlemen's sons has been held a proper devise to charitable uses. Uncertainty of individual objects has often been said to be a characteristic of charity, and, if the beneficiary is certain, it is a gift, and not a charity. This must be understood, however, to some extent as referring to certainty of individuals to whom, as such, the bequest is made, and not to certainty of a class of individuals from whom the beneficiaries shall come." Paschal v. Acklin, 27 Tex. 173, 198.

A gift to a school under the auspices and control of a religious denomination, and confined to the youth of its members, both rich and poor, and in which the particular creed of that church is taught, is a devise to a charitable use. Price v. Maxwell, 28 Pa. (4 Casey) 23, 35.

The term "charitable trust" may properly be applied to the bequest of a fund in trust for the education of the poor children of a certain district in the state, although the free education of all poor children in the state is provided for by law. Green v. Blackwell (N. J.) 35 Atl. 375.

A charitable trust is one which originates from a gift, and which limits property to any public use to which it is lawful to devote the property. Thus a bequest of property in trust for the payment of additional teachers in the public schools is a charitable trust. Webster v. Wiggin, 31 Atl. 824, 828, 19 R. I. 73, 28 L. R. A. 510.

A bequest to a theological seminary to provide for the education of two young men for the ministry is a good charitable bequest. Field v. Drew Theological Seminary (U. S.) 41 Fed. 371, 373.

"Charitable institutions," in a strict sense, are not educational institutions, for it may be conceded that in a popular sense the words "charitable" and "educational" are distinguishable. But from a consideration of the title of Gen. Laws 1901, c. 122, reading "An act to create a state board of control, and to provide for the management and control of the charitable, reformatory and penal institutions of the state, and to make an appropriation therefor, and to abolish the state board of corrections and charities," it may be assumed that the phrase "charitable institutions" in the title, under the liberal rules of construction applicable to such cases, is fairly suggestive of the supervision by the state board of control of the finances of the state normal schools, and hence not obnoxious to Const. art. 4, § 27, declaring that no law shall embrace more than one subject, which shall be expressed in its title. State v. Board of Control, 85 Minn. 165, 169, 88 N. W. 533, 535.

Eleemosynary synonymous.

"Charitable" is practically synonymous with "eleemosynary," the latter being technically employed to designate a class of corporations organized for charitable purposes. People v. Fitch, 39 N. Y. Supp. 926, 927, 16 Misc. Rep. 464.

Family monument.

After approving the definition in Jackson v. Phillips, 96 Mass. (14 Allen) 539, 556, it was held that, where a testator who had no family of his own provided for repairs of a family monument and burial place, the trust is void as against perpetuities, for the object is not a charity, it not being to a general public use. Detwiller v. Hartman, 37 N. J. Eq. (10 Stew.) 347, 353.

Under Gen. St. c. 113, § 2, providing that a person "may by will dispose of any estate, right or interest in real or personal estate that he may be entitled to at his death," and chapter 13, § 1, declaring that devises for any charitable or humane purpose shall be valid, a devise of a life estate to a testator's wife, with directions that at her death the whole estate shall be converted into money and applied to the purchase of a monument to be erected over the graves of himself and wife, is valid. Ford v. Ford's Ex'r, 16 S. W. 451, 452, 91 Ky. 572, 13 Ky. Law Rep. 183.

A bequest of money to county commissioners and their successors in office, or to such authority as may control and direct the finances of the county, to be held in perpetuity in trust, and the interest to be expended annually in the repair, preservation, and neat keeping of the graves and monuments of the testatrix and other named relatives, is not a bequest to a charitable use, within the exception to the rule against perpetuities, and is therefore void. Johnson v. Hollifield, 79 Ala. 423, 58 Am. Rep. 596.

Insurance.

A Tennessee statute exempting organizations for charitable and benevolent purposes from taxation, etc., does not exempt a co-operative fire insurance company. Co-operative Fire Ins. Order of Knoxville v. Lewis, 80 Tenn. (12 Lea) 136.

The term "charity" cannot be construed to include life insurance, which is merely a business transaction. State v. Taylor, 27 Atl. 797, 798, 56 N. J. Law (27 Vroom) 49.

Library or museum.

Const. art. 9, § 1, providing that the General Assembly may exempt from taxation "institutions of purely public charity," means charities that are purely and entirely public. The phrase is intended to exclude those charities which are private or only quasi public, such as many religious aid societies are. Where a library is held in trust as the property of a corporation for the advancement of knowledge and literature in a city, not used in any way for the purpose of private profit, no distinction being made between the parties and the general public, except members' privilege of commutation by annual payment for the hire of books, which payment is for the increase and preservation of the library, the corporation is an "institution of purely public charity," within the meaning of the Constitution. Philadelphia Library Co. v. Donohugh (Pa.) 12 Phila. 284, 285.

As used in the law of wills, a "charity" is a gift to any general public use extending to all, rich or poor, and a gift for public charity is not void, although in some forms it creates a perpetuity. A gift must be expressly, or by necessary implication, for the public benefit, and so a private museum or a library established by private subscriptions for the use of subscribers is not a charity. Piper v. Moulton, 72 Me. 155, 159.

A "charitable trust," or a "charity," is a donation in trust for promoting the welfare of mankind at large, or of a community, or of some part of it, indefinite as to numbers and individuals. It may, but it need not, confer a gratuitous benefit upon the poor. It may, but it need not, seek to spread religion or piety. Schools and libraries, equally with asylums, hospitals, and religious institutions, are included within its scope. People v. Cogswell, 45 Pac. 270, 271, 113 Cal. 129, 35 L. R. A. 269.

The word "charity" includes a bequest for the erection, creation, and preservation of a free library in a large city. Crerar v. Williams, 34 N. E. 467, 471, 145 Ill. 625, 21 L. R. A. 454, 471.

Masonic societies.

Const. art. 207, providing that charitable institutions shall be exempt from taxation on property owned and used for their corporate purposes, comprises all institutions whose primary objects are benevolence and universal charity, within which description are Masonic societies. State ex rel. Bertel v. Board of Assessors, 34 La. Ann. 574, 575.

The grand and subordinate lodges of Free Masons, acquiring money and property beyond their current expenses as a society for the sole purpose and object of the bestowal of relief and charities to the needy, constitute a "charitable and eleemosynary corporation." Burdine v. Grand Lodge of Alabama, 37 Ala. 478, 482.

Public buildings and improvements.

In the case of Perin v. Carey, 65 U. S. (24 How.) 465, 506, 16 L. Ed. 701, the Supreme Court of the United States said: "All property held for public purposes is held as a charitable use in the legal sense of the term 'charity,'" and in Ould v. Washington Hospital for Foundlings, 95 U. S. 303, 309, 311, 24 L. Ed. 450, the court declared: "A charitable use, where neither law nor public policy forbids, may be applied to almost anything that tends to promote the well-doing and the well-being of social man." A grant of land by the proprietaries of Pennsylvania in trust for the erecting thereon a courthouse for the public use and service of the county is a gift for a charitable use. Stuart v. City of Easton (U. S.) 74 Fed. 854, 859, 21 C. C. A. 146.

A legacy of a sum of money to a town for the purpose of erecting a townhouse for transacting the town's business is a legacy for a charitable purpose. Coggeshall v. Pelton (N. Y.) 7 Johns. Ch. 292, 294, 11 Am. Dec. 471.

A devise of land to a town, with directions that all the interest thereof should be used in annually repairing highways and bridges, is a devise for a public and charitable use. Town of Hamden v. Rice, 24 Conn. 350, 355.

A bequest in trust for the erection in a public park of a memorial arch in memory of Pennsylvania soldiers, upon which are to appear statues of certain Union generals, and also a statue of testator, with his name in large letters underneath, is a charitable gift. It is true the gift does not provide for the hungry, naked, sick, or homeless, nor for the scholastic or scientific education of the general public, but, with an equally exalted benevolence and love for mankind, has in view the foundation of an almost imperishable, magnificent memorial, far excelling in beauty any creation of the sculptor's art heretofore erected within the limits of the park, the pleasure resort of hundreds of thousands of our population, which for generations yet unborn will tend to the elevation and refinement of the people, cultivate a love for the beautiful in art and architecture, and keep alive their patriotism and remembrance of the martial prowess and good deeds in statesmanship and civil life of heroes, patriots, and citizens worthy of perpetuation; and not only this, but furnishes a secure place for the comfort and gratuitous healthful amusement and recreation of young children, amid pure and attractive rural surroundings, removed from the dangers of the streets and contaminated atmosphere of a great city. We cannot conceive of any more strictly "charitable use," within its legal definition, than the purposes and objects contemplated by the testator in this disposition of his large estate. The memorial monument is for the beautifying and adornment of the city, and for these reasons alone the gift would be upheld as charitable. In re Smith's Estate, 37 Atl. 114, 115, 181 Pa. 109.

Public charity.

"Charity" is understood to refer to something done or given for the benefit of our fellows or of the public. In re Knight's Estate, 28 Atl. 303, 159 Pa. 500.

A more concise and practicable rule is that of Lord Camden in Jones v. Williams, Amb. 651, adopted by Chancellor Kent, by Lord Lyndhurst, and by the Supreme Court of the United States: A gift to a general public use, which extends to the poor as well as the rich. Jackson v. Phillips, 96 Mass. (14 Allen) 539, 556. This definition is followed in many other cases. See Coggeshall v. Pelton (N. Y.) 7 Johns. Ch. 292, 294; Gerke v. Purcell, 25 Ohio St. 229, 243; Kain v. Gibbone, 101 U. S. 362, 365, 25 L. Ed. 813; Perin v. Carey, 65 U. S. (24 How.) 465, 506, 16 L. Ed. 701; Stuart v. City of Easton (U. S.) 74 Fed. 854, 858, 21 C. C. A.

146; Dexter v. Harvard College, 57 N. E. 371, 374, 176 Mass. 192.

To constitute a "charity" in the legal sense, the use must be public in its nature. A trust created for the use of a particular person, a single individual, would not be a charity in a legal sense. A bequest to a church mission for the education of a boy to whom the testatrix had previously advanced money is not a bequest to a charity, it not being public. Sherwood v. American Bible Soc., *40 N. Y. (1 Keyes) 561, 566.

The term "charity" does not extend to particular gifts to particular persons. A sum supplied from a private gift for any private or general purpose is a charity. The establishment of a school for learning of any description, and donations for the establishment of colleges and schools, are charities. Yates v. Yates (N. Y.) 9 Barb. 324, 334.

An act, to be "charitable" in a legal sense, must be designed for some public benefit to an indefinite and vague number; that is, the persons to be benefited must be vague, uncertain, and indefinite, until they are selected or appointed to be the particular beneficiaries of the trust for the time being. Franta v. Bohemian Roman Catholic Cent. Union, 63 S. W. 1100, 1101, 164 Mo. 304, 54 L. R. A. 723, 86 Am. St. Rep. 611; Burke v. Roper, 79 Ala. 138, 142.

A charitable use is one of a public nature, tending to the relief or benefit, in some shape or other, of the community at large, not restricted to the mutual aid of a few, as in a mutual benefit association. Babb v. Reed (Pa.) 5 Rawle, 151, 158, 28 Am. Dec. 650.

As used in the law of wills, a "charity" is a gift to any general public use extending to all, rich or poor, and a gift for public charity is not void, although in some forms it creates a perpetuity. A gift must be expressly or by necessary implication for the public benefit. Piper v. Moulton, 72 Me. 155, 159.

A "purely public charity," within the meaning of Const. art. 9, § 1, providing that the Legislature may exempt from taxation institutions of a purely public nature, is not one necessarily solely controlled and administered by the state, but extends to private institutions for purposes of public charity, and not administered for private gain. Appeal of Donohugh, 86 Pa. 306, 318.

An instrument of writing purporting to convey lands to trustees and their successors, in perpetual trust, to provide a home and school for the maintenance and education of children of the deceased members of a secret society, is not a gift for the purpose of public charity. Troutman v. De Boussiere Odd Fellows' Orphans' Home & Industrial School Ass'n, 71 Pac. 286, 66 Kan. 1.

An infirmary established in connection with a medical college to make it more attractive to students is not exempt from taxation as an institution of public charity. Gray St. Infirmary v. City of Louisville, 65 S. W. 11, 23 Ky. Law Rep. 1274, 55 L. R. A. 270.

Relief of the poor and sick.

The general relief of the poor is a charitable use. "Assistance of the poor is required not only by the moral and religious duty of every citizen, but by a sound public policy, and a regard for the interests of the whole community. A gift to the poor generally, or to the poor of a particular town, parish, age, sex, or condition, is a good charitable gift. It is the number and indefiniteness of the objects, and not the mode of relieving them, which is the essential element of a charity. It makes little difference to the contributors, the poor, or the public, and none in the nature of the charity, what is the mode of distributing relief. In every act of relieving the poor, by whatever means, the immediate benefit is to the individual. Hunger, nakedness, and disease are personal, and the relief is also personal, and in one sense private. A good charitable use is public in the sense that it must be executed openly and in public, or in the sense of being so general and indefinite in its objects as to be deemed of common and public benefit. Each individual immediately benefited may be private, and the charity may be distributed in private and by a private hand. It is public and general in its scope and purpose, and becomes definite and private only after the individual objects have been selected." Saltonstall v. Sanders, 93 Mass. (17 Allen) 446, 454.

The term "charitable gift" includes a bequest, in trust, the income of which is to be applied to the relief of the worthy poor of the town, although it adds nothing to what the poor are entitled to receive from the town. The conclusion that such a gift is not charitable is unsupported by any authority in this state or elsewhere. The decisions are to the contrary. So are the best and most thoroughly recognized definitions, such as that in Perin v. Carey, 65 U. S. (24 How.) 465, 506, 16 L. Ed. 701, or in Jackson v. Phillips, 96 Mass. (14 Allen) 539, 556. Appeal of Strong, 37 Atl. 395, 396, 68 Conn. 527.

A charity is "a gift to be applied, consistently with existing laws, for the benefit of indefinite number of persons, either by bringing their hearts under the influence of education or religion, by relieving their bodies from disease, suffering, or constraint, by assisting them to establish themselves for life, or by erecting and maintaining public buildings or works, or otherwise lessening the burdens of government." The purpose need not be called "charitable" in the gift itself, if so described as to show that it is so in its nature. A bequest of a fund to trustees to form a county benevolent fund, the trustees being empowered, upon such plan as they may choose, to apply the annual income to poor families, widows, and orphans, newcomers in distress, or persons in such county suffering for want of clothing, food, or fuel, but not to drunkards, but to their suffering families, if worthy, not to companies or corporations, unless formed for the relief of the poor, not to church, but to those in distress, and especially to suffering families from whatsoever country, is a gift to charity. Ersine v. Whitehead, 84 Ind. 357, 358.

"A gift is charitable where a fund is to be permanently maintained, and its income to be devoted to the relief of the poor and unfortunate, although its distribution is private and to private persons." Bullard v. Chandler, 21 N. E. 951, 953, 149 Mass. 532, 6 L. R. A. 104.

A "charitable gift" is one to a class of persons of limited means, and, when made to a town in trust, the object is in no sense incompatible with the object of the town's organization. Lovell v. Town of Charlestown, 32 Atl. 160, 161, 66 N. H. 584.

"Charitable purposes," as used in St. p. 1152, § 5, subd. 2, exempting from taxation all buildings used "exclusively for charitable purposes," includes a corporation owning real estate, the products of which are exclusively expended in the training and furnishing of persons for charitable purposes, such as the visitation of the sick, and the care of hospitals and poor schools. "To tax such an establishment would be in fact to tax the sick and destitute, who are the beneficiaries thereof." State v. Collector of Chatham, 20 Atl. 292, 293, 52 N. J. Law (23 Vroom) 373, 9 L. R. A. 198.

The term "charitable bequest" applies to a bequest to any institution in a city that will give shelter to homeless people at night, irrespective of creed, color, or condition. In re Croxall's Estate, 29 Atl. 759, 760, 162 Pa. 579.

The term "charitable use" includes a testamentary disposition for the benefit of the poor of a defined locality. Trim v. Brightman, 31 Atl. 1071, 168 Pa. 395.

A devise, to a society incorporated for the relief of distressed widows and the schooling and maintaining of poor children, of buildings and lands to use and appropriate the receipts and profits for the support of the school and the charities of said institution, without said lot being at any time liable for the debts or contracts of said society, is a good charitable devise. Jones v. Habersham, 2 Sup. Ct. 336, 337, 107 U. S. 174, 27 L. Ed. 401.

Religious purposes.

Rev. St. § 2039, providing that the absolute power of alienation shall not be suspended by any limitation or condition whatever for a longer period than during the continuance of two lives in being at the creation of the estate, except when real estate is given or devised to a charitable corporation, is intended to include only those which are formed for advancing charitable ends, and does not include a corporation organized and existing for religious and spiritual purposes, and the words cannot be so enlarged as to include what is generally called a "religious corporation." De Wolf v. Lawson, 21 N. W. 615, 619, 61 Wis. 469, 50 Am. Rep. 148.

The word "charitable," as used in Pub. St. c. 11, § 5, cl. 3, as amended by St. 1889, c. 465, exempting corporations organized for benevolent, charitable, scientific, and literary purposes from taxation, refers to hospitals and other charitable institutions for the relief of the poor or sick, which render a service to the public, and so relieve the state or municipality from expense, and hence cannot be construed to include a corporation having for its paramount object the dissemination of theosophical ideas and the procuring of converts thereto, one of the purposes of which was forming the nucleus of the universal brotherhood of humanity. New England Theosophical Corp. v. Board of Assessors, 51 N. E. 456, 457, 172 Mass. 60, 42 L. R. A. 281.

After approving the definition in Jackson v. Phillips, 14 Allen, 558, it was held that a gift to a church, to be used by it for religious purposes, is a gift for charitable uses. De Camp v. Dobbins, 29 N. J. Eq. (2 Stew.) 36, 44.

After quoting from Allen v. Duffie, 43 Mich. 1, 4 N. W. 427, 38 Am. Rep. 159, it was held that contributions to a church for the advancement of Christianity and the betterment of morals must be classed as a "charity." First M. E. Church of Ft. Madison v. Donnell, 81 N. W. 171, 110 Iowa, 5, 46 L. R. A. 858.

A devise for masses for the repose of the soul of testator, and the repose of the souls of other named persons, is valid as a charitable use. Hoeffer v. Cloghan, 49 N. E. 527, 529, 171 Ill. 462, 40 L. R. A. 730, 63 Am. St. Rep. 241, approving Jackson v. Phillips, 96 Mass. (14 Allen) 539.

A devise of real estate as a site for a church and parsonage, and of other real estate, with directions to sell the same for the purpose of building such church and parsonage, is a charitable trust. Pennoyer v. Wadhams, 25 Pac. 720, 722, 20 Or. 274, 11 L. R. A. 210.

A direction in a will by a member of the Society of Friends that his house be kept open for the reception and entertainment of ministers and others traveling in the service of truth does not create a charitable trust.

Kelly v. Nichols, 25 Atl. 840, 841, 18 R. I. 62, 19 L. R. A. 413.

The owner of land having at his own expense built a chapel which was used for the purpose of public worship, and the congregation having subscribed a sum of money for the purpose of enlarging and improving the same, he, in consideration that the money so subscribed should be expended for that purpose, demised the premises by lease for 23 years, reserving a peppercorn rent during his life, and £10 per annum after his death. A declaration of trust was afterwards executed by some of the lessees, declaring that they would hold the premises in trust for the congregation assembling at the chapel, and that in case the public worship should be there discontinued, then that they would assign the premises for civil purposes. Held, that this was a conveyance for the benefit of a charitable use, and therefore void within 9 Geo. II, c. 36, § 1. Wellard v. Hawthorn, 2 Barn. & Ald. 96.

A bequest to a Catholic bishop, to be expended for the benefit of a religious community, is not a gift to charitable uses. Kain v. Gibboney, 101 U. S. 362, 365, 25 L. Ed. 813.

"As there can be no charitable use without a trust, an absolute gift or bequest to an incorporated missionary society is no more a charity than an absolute gift to an individual." Owens v. Missionary Soc. of Methodist Episcopal Church, 14 N. Y. (4 Kern.) 380, 385, 67 Am. Dec. 160.

Rev. St. § 2039, authorizing devises of real estate to "charitable corporations," does not authorize devises to "religious corporations." De Wolf v. Lawson, 21 N. W. 615, 619, 61 Wis. 469.

A bequest to the board of trustees of several churches was within the prohibition of Civ. Code, § 1313, prohibiting bequests in trust for charitable uses of more than one-third of the estate where the testator had legal heirs. In re Hewitt's Estate, 29 Pac. 775, 776, 94 Cal. 376.

A gift for the perpetual support of a Christian minister, the primary object of which is not the support of an individual, but is for the support and spread of Christian teaching and enlightenment, is a broad charity. Gifts to pastors have heretofore in adjudicated cases been considered charities. Farmers' & Merchants' Bank v. Robinson, 70 S. W. 372, 374, 96 Mo. App. 385.

Society for prevention of cruelty to children.

A society which cares for children charged with crime or held as witnesses against persons charged with cruelty, and brings into court for disposition children found in a state of destitution, and investigates applications for commitment of children, and defends the custody by institutions of children committed through its instrumentality, and, in addition, affords shelter for children overnight, furnishing them food, clothing, and medical attendance, and aids needy families and children, is a charitable institution. People v. New York Soc. for Prevention of Cruelty to Children, 53 N. Y. Supp. 1017, 1019, 25 Misc. Rep. 53.

The New York Society for Prevention of Cruelty to Children, which is supported by public and private donations, and whose services are wholly gratuitous, and not limited to any particular form of cruelty, is a "charitable" institution within the meaning of Acts 1896, c. 546, §§ 9, 10, relating to the visitation and inspection by the state board of charities of charitable institutions. People v. New York Soc. for Prevention of Cruelty to Children, 58 N. Y. Supp. 953, 42 App. Div. 83.

The New York Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children, incorporated under Laws 1875, c. 130, for the prevention of cruelty to children, and the enforcement by all lawful means of all laws relating to or in any wise affecting children, is not a "charitable institution" within the meaning of Const. art. 8, §§ 11, 14, conferring on the state board of charities the right of visitation and inspection of all charitable institutions. People v. New York Soc. for Prevention of Cruelty to Children, 55 N. E. 1063, 1064, 161 N. Y. 233.

State prison or penitentiary.

As used in Act March 21, 1895 (Laws 1895, c. 54), providing that any person who shall become a pauper or public charge while at any charitable institution shall be chargeable for support to the county in which he last resided before entering such institute, the term "charitable institution" cannot be construed to include the state prison. New Hampshire Asylum for Insane v. Belknap County, 44 Atl. 928, 69 N. H. 174.

The state penitentiary is a charitable institution within Const. art. 15, § 4, limiting the annual tax levy except for the support of state, educational, and charitable institutions. State v. Laramie County Com'rs, 55 Pac. 451, 456, 8 Wyo. 104.

The state penitentiary is a "charitable institution" within Const. art. 15, § 4, limiting the annual state tax levy except for the support of a state, educational, and charitable institution, the payment of the state debt, and the interest thereon. State v. Laramie County Com'rs, 55 Pac. 451, 8 Wyo. 104, 130.

Temperance.

After quoting definitions of "charity" from the cases of Jackson v. Phillips, 96 Mass. (14 Allen) 539, 556, Vidal v. Girard's Ex'rs, 43 U. S. (2 How.) 127, 11 L. Ed. 205, and Missouri Historical Soc. v. Academy of Science, 94 Mo. 459, 8 S. W. 346, it was held that a gift for the promotion of temperance will be construed charity. Harrington v. Pier, 82 N. W. 345, 357, 105 Wis. 485, 50 L. R. A. 307, 76 Am. St. Rep. 924.

Woman's suffrage.

A bequest to trustees "to be used by them, according to their best judgment, for the attainment of woman suffrage in the United States of America and its territories," is a valid charity. Garrison v. Little, 75 Ill. App. 402, 411.

Young Men's Christian Association.

"Charitable purposes," as used in 3 Gen. St. c. 3320, exempting buildings used for charitable purposes from taxation, means eleemosynary purposes, purposes connected with the distribution of charity, i. e., of aid to the needy, and cannot be construed to apply to the buildings of a Young Men's Christian Association. The word "charitable," like most other words, is capable of different significations. In the law relating to charitable uses it has a very wide meaning, but in this statute it has not so broad a meaning. Trustees of Y. M. C. A. v. City of Paterson, 39 Atl. 655, 61 N. J. Law, 420.

The work done by the Young Men's Christian Association is "charitable," within the meaning of that term as defined in the law. People v. Willis, 52 N. Y. Supp. 739, 23 Misc. Rep. 545.

CHARITY (In Sunday Law).

"Charity," as used in Gen. St. c. 84, §§ 1, 2, prohibiting the doing of any business, labor, or work on Sunday, save what is done from necessity or charity, means everything which proceeds from a sense of moral duty or a feeling of kindness or humanity, and is intended wholly for the purpose of the relief or comfort of another, and not for one's own benefit or pleasure. Doyle v. Lynn & B. R. Co., 118 Mass. 195, 197, 19 Am. Rep. 431.

"Necessity or charity," within the meaning of the exception of a statute making it criminal for the proprietors of carriages to allow any person or persons to travel therein on Sunday, except from necessity or charity, means for the purpose or with a view of contributing to the relief of necessity, or to some office of charity. The letting of a carriage for the conveyance of persons on Sunday, from a belief that it is to be used in a case of necessity or charity, though no such case in fact exists, is not an offense within the prohibition of the statute. Myers v. State, 1 Conn. 502, 506.

Gen. St. Mass. c. 84, § 2, provides that whoever travels on the Lord's Day, except for necessity or charity, shall be punished, etc. Held that, in order to constitute the purpose of travel on the Lord's Day a charity or necessity, the act which is done or which is to be performed by the traveler must be in itself a charitable act, and therefore, where the charitable purpose is made subservient to secular ends, the fact that the travel includes a charitable purpose would not be sufficient to satisfy the provisions of the exception of the act. Bucher v. Cheshire R. Co., 8 Sup. Ct. 974, 976, 125 U. S. 555, 31 L. Ed. 795.

Travelling on Sunday is, prima facie, not a work of charity. Hinckley v. Inhabitants of Penobscot, 42 Me. 89, 92.

Business transactions.

The words "necessity or charity," in the exception to the Sunday law prohibiting traveling on Sunday except for necessity or charity, do not characterize the act of a servant in traveling to see his master to induce the latter to change the servant's hours of work from night to day in order that the servant may sleep better, as the traveling was merely for a matter of secular business. Connolly v. City of Boston, 117 Mass. 64, 65, 19 Am. Rep. 396.

The loaning of money on Sunday is not a work of "charity," within the meaning of that word as used in an exception to a Sunday statute. Meador v. White, 66 Me. 90, 91, 22 Am. Rep. 551.

A creditor drew an order upon his debtor on Sunday. The debtor accepted the order on the same day, and the amount was paid to the debtor by a third person, who took the order, the payment being also made on Sunday. The transaction took place on Sunday in order that the creditor, who was about to leave, might receive his money before going. Held, that the transaction was not a work of "charity" within the exception of a Sunday statute. Mace v. Putnam, 71 Me. 238.

The term "necessity" or "charity," in a statute forbidding travel on Sunday except traveling for charity or necessity, does not characterize traveling in order to conduct negotiations between a creditor and his debtor, nor for every other act done for the purposes of profit or gain. Stanton v. Metropolitan R. Co., 96 Mass. (14 Allen) 485, 486.

Care of poor or sick.

The term "necessity or charity," in a statute prohibiting work, etc., on Sunday, but excepting work of necessity or charity, includes the care of the poor on Sunday by the overseers of the town, and a contract made on such day by the overseers for the relief of a sick pauper is not in violation of the statute. Aldrich v. Inhabitants of Blackstone, 128 Mass. 148, 151.

A person who travels from one town to another on the Lord's Day for the sole purpose of visiting an invalid sister whom he believes to be ill, and another person who drives the former at his request solely for the same purpose, are "traveling from charity," within Pub. St. c. 98, § 3, prohibiting all traveling, other than that from charity, on the Lord's Day. Cronan v. City of Boston, 136 Mass. 384, 385.

The words "necessity or charity," in the exception in the statute prohibiting traveling on Sunday except through necessity or charity, characterize the act of traveling by a mother to obtain medicine for her sick child. Gorman v. City of Lowell, 117 Mass. 65, 66.

Pleasure trips.

Rev. St. § 2000, providing for the punishment of any person found at common labor or engaged in his usual vocation on Sunday, works of "necessity and charity" alone excepted, cannot be construed to include the carrying of persons for their own pleasure solely. Carrying persons for their own pleasure is no business at all, much less is it business of an urgent nature, demanding prompt action. The exception cannot be enlarged so as to include persons who, in pursuing their usual vocation, carry pleasure seekers to and from picnics. Dugan v. State, 25 N. E. 171, 172, 125 Ind. 130, 9 L. R. A. 321.

The exception in a Sunday law prohibiting work on Sunday, except works of "charity or necessity," may properly be said to cover everything which is morally fit and proper, under the particular circumstances of the case, to be done upon the Sabbath. Riding upon Sunday for exercise, and for no other purpose, is not a violation of the statute. "Our own court, in O'Connell v. Lewiston, 65 Me. 34, 20 Am. Rep. 673, and Davidson v. City of Portland, 69 Me. 116, 39 Am. Rep. 253, has held that walking out in the open air upon the Sabbath for exercise is not a violation of the statute. In other jurisdictions, also, it has been held not to be unlawful to ride to a funeral (Horne v. Meakin, 115 Mass. 326); walking to prepare medicine for a sick child (Gorman v. City of Lowell, 117 Mass. 65); riding to visit a sick sister (Cronan v. City of Boston, 136 Mass. 384); traveling to visit a sick friend (Doyle v. Lynn & B. R. Co., 118 Mass. 195, 19 Am. Rep. 431); a servant riding to prepare needful food for her employer (King v. Savage, 121 Mass. 303); a father riding to visit his two boys (McClary v. Town of Lowell, 44 Vt. 116, 8 Am. Rep. 366); walking for exercise (Hamilton v. City of Boston, 96 Mass. [14 Allen] 475; and walking partly for exercise and partly to make a social call." Sullivan v. Maine Cent. R. Co., 19 Atl. 169, 82 Me. 196, 8 L. R. A. 427 (citing Barker v.

City of Worcester, 139 Mass. 74, 29 N. E. 474).

"Charity," as used in Comp. Laws, § 1984, providing that no person shall keep his shop, warehouse, or workshop open on Sunday, or do any manner of labor, business, or work, except only works of necessity and charity, on such day, should be construed to include the raising of money for the purchase of a house of worship, and the solicitation of contributions from the congregation, assembled on Sunday for religious worship, in order to pay for a house of worship which had been erected for their occupation for religious purposes. "Charity is active goodness; it is doing good to our fellowmen. It is fostering those institutions that are established to relieve pain, to prevent suffering, and to do good to mankind in general, or to any class or portion of mankind. As the term 'charity' is made use of in our law, it no doubt takes shades of meaning from the Christian religion which has largely affected the great body of our laws, and to which we must trace the laws which furnish what the Christian regards as the desecration of the first day of the week. It was never doubted that all the necessary or usual work connected with religious worship was work of charity. The work of the minister who preaches, the organist and precentor who furnish the music, and the sexton who cares for the building on Sunday, is in the very highest sense 'charitable.' Religious societies are formed to do good to mankind. The support of public worship is a work of 'charity' within the meaning of the statute. Such an act does not pertain to religious worship, but is a means by which religious worship is supported." Allen v. Duffie, 1 N. W. 427, 429, 43 Mich. 1, 38 Am. Rep. 159 (definition quoted and approved in First M. E. Church v. Donnell, 81 N. W. 171, 110 Iowa, 5, 46 L. R. A. 858).

"Charity," as used in Act April 22, 1794, providing a penalty for any person doing or performing any worldly employment or business whatsoever on the Lord's Day, commonly called "Sunday," works of necessity and "charity" only excepted, should be construed to include the raising of money to build a house of worship, or the solicitation of contributions for that purpose from a congregation assembled on Sunday for religious worship. "Charity is active goodness. The means which long-established common usage of religious congregations show to be reasonably necessary to advance the cause of religion may be deemed works of charity. It is not essential that they be purely charitable. It is sufficient if they so far partake of that character as to be recognized by the congregation as part of its active goodness and are not expressly forbidden by the statute. The support of religious societies is a charity. It is a giving for the love of God, or the love of a neighbor, in a broad, catholic sense. Whatever is merely fit and proper to be done on Sunday in furtherance of the great object is likewise a charity." Dale v. Knepp, 98 Pa. 389, 391, 38 Am. Rep. 165, note, 42 Am. Rep. 624.

Shaving.

The word "charity" does not characterize the work of a barber in shaving his customers on Sunday, and therefore he is not within the exception of a statute prohibiting work on Sunday, but excepting works of charity or necessity. State v. Frederick, 45 Ark. 347, 348, 55 Am. Rep. 555.

Where an old man has been injured so that he cannot well shave himself, the act of another in shaving him at his own house on Sunday is not in violation of a statute prohibiting the doing of any manner of labor, business, or work, except works of charity and necessity, on the Lord's Day. Stone v. Graves, 13 N. E. 906, 145 Mass. 353.

CHARIVARI.

Webster defines "charivari" as a mock serenade of discordant noises. Worcester defines "charivari" as a vile or noisy music made with horns, bells, kettles, pans, etc., in derision of some person or event; a mock serenade. The Supreme Court in Wisconsin, in Higgins v. Minaghan, 78 Wis. 602, 47 N. W. 941, 11 L. R. A. 138, 23 Am. St. Rep. 428, says: "A charivari is an unlawful and riotous assembly, wholly indefensible in law and morals, and reprobated by every well-disposed person." Gilmore v. Fuller, 198 Ill. 130, 132, 65 N. E. 84, 60 L. R. A. 286. "It was first directed against widows who married a second time at an advanced age, but is now extended to other occasions of nocturnal annoyance." Bankus v. State, 4 Ind. 114, 116.

"Chart," as used in 4 Stat. 436, providing that charts and certain other articles may be made the subject of copyright, means some form of map. Ehret v. Pierce (U. S.) 10 Fed. 553, 554.

"Chart," as used in Rev. St. U. S. § 4965 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3414], and 1 Stat. 124, refers to charts of the class of maps, and does not include tables of figures or methodically arranged information. As the word was originally used in the copyright act of 1790, it meant a marine map. Sheets of paper exhibiting tabulated or methodically arranged information came to be called "charts," so that a definition of "chart" covering them was put in an edition of Worcester's Dictionary in 1864, and in Webster's Dictionary in 1865. In the construction of a penal statute, however, the word must be understood in its strictest sense, as including only drawings of the nature of a map. Taylor v. Gilman (U. S.) 24 Fed. 632, 634.

CHARTER.

See "Private Charter."

A charter is a legislative grant, and in case of doubt is to be construed most strongly against the grantee, but not against the state. Starkweather & Shepley v. Brown (R. I.) 55 Atl. 201, 203.

The word "chartered," as used in the statement that a steamer belonging to a corporation was chartered to certain parties, means hired. White v. Norfolk & S. Ry. Co., 20 S. E. 191, 115 N. C. 631, 44 Am. St. Rep. 489.

An insurance upon a charter is an insurance of the risk of losing the freight to be carried under the charter. Ocean Ins. Co. v. Sun Mut. Ins. Co. (U. S.) 18 Fed. Cas. 540, 546.

As law.

The charter of a private corporation enacted by the Legislature of another state is a law, within the meaning of Code Proc. § 426, which declares that printed copies in volumes of statute codes or other written law of other states shall be admissible in evidence in courts of this state. Persse & Brooks Paper Works v. Willett (N. Y.) 19 Abb. Prac. 416.

Of corporation.

As contract, see "Contract."

As public act, see "Public Act or Statute."

The word "charter," when used in a statute, may include the articles of agreement by which a corporation is formed under the general laws. Pub. St. N. H. 1901, p. 63, c. 2, § 10.

A corporate charter is in the nature of a commission from the state to its citizens and their successors in interest, whether at home or abroad. Each government, in the exercise of its own discretion, determines the conditions of its grant, being free to impose or omit territorial restrictions. It cannot enlarge its own jurisdiction, but it can confer general powers to be exercised within its bounds, or beyond them, wherever the comity of nations is respected. For the purposes of commerce such a commission is revered like a government flag, as a symbol of allegiance and authority, entitled to recognition abroad until it forfeits recognition at home. Merrick v. Van Santvoord, 34 N. Y. 208, 214.

The charter of a corporation is the law by which it is created, together with the articles of association adopted in pursuance thereof. It may be either a special act of the Legislature enacted for the purpose of creating the corporation, or general laws enacted for the organization of all corporations, intended to be sufficiently broad to authorize them to exercise necessary powers. The charter of a corporation is also sometimes called the "constituting instrument," and it defines and limits the powers and rights of the corporation as such. Attorney General v. Perkins, 41 N. W. 426, 431, 73 Mich. 303.

The charter of a corporation formed under a general law consists of its articles of association and the law under which it is organized. State v. Anderson, 67 N. E. 207, 210, 31 Ind. App. 34 (citing Bent v. Underdown, 156 Ind. 516, 60 N. E. 307).

"Every charter of a private corporation is a contract, first, between the state and the corporation, to which each is solemnly bound—the state that it will not impair the obligation, the corporation that it will perform the objects of its incorporation and keep within the powers granted to it; secondly, between the stockholders themselves. The stockholders are bound to consent to the management of the affairs of the corporation by the majority, and by the by-laws which that majority makes. And the whole, on the other hand, agree with each other that they will apply the funds of the company to the objects and purposes of the charter, and not otherwise." Central R. Co. v. Collins, 40 Ga. 582, 624.

Corporation charters are in many respects compacts between the government and the corporators, and, as the former cannot deprive the latter of their franchises in violation of a compact, so the latter cannot put an end to the compact without the assent of the former. It is equally obligatory on both parties. The surrender of a charter can only be made by some formal, solemn act of the corporation, and will be of no avail until accepted by the government. Economy Building & Loan Ass'n v. Paris Ice Mfg. Co. (Ky.) 68 S. W. 21, 23; Boston Glass Manufactory v. Langdon, 41 Mass. (24 Pick.) 49, 53, 35 Am. Dec. 292.

A charter of a corporation is a contract to the validity of which the consent of both the corporation and the state is essential, and hence it cannot be altered or added to without such consent. Dartmouth College v. Woodward, 17 U. S. (4 Wheat.) 518, 603, 4 L. Ed. 629.

The charter of a corporation is a contract made by the state with the corporators, and as such it is protected in all the privileges granted it by the Constitution of the United States. Alabama & F. R. Co. v. Burkett, 46 Ala. 569, 578.

A charter is not simply an executed grant, but a continuing contract. There is a duty of performance by the recipients of the grant which continues during the life of the charter. Long Island Water Supply Co. v. City of Brooklyn, 17 Sup. Ct. 718, 722, 166 U. S. 685, 41 L. Ed. 1165.

A charter is a contract between the corporation and the sovereign, so that none but the parties and their privies can take advantage of a breach of a condition therein. Farrington v. Putnam, 37 Atl. 652, 657, 90 Me. 405, 38 L. R. A. 339 (citing Trustees of Davidson College v. Chamber's Ex'rs, 56 N. C. 253).

The term "charter," as applied to corporations, means a grant made by sovereign authority, either to the whole people or to a portion of them, securing to them the enjoyment of certain rights. Every grant or franchise is a charter. It may be a grant of the mere franchise of being a corporation, or a grant of powers to a corporation already in existence. In either case the grant is the company's charter to exercise the rights and privileges and enjoy the immunities granted. Morris & E. R. Co. v. Commissioner of Railroad Taxation, 37 N. J. Law (8 Vroom) 228, 237.

The word "charter," as used in the charter of the Memphis & Little Rock Railroad Company authorizing the company to mortgage its charter, means the franchises of the corporation, in the sense of the right to own and operate the road, take tolls, and carry on its business. Memphis & L. R. R. Co. v. Berry, 41 Ark. 436, 443.

"Charter," as used in Const. art. 16, § 1, declaring that all existing charters or grants of special or exclusive privileges, under which a bona fide organization shall not have taken place and business been commenced in good faith, shall thereafter have no validity, is synonymous with the words, "grants of exclusive or special privileges," immediately following it. Appeal of Lehigh Water Co. 102 Pa. 515, 517.

The charter of a mutual benefit association is the foundation of authority for the corporation. Supreme Council O. K. A. v. Densford (Ky.) 56 S. W. 172, 174, 49 L. R. A. 776.

In the rule of law that the charter alone of a corporation is recognized in another state by comity, the word "charter" signifies an agreement between the shareholders of the corporation, whether this agreement be contained in a special act of Legislature, or in articles of association, or in either of these taken in connection with certain general laws of the state. Floyd v. National Loan & Investment Co., 38 S. E. 653, 661, 49 W. Va. 327, 54 L. R. A. 536, 87 Am. St. Rep. 805.

The words "charter accepted," in the usual meaning, signify, under our system of government, a special act of the Legislature, offering corporate existence and franchise to designated individuals, who thereupon accept the offer, and corporations organized under general laws do not come within its meaning; the document under which they are formed being called "articles of association," "articles of incorporation," "certificate of organization," "certificate of incorporation," and such instruments would not be called a "charter accepted." Trenton St. Ry. Co. v. United New Jersey R. & Canal Co., (N. J.) 46 Atl. 763, 764, 60 N. J. Eq. 500.

Of municipal corporation.

As contract, see "Contract."

As statute, see "Statute."

The "charter of a municipal corporation" is a delegation of powers to its governing authority by the legislative branch of the government, and no powers will be presumed to have been granted that are not mentioned or not necessarily included in a general grant of power. Certainly a power that the Legislature itself cannot exercise will not be presumed to be granted to a municipal corporation. Board of Council v. Renfro (Ky.) 58 S. W. 795, 796, 51 L. R. A. 897.

The "charter of a municipal corporation" is not a contract, within the meaning of the constitutional inhibition of laws impairing the obligation of contracts; and where there is no constitutional restriction, either express or implied, upon the action of the Legislature, it has absolute control to create, change, modify, or destroy such corporations at pleasure. State v. Barker, 89 N. W. 204, 206, 116 Iowa, 96, 57 L. R. A. 244, 93 Am. St. Rep. 222.

The charter of a public or municipal corporation is not a contract between the corporation and the state, nor between the corporators themselves. The effect of an act of the Legislature incorporating a municipality is to invest the government authorities of the municipality—either a majority of the voters, or such officers as are prescribed—with the power of local government over the inhabitants of that district. Such an act, strictly speaking, confers powers which did not exist before. The governing authorities possess no powers or faculties not conferred upon them either expressly or by fair implication by the law which creates them or by other statutes applicable to them. Goodwin v. Town of East Hartford, 38 Atl. 876, 884, 70 Conn. 18 (citing Dill. Mun. Corp. § 21; Coler v. City of Cleburne, 131 U. S. 162, 9 Sup. Ct. 720, 33 L. Ed. 146).

The charter of a municipal corporation consists of the creative act and of laws relating to the corporation, whether in defining its powers or regulating their mode of exercise. People v. Briggs, 50 N. Y. 553, 559.

The word "charter," as used in Sp. Laws 1891, c. 6, § 1, may be defined "as the enabling acts under which a municipal corporation exercises its privileges and performs its duties and obligations, including all matters in which the municipality has a direct interest, and the right to regulate and control." These acts must necessarily include all laws relating to the material affairs and direct interests of the municipality. State v. Ehrmantraut, 65 N. W. 251, 253, 63 Minn. 104.

It is laid down in the authorities that the charter of a city bears the same general relation to the ordinances of a city that the constitution of a state bears to its statutes. 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. (4th Ed.) p. 335, § 308, and notes; Quintette v. City of St. Louis, 76 Mo. 402. Hence a city ordinance which does not comply with the city charter is as invalid as a statute which does not conform to the requirements of the state constitution. People v. Mount, 58 N. E. 360, 363, 186 Ill. 560.

The expression "charter and law," as used in a city charter forbidding the improvement and repair by the city of streets not acquired according to the provisions of the charter and law, comprehends both statutory and common law, so that the provision is not equivalent to forbidding the city to acquire control of streets otherwise than in the statutory way. McGinnis v. City of St. Louis, 57 S. W. 755, 757, 157 Mo. 191.

CHARTER PARTY.

As a maritime contract, see "Maritime Contract."

As conveyance, see "Conveyance."

The contract by which a ship is let is termed a "charter party." Civ. Code S. D. 1903, § 1446.

The contract by which a ship is let is termed a "charter party." By it the owner may either let the capacity or burden of the ship, continuing the employment of the owner's master, crew, and equipments, or may surrender the entire ship to the charterer, who then provides them himself. The master or a part owner may be a charterer. Civ. Code Cal. 1903, § 1959; Civ. Code Mont. 1895, § 2644.

A "charter party" is defined to be an agreement by indenture whereby the owners of a ship and the freighters covenant with each other that such a ship shall take in such a lading and carry the same to such a place in consideration of a certain sum by the freighter. Ashley v. Cornwell (Va.) 2 Munf. 268, 270.

A charter party is a contract in writing by which an entire ship, or some principal part thereof, is let for the specified purpose of the charterer during a specified term, or for a specified voyage, in consideration of a certain sum of money per month, or per ton, or both, or for the whole period or adventure described. Controversies arising upon charter parties are cognizable in admiralty, because they are maritime contracts. The Harvey and Henry (U. S.) 86 Fed. 656, 30 C. C. A. 330.

A charter party is a specific contract by which the owners of a vessel let the entire vessel or some principal part thereof to another person, to be used by the latter in transportation for his own account, either under their charge or his. The charter party must provide and express that the charterer hired the whole ship, and took it absolutely into his own possession, and manned, equipped, furnished, and controlled her during a certain period or for a certain voyage. In accordance with such definition, a charter party is often called a "mercantile lease." The New York (U. S.) 93 Fed. 495, 497.

A "charter party" is defined to be a contract by which an entire ship, or some principal part thereof, is let to a merchant for the conveyance of goods on a determined voyage to one or more places. The Erie (U. S.) 8 Fed. Cas. 757, 758; Vanderwater v. Mills, 60 U. S. (19 How.) 82, 91, 15 L. Ed. 554; Ward v. Thompson, 63 U. S. (22 How.) 330, 333, 16 L. Ed. 249; Wilson v. Morgan, 27 N. Y. Super. Ct. (4 Rob.) 58, 67. Thus, where there was no letting or hiring of a ship for a given voyage to be employed by the hirer for his own profit, but the owners contributed the vessel to be put into a line for freight and passengers, and the hirer contributed the good will of an established line, together with his care, skill, and experience, the receipts of the boat to be applied to expenses, insurance, a certain sum to the owners, and a certain sum to the hirer, and the balance to be equally divided, there was no charter party between the owners and the hirer. Ward v. Thompson, 63 U. S. (22 How.) 330, 333, 16 L. Ed. 249. So, also, an agreement that passengers and freight carried by one vessel to a certain place should be turned over to another to be transported still further, the passage money and freight to be divided between them, was not a charter party. Vandewater v. Mills, 60 U. S. (19 How.) 82, 91, 15 L. Ed. 554.

A charter party is the hiring of the whole or a part of a vessel for the transportation of merchandise or passengers; and if it does not, ex vi termini, convey a proprietary interest, it certainly does pass a claim or interest in the vessel, recognized by the maritime law, the privilege to look on her as answerable for the goods placed on board. In charter parties there is a mutuality of lien. The ship is answerable to the goods, and these again to the ship. Vandewater v. The Yankee Blade (U. S.) 28 Fed. Cas. 980, 981.

A charter party is a contract by which the owner lets his vessel to another for freight. It is a special contract, whereby compensation is stipulated for a service to be performed, and is not an account concerning trade or merchandise. Spring v. Gray, 31 U. S. (6 Pet.) 151, 163, 8 L. Ed. 352.

A charter party is a mere hiring of a vessel, and hence cannot be an element of loss where the vessel has suffered a total loss in a collision. The Hamilton (U. S.) 95 Fed. 844.

As demise or affreightment.

A "charter party" is not a demise of the ship itself as contradistinguished from a right to have goods carried by the vessel, but is a mere affreightment, sounding in covenant. The George Dumois (U. S.) 88 Fed. 537, 540.

A "charter party," in order to amount to a demise of the entire ship and clothe the charterer with all the rights and liabilities of owners, must therefore give the possession of the ship as well as a right to the profits of her employment. The general rule is that, although he lets the whole capacity of the ship, that if he appoints the master and crew it is not a demise of the ship, but a contract of affreightment. The Erie (U. S.) 8 Fed. Cas. 757, 758.

A "charter party" is of two kinds: One is where the owner agrees to carry a cargo, which the charterer agrees to provide; the second is where there is an entire surrender by the owner of the vessel to the charterer, who hires the vessel as one hires a house, takes her empty, and provides the officers and provisions, and, in short, the entire outfit. In such a contract the charter is substituted in place of the owner, and becomes the owner for the voyage. Fish v. Sullivan, 3 South. 730, 732, 40 La. Ann. 193.

"There are two kinds of contracts passing under the general name of 'charter party,' differing from each other very widely in their nature, their provisions, and in their legal effects. In one the owner lets the use of his ship to freight, he himself retaining the legal possession, and being liable to all the responsibilities of owner. The master is his agent, and the mariners are in his employment, and he is answerable for their conduct. The charterer obtains no right of control over the vessel, but the owner is in fact and in contemplation of law the carrier of whatever goods are conveyed in his ship. The charter party is a mere covenant for the transportation of merchandise or the performance of the service which is stipulated in it. In the other, the vessel is herself let to hire, and the charterer takes her into his own possession. It is a contract for the lease of the vessel. The owner parts with possession and the right of possession, and the hirer has not only the use, but the entire control, of the vessel herself. He becomes the owner during the term of the contract. He appoints the master and mariners, and is responsible for their acts. If goods are taken on freight, the freight is due to him, and if, by the barratry or other misconduct of the master or crew, the shippers suffer a loss, he must answer for it. If he ships his own goods, he is his own carrier. Under a charter party of the former description the charterer may hire the use of the whole vessel, and it may be employed in carrying his own goods or the goods of other merchants on freight. His own goods become liable to the owner of the vessel for the charter, to the full extent of their value, and, though he is entitled to the freight of the goods shipped by the subfreighters, the owner of the ship has a lien on that freight for the charter of the vessel, and his lien extends to the goods of each subfreighter for the amount of freight due on his shipment. This was the decision in the case of Paul v. Birch, 2 Atk. 621, and it has ever since been held to be law. Holt, Shipp. 471. It is so recognized in Christie v. Lewis, 2 Brod. & B. 410, and in Faith v. East India Co., 4 Barn. & Ald. 630. In a charter party of the second kind, not only the entire capacity of the ship is let, but the ship itself, and the possession is passed to the charterer. The entire control and management of it is given up to him. The general owner loses his lien for freight, but the lien itself is not destroyed; the charterer is substituted in his place, in whose favor the lien continues to exist when goods are taken on freight. But the general owner has no remedy for the charter of his vessel, but his personal action on the covenants of the charter party. It is a contract in which he trusts to the personal credit of the charterer." Drinkwater v. The Spartan (U. S.) 7 Fed. Cas. 1085, 1088.

CHARTER RIGHTS.

The "charter rights, privileges, and franchises of every kind," within the meaning of a conveyance by a railroad company of all and singular the charter rights, privileges, and franchises of every kind belonging to the grantor, do not include land grants which are not directly connected with the operation of the road. Shirley v. Waco Tap R. Co., 10 S. W. 543, 551, 78 Tex. 131.

CHARTERER.

Within Rev. St. art. 2899, rendering a charterer or hirer of any railroad, steamboat, etc., liable for death caused by negligence, a charterer is one who by contract acquires the right to use a vessel or road belonging to another, and does not include a receiver. The word "charterer" applies to persons who in their own rights are entitled to possess, use, and have the benefits resulting from the use of the thing chartered, and those rights must be acquired by contract with persons having such dominion over the thing chartered as enables them to confer on the charterer the right to use the thing chartered and have the benefits resulting therefrom. The ordinary meaning of the word "charterer" is that no person can hold that relation to property unless he has a personal interest in or right to it. A charterer is one in possession in his own right, while a receiver is an officer of the court that appoints him, and at all times he is the agency of the court, subject to its orders, and having no personal interest in the property in his hands resulting from the existence of the receivership. Turner v. Cross, 18 S. W. 578, 579, 83 Tex. 218, 15 L. R. A. 262, 263. See, also, Houston & T. C. Ry. Co. v. Roberts (Tex.) 19 S. W. 512; Yoakum v. Selph, 19 S. W. 145, 83 Tex. 607; Bonner v. Thomas (Tex.) 20 S. W. 722.

CHASTE.

"Chaste" is defined by Webster as meaning "pure from all unlawful commerce of the sexes." Applied to persons before marriage, it signifies pure from all sexual intercourse, undefiled; and as applied to married persons it means true to the marriage bed. State v. Carron, 18 Iowa, 273, 275, 87 Am. Dec. 401.

A girl of 15, who has led a virtuous life for six or seven years, is, notwithstanding possible unchastity before that time, a girl "theretofore chaste," within Laws Mich. 1887, No. 143, declaring a penalty against any one who shall carnally know a girl of the age of 14 "theretofore chaste." People v. Mills, 54 N. W. 488, 94 Mich. 630.

CHASTE CHARACTER.

See "Previous Chaste Character."

The expression "chaste character," as used in the laws providing for the punishment of any one guilty of seducing an unmarried woman of previous chaste character, means actual personal virtue, and not reputation. Kenyon v. People, 26 N. Y. 203, 207, 84 Am. Dec. 177; People v. Kenyon (N. Y.) 5 Parker, Cr. R. 254, 285; Carpenter v. People (N. Y.) 8 Barb. 603, 609; Crozier v. People (N. Y.) 1 Parker, Cr. R. 453, 457. See, also, State v. Shean, 32 Iowa, 88, 92; State v. Carron, 18 Iowa, 372, 374, 87 Am. Dec. 401; People v. Clark, 33 Mich. 112, 118; People v. Mills, 54 N. W. 488, 491, 94 Mich. 630. By the term "chaste character" the Legislature could only have meant personal qualities that make up the real character, and not public reputation, which is the estimated character formed by the public. Kenyon v. People, 26 N. Y. 203, 207, 84 Am. Dec. 177. The fact that a female was known as a person of chaste character and reputation at the time of the abduction was not sufficient, where it appeared on the trial that she was not in fact a person of chaste character. Carpenter v. People (N. Y.) 8 Barb. 603, 608. There is a distinction between actual personal virtue and good repute for chastity. The former may be preserved, while the latter is impaired by indiscreet conduct, and it does not necessarily follow that they are co-extensive. Zabriskie v. State, 43 N. J. Law (14 Vroom) 640, 645, 39 Am. Rep. 610.

The words "chaste character," in section 2586 of the Code, which provides for the punishment of any person who shall seduce and debauch an unmarried woman of previously chaste character, are not limited to the chastity of person, but extend to the mind and sentiments of the person seduced. Boak v. State, 5 Iowa, 430, 431.

"Chaste character," as used in the statute relating to the punishment of seduction under promise of marriage of a female of previous chaste character (Pen. Code, § 284), means actual personal virtue; and a woman who has voluntarily submitted to sexual intercourse prior to the alleged seduction is not within the statute, though she was at the time under the age of consent. People v. Nelson, 46 N. E. 1040, 1042, 153 N. Y. 90, 60 Am. St. Rep. 592.

Although a female may, from ignorance or other causes, have so low a standard of propriety as to commit or permit indelicate acts or familiarities, yet if she have enough of the sense of virtue that she would not surrender her person, unless seduced to do so under a promise of marriage, she cannot be said to be a woman of unchaste character. State v. Brinkhaus, 34 Minn. 285, 25 N. W. 642.

As including reformed woman.

A statute punishing the seduction of a female of "previous chaste character" means actual personal virtue; but if a female had previously fallen from virtue, but had subsequently reformed and become chaste, she is within the meaning of the statute. People v. Mills, 54 N. W. 488, 491, 94 Mich. 630.

Though a woman has fallen, yet if at the time of the seduction she is reformed, she is of "chaste character." The legal signification of "chaste," or "chaste character," is not the same as its usual or ordinary meaning. Webster defines "chaste" as meaning "one pure from all unlawful commerce of sexes. Applied to persons before marriage, it signifies pure from all sexual commerce, undefiled; applied to married persons, true to the marriage bed." State v. Carron, 18 Iowa, 372, 374, 87 Am. Dec. 401.

CHASTITY.

Chastity, in law, relates to the question whether a woman has improper sexual relations with a man or not, and, in case of an unmarried woman, whether she has had sexual intercourse with any man. People v. Brown, 24 N. Y. Supp. 1111, 1116, 71 Hun, 601.

"Chastity," as used in prosecutions for seduction, means, in case of an unmarried female, simply that she is virgo intacta; and, though one woman may permit familiarities, liberties, or even indecencies at the thought of which another woman would blush, so long as that woman has not surrendered her virtue, she is not put without the pale of the law. People v. Kehoe, 55 Pac. 911, 912, 123 Cal. 224, 69 Am. St. Rep. 52 (citing Crozler v. People (N. Y.) 1 Parker, Cr. R. 453, 455).

CHATTEL.

See "Incorporeal Chattel."

All other chattel property, see "All Other."

Any chattels, see "Any."

Goods and chattels, see "Goods."

2 Bl. Comm. 385, says "that things personal by our law not only include things movable, but also something more, the whole of which is comprehended under the general name of 'chattels,' which Sir Edward Coke says is a French word signifying 'goods.' In the grand coutumier of Normandy," he observed, "a chattel is described as a mere movable, but at the same time set in opposition to a fief or feud, so that not only goods, but whatever was not a feud, were accounted chattels, and it is in this larger and more extended sense that our law adopts it; the idea of goods or movables only being not sufficiently comprehensive to take in everything the law considers a chattel interest." People v. Holbrook (N. Y.) 13 Johns. 90, 94; Dowdel v. Hamm (Pa.) 2 Watts, 61, 64.

"There is no term broader than 'chattel.' It includes all kinds of property, except the freehold and things which are parcel of it." People v. Maloney (N. Y.) 1 Parker, Cr. R. 593, 595; Commonwealth v. Hazlewood, 2 S. W. 489, 490, 84 Ky. 681; International & Life Assur. Co. v. Haight, 35 N. J. Law (6 Vroom) 279, 282; In re Gay's Gold, 80 U. S. (13 Wall.) 358, 362, 20 L. Ed. 606; State v. Harvey, 32 S. W. 1110, 1112, 131 Mo. 339; Hawkins v. State Loan & Trust Co. (U. S.) 79 Fed. 50, 51; Fling v. Goodall, 40 N. H. 208, 215.

"How extensively the meaning of the words 'goods and chattels' is to be understood in any instance must depend on the subject-matter and the context. 'Goods' may include everything but what descends to heirs. 'Choses in action' may pass by that name. The term 'goods and chattels' will cover more than any possible or practicable enumeration of articles." Gibbs v. Usher (U. S.) 10 Fed. Cas. 303, 304.

"Chattels" include all personal property, the title to which is evidenced by possession. Hornblower v. Proud, 2 Barn. & Ald. 327, 335.

"Chattel" is a very comprehensive term and includes every species of property which is not real estate or a freehold. State v. Bartlett, 55 Me. 200, 211 (citing Burrill, Law Dict.).

The term "chattels" includes living things, as slaves, horses, cattle, hogs, etc. Vaughan v. Town of Murfreesboro, 2 S. E. 676, 677, 96 N. C. 317, 60 Am. Rep. 413.

"Chattels" include any movable property or goods, as furniture, money, horses, etc. State v. Bartlett, 55 Me. 200, 211 (citing Worcester, Dict.).

The term "chattels" includes goods and chattels. Laws N. Y. 1892, c. 677, § 4.

"Goods, wares, and merchandise" means all movable property that is ordinarily bought and sold, while "chattels" is a more comprehensive term, and includes animate property. Smith v. Wilcox, 24 N. Y. 353, 358, 82 Am. Dec. 302.

The words "goods, wares, chattels, implements, fixtures, tools, and other personal property," in a chattel mortgage so describing the mortgaged property, is insufficient in failing to identify any particular property so that it can be known as to what it is intended to apply. Buskirk v. Cleveland (N. Y.) 41 Barb. 610, 611.

The word "goods," in a statute relative to the recording of mortgages of negroes, goods, and chattels, means evidently what is usually understood by goods, wares, and merchandise. The term would not embrace horses, cattle, plate, household furniture, and the like, with sufficient clearness. Ex parte Leland (S. C.) 1 Nott & McC. 460, 462.

"The words 'goods and chattels' are the most comprehensive terms of description for passing personal property by will, yet they may be restricted by the context." Foxall v. McKenney (U. S.) 9 Fed. Cas. 645, 646.

"Chattels," as used in a will wherein testator devised all his household goods, furniture, provisions, and other goods and chattels to his wife, did not refer only to such as were in the house at the time of his death, but included those situated in various outbuildings on the home place. Blackmer's Ex'r v. Blackmer, 22 Atl. 600, 602, 63 Vt. 236.

"Chattels," as words of description in a bequest, will pass all the personal estate, but, where used after the word "furniture," restricts the articles to the same kind as mentioned; that is, articles of furniture. Stuart v. Marquis of Bute, 11 Ves. 656, 665.

"The words 'goods and chattels' at common law include all personal property in possession, and if unrestrained in a will they will pass all personal property." State v. Brown, 68 Tenn. (9 Baxt.) 53, 54, 40 Am. Rep. 81.

In a will giving a wife all of testator's estate for life, without power to dispose of the profits, and any of the goods and chattels, the term "goods and chattels" will not be held to include therein any property which by the language of another clause it has been provided shall constitute part of the funds from which a legacy is to be paid. Brady v. Brady, 28 Atl. 515, 517, 78 Md. 461.

"Chattels," as used in statutes defining larceny, are to be understood as meaning such goods and chattels as were esteemed at the common law to be the subjects of larceny. State v. Lymus, 26 Ohio St. 400, 401, 20 Am. Rep. 772.

Accounts.

"Chattels" are articles of personal property which are capable of delivery, and hence, as used in How. Ann. St. § 6193, declaring that every mortgage or conveyance of goods and chattels, not accompanied by immediate delivery, etc., should be void, unless filed in the office of the clerk of the township where the mortgagor resides, etc., did not include a mortgage or transfer of accounts as security, there being no way in which an account may be delivered, it being a thing having no tangible entity, and exists only as an incorporeal right. Preston Nat. Bank v. George T. Smith Middlings Purifier Co., 47 N. W. 502, 506, 84 Mich. 364.

Advancements.

The term "goods and chattels," used in reference to the goods and chattels as to which a decedent dies intestate, does not include advancements made by the decedent to his children in his lifetime. Knight v. Oliver (Va.) 12 Grat. 33, 37.

Bank bills.

The term "chattels," as used in an indictment for stealing bank notes, alleging that they were the goods and chattels of a certain person, denotes and signifies property and ownership, and includes notes or instruments in writing. People v. Holbrook (N. Y.) 13 Johns. 90.

The word "chattels" is so comprehensive that it may include bank bills. Citizens' Bank v. Nantucket Steamboat Company (U. S.) 5 Fed. Cas. 719, 731. See, also, Garfield v. State, 74 Ind. 60, 65.

The term "chattels," as used in Rev. St. p. 279, § 72, making it a misdemeanor to receive stolen goods or chattels, cannot be construed to include bank notes. State v. Calvin, 22 N. J. Law (2 Zab.) 207.

Bank bills, though strictly within the terms "goods and chattels," are not in common parlance included in the phrase "goods and chattels," when used in connection with insurance companies and transportation by land or water. Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Thompson, 19 Ill. (9 Peck) 578, 584.

Bonds and other securities.

"Chattels," as used in Rev. St. p. 174, § 2, providing that, where any testator or intestate shall have in his lifetime taken or carried away or converted to his own use the goods or chattels of any person, such person could maintain the same action against the executors and administrators of such testator or intestate as he could have maintained against such testator or intestate, should be construed to include bonds and other documentary securities, for they are bona notabilia, and therefore property, though there is a distinction between "rights and credits" and "goods and chattels." Terhune v. Bray's Ex'rs, 16 N. J. Law (1 Har.) 53, 54.

Chattels personal only.

1 N. R. L. 393, providing that, whenever judgment shall be given by a justice of the peace, an execution may be granted commanding the collection thereof from the "goods and chattels" of the person against whom it is granted, is to be construed as only meaning chattels personal, and as not including chattels real. Putnam v. Westcott (N. Y.) 19 Johns. 73, 76.

In construing the term "chattels," in a statute relative to the recording of mortgages of negroes, goods, or chattels, as not including chattels real, the court said that the word "chattels" is "so extensive that it may often mean chattels real or leasehold estates. But it is a sound rule of interpretation that when an author makes use, first, of terms, each evidently confined and limited to a particular class of a known species of things, and then, after such specific enumeration, subjoins a term of very extensive signification, this term, however general and comprehensive in its possible import, yet, when thus used, embraces only things ejusdem generis; that is, of the same kind or species with those comprehended by the preceding limited and confined terms. In a word, the last is restricted to the subject-matter of the preceding terms. Now the terms 'negroes' and 'goods' are each confined to a known class of strictly personal estate; and the term 'chattels,' following them immediately, means 'chattels ejusdem generis'; that is, personal chattels." Ex parte Leland (S. C.) 1 Nott & McC. 460, 462.

Chose in action or debt.

A debt or chose in action is included within the term "chattels." Dowdel v. Hamm (Pa.) 2 Watts, 61, 64. See, also, Gibbs v. Usher (U. S.) Fed. Cas. No. 5,387; Terhune v. Bray's Ex'rs, 16 N. J. Law (1 Har.) 53, 54.

"Chattels," as used in Code 1873, p. 897, §§ 4, 5, 6, requiring every contract in writing made in respect to real estate or goods and chattels in consideration of marriage to be in writing and to be recorded, means "such property and such goods and chattels as are visible, tangible, or movable." It does not include a mere chose in action. Kirkland v. Brune (Va.) 31 Grat. 126, 131. See, also, Tingle v. Fisher, 20 W. Va. 497, 511.

Mere choses in action, such as notes or demands placed in another's hands for collection, are not chattel property, and therefore Laws 1869, c. 738, designed to afford means of realizing payment upon possessory liens, but which was so drawn as to apply only to liens "upon any chattel property," did not apply to an attorney's retaining lien upon papers, deeds, vouchers, etc., in his possession. In re Wilson (U. S.) 12 Fed. 235, 238. See, also, Tingle v. Fisher, 20 W. Va. 497, 511; Kirkland v. Brune (Va.) 31 Grat. 126, 131.

In construing a statute providing that persons garnished are required to appear and answer such interrogatories as shall be propounded touching goods, chattels, rights, and credits of the judgment debtor, the courts say that it would seem that the words here used, particularly "rights and credits" concerning which such garnishee must make disclosures, are sufficiently comprehensive to include the right of redemption in mortgaged or pledged personal property. Burnham v. Doolittle, 15 N. W. 606, 608, 14 Neb. 214.

The word "chattels," as used in a bequest of "my home place, with my household furniture and all my personal goods and chattels on said premises at the time of my decease," is restricted by the words "household furniture" to property of the same kind, and does not include promissory notes and cash on the premises at the time of the testator's decease, there being a residuary clause conveying the residue for another purpose. Peaslee v. Fletcher's Estate, 14 Atl. 1, 60 Vt. 188, 6 Am. St. Rep. 103.

An action by a receiver of an insolvent bank, in which it is alleged that the defendant to whom negotiable papers were sent by the bank for collection appropriated the proceeds thereof, and refused to pay the same over on demand, is an action for the conversion of a chattel. Hawkins v. State Loan & Trust Co. (U. S.) 79 Fed. 50, 51.

A claim to land under a certificate of location is not a chattel, but is an incorporeal hereditament, fulfilling Blackstone's definition thereof as "a right issuing out of a thing corporate, whether real or personal." The claim to land, until perfected by location and patent, was simply a right granted by the United States to receive so many acres of land—a mere equity. Walker v. Daly, 49 N. W. 812, 813, 80 Wis. 222.

Rev. St. Tex. 1895, art. 2546, providing that no gift of any "goods and chattels" shall be valid unless by deed or will, duly acknowledged, or unless actual possession be given, refers to corporeal personal property only, and does not include choses in action. Cowen v. First Nat. Bank of Brownsville, 63 S. W. 532, 533, 94 Tex. 547.

Coin and money.

The term "chattels," as used in Code 1880, § 1178, declaring that no transfer of goods or chattels, between husband and wife shall be valid as against any third person unless such transfer or conveyance be in writing and acknowledged and filed for record as a mortgage or deed of trust of such property is required to be filed for record, etc., does not include money. Leinkauf v. Barnes, 5 South. 402, 405, 66 Miss. 207. See, also, Garfield v. State, 74 Ind. 60, 65.

In its ordinary signification "chattel" includes every species of property which is not real estate or freehold, and includes gold coin. In re Gay's Gold, 80 U. S. (13 Wall.) 358, 362, 20 L. Ed. 606. See, also, Hall v. State, 3 Ohio St. 575, 576.

Crops and fruit.

A chattel is any species of property not amounting to a freehold in land. The perennial productions of the earth are regarded as a part of a freehold, while the annual fruits of annual labor are held to be chattels. Westbrook v. Eager, 16 N. J. Law (1 Har.) 81, 85.

Annual crops raised by yearly labor and cultivation are to be regarded as personal chattels, independent and distinct from the land, capable of a sale, without regard to whether growing or matured. Swafford v. Spratt, 67 S. W. 701, 702, 93 Mo. App. 631.

Annual crops raised by yearly labor and cultivation, or fructus industriales, are to be regarded as personal chattels, independent of and distinct from the land, capable of being sold by oral contract, and this without regard to whether the crops are growing or have ceased to draw nutriment from the soil. Holt v. Holt, 57 Mo. App. 272, 275 (citing Smock v. Smock, 37 Mo. App. 56; Garth v. Caldwell, 72 Mo. 622).

Annual crops raised by yearly labor and cultivation are regarded as personal chattels, independent of and distinct from the land, capable of being sold by oral contract, and this without regard to whether the crops are growing, or, having matured, have ceased to derive any nutriment from the soil. Garth v. Caldwell, 72 Mo. 622, 627.

If the subject of a contract is comprehended in that class of products of the soil which are obtained by the labor and cultivation of man, and which the law has termed "fructus industriales," then it is in regard to chattels personal, and need not be in writing. 2 Schouler, Pers. Prop. 468 et seq.; Vulicevich v. Skinner, 19 Pac. 424, 77 Cal. 239; Marshall v. Ferguson, 23 Cal. 65; Davis v. McFarlane, 37 Cal. 634, 636, 99 Am. Dec. 340; Benj. Sales, §§ 120, 121, 126. Under this principle a contract in regard to apples, peaches, and blackberries which might be raised in a certain orchard during three successive years was in regard to chattels, and did not need to be in writing, since it is a matter of common observation that such fruit cannot be made to annually produce without the manurance and industry of man. Smock v. Smock, 37 Mo. App. 56, 60, 63.

Stacks of hay are chattels, within the statute providing that every person who shall willfully set fire to and burn the "goods and chattels" of another shall be guilty of arson. State v. Harvey, 32 S. W. 1110, 1112, 131 Mo. 339.

Dog.

A dog is a chattel, within the statutes relating to the larceny of goods and chattels. People v. Maloney (N. Y.) 1 Parker, Cr. R. 593, 595; Commonwealth v. Hazelwood, 2 S. W. 489, 490, 84 Ky. 681.

A dog is a chattel, within Code Cr. Proc. § 160, defining the crime of larceny, it being by statute taxable property. State v. Langford, 33 S. E. 370, 371, 55 S. C. 322, 74 Am. St. Rep. 746.

"Chattels" is a broader term than "goods," and includes all kinds of property except the freehold, and things which are a portion of it. So that a dog is the subject of larceny, being comprehended within the term "chattels," as used in Code 1873, § 3902, defining such crime. Hamby v. Samson, 74 N. W. 918, 919, 105 Iowa, 112, 40 L. R. A. 508, 67 Am. St. Rep. 285.

Fixtures.

Fixtures come within the expression "goods and chattels." Pitt v. Shew, 4 Barn. & Ald. 206. As to steam engine, see Coombs v. Beaumont, 5 Barn. & Adol. 72.

The general rule appears to be that, where an instrument or utensil is an accessory to anything of a personal nature as to the carrying on of a trade, it is to be considered a chattel, but where it is a necessary accessory to the enjoyment of the inheritance, it is to be considered as a part of the inheritance. The stage and scenery of a theater are chattels. In re Olympic Theater (Pa.) 2 Browne, 275, 285.

A steam engine erected for the purpose of working a colliery, to be used by the lessee during his term, to be held as the property of the landlord, does not come within the description of "goods and chattels." Coombs v. Beaumont, 5 Barn. & Adol. 72 (citing 16 Geo. IV, c. 16, § 72).

Goods distinguished.

The term "chattels" is more comprehensive than "goods," and includes animate property. Smith v. Wilcox, 24 N. Y. 353, 358, 82 Am. Dec. 302; Dowdel v. Hamm (Pa.) 2 Watts, 61, 65.

"The term 'chattels' is more comprehensive than the term 'goods,' and will include animate as well as inanimate property, slaves, horses, cattle, etc., being chattels, but 'goods' will not be included as that term is understood. Every movable thing which can be weighed, measured, or counted is included under the general term 'chattels,' which Lord Coke says is a French word signifying 'goods.' Blackstone says the term is in truth derived from the technical word 'catalla,' which primarily signified only beasts of husbandry, or, as we still call them, cattle, but in its secondary sense was applied to all movables in general. 2 Comm. 385. We may remark here that in the English statute of limitations (St. 21 Jac. I, c. 5) this phraseology is used, as regards the action of replevin: 'goods and cattle,' and not, as in our modern statutes, 'goods and chattels.'" Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Thompson, 19 Ill. (9 Peck) 577, 583.

"Chattel property" is a term which includes all kinds of property except the freehold or things which are parcel of it. It is a more extensive term than "goods" or "effects." Pearce v. City Council of Augusta, 37 Ga. 597, 599.

The term "chattels" not only includes goods, but also living things, as slaves, horses, cattle, etc. Pippin v. Ellison, 34 N. C. 61, 62, 55 Am. Dec. 403.

Horse.

Under Code, § 3985, making it criminal to destroy, injure, or secrete any goods or chattels of another, an indictment will lie of secreting and injuring a horse, since the term "chattels" is used in the section in its broadest sense, and covers every kind of personal property. State v. Phipps, 95 Iowa, 491, 64 N. W. 411.

Lease for years.

A lease for years is a chattel real, and, being less than a freehold, is considered as personal estate or property, and in statutory interpretation is not included under the word "land," or the phrases "real estate" or "real property," but is included in the phrase "personal property" or the word "chattel." Meni v. Rathbone, 21 Ind. 454.

The word "chattels," as used in Rev. St. 1838, p. 373, which provides that executions issued by a justice of the peace shall operate as a lien upon personal property of the judgment debtor, and providing that in all cases where execution shall issue, and goods and chattels shall not be found to discharge the same, a transcript may issue, etc., includes a term for years in real estate. Barr v. Binford (Ind.) 6 Blackf. 335, 336, 38 Am. Dec. 146.

Legacy.

A legacy is not a chattel, and therefore an assignment of it by way of mortgage need not be filed in accordance with the chattel mortgage act. Woodward v. Laporte, 41 Atl. 443, 444, 70 Vt. 399.

License.

The term "chattels" refers to things that can be used, handled, transferred, as horses, carriages, furniture, machinery, tools, and the numerous objects to be seen about us in everyday life, the value of which is in the possession of the thing itself. The term in Rev. St. p. 2013, providing that any mortgage, etc., of goods and "chattels," which shall not be accompanied by actual change of possession, shall be void unless a copy of the mortgage be filed, etc., does not include a liquor tax certificate assigned by the holder to the brewer as security for loan. Niles v. Mathusa, 57 N. E. 184, 185, 162 N. Y. 546.

Liquor tax certificate.

In New York it is held that a liquor tax certificate is a mere chose in action which is incapable of seizure or delivery by the sheriff, and hence cannot be levied on and taken. It is not a chattel, but an intangible right. McNeeley v. Welz, 59 N. E. 697, 698, 166 N. Y. 124.

Mortgages and securities.

"Chattel," though ordinarily used with reference to things movable and tangible, is a very comprehensive word, including any species of property, not real estate or freehold, and in a tax law the term "chattels" includes mortgages. International & Life Assur. Co. v. Haight, 35 N. J. Law (6 Vroom) 279, 282.

A mortgage of leasehold interest does not come within the provision of Laws 1833, c. 279, requiring mortgages of goods and chattels to be filed. State Trust Co. v. Casino Co., 41 N. Y. Supp. 1, 2, 18 Misc. Rep. 327.

A mortgage of the capital stock of a corporation is not a chattel. Williamson v. New Jersey South. R. Co., 26 N. J. Eq. (11 C. E. Green) 398, 403.

A mortgage or transfer of accounts as security is not within the term "goods and chattels." Preston Nat. Bank v. George T. Smith Middlings Purifier Co., 47 N. W. 502, 506, 84 Mich. 364.

"Goods and chattels" embraces all kinds of property other than realty, including bonds, mortgages, and other choses in action. Terhune v. Bray's Ex'rs, 16 N. J. Law (1 Har.) 53, 54.

Right to office.

The right to an office is not within the expression "goods and chattels." State v. Moores, 76 N. W. 530, 533, 56 Neb. 1.

Slaves.

"Chattels," as used in a statute declaring that all and singular the goods and chattels of a debtor shall be liable to execution, except certain exemptions, includes registered servants or slaves. Nance v. Howard, 1 Ill. (Breese) 242, 243.

Stocks.

As applied to bequests or devises, taken simply and without qualification, the word "chattels" comprises the whole personal estate of every description, including stocks. Kendall v. Kendall, 4 Russ. 360, 370. See, also, First Nat. Bank v. Holland, 39 S. E. 126, 129, 99 Va. 495, 55 L. R. A. 155, 86 Am. St. Rep. 898.

"Chattels," as used in Nix, Dig. p. 294, § 7, providing that the rights, credits, moneys or effects, goods and chattels, lands and tenements, of a defendant may be attached, should be construed to include corporate stock. Curtis v. Steever, 36 N. J. Law (7 Vroom) 304, 306.

"Chattels," as used in a statute requiring the filing of mortgages on all goods and chattels, means personal property of all kinds which is capable of visible possession, and hence a mortgage of capital stock of a corporation is not within the statute. Williamson v. New Jersey South. R. Co., 26 N. J. Eq. (11 C. E. Green) 398, 403.

As used in Code Va. § 2414, declaring that no gift of goods or chattels shall be valid unless by deed or will, or unless the donee have actual possession, the words "goods and chattels" relate to some visible, tangible, movable thing, and hence do not include mere choses in action which are not capable of actual possession, so that a gift of a certificate of stock is valid. First Nat. Bank v. Holland, 39 S. E. 126, 129, 99 Va. 495, 55 L. R. A. 155, 86 Am. St. Rep. 898.

CHATTEL INTERESTS.

Estates at will are chattel interests. Civ. Code Cal. 1903, § 765; Rev. St. Okl. 1903, § 4030; Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 3329; Civ. Code S. D. 1903, § 245.

Estates at will or by sufferance shall be chattel interests. Rev. St. Wis. 1898, § 2029.

By statute in New York, estates of inheritance are denominated "estates of freehold," estates for years are denominated "chattels real," and estates by will or by sufferance are called "chattel interests"; and it is further provided that the terms "real estate" and "lands" shall be coextensive with "lands, tenements, and hereditaments." Nellis v. Munson, 15 N. E. 739, 108 N. Y. 453.

CHATTEL MORTGAGE.

See "Formal Mortgage."

"A regular mortgage of personal property is a transfer of the legal title, upon condition, as a security for the payment of a debt or the performance of some other obligation, and if the condition is not complied with the title of the mortgagee becomes absolute at law, and he has the right to take immediate possession." Means v. Montgomery (U. S.) 23 Fed. 421, 424; Jordan v. Turner (Ind.) 3 Blackf. 309, 311; Brownell v. Hawkins (N. Y.) 4 Barb. 491, 493. The possession of the goods may be in the mortgagor or in the mortgagee. Brownell v. Hawkins (N. Y.) 4 Barb. 491, 493; Porter v. Parmly (N. Y.) 43 How. Prac. 445, 453; Robinson v. Fitch, 26 Ohio St. 659, 663; Heyland v. Badger, 35 Cal. 404, 410; Streeter v. Ward, 12 N. Y. 333, 334; McGriff v. Porter, 5 Fla. 373, 376.

A mortgage of personal chattels in all cases vests the legal title in the mortgagee, and when by the terms or by the legal construction of the instrument he has an immediate right to the possession, although the possession may not in fact have been changed, he is, in judgment of law, the absolute owner, and it is merely as his bailee and by his sufferance that the mortgagor retains the possession. The latter has no interest that is bound by or can be sold under an execution against him. When, by the terms of a mortgage, the mortgagor is to remain in possession, his temporary interest subject to the mortgage may be levied on and sold; but his interest in other cases is a right of redemption only, a mere chose in action, which, unless united to a right to the possession for a definite period, can never be the subject of a levy and sale under execution. Stewart v. Slater, 13 N. Y. Super. Ct. (6 Duer) 83, 99.

In the earlier decisions, as well as in the later ones, which follow the principles of the common law, the rule is that a chattel mortgage is something more than a mere security; that it is a conditional sale of personal property, and operates to transfer the legal title to the mortgagee, which can only be defeated by full performance of the conditions mentioned in the mortgage. The decisions rendered under the statutes and registry laws of various states declare the rule to be that the title to personal property in a chattel mortgage remains in the mortgagor until divested by foreclosure and sale; that the mortgage is merely security for the debt, and only creates a lien upon the property; and this is the rule in California. Alferitz v. Ingalls (U. S.) 83 Fed. 964, 971 (citing Shoobert v. De Motta, 112 Cal. 215, 44 Pac. 487, 53 Am. St. Rep. 207; First Nat. Bank v. Erreca, 116 Cal. 81, 47 Pac. 926, 58 Am. St. Rep. 133).

"A chattel mortgage is an instrument of sale conveying the title of the property to the mortgagee with terms of defeasance, and, if the terms of redemption are not complied with, then at law the title becomes absolute in the mortgagee. The nature of the agreement must be such that by the mere nonperformance of the condition by the mortgagor the title will be transferred to the mortgagee by the force of the agreement." People v. Remington, 14 N. Y. Supp. 98, 99, 59 Hun, 282; Parshall v. Eggart (N. Y.) 52 Barb. 367, 371. An instrument on its face purporting to be an acknowledgment of the receipt of the property of another, to be accounted for and held subject to the order of the vendee, conditioned that it was held as a collateral security for the payment of the maker's note, but containing no words of sale, is not a chattel mortgage. Parshall v. Eggart (N. Y.) 52 Barb. 367, 371, 54 N. Y. 18, 23.

At common law a mortgage of chattels vested the title in the mortgagee, and after default by the mortgagor the title of the mortgagee was absolute; but under the statutes of Oregon the mortgagee is not entitled to the possession of the chattels as a matter of right until condition broken, and it appears from the different sections of the statutes relating to chattel mortgages that a chattel mortgage simply creates a lien on the property mortgaged in favor of the mortgagee, and does not vest any title without foreclosure. Chapman v. State, 5 Or. 432, 435.

A chattel mortgage vests the legal title, and also, unless it provides to the contrary, the right to the possession, in the mortgagee; and if the mortgagor or his vendee, without notice, refuse on demand to let the mortgagee have possession of the property, an action for conversion will lie. Fletcher v. Nendek, 30 Minn. 125, 14 N. W. 513.

A mortgage of personal chattels is a sale on condition. The legal title to the chattel is vested in the mortgagee, subject to the right of the mortgagor to perform the condition. Until default there is no doubt of the mortgagor's right to perform, and upon performance to revest himself with the legal title. Stoddard v. Denison (N. Y.) 7 Abb. Prac. N. S. 309, 314; Id., 32 N. Y. Super. Ct. (2 Sweeney) 54, 60.

"A mortgage of personal property regularly executed is defined to be 'a conditional sale as security for the payment of a debt or the performance of some other obligation.'" Allen v. Steiger, 31 Pac. 226, 229, 17 Colo. 552 (quoting Jones, Chat. Mortg. [2d Ed.] § 1); Garwood v. Garwood, 38 Atl. 954, 955, 56 N. J. Eq. 265. The condition upon the performance of which the transfer is to become void should be contained in the instrument by which the property is conveyed. Williams v. Chadwick, 50 Atl. 720, 721, 74 Conn. 252.

"A chattel mortgage is neither a sale absolute nor conditional; neither is it more than a pledge or an absolute pledge; neither does it vest an absolute title in the mortgagee, but, like a real estate mortgage, is nothing but a mere security; a lien upon the property therein described which the mortgagee may himself, or by an agent, sell for the satisfaction of his debt, and until so sold, or the mortgagor's title is foreclosed, does not vest in the mortgagee for any other purpose except that of satisfaction." Shoecraft v. Beard, 19 Pac. 246, 247, 20 Nev. 182 (quoting Herm. Chat. Mortg. § 196, p. 471).

One characteristic of a chattel mortgage is that it is a transfer of personal property, or of some interest therein, by the mortgagor to the mortgagee as security. The mortgagee under a chattel mortgage acquires, not the legal title to the property, but merely a lien thereon, the legal title remaining in the mortgagor. McCormick Harvesting Mach. Co. v. Mills, 89 N. W. 621, 622, 64 Neb. 166.

A chattel mortgage is a mere security, under which no title can possibly pass except by foreclosure and sale. Marsh v. Wade, 20 Pac. 578, 580, 1 Wash. St. 538.

A chattel mortgage is regarded as a mere security for the debt, and does not entirely divest the property out of the mortgagor. It does not give the right of immediate possession until default to make payment on the due day, and therefore trover cannot be maintained by a mortgagee who has demanded possession of the mortgaged property before the due day of his mortgage. Finkel v. Lepkin, 41 Atl. 718, 62 N. J. Law, 580.

Wherever there is a conveyance of the legal title to personal property upon an express condition subsequent, the transaction is a chattel mortgage; while where there is no conveyance of the legal title, there is no mortgage, though the instrument contained a condition subsequent. Vanstone v. Goodwin, 42 Mo. App. 39, 46.

A chattel mortgage is more than a mere security. It is a conditional sale, and operates to transfer the legal title to the mortgagee. Hill v. Beebe, 13 N. Y. (3 Kern.) 556, 565.

A mortgage of personal property vests the legal title in the mortgagee, and he may bring trover, after condition broken, and perhaps before, unless there be a stipulation that the mortgagor may retain possession until condition is broken. The assignment of a mortgage is in the nature of a bill of sale, and transfers the title to the assignee, who may therefore bring an action in his own name for a tort to the property. Montgomery v. Kerr (S. C.) 1 Hill, 291.

In a mortgage of chattels the general property passes to the mortgagee. Bank of Rochester v. Jones, 4 N. Y. (4 Comst.) 497, 507, 55 Am. Dec. 290.

A mortgage of personal property transfers the legal title, and a stipulation permitting the mortgagor to retain possession unless condition is broken is personal to him, and cannot be assigned. Levi v. Legg, 23 S. C. 282, 285.

A chattel mortgage merely creates a lien on the property, and vests no title in the mortgagee; but on the breaking of the condition of the mortgage a new right arises, which is a legal right, and the mortgagee becomes vested with a special property in the thing. J. I. Case Threshing Mach. Co. v. Campbell, 13 Pac. 324, 327, 14 Or. 460.

The legal title of mortgaged chattels vests in the mortgagee without foreclosure, unless otherwise stipulated. Kellogg v. Olson, 24 N. W. 364, 365, 34 Minn. 103.

A chattel mortgage is a conditional sale, the legal title being vested in the mortgagee. Stoddard v. Denison (N. Y.) 38 How. Prac. 296, 301.

A chattel mortgage transfers the whole legal title. Adams v. Nebraska City Nat. Bank, 4 Neb. 370, 373; Stewart v. Hanson, 35 Me. 506, 508.

A chattel mortgage, though in the nature of a sale upon condition, creates a mere lien upon the property to secure the payment of a debt or the performance of some other duty. Backhaus v. Buells, 73 Pac. 342, 344, 43 Or. 358.

In the state of Alabama a chattel mortgage conveys title to the mortgagee. Petersen v. Kaigler, 3 S. E. 655, 656, 78 Ga. 464.

A mortgagee of a chattel mortgage takes every interest the mortgagor had, except the mere right of redemption. Chadwick v. Lamb (N. Y.) 29 Barb. 518, 522.

In South Carolina a mortgagee of chattels is the legal owner, and chattels so mortgaged cannot be attached for a debt of the mortgagor. A mortgagor has therefore no property in such chattels sufficient, in case of his nonresidence, to support an attachment on that ground. Simonds v. Pearce (U. S.) 31 Fed. 137.

A chattel mortgage in Oregon does not merely give a lien, but conveys title and right to possession. Marquam v. Sengfelder, 32 Pac. 676, 678, 24 Or. 2.

A chattel mortgage in Washington is a mere security. Byrd v. Forbes, 3 Wash. T. 318, 13 Pac. 715.

An agreement, to constitute a valid verbal chattel mortgage, must contain all the essential elements and features of a written mortgage. Bank of Highland v. Evans-Snyder-Buell Co., 57 Pac. 1046, 1047, 9 Kan. App. 80.

A chattel mortgage is a bill of sale or any other writing which is intended to create a security consisting of chattels, and it is not necessary that it should be under seal. Rauch v. Blennerhassett Oil Co., 8 W. Va. 36, 40.

To constitute a chattel mortgage, a present title must pass. An agreement to deliver property at a future day or upon some future contingency does not create a mortgage. Flelding v. Middlebaugh's Adm'rs, 2 Ohio Dec. 55, 56, 1 West. Law Month. 218, 219.

A characteristic of a chattel mortgage is that there should be a defeasance. Marshall v. Livingston Nat. Bank, 28 Pac. 312, 313, 11 Mont. 351.

Mortgages in Ohio are usually under seal, but the term "mortgage," used in the statutes of that state, does not import or imply that a seal is necessary. In regard to chattels it is a mortgage, and not a deed of mortgage, that is required. A chattel mortgage is only a bill of sale with a defeasance incorporated in it, and, as a seal has never been held necessary to the validity of a bill of sale, the presence or absence of that formality in a chattel mortgage is wholly immaterial. Gibson v. Warden, 81 U. S. (14 Wall.) 244, 247, 20 L. Ed. 797.

A paper containing all the requisites of a mortgage of personal property is a mortgage from the date of execution thereof, even though it be not attested by an officer. Nichols v. Hampton, 46 Ga. 253.

A delivery of personal property as collateral security, where there is no written conveyance, cannot be regarded as a chattel mortgage. Day v. Swift, 48 Me. 368, 369.

There is no express restriction in the statutes of this state against making a mortgage upon any kind of personal property, and the comprehensive provision in section 2924 that every transfer of an interest in property, other than in trust, made only as a security for the performance of another act, is to be deemed a mortgage, includes all such transfers, whether those for which specific provision is made in other parts of the Code, or such as rest upon the natural rights of citizens to deal with their property as they choose. Works v. Merritt, 38 Pac. 1109, 1110, 105 Cal. 467

Assignment distinguished.

Expressions have crept into some decisions to the effect that, if property is conveyed in trust in a mortgage, the instrument is thereby changed from a chattel mortgage to an assignment; but such is not the law, unless the conveyance is absolute and places the title of the property in the trustee. The question is, is the title of the property conveyed to the trustee, so that it is beyond the reach of the creditors of the mortgagor? If their relation to the property is not so changed by the interposition of a trustee between them and the property of the debtor that they cannot reach the surplus, or redeem from the mortgage and become subrogated to the rights of the trustee, then the instrument is valid as a chattel mortgage. The mere use of the words "in trust for the benefit of creditors," in a chattel mortgage, does not render it a common-law assignment. Under these principles a chattel mortgage to one who was not a creditor, as trustee, conditioned that the mortgagor should pay to the mortgagee within a certain time certain amounts due to certain creditors, and to save certain obligors harmless from certain obligations, and providing for the distribution of the fund after payment of the expenses pro rata to certain creditors, did not become an assignment for the benefit of creditors, though it included all the mortgagor's property and was made to a trustee, since by it the property was not withdrawn from the right of the mortgagor or others to redeem. Warner v. Littlefield, 50 N. W. 721, 724, 89 Mich. 329.

A "chattel mortgage" is the security for a debt, and gives merely a lien on the property, leaving in the grantor an equity of redemption and any surplus or residue after the payment of the debt. The property does not pass beyond the grantor's control. He may satisfy the debt it is executed to secure, and the property reverts to him, while in the case of an assignment he disposes of the entire property. Preston v. Carter, 10 S. W. 17, 18, 80 Tex. 388.

An instrument making a conveyance of all the goods, wares, property, bills, book accounts, and demands, and all other property of the maker, wheresoever situated, except such as is exempt from forced sale, and setting out the list of the creditors, stating the liabilities, and providing for the sale of the property and return of any surplus to the grantor, is not a mortgage, but an assignment for the benefit of creditors. Padgitt v. Wood (Tex.) 24 S. W. 1108, 1112.

Bill of sale.

A chattel mortgage, whether in writing or not, is a pledge of personal property to secure the performance of the promise of the mortgagor, or some one for whom he stands sponsor. It need not be in writing. Conchman v. Wright, 8 Neb. 1; Ostertag v. Galbraith, 23 Neb. 730, 37 N. W. 637; Sloan v. Coburn, 26 Neb. 607, 42 N. W. 726, 4 L. R. A. 470. A bill of sale, absolute on its face, may be shown to be a chattel mortgage. Omaha Book Co. v. Sutherland, 6 N. W. 367, 10 Neb. 334.

The question is, what is the intention of the parties pledging the property? If it was intended to be a security, then it is a chattel mortgage, no matter how or in what form the pledge may be expressed, and the legal title to property pledged by a chattel mortgage remains in the mortgagor until divested by foreclosure proceedings and sale in pursuance of the statute. Musser v. King, 59 N. W. 744, 746, 40 Neb. 892, 42 Am. St. Rep. 700.

An instrument conveying chattels is a chattel mortgage, and not a bill of sale, where it provides that it is to be void on repayment of the consideration at a given time, though it provides that the sale is to become absolute, and the title is to pass, without any legal process, on the seller's failure to make such legal payment, and though it is described as a bill of sale, and hence is within 2 Sayles' Civ. St. art. 338, requiring chattel mortgages to be registered, to be valid against execution creditors. Williams v. Farmers' Nat. Bank, 56 S. W. 261, 22 Tex. Civ. App. 581.

A bill of sale, though absolute on its face, intended to secure the vendee against loss for money advanced toward the purchase of property, or for that and as security for the payment of other debts, no matter what language may have been employed in expressing the terms of the contract, must be held and treated as a chattel mortgage. Scott v. Henry, 13 Ark. 112, 116.

Where a debtor by a written instrument transfers personal property to his creditor, and delivers possession of such property to him with authority to sell, and, after paying all prior incumbrances, apply the excess to the payment of his own claim, no definite price being fixed for the property between the parties to the instrument, the writing is not a bill of sale, even though the words

"bargain," "sale," "transfer," and "delivery" are used therein; but such instrument will be construed to be a deed of trust or a chattel mortgage. A bill of sale of chattels, absolute on its face, may be shown, even by those not parties to it, to be a security for mortgage, void against subsequent lienholders, unless filed as required by law, or unless possession of the property be given to the mortgagee and such possession be actual and continuous. Greenville Nat. Bank v. Evans-Snyder-Buel Co., 60 Pac. 249, 260, 9 Okl. 353.

A bill of sale, made for security, even though running directly to the person to be secured, and though accompanied by delivery of the goods, is at most only a pledge, and not a chattel mortgage. Copeland v. Barnes, 18 N. E. 65, 66, 147 Mass. 388 (citing Shaw v. Silloway, 145 Mass. 503, 14 N. E. 783).

An instrument executed by a party, in the nature of a bill of sale, but showing in its language the intent of the parties to be a security for a loan of money, is a mortgage. Stokes v. Hollis, 43 Ga. 262, 264.

Lease of personality.

Where a sewing machine is delivered by the owner, who takes back an instrument, called a "lease," whereby the maker agrees to pay certain rent for a fixed time, and, on default, to return the machine, otherwise to retain possession permanently, it constitutes a chattel mortgage. Singer Mfg. Co. v. Smith, 19 S. E. 132.

Mortgage of realty and personality.

An instrument in the form of a real estate mortgage, conveying real estate, which includes personal property, is a chattel mortgage so far as the personal property is concerned, and must be filed for record as provided by statute for chattel mortgages, and treated as a chattel mortgage. Fitzgerald v. Atlanta Home Ins. Co., 70 N. Y. Supp. 552, 555, 61 App. Div. 350.

Pledge distinguished.

A chattel mortgage is distinguished from a pledge in that it is in form a sale of personal property, which passes title to the mortgagee with a condition that, if a debt which it is given to secure is paid, the sale shall be void, while a pledge contains no words of sale, and does not pass title, but only authorizes the pledgee to sell the property in case of default. Mitchell v. Roberts (U. S.) 17 Fed. 776, 778; Thurber v. Oliver (U. S.) 26 Fed. 224, 228; Raper v. Harrison, 15 Pac. 219, 220, 37 Kan. 243; Lewis v. Graham (N. Y.) 4 Abb. Prac. 106, 109; Cortelyou v. Lansing (N. Y.) 2 Caines, Cas. 200, 202; McFarland v. Wheeler (N. Y.) 26 Wend. 467, 475; People v. El. Remington & Sons, 12 N. Y. Supp. 824, 826, 59 Hun. 282. See, also, Haskins v. Kelly, 24 N. Y. Super. Ct. (1 Rob.) 160, 172; Wilson v. Little, 2 N. Y. (2 Comst.) 443, 446, 51 Am. Dec. 307; White v. Cole (N. Y.) 24 Wend. 116, 142; Appeal of Collins, 107 Pa. 590, 605, 52 Am. Rep. 479; Huntington v. Mather (N. Y.) 2 Barb. 538, 542; Sims v. Canfield, 2 Ala. 555, 560.

A mortgage is a sale of goods with a condition that, if the mortgagor pays, it shall be void. A pledge contains no words of sale, but an authority, if the debt is not paid, to sell the pledge for that purpose. In the one case the title passes to the mortgagee; in the other the title remains in the pledgor, although possession is given to the pledgee. An instrument reciting that, "as security for the payment of the notes, I have deposited with them the securities," etc., shows merely an intention to pledge, and not to mortgage or sell, such securities. Lewis v. Graham (N. Y.) 4 Abb. Prac. 106, 109.

By the common law a pledge is a bailment of personal property as a security for some debt or obligation. It is usually confined to chattels. Where real or personal property is transferred by a conveyance of the title as a security, it is commonly denominated a "mortgage." In case of a mortgage the whole legal title passes conditionally to the mortgagee, and, if not redeemed at the time stipulated, the title becomes absolute at law; but in a pledge a special property only passes to the pledgee, the general property remaining in the pledgor. A delivery is essential to a pledge. It was for a long time doubted whether incorporeal things, like debts, money in stocks, etc., which cannot be manually delivered, were proper subjects of a pledge. It is now held that they are. Hence any species of personal property or chattel interest may be the subject of a pledge, and, although the pledgor parts with the possession of the pledge, he retains his general property in it, and the pledgee has but a special or qualified interest. The assignment of a bond and mortgage, though absolute on its face, but accompanied by a promissory note made by the assignor, which gives the assignee authority to sell the bond and mortgage upon default of the assignor to pay his debt, is a pledge of the bond and mortgage, and not a mortgage or sale of them. Campbell v. Parker, 22 N. Y. Super. Ct. (9 Bosw.) 322, 333.

The material distinction between a pledge and a chattel mortgage is that a mortgage is a conveyance of the legal title on condition, and it becomes absolute at law if not redeemed at a given time, while a pledge is a deposit of goods, redeemable on certain terms, either with or without a fixed period for redemption. The general property does not pass in a pledge, as in the case of a mortgage, and a pawnee has only a special property in the thing deposited, and a right of redemption exists in the pawnor at any time before the pledge is legally disposed of by the pawnee. Evans v. Darlington (Ind.) 5 Blackf. 320, 322.

One of the important distinctions between a mortgage of personalty and a pledge is that in the former case the general owner may, as between the parties, retain possession of the chattels, and in the latter the special owner must have possession. Conner v. Carpenter, 28 Vt. 237, 240.

"A pledge differs from a chattel mortgage in three essential characteristics: (1) It may be constituted, without any contract in writing, merely by delivery of the thing pledged. (2) It is constituted by a delivery of the thing pledged, and is continued only so long as the possession remains with the creditor. (3) It does not generally pass the title to the thing pledged, but gives only a lien to the creditor while the debtor retains the general property." Jones, Pledges, § 4. "Whenever there is a conveyance of the legal title to personal property upon an expressed condition subsequent, whether contained in the conveyance or in a separate instrument, the transaction is a mortgage." Id. § 8. "A delivery must always accompany a pledge, while a mortgage may be valid without a delivery." Jones, Chat. Mortg. § 7. "A decisive test of a legal mortgage of personal property is the use of language which makes the instrument one of sale, conveying the title of the property to the creditor conditionally, so that the sale is defeated by the debtor's performance of his agreement." Id. § 8. Thus a writing, executed by a debtor, reciting that the debtor has sold to his creditor certain goods, which are held by the creditor as collateral security for the debt, and that said goods are stored in a certain warehouse, is a chattel mortgage, and not a pledge. People v. E. Remington & Sons, 12 N. Y. Supp. 824, 826, 59 Hun, 282.

The distinction between a pledge and a chattel mortgage is that, in the case of a pledge, the title is retained by the pledgor, while in the case of a chattel mortgage the title passes to the mortgagee, and the delivery of the possession of the property pledged to the pledgee is essential to a pledge, while between the parties, though not as against creditors or purchasers, such a delivery is not necessary to the validity of a mortgage. McCoy v. Lassiter, 95 N. C. 88, 91.

There is a clear and obvious difference between a pledge and a chattel mortgage. By a pledge of personal property by one to another as security for some debt or engagement, the pledgee acquires only a special property in the thing pledged, while the general property remains in the pledgor. A chattel mortgage is a conditional transfer or conveyance of the property itself, and, if the condition be not duly performed, the whole title vests absolutely at law in the mortgagee. Delivery accompanies a pledge and is essential to its vitality. Wright v. Ross, 36 Cal. 414, 428.

"By a mortgage the general property passes. It is a conditional sale with the right of defeasance, and the chattel may remain in the possession of the mortgagor, if the transaction is not accompanied by actual fraud." But where a mere lien is intended to be created, the object being to give security, the owner must not be suffered to remain in possession. In a mortgage there must be a definite sum to be paid and a definite time for payment. A, having indorsed for B. certain promissory notes, B., before the notes became due, executed a deed of furniture to A., conditioned to be void if he saved A. harmless. The deed and furniture were formally delivered in the presence of a witness, who alone knew of the transaction, and B. remained in possession. Held, that the transaction might be viewed either as a mortgage or pledge; but, as the furniture remained in B.'s hands, it must be construed as a mortgage. Ward v. Sumner, 22 Mass. (5 Pick.) 59, 60.

The word "mortgage," within the meaning of the attachment act, declaring that the remedy of attachment does not exist where the contract is secured by a mortgage, is used in its most general signification, meaning "security," and hence a pledge of personal property as security for a debt is a mortgage, within the meaning of the act. Payne v. Bensley, 8 Cal. 260, 267, 68 Am. Dec. 318.

Where goods were not sold, assigned, or conveyed, but were intended to be simply delivered, to be held as collateral security for the payment of a note, with power to sell in case of default, when effectually accomplished, the transaction would be what is known as a "pledge" of chattels, as distinguished from a "mortgage" or "sale." The distinction between a mortgage and a pledge is clearly stated by Judge Miller in Dungan v. Mutual Ben. Life Ins. Co., 38 Md. 242, 251: "The general distinction is that in a mortgage the title is conveyed with a condition of defeasance (that is to say, a condition rendering the conveyance void on the payment of a certain sum of money on or about a day agreed upon), while in a pledge the goods bailed are deposited as a collateral security, and only a special property is transferred to the bailee (the general title in the meanwhile remaining with the bailor). The difference has also been stated thus: A mortgage is a pledge, and more; for it is an absolute pledge, to become an absolute interest if not redeemed at a certain time. A pledge is a deposit of personal effects, not to be taken back but on payment of a certain sum, by express stipulation or by the course of trade to be a lien upon them." To the same effect is the text in Jones, Pledges, § 8: "Whenever there is a conveyance of the legal title to personal property upon an express condition subsequent, whether contained in the conveyance or in a separate instrument, the transaction is a mortgage. Thus, if a bill of sale of a horse be made, and at the same time a defeasance be given back by the purchaser, engaging that on the payment of the purchase price within a specified time he will redeliver the horse, the transaction is a mortgage, and not a pledge, of the horse. An instrument in writing, which records a debt and declares that the debtor does thereby deliver certain property to his creditor to secure the debt, is a pledge, and not a mortgage, because there is no transfer of the title to the property, but only a deposit of it. Although an instrument contains a covenant to warrant and defend the title, such as is usual in a mortgage, the character of the instrument is not thereby changed. The covenant is not a present conveyance, but an executory stipulation. A delivery of personal property by a debtor in security for a debt, accompanied by a written agreement whereby the debtor agrees that, if he does not pay the debt by a certain time, the creditor may dispose of the property to pay the debt, is a pledge, and not a mortgage; for the agreement does not show any intention to transfer a title to the property absolutely or conditionally, but only to deliver the property as security, with a right in the creditor to sell it if the debt be not paid by a certain time." To constitute a pledge the pledgee must take possession, and to preserve it he must retain possession. The delivery and possession required is not a mere agreement of parties, which they can make on paper, but must be some sufficient act of an unequivocal character. Thurber v. Oliver (U. S.) 26 Fed. 224, 226.

One test whether a transfer of property is a pledge or a mortgage is whether a debt exists independent of it, for the payment of which it is security, in which case is the former. A pledge of property capable of physical delivery requires that it should be so delivered. Property not capable of such delivery may be pledged in writing. The transfer of choses in action as mere security for a debt is always a pledge. When so received, without special authority, the pledgee cannot sell them or compromise them. He can only wait until they mature and collect them. So an assignment of a mortgage by the mortgagee to secure a debt due from him to the assignee is clearly a pledge of the mortgage, and not a mortgage or conditional sale. Haskins v. Kelly, 24 N. Y. Super. Ct. (1 Rob.) 160, 172.

"The difference," says Bradley, J., in Casey v. Cavaroc, 96 U. S. 467, 24 L. Ed. 779, "between a mortgage and a pledge is: The title is transferred by the former, and possession by the latter." Fidelity Ins., Trust & Safe Deposit Co. v. Roanoke Iron Co. (U. S.) 81 Fed. 439, 445.

A note, delivered to a party, with a power of redemption, and as a security for a debt, is a pledge. Such act does not constitute a sale. The property in the note was not intended to pass until after the default. It was merely deposited with the party, and the legal property did not pass, as it does in the case of a mortgage. McLean v. Walker (N. Y.) 10 Johns. 471, 474.

Where defendants loaned $2,000 to plaintiffs for the space of 44 days, and received in return a check for the same amount, and as collateral security for the repayment of the money plaintiffs deposited with them notes taken in the course of their business as margins, amounting to the sum of $2,614. the contract was a pledge of the notes, and not a mortgage. Wheeler v. Newbould, 16 N. Y. 392, 396.

A bill of sale of goods to secure the payment of rent as it became due, providing that, if the rent should be paid as it became due, the said bill of sale should be void, is a mortgage of the goods, and not a technical pledge. A pledge is a deposit of goods, to be redeemed on certain terms. Delivery always accompanies a pledge, but a mortgage of goods is often valid without delivery. Possession continuing in the vendor is only prima facie evidence of fraud, and may be explained. Barrow v. Paxton (N. Y.) 5 Johns. 258, 261, 4 Am. Dec. 354.

The radical distinction between a pledge and a mortgage is that by a mortgage the general title is transferred to the mortgagee, subject to be revested by performance of the condition; but, in case of a pledge, the pledgor retains the general title in himself and parts with the possession for a special purpose. To constitute a pledge the pledgee must take possession, and to preserve it he must retain possession. Walker v. Staples, 87 Mass. (5 Allen) 34, 35.

A pledge differs from a mortgage in that the pledgee must have possession and the pledgor the legal title of the property. while a mortgage passes the title to the mortgagee and may allow the possession to remain in the mortgagor. American Pig Iron Storage Warrant Co. v. German, 126 Ala. 194, 223, 28 South. 603, 614, 85 Am. St. Rep. 21.

A mortgage of personal property is a conveyance of title upon condition, to be come an absolute interest at law if not redeemed by a given time. Under Code Dak. § 1722, a mortgage is defined as a contract by which specific property is hypothecated for the performance of an act, without the necessity of a change of possession. This definition makes a clear distinction between a pledge and a chattel mortgage, and at the same time avoids the idea of a mortgage being in any sense a transfer or conveyance of title. The property is hypothecated—that is to say, according to the well-recognized meaning of the term in the civil and admiralty law—and is thereby rendered liable for the debt, interest, and costs out of the proceeds of a sale. Pledge requires actual possession; hypothecation does not. The former is confined to personal property; but a mortgage is not. By a pledge the title or ownership does not pass, and so with regard to hypothecation or mortgage. The contract of mortgage and the contract of pledge are both charges imposed on property as security only. These contracts simply confer a right or lien, by which is not meant a lien in the narrow sense applicable exclusively to the common-law liens, which give a right to retain possession of a specific thing until the charge attached to it is satisfied, but by which is to be understood a lien in the sense of the Civil Code, which embraces in one definition both common-law and equitable liens and has brought under one head all the general principles which affect liens by possession or mortgage. Everett v. Buchanan, 8 N. W. 31, 33, 2 Dak. 249.

A mortgage of personal estate is a sale, and operates to transfer the whole legal title of the thing mortgaged to the mortgagee, subject only to be defeated by a full performance of the condition. After forfeiture no tender can revest the title in the mortgagor, and even acceptance of part is no waiver. The distinctions between mortgages of real and personal estate cannot prevail in case of a pledge, which is settled to be a mere security, conferring only a special property in the property pledged for the full value, in which, after a tender, the pledgee is responsible, which would not be the case if a bill to redeem was necessary. The interest of the pledgee is in fact a mere lien, like a mortgage of lands, and should be relieved by the same process. A transfer of a chattel mortgage merely by way of collateral security for the payment of a debt is a pledge, not a mortgage thereof, and need not be recorded. Haskins v. Kelly (N. Y.) 1 Abb. Prac. (N. S.) 63, 75.

In a late work the difference between a mortgage and a pledge of stocks is concisely stated. "A mortgage," says the author, "is a sale of the stock by way of securing a debt, with a condition that, if the mortgagor pays the debt, the sale shall be void. A pledge contains no words of sale, but an authority, if the debt is not paid, to sell the pledge for that purpose. In the former case the title passes to the mortgagee; in the latter, the title remains in the pledgor, although possession is given to the pledgee." Dos Passos, Stock Brokers, 658. At common law a mortgage was a conveyance to the mortgagee, to be void upon condition the mortgagor paid the debt at a specified day, and to become absolute on failure so to pay. The mortgagee was invested with the legal title. It was not necessary to the validity of the mortgage that the possession should pass to the mortgagee, though the right of possession was in him. The mortgagee acquired the title of the property, and the mortgagor parted with the title as in the case of sale, reserving only the right to defeat the transfer and reacquire the property by paying the debt on the day named. If the mortgagee paid the debt or made a legal tender of it at the specified day, the condition of the mortgage was satisfied, and the property forever discharged from the incumbrance; but upon default of payment according to the condition the absolute title at law vested in the mortgagee. A pledge is a bailment of personal property as a security for some debt or engagement. It is completed by a delivery of the property. It does not transfer the title. It only gives the pledgee a lien upon the property for his debt and the right to retain the possession until his debt is paid. But the nonpayment of the debt, even after it is due, does not work a forfeiture of the pledge. The title remains in the pledgor until it is divested, either by a foreclosure in equity or by a sale on due notice. Mitchell v. Roberts (U. S.) 17 Fed. 776, 778.

The difference between a mortgage and pledge is that by the former the general property passes; by the latter it does not, but the pawnee has only a special property. A mortgage is a conveyance of the title upon condition, and it becomes an absolute interest at law if not redeemed by a given time. A pledge or pawn is a deposit of goods, either with or without a fixed period for redemption. Delivery of possession must accompany a pledge, but need not accompany a mortgage. Lobban v. Garnett, 39 Ky. (9 Dana) 389, 390.

While the distinction between mortgage and pledge is well defined, yet owing to the haste with which transactions are often made, and to the meagerness or abbreviations of the written papers which accompany them, it is not easy always to determine what character is properly to be attributed to them. By a mortgage the granted property passes to the grantee, subject to be revested in the grantor by the performance of the condition. By a pledge the pledgee acquires a special property only in the article pledged, the general title remaining in the pledgor. That which the pledgee has is a lien only, and to the existence of this lien possession is essential. Without possession there is no pledge, and if, having obtained this, the pledgee parts with it voluntarily, it is a relinquishment of his security. A receipted bill of parcels of chattels, purporting on its face to be as security for a debt, is a pledge, and not a mortgage; and if the pledgee, after receiving possession of the chattels, permits the pledgor to resume possession of them and to hold them until his death, he cannot, by then taking possession of them, defeat the right of the administrator to maintain against him an action for their conversion. Thompson v. Dolliver, 132 Mass. 103, 104.

The term "pledge" is ordinarily confined to personal property, and where real or personal property is transferred by conveyance for debt or security it is a mortgage. It is essential, in case of a pledge, that possession be given of the goods pledged. Hurst v. Jones, 78 Tenn. (10 Lea) 8, 14.

A mortgage differs from a pledge, in that the legal property does not pass with a pledge, as it does in the case of a mortgage, with a condition of a defeasance. The mortgage, pledge, or pawn of goods seems, however, generally to have been confounded in the books, and it was not until lately that this just discrimination has been well attended to and explained. Cortelyou v. Lansing (N. Y.) 2 Caines, Cas. 200, 202.

A mortgage of goods is a pledge, and more. It is an absolute pledge, to become an absolute interest if not redeemed at the specified time. After the condition forfeited, the mortgagee has an absolute interest in the thing mortgaged, whereas as a pawnee he has but a special property in the goods to detain them for his security. Brown v. Bement (N. Y.) 8 Johns. 96, 97; Smith v. Acker (N. Y.) 23 Wend. 653, 668; Luckett v. Townsend, 3 Tex. 119, 129, 49 Am. Dec. 723.

A mortgage of personal property is a pledge, and more; for it is an absolute pledge, to become an absolute interest if not redeemed in a certain time. A mortgage of personal property in law differs from a pledge. The former is a conditional transfer or conveyance of the property itself, and, if the condition is not duly performed, the whole title vests absolutely at law in the mortgagee, exactly as it does in a mortgage of lands; the latter, a pledge, only passes the possession, or at the most is a special property in the pledge, with the right of retention until the debt is paid. Doak v. Bank of State, 28 N. C. 309, 319.

A mortgage is a pledge, and more; for it is an absolute pledge, to become an absolute interest if not redeemed at a certain time. "This definition," says the court, "is perhaps not precisely correct at the present time. A pledge is the bailment of property.

In the case of a mortgage, the property may remain in the possession of the mortgagor; but a mortgage of chattels is a sale of them upon condition, and, if the condition is not performed, the title becomes absolute at law. The mortgagor becomes, by failure to perform the condition, a vendee, and he has in law an absolute power over the property." Chamberlain v. Martin (N. Y.) 43 Barb. 607, 610.

A mortgage of goods is a conditional transfer or conveyance of the property itself, and, if the condition be not performed, the whole title vests absolutely at law, exactly as it does in the case of a mortgage of lands. It differs from a pawn or pledge in that it is a conveyance of the title on condition, and may be valid without actual delivery. A mortgage is a pledge, and more; for it is an absolute pledge, to become an absolute interest if not redeemed at a certain time, while a pledge is a deposit of personal effects, not to be taken back except on payment of a certain sum, by express stipulation or the course of trade made to be a lien on them. In the case of a mortgage, the legal property passes, with a condition of defeasance; in that of a pledge, the general property does not pass, but remains with the pawnor. Luckett v. Townsend, 3 Tex. 119, 129, 49 Am. Dec. 723 (citing 2 Story, Eq. § 1030; 4 Kent, Comm. 138; Jones v. Smith, 2 Ves. Jr. 372, 378; Cortelyou v. Lansing [N. Y.] 2 Caines, Cas. 200, 206).

A delivery of personal property for security is not a transfer on condition, and does not constitute a mortgage thereof, but a pledge merely. Eastman v. Avery, 23 Me. (10 Shep.) 248, 250.

CHATTELS PERSONAL.

Personal chattels are properly things movable, which may be carried about by the owner, such as animals, household stuff, money, jewels, corn, garments, and everything else that can be put in motion and transferred from one place to another. Hawkins v. State Loan & Trust Co. (U. S.) 79 Fed. 50, 51 (citing Bouv. Law Dict. p. 305); Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Thompson, 19 Ill. (9 Peck) 578, 584; State v. Harvey, 32 S. W. 1110, 1112, 131 Mo. 339; Niles v. Mathusa, 57 N. E. 184, 185, 162 N. Y. 546; State v. Bartlett, 55 Me. 200, 211; Woodward v. Laporte, 41 Atl. 443, 70 Vt. 399. Thus stacks of hay are chattels, within the statute providing that every person who shall willfully set fire to and burn the goods and chattels of another shall be guilty of arson. State v. Harvey, 32 S. W. 1110, 1112, 131 Mo. 339.

"Chattels personal include movable things, only as belonging immediately to the person." Putnam v. Westcott (N. Y.) 19 Johns. 73, 76.

Where a building is erected by one man on the land of another by his permission, on an agreement that it may be removed at the pleasure of the builder, it does not become a part of the real estate, but continues a personal chattel, and the property of the person who erected it. Van Ness v. Packard, 27 U. S. (2 Pet.) 137, 7 L. Ed. 374. It is merely personal, and is governed by the same rules as any other article of personal property. Dame v. Dame, 38 N. H. 429, 431, 75 Am. Dec. 195 (citing Smith v. Benson [N. Y.] 1 Hill, 176).

CHATTELS REAL.

As included in term land, see "Land."

Chattels real are such as concern or savor of the realty, including terms for years, and are called "chattels real," as being interests arising out of or being annexed to real estate, of which they have one quality, to wit, immobility, but want the quality of indeterminate duration, the want of which constitutes them chattels. Lycoming Fire Ins. Co. of Muncy v. Haven, 95 U. S. 242, 251, 24 L. Ed. 473; Putnam v. Westcott (N. Y.) 19 Johns. 73, 76; People v. McComber, 7 N. Y. Supp. 71, 72; Hyatt v. Vincennes Nat. Bank, 5 Sup. Ct. 573, 576, 113 U. S. 408, 28 L. Ed. 1009 (citing 2 Bl. Comm. 386).

Bouvier's definition of a "chattel real" is substantially the same as that of text-writers generally. He says: "Chattels real are interests which are annexed to or concern real estate, as a lease for years of land; and the duration of the lease is immaterial, whether it be for one or a thousand years, providing there be a certainty about it and a reversion or remainder in some other person. A lease to continue until a certain sum of money can be raised out of the rents is of the same description, and so, in fact, will be found other interests in real estate whose duration is limited to a time certain beyond which it cannot subsist, and which is therefore something less than a freehold." A grain elevator or permanent structure built by a lessee on ground held under a lease which provides that the lessor may terminate the lease on 60 days' notice, and that the lessee may remove his buildings at any time before the expiration of the lease, is, together with the leasehold estate, a chattel real. Knapp v. Jones, 32 N. E. 382, 383, 143 Ill. 375.

Burrill's Law Dict. defines a "chattel real" to be such as concern, are annexed to, or savor of the realty, as terms for years in land. People v. McComber, 7 N. Y. Supp. 71, 72.

In the case of First Nat. Bank v. Consolidated Electric Light Co., 97 Ala. 465, 12 South. 71, it was said: "A chattel real, such as a freehold interest in lands, though personal property, has different attributes from those of other chattels. It is an immovable thing, attached to and issuing out of lands." Milliken v. Faulk, 20 South. 594, 595, 111 Ala. 658.

Leasehold interests are chattels real, and not mere chattels; so that a mortgage of a leasehold is conveyance of the chattel real. State Trust Co. v. Casino Co., 46 N. Y. Supp. 492, 493, 19 App. Div. 344.

A building erected by a lessee on leased ground is a chattel real, and not personal property. Knapp v. Jones, 38 Ill. App. 489, 495.

By statute in New York estates of inheritance are denominated "estates of freehold," estates for years are denominated "chattels real," and estates by will or by sufferance are called "chattel interests," and it is further provided that the terms "real estate" and "land" shall be coextensive with "lands, tenements, and hereditaments." Nellis v. Munson, 15 N. E. 739, 108 N. Y. 453.

Estates for years are chattels real. Civ. Code Cal. 1903, § 765; Rev. St. Okl. 1903, § 4030; Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 3329; Civ. Code S. D. 1903, § 245.

An estate for the life of a third person, whether limited to heirs or otherwise, shall be deemed a freehold only during the life of the grantee or devisee; but after his death it shall be deemed a chattel real. Comp. Laws Mich. 1897, § 8788.

Estates for years shall be denominated "chattels real." Rev. St. Wis. 1898, § 2029.

CHEAT.

See "Common-Law Cheat."

In the form of an indictment for a conspiracy to cheat, the word "cheat" implies a corrupt act. Wood v. State, 1 Atl. 509, 511, 47 N. J. Law (18 Vroom) 461.

"Cheat and defraud," as ordinarily used, mean "every kind of trick and deception, from false representation and intimidation to suppression and concealment of any fact or information by which a party may be induced to part with his property for less than its value or to give more than its worth for the property of another." State v. Parker, 43 N. H. 83, 85.

A fraudulent sale of goods, for the purpose of preventing them from being attached by the creditors of the vendor, is a fraud in law, which will justify the application of the epithets "cheating" and "swindling." Richardson v. Butterfield, 60 Mass. (6 Cush.) 185, 191.

Where there is a sale of goods and delivery of possession, even though the buyer intends at the time not to pay for them, and conceals his insolvency from the vendor, it is not a cheat that will avoid the sale. There must be artifice practiced, such as was intended and fitted to deceive, to constitute a cheat. In Rodman v. Thalheimer, 75 Pa. (25 P. F. Smith) 232, the court said: "The law in this state is not that insolvency, and the mere knowledge of it, are such a fraud as to set aside the sale, and enable the seller to rescind and to replevy the goods after they have come fully and fairly into the possession of the purchaser. It requires artifice, trick, or false pretense, as a means of obtaining possession, to avoid the purchase. There must be bad faith; an intent at the time to defraud the seller. Insolvency and a knowledge of it at the time of the sale are evidence to go to the jury, with other facts, to show the intended fraud, but, standing alone, will not operate to rescind after a possession fully and fairly acquired. The New York doctrine does not hold in this state." Wessels v. Weiss, 27 Atl. 535, 537, 156 Pa. 591.

As actionable per se.

A charge that another "will swear, lie, cheat, or steal" may import that he lies, swears, cheats, and steals, and, if used in the latter sense, it is to be determined by the jury whether the language is actionable. Dottarer v. Bushey, 16 Pa. (4 Harris) 204, 209.

The term "cheat" does not import a crime known to the law, and hence words charging one with being a cheat are not actionable per se. Chase v. Whitlock (N. Y.) 3 Hill, 139, 140; Odiorne v. Bacon, 60 Mass. (6 Cush.) 185, 191; Pollock v. Hastings, 88 Ind. 248, 250.

It is actionable to call a lawyer a "cheat"; for, though he were not indictable for cheating his client, or punishable for it by striking from the roll, it is enough to support an action for words which impute it that they touch the business by which he gets his bread. Rush v. Cavanaugh, 2 Pa. (2 Barr) 187, 189.

A statement that plaintiff in an action for slander had cheated and robbed orphan children out of $1,400 is held not to impute the crime of larceny or robbery, so as to be actionable per se. In discussing the meaning of the word "robbed," as here used, the court says that "while it is doubtless actionable to say of another that he robbed any person, unless the words were used in a connection which shows that they were not intended to impute the crime of robbery, yet the word 'robbed,' as used in the statement under consideration, indicated not a taking by force, but rather a taking by fraud and wrong, and did not import a charge of the technical crime of robbery." Filber v. Dauermann, 28 Wis. 134, 135.

To cheat is an offense at common law, and is such an act as would affect the public—such a deception that common prudence cannot guard against it, as by using false weights and measures, or false tokens, or where there is a conspiracy to cheat. People v. Babcock, 7 Johns. 201, 5 Am. Dec. 256; Blanchard v. State, 29 N. E. 783, 784, 3 Ind. App. 395; Cross v. Peters, 1 Me. (1 Greenl.) 376, 387, 10 Am. Dec. 78.

In Pen. Code, § 168, subd. 4, making it a misdemeanor for two or more persons to conspire to defraud another out of property by means which, if executed, would amount to a cheat, the word "cheat" is used in its common-law significance, and therefore must be such a fraud as would affect the public, or as common prudence cannot guard against, and is synonymous with "fraud"; and cheats punishable at common law may generally be described to be such as did not amount to a felony, but which affect or may affect the public, and are effected by deceitful or illegal practice, against which common prudence could not have guarded. People v. Olson, 15 N. Y. Supp. 778, 780.

Deceitful practices, involving considerations of public trade which defraud another of his known rights by means of some artifice or device contrary to the plain rules of common honesty, are cheats, punishable at common law. Acts of this character are always unlawful, and, when they cause special injury, give to the person injured a right of action, and the right in the proper case to the protection of the court of equity. Von Mumm v. Frash (U. S.) 56 Fed. 830, 836.

"Cheating" by false pretenses or by false tokens is an offense at common law. State v. Hewett, 31 Me. 396, 398.

Crime imported.

"The term 'cheating and defrauding' does not necessarily import the commission of any indictable offense, either at common law or by statute. It may embrace only such civil frauds as are in common violation of common honesty, and for which the party is amenable to justice, not by indictment, but by a civil action." Commonwealth v. Eastman, 55 Mass. (1 Cush.) 189, 223, 226, 48 Am. Dec. 596.

An allegation that one obtained the goods of another by false pretenses or by cheating is not in the legal sense a charge of a crime; for it may be true, and yet no crime may have been committed. People v. Brady, 56 N. Y. 182, 188.

"Cheat and defraud," as used in an indictment for conspiracy, which charged that defendants conspired to cheat and defraud, do not import the commission of any indictable offense, and hence the indictment is insufficient. Commonwealth v. Wallace, 82 Mass. (16 Gray) 221, 223.

The words "cheating and defrauding" of themselves do not import an offense, and do not define an offense, unless effected by false tokens or pretenses. Pursuant to this construction of the words, it is held that an indictment for conspiracy to cheat and defraud must set out the false tokens and pretenses to be used in effecting the contemplated fraud. Alderman v. People, 4 Mich. 414, 424, 9 Am. Dec. 321.

CHECK.

"A check is a draft or order upon a bank or banking house, purporting to be drawn upon a deposit of funds for the payment, at all events, of a certain sum of money to a person or his order, or to bearer, and payable instantly on demand." Ridgely Nat. Bank v. Patton, 109 Ill. 479, 484 (quoting and approving 2 Daniel, Neg. Inst. 528); Industrial Bank of Chicago v. Bowes, 46 N. E. 10, 12, 165 Ill. 70, 56 Am. St. Rep. 228; State v. Murphy, 42 S. W. 936, 937, 141 Mo. 267; Connor v. Becker, 76 N. W. 893, 894, 56 Neb. 343; First Nat. Bank of Farmersville v. Greenville Nat. Bank, 84 Tex. 40, 19 S. W. 334; State v. Warner, 55 Pac. 342, 343, 60 Kan. 94. It is presumed to stand on a valid and valuable consideration. Martin v. Martin, 67 N. E. 1, 2, 202 Ill. 382.

"A check or draft on a banker is defined to be a written order or request addressed to persons carrying on the business of bankers, drawn on them by a party having money in their hands, requesting them to pay on presentment to a person therein named, or to bearer, a specified sum of money." Douglass v. Wilkeson (N. Y.) 6 Wend. 637, 643 (citing Chit. Bills, 322); Hawley v. Jette, 10 Or. 31, 34, 45 Am. Rep. 129; In re Brown (U. S.) 4 Fed. Cas. 342, 346.

"A check is defined to be a written order on a bank or banking house, directing it to pay a certain sum of money." Grissom v. Commercial Nat. Bank, 10 S. W. 774, 779, 87 Tenn. (3 Pickle) 350, 3 L. R. A. 273, 10 Am. St. Rep. 669. It is an order for the payment of money. State v. Crawford, 13 La. Ann. 300. A check is an instrument for the payment of a specified sum of money, having a drawer and a payee, and drawn on some bank or banker. State v. Curtis, 40 N. W. 263, 264, 39 Minn. 357. "A 'check' is a written order or request for the payment of money, addressed to a bank or banker." An order addressed to a banker requesting him to let the bearer, son of the alleged drawer, have a certain sum, is a check. Thompson v. State, 49 Ala. 16, 18; Connor v. Becker, 76

N. W. 893, 894, 56 Neb. 343; Industrial Bank of Chicago v. Bowes, 46 N. E. 10, 12, 165 Ill. 70, 56 Am. St. Rep. 228; Ridgely Nat. Bank v. Patton, 109 Ill. 479, 484; Rogers v. Durant, 11 Sup. Ct. 754, 755, 140 U. S. 298, 35 L. Ed. 481. A check is a written request by the one drawing it, on the drawer, to pay money to the drawer or his order. State v. Rickey, 9 N. J. Law (4 Halst.) 293, 312. Thus an indorsement on an architect's certificate reciting that a certain amount is due the contractor, "P. H. & Co.—pay to the order of E." (the contractor), and signed by the owner of the building, P., H. & Co. having in their hands funds of the owner to be paid out as required for the construction of the building, is a check, not a bill of exchange. Industrial Bank of Chicago v. Bowes, 46 N. E. 10, 12, 165 Ill. 70, 56 Am. St. Rep. 228.

A check is a written request by one, called the "drawer," directed to another, called the "drawee," requesting him to pay a third, called the "payee," a certain sum of money therein specified, at all events, on a day certain, or so many days after date or after presentment. Westminster Bank v. Wheaton, 4 R. I. 30, 33.

A check is a bill of exchange drawn upon a bank or banker, or a person described as such upon the face thereof, and payable on demand, without interest. Civ. Code Cal. 1903, § 3254; Civ. Code Idaho 1901, § 2956; Civ. Code Mont. 1895, § 4230; Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 4964; Civ. Code S. D. 1903, § 2279; Rev. St. Okl. 1903, § 3703; Rev. St. Utah 1898, § 1663; Rev. St. Wyo. 1899, § 2440. See, also, House v. Kountze, 43 S. W. 561, 563, 17 Tex. Civ. App. 402.

A check is a bill of exchange drawn on a bank, payable on demand. Rev. Laws Mass. 1902, p. 652, c. 73, § 202; Bates' Ann. St. Ohio 1904, § 3177v; Ann. Codes & St. Or. 1901, § 4587; Code Supp. Va. 1898, § 2841a.

As appropriation or assignment of money.

A check is an order drawn on an existing fund for immediate payment of money. It is an absolute transfer or appropriation to the holder of so much money in the hands of the drawee. Morrison v. Bailey, 5 Ohio St. 13, 17, 64 Am. Dec. 632.

A check is the acknowledgment of a certain sum due. It is an absolute appropriation of so much money in the hands of the drawer's banker to the holder of the check, and there the money should remain until called for by the holder, unless the drawer actually suffers by the delay, as by the intermediate failure of the banker, but he has no reason to complain of delay not unreasonably protracted. If the holder does not unreasonably delay, the drawer assumes the risk of drawee's failure. A check differs from a bill of exchange in that it has no days of grace, and requires no acceptance distinct from payment being made promptly. The drawer of a check is not a surety, but the principal debtor, as much as the maker of a note. In re Brown (U. S.) 4 Fed. Cas. 342, 346.

As banks are debtors to their customers for the amount of their deposits, a check is a request of the customer to pay the whole or a portion of such indebtedness to the bearer, or to the order of the payee. Until presented and accepted, it is inchoate. It vests no title, legal or equitable, in the payee to the fund; before acceptance, the drawer may withdraw his deposit. Attorney General v. Continental Life Ins. Co., 71 N. Y. 325, 27 Am. Rep. 55. A check, therefore, does not constitute an equitable assignment of such portion of the fund drawn on. Akin v. Jones, 27 S. W. 669, 672, 93 Tenn. (9 Pickle) 353, 25 L. R. A. 523, 42 Am. St. Rep. 921; Florence Min. Co. v. Brown, 8 Sup. Ct. 531, 534, 124 U. S. 385, 31 L. Ed. 424.

A check is only a direction to the bank to pay a certain sum of money to the person therein named. The money does not thereby become the property of the payee, nor is it placed beyond the control of the depositor. Neither does a check of itself, before presentation, operate as an assignment to the payee of the money for which it was drawn. O'Connor v. Mechanics' Bank, 124 N. Y. 324, 26 N. E. 816. A check not accepted does not constitute a transfer of any money to the credit of the holder. Pullen v. Placer County Bank, 71 Pac. 83, 84, 138 Cal. 169, 94 Am. St. Rep. 19 (citing Florence Min. Co. v. Brown, 124 U. S. 385, 8 Sup. Ct. 531, 31 L. Ed. 424).

A check is, and always has been, primarily an authority from the maker upon which his banker may rely, but in which the latter has no interest until he has acted thereon. Where, however, a check for a valuable consideration works an assignment of the deposit, equitable or legal, such a check is something more than a mere authority to pay. It also evidences a contract between the maker and payee, and, if that contract is a valid and irrevocable one, the check cannot be revoked as between them. Raesser v. National Exch. Bank, 88 N. W. 618, 620, 112 Wis. 591, 56 L. R. A. 174, 88 Am. St. Rep. 979.

As the execution and delivery of a check assigns to the payee a specified amount represented as belonging to the drawer in the hands of the drawee, it is really an undertaking that the bank or banker on whom it is drawn will deliver to the payee the amount of money expressed, and comes within the provision of the statute of limitations relating to simple contracts in writing. Haynes v. Wesley, 37 S. E. 990, 991, 112 Ga. 668, 81 Am. St. Rep. 72.

A bank check is a bill of exchange under Civ. Code, § 3254, and does not operate at the time of delivery as an equitable assignment pro tanto of the sum on deposit. It was held by the Supreme Court of the United States, in Fourth St. Bank v. Yardley, 165 U. S. 634, 17 Sup. Ct. 439, 41 L. Ed. 855, to be the settled law that a check drawn in the ordinary form does not, as between the maker and the payee, constitute an equitable assignment pro tanto of an indebtedness owing by the bank on which the check has been drawn. Donohoe-Kelly Banking Co. v. Southern Pac. Co., 71 Pac. 93, 94, 138 Cal. 183, 94 Am. St. Rep. 28.

Bank note distinguished.

See "Bank Note."

Bill of exchange distinguished.

A check is denominated a species of inland bill of exchange; not with all the incidents of an ordinary bill of exchange, but still it belongs to that class of commercial paper. Moses v. Franklin Bank, 34 Md. 574, 579; Exchange Bank v. Sutton Bank, 28 Atl. 563, 564, 78 Md. 577, 23 L. R. A. 173.

A check is substantially the same as an inland bill of exchange, and in general is governed by the law applicable to bills of exchange and promissory notes. Barnet v. Smith, 30 N. H. 256, 264, 64 Am. Dec. 290; Foster v. Paulk, 41 Me. 425, 428; Neal v. Coburn, 42 Atl. 348, 350, 92 Me. 139, 69 Am. St. Rep. 495. And hence decisions as to bills of exchange are applicable to cases involving checks. Neal v. Coburn, 42 Atl. 348, 350, 92 Me. 139, 69 Am. St. Rep. 495.

A check on a bank is in legal effect an equivalent to a bill of exchange payable to bearer or order on demand, so that an action on a check is a suit on a written instrument. Connor v. Becker, 76 N. W. 893, 894, 56 Neb. 343.

"Checks upon banks have most of the qualities of inland bills of exchange. They are drawn for a sum certain upon a person or corporation usually having funds of the drawer sufficient for their payment, and are payable on presentation. If payable to bearer they pass by delivery, and, if to the order of the payee, by indorsement in the usual form. They are not payable on time, and are therefore not presented for or subject to acceptance, and in this particular they differ from bills of exchange. The drawer may be made liable, as the drawer of a bill of exchange, upon presentation within a reasonable time and notice of nonpayment." Farmers' & Mechanics' Bank v. Butchers' & Drovers' Bank, 28 N. Y. 425, 427.

It is said in Cruger v. Armstrong (N. Y.) 3 Johns. Cas. 5, 7, 2 Am. Dec. 126: "A check, although generally received as cash, when given in payment is in form and reality a bill of exchange. It possesses all the requisites of the bill, and has been treated as such. Lord Kenyon said in the case of Bo- hem v. Sterling, 7 Term R. 430, that at the trial of that case he thought there was a distinction between a banker's check and a bill of exchange, but on further consideration he did not think that distinction well founded." Douglass v. Wilkeson (N. Y.) 6 Wend. 637, 643.

"A check is a bill of exchange, drawn on a banker, payable on demand." Rand. Com. Paper, § 8. The authorities and textbooks, as a general thing, class them among commercial instruments. All checks are bills, but all bills are not checks, is the conclusion of the authorities. Id., and authorities there cited; Morse, Banks, §§ 363, 393; 2 Daniel, Neg. Inst. § 583; Byles, Bills, 13; 1 Edw. Bills & N. § 19; 2 Pars. Bills & N. 57; Story, Prom. Notes, 487; 3 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 211, note 1. In Branch Bank v. Crocheron, 5 Ala. 250, 254, this court, in defining the term "notes and bills" as employed in a statute against the issuance of such instruments by a corporation, said they were sufficiently comprehensive to include checks, drafts, bills single, bonds, or tokens. First Nat. Bank v. Nelson, 16 South. 707, 708, 105 Ala. 180.

Judge Story says that the distinguishing characteristics of checks, as distinguished from bills of exchange, are that they are always drawn on a bank or banker, they are payable immediately on presentment, without the allowance of any days of grace, and that they are never presented for mere acceptance, but only for payment. By a check on a bank, payable at a future day, the drawer thereof simply undertakes that he will have money there at that day, and no days of grace will be allowed on such a check. Champion v. Gordon, 70 Pa. (20 P. F. Smith) 474, 475, 10 Am. Rep. 681. See, also, Outler v. Reynolds, 64 Ill. 321, 324.

A check is in form and effect a bill of exchange. 3 Kent, Comm. § 44. The difference between one and the other is that the former is drawn upon a bank or on the house of a private banker, is payable on presentment, and the bank or banker is not entitled to days of grace upon it, although payable on some other day than its date. Veazie Bank v. Winn, 40 Me. 60, 61.

A check differs from a bill of exchange in several particulars. It has no days of grace, and requires no acceptance distinct from prompt payment. The drawer of the check is not a surety, but the principal debtor, as much as the maker of a promissory note. It is an absolute appropriation of so much money in the hands of the banker to the holder of the check, and there it ought to remain until called for. People v. Compton, 123 Cal. 403, 410, 56 Pac. 44.

A check is an order for the payment of money, and is not, either in common parlance or in the technical language of the law, a bill of exchange or promissory note, though in some respects it has the same legal operation. People v. Howell (N. Y.) 4 Johns. 296, 301.

Mr. Justice Story, in Re Brown (U. S.) 4 Fed. Cas. 342, says: "I agree that it nearly resembles a bill of exchange, or nullum simile est idem. The distinguishing characteristics of 'checks,' as contradistinguished from 'bills of exchange,' are that they are always drawn on a bank or bankers, that they are payable immediately on presentment without the allowance of any days of grace, and that they are never presentable for mere acceptance." Hawley v. Jette, 10 Or. 31, 34, 45 Am. Rep. 129.

The distinction between checks and inland bills of exchange has been clearly and concisely stated by Mr. Justice Swayne in Merchants' Nat. Bank v. State Nat. Bank, 77 U. S. (10 Wall.) 604, 647, 19 L. Ed. 1008, in which he says: "Banks checks are not inland bills of exchange, but have many of the properties of such commercial paper, and many of the rules of the law merchant are alike applicable to both. It is for a specified sum payable in money. In both cases there is a drawer, a drawee, and a payee. Without acceptance, no action can be maintained by the holder upon either against the drawer. The chief points of difference are that a check is always drawn on a bank or banker; no days of grace are allowed; the drawer is not discharged by the laches of the holder in presentment for payment, unless he can show some injury by the default; it is not due until payment is demanded, and the statute of limitations runs only from that time. It is by its face the appropriation of just so much money of the drawer in the hands of the drawee to the payment of an admitted liability of the drawer." Hawley v. Jette, 10 Or. 31, 34, 45 Am. Rep. 129; Haynes v. Wesley, 37 S. E. 990, 991, 112 Ga. 668, 81 Am. St. Rep. 72; Levy v. Laclede Bank (U. S.) 18 Fed. 193, 194; Bull v. First Nat. Bank, 8 Sup. Ct. 62, 63, 123 U. S. 105, 31 L. Ed. 97; Exchange Bank v. Sutton Bank, 28 Atl. 563, 564, 78 Md. 577, 23 L. R. A. 173.

A check is a short bill of exchange, payable on demand, and is therefore within the term "bill of exchange" in Act III. Nov. 5, 1849, § 2, providing that all actions founded on bills of exchange, orders, etc., shall be commenced within five years after the action accrued. Rogers v. Durant, 11 Sup. Ct. 754, 755, 140 U. S. 298, 35 L. Ed. 481.

"A check is an order to the bank to pay the money of the drawer to the payee. It is an appropriation of money; cash. It differs from a bill of exchange in that the element of credit inheres in the latter, as it is made payable at some future day." George Nat.

Bank v. Henderson, 46 Ga. 487, 491, 12 Am. Rep. 590.

As cash.

See "Cash."

Cashier's check distinguished.

A "cashier's check," so called, differs radically from an ordinary check. The latter is merely a bill of exchange drawn by an individual on a bank, payable on demand; or, in other words, it is an order upon a bank, purporting to be drawn upon a deposit of funds for the payment of a certain sum of money to a person named, or to order or bearer, on demand. As between himself and the bank, the drawer of the check has the power of countermanding his order of payment at any time before the bank has paid it or committed itself to pay it. A cashier's check is of an entirely different nature. It is a bill of exchange drawn by the bank upon itself, and is accepted by the act of issuance, and, of course, the right of countermand as applied to ordinary checks does not exist as to it. Drinkall v. Movius State Bank, 88 N. W. 724, 726, 11 N. D. 10, 57 L. R. A. 341, 95 Am. St. Rep. 693.

Deposit presumed.

A check purports to be made upon a deposit to meet it, and presupposes funds of the drawer in the hands of the drawee. First Nat. Bank of Portland v. Linn County Nat. Bank, 47 Pac. 614, 615, 30 Or. 296.

A check is an order for the payment of money, drawn on bankers, and payable immediately on presentment without any days of grace, and by its terms is supposed to be drawn on a previous deposit of funds, and is, in fact, an absolute appropriation of so much money in the hands of bankers to the holder of the check, to remain there until called for. Lester v. Given, 71 Ky. (8 Bush) 357, 360.

Draft.

Under Civ. Code, § 3254, defining a "check" as a bill of exchange drawn upon a bank or banker, payable on demand, without interest, instruments having these characteristics do not cease to be checks because drawn by a bank. Garthwaite v. Bank of Tulare, 66 Pac. 326, 327, 134 Cal. 237. The fact that they are payable in another state than the one in which they are drawn does not change their character as checks. Bowen v. Needles Nat. Bank (U. S.) 87 Fed. 430, 437.

A draft is an order for the payment of money, drawn by one person on another. Wildes v. Savage (U. S.) 29 Fed. Cas. 1226. It is said to be a nomen generalissimum, and to include all such orders. Wooster defines it: "An order by which one person draws on another for a certain sum of money; a check; a bill of exchange." Thus the word "draft," as used in Laws 1891, c. 43, § 16, relates to forgery as a general term, and includes checks. State v. Warner, 55 Pac. 342, 343, 60 Kan. 94.

As false token.

As money.

See "Money."

As note or order.

See "Note"; "Order (In Commercial Law)."

Payable on demand or presentment.

Nearly every definition of a "check" given in the books is to the effect not only that it must be drawn on a bank or banker, but that it must be payable on demand. A draft on a bank payable on a day subsequent to its date is a bill of exchange, and not a check. Harrison v. Nicollet Nat. Bank of Minneapolis, 43 N. W. 336, 41 Minn. 488, 5 L. R. A. 746, 16 Am. St. Rep. 718.

A check is a bill of exchange, payable on demand, on which an action will not lie against the drawer until after notice of presentment and nonpayment, which must be made within a reasonable time. Harker v. Anderson (N. Y.) 21 Wend. 372, 373. It imports an instrument payable on its date. Church v. Pontifex, 9 C. B. 229, 248.

A check is an order to pay the holder a sum of money at a bank on presentment and demand. No previous notice is necessary; no acceptance is required or expected; it has no days of grace; is payable on presentment, and not before. Head v. Hornblower, 31 N. E. 489, 156 Mass. 458, 16 L. R. A. 510, 32 Am. St. Rep. 472. Bullard v. Randall, 67 Mass. (1 Gray) 605, 606, 61 Am. Dec. 433.

As personal property.

See "Personal Property."

As thing of value.

A check represents a certain sum of money which the drawer of the check intends that the payee shall in fact have. While not money, a check is a thing of value, and therefore it is the subject of conversion. Pawson v. Miller, 72 N. Y. Supp. 1011, 1012, 66 App. Div. 12.

CHECK GUERILLA.

A "check guerilla" is one who frequents gambling rooms and solicits money, on the checks used therein to represent money, from the proprietor, bystanders, or bettors. Comp. Laws Nev. 1900, § 4861.

CHECK-ROWER.

A "check-rower" is an attachment to a machine for planting corn. Joliet Mfg. Co. v. Dice, 105 Ill. 649, 650.

CHEESE.

See "Filled Cheese"; "Skimmed Milk Cheese."

For the purpose of the provision relating to the sale of adulterated cheese or butter, the terms "butter" and "cheese" mean the products usually known by those names, and which are manufactured exclusively from milk or cream, or both, with salt and rennet, and with or without coloring matter. Rev. St. Me. 1883, p. 923, c. 128, § 6.

For the purpose of the statutory provisions relative to the sale of imitation butter and cheese, the terms "butter" and "cheese" shall mean the products which are usually known by these names, and are manufactured exclusively from milk or cream, with salt and rennet, and with or without coloring matter. Rev. Laws Mass. 1902, p. 547, c. 56, § 35.

The terms "butter" and "cheese" shall be understood to mean the products usually known by those names, and which are manufactured exclusively from milk or cream, or both, with salt, and with or without coloring matter, and, if cheese, with rennet. Pub. St. N. H. 1901, p. 402, c. 127, § 22.

The term "cheese," as used in the chapter of the Penal Code relating to adulterated dairy products, is understood to mean the product usually known by that name, and which is manufactured exclusively from milk or cream, or both. Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 7648.

The word "cheese," as used in an act relating to internal revenue tax on filled cheese, shall be understood to mean the food product known as "cheese," and which is made from milk or cream, and without the addition of butter, or any animal, vegetable, or other oils or fats foreign to such milk or cream, with or without additional coloring matter. U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 2236.

CHEESE FACTORY.

For the purpose of the pure food act, a "cheese factory" is defined as "factory where milk with or without the addition of salt, rennet and coloring matter is manufactured into cheese." Cobbeys Ann. St. Neb. 1903, § 9410.

CHEMICAL.

A chemical is a substance used for producing a chemical effect, or one produced by a chemical process; a chemical agent prepared for scientific or economic use. Shreveport Gas, Electric Light & Power Co. v. Assessor of Caddo Parish, 16 South. 650, 651, 47 La. Ann. 65 (citing Cent. Dict.); Phoenix Ins. Co. v. Flemming, 44 S. W. 464, 465, 65 Ark. 54, 39 L. R. A. 789, 67 Am. St. Rep. 900.

The word "chemical," however, as used in a constitutional exemption from taxation of capital and machinery employed in the manufacture of chemicals, is to be understood not from a scientific point of view, but in its generally accepted meaning, and in that meaning cannot be held to include illuminating gas. Shreveport Gas, Electric Light & Power Co. v. Assessor of Caddo Parish, 16 South. 650, 651, 47 La. Ann. 65.

Benzine put up in bottles containing from two to six ounces, to be sold for cleansing purposes, is included in the term "chemicals," as used in a fire policy, and insuring drugs and chemicals. Phoenix Ins. Co. v. Flemming, 44 S. W. 464, 465, 65 Ark. 54, 39 L. R. A. 789, 67 Am. St. Rep. 900.

Soda and similar drinks are not "chemicals," within the meaning of Const. art. 207, as amended by Act 1886, No. 92, p. 129, exempting property employed in manufacturing chemicals, though the making of such drinks depends in part on the result of a chemical process. Crescent City Seltz & Mineral Water Co. v. City of New Orleans, 19 South. 943, 944, 48 La. Ann. 768.

We do not understand that illuminating gas is generally understood to be chemicals, so as to exempt capital and machinery employed in its manufacture from taxation under the amendment to the 270th article of the Constitution exempting from taxation capital and machinery employed in the manufacture of chemicals. Shreveport Gas, Electric Light & Power Co. v. Assessor of Caddo Parish, 16 South. 650, 651, 47 La. Ann. 65.

CHEMICAL SALTS.

"Chemical salts," as used in Tariff Act Oct. 1, 1890, par. 76, include muriate or hydrochlorate of cocaine. Lehn v. United States (U. S.) 66 Fed. 748.

CHEMICALLY PURE.

"Chemically pure," as used in reference to substances employed in chemical process, means absolutely pure. Matheson v. Campbell (U. S.) 69 Fed. 597, 608.

CHEMIST.

See "Pharmaceutical Chemist."

Apothecary distinguished, see "Apothecary."

CHEROKEE.

The Cherokee Nation has been variously described by the courts as a domestic, dependent nation (Cherokee Nation v. Georgia, 30 U. S. [5 Pet.] 1, 8 L. Ed. 25); as a state, in a certain sense, although not a foreign state or a state of the Union (Holden v. Joy, 84 U. S. [17 Wall.] 211, 21 L. Ed. 523); as a distinct community, with boundaries accurately described (Worcester v. Georgia, 31 U. S. [6 Pet.] 515, 8 L. Ed. 483); an alien, though dependent, power (Elk v. Wilkins, 112 U. S. 94, 103, 5 Sup. Ct. 41, 28 L. Ed. 643); not a foreign, but a domestic, territory; a territory which originated under our Constitution and laws. Thebo v. Choctaw Tribe of Indians (U. S.) 66 Fed. 372, 374, 13 C. C. A. 519 (citing Mackey v. Cox, 59 U. S. [18 How.] 100, 15 L. Ed. 299).

CHEROKEE LANDS.

Lands described in a deed as "Cherokee lands" are not necessarily lands ceded to the Cherokee Indians by the United States. Ephraim v. Garlick, 10 Kan. 280, 281.

CHEROKEE OUTLET.

As Indian country, see "Indian Country."

CHERRY JUICE.

Tariff Act 1890, par. 339, relating to the duties on "cherry juice," includes cherry juice so concentrated that five gallons in its natural condition are reduced to one gallon, the entire amount of acidity and coloring matter being retained, and the bulk of the water eliminated. In re Rheinstrom (U. S.) 60 Fed. 599, 600.

Cherries of an inedible variety, imported in casks in a surrounding fluid containing alcohol, added for the purpose of resisting fermentation and decay, intended for use in the manufacture of cherry juice, are dutiable under paragraph 263, Schedule G, § 1, c. 11, Tariff Act July 24, 1897, 30 Stat. 171 (U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1651), as "fruits preserved in spirits," and not under paragraph 299, Schedule H, § 1, c. 11, of said act, 30 Stat. 174 (U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1655), as "cherry juice, etc." Voight v. Mihalovitch (U. S.) 125 Fed. 78, 82.

CHEST.

The words "trunk" and "chest" are not synonymous, and therefore an indictment charging the theft of a trunk or chest, being in the alternative, is bad for want of certainty. Potter v. State, 39 Tex. 388, 389.

CHICORY.

Chicory is a compound used to some extent to flavor coffee, and more largely, both in Germany and in this country, to mix with coffee, or as a substitute for coffee for purposes of economy. It is sold for about six cents per pound, and is also used by dealers as an adulterant to mix with ground coffee, and by consumers to mix with, or as a substitute for, coffee. United States v. Rosenstein (U. S.) 60 Fed. 74, 75, 8 C. C. A. 474.

CHIEF.

"A person engaged chiefly in farming," within the bankrupt act, is one whose chief occupation or business is farming, and one's chief occupation or business, so far as worldly pursuits are concerned, is that which is of principal concern to him, of some permanency in its nature, which he deems of paramount importance to his welfare, and on which he chiefly relies for his livelihood, or as the means of acquiring wealth, great or small. In re Mackey (U. S.) 110 Fed. 355, 358.

CHIEF FISCAL OFFICER.

Code Civ. Proc. § 3245, provides that costs cannot be awarded to the plaintiff in an action against a municipal corporation in which the complaint demands judgment for a sum of money only, unless the complaint upon which the action is founded was, before the commencement of the action, presented for payment to the "chief fiscal officer" of the corporation. Under other provisions of the statute the comptroller of the city of Buffalo was charged with superintendence of the fiscal concerns of the city and management of the same, and it was made his duty, by and with the advice of the common council, to appoint an auditor, who shall examine and report upon all unliquidated claims against the city before the same should be audited by the common council. Other provisions require that money should only be drawn from the treasury by warrants authorized by the common council, and signed by the mayor and city clerk and countersigned by the comptroller, etc., and it was held that the comptroller was the "chief fiscal officer" of the corporation within the meaning of the statute. Williams v. City of Buffalo (N. Y.) 25 Hun, 301.

CHIEF JUDGE.

The term "chief judge" is equivalent to that of presiding justice or presiding magistrate. Bean v. Loryea, 22 Pac. 513, 81 Cal. 151.

CHIEF MAGISTRATE.

Under an act authorizing the acknowledgment of deeds before any "mayor, chief magistrate, or officer" of the cities, towns, or places where the deed was made, it is held that the word "mayor" refers to cities, "chief magistrate" to towns, and "officers" to places. McIntire's Lessee v. Ward (Pa.) 3 Yeates, 424, 426.

CHIEF OFFICE.

Code, § 92, provides, as one of the grounds of attachment, that defendant is a corporation whose "chief office or place of business" is out of the state. In construing this section, the court holds that the expressions "chief office" and "place of business," while not strictly synonymous, must be regarded as equivalent, saying: "The essential characteristics of each might be very different. The former would ordinarily be the place where the officials charged with the general management of its affairs might meet and direct them, while the latter might be the same, or the place where its business operations were carried on under the direction and supervision of an authorized agent. The two designations are mentioned in the disjunctive, but it is clear that one must be considered the equivalent of the other, although each may be maintained at a separate place." Rocky Mountain Oil Co. v. Central Nat. Bank, 67 Pac. 153, 154, 29 Colo. 129.

CHIEF PLACE OF BUSINESS.

The words "chief place of business in the county" within the act of 1893, giving courts of common pleas jurisdiction to issue mandamus to corporations having their chief place of business within the county, authorizes mandamus against a railroad company operating its road almost entirely within one county where its operating officers dwell, but having its principal offices in Philadelphia, to be brought in either county. Lorraine v. Pittsburg, J., E. & E. R. Co., 54 Atl. 580, 583, 205 Pa. 132, 61 L. R. A. 502.

CHIEFEST.

The construction of the words "chiefest and discretest," as relating to the persons authorized to nominate to an advowson, is difficult. The use of these words is a strong badge of antiquity. Formerly a few of the principal people of the parish met and settled the business themselves, and the rest of the parish were obliged to them for taking the trouble on themselves, and did not interfere. The degree of chiefness and discreteness it is impossible to grasp. The distinction of rich and poor has only been determined by paying the parish rates. This is certainly a much wider range than was originally intended, but it is the only one that can be followed, though the court may be perfectly satisfied that it never was the intent of the original donor. Fearon v. Webb, 14 Ves. 13, 24.

CHILD—CHILDREN.

See "Abortive Child"; "After-Born Child"; "Census Children"; "Colored Child"; "Legitimate Child"; "Natural Child"; "Neglected Child"; "Poor Children."

All children, see "All."

Any child, see "Any."

Other children, see "Other."

Adults.

"The word 'children,' when used irrespective of parentage, may denote that class of persons under the age of twenty-one years as distinguished from adults, but its ordinary meaning with respect to parentage is sons and daughters, of whatever age." Miller v. Finegan, 7 South. 140, 142, 26 Fla. 29, 6 L. R. A. 818.

Grandchildren.

Ordinarily, the word "children" means the immediate offspring, and does not include grandchildren. Shanks v. Mills, 25 S. C. 358, 362.

"Children" is not a word of art; it has a natural sense, in which it is most generally used. When applied to the remote descendants of any person, it is altogether a figurative expression; thus we read of the "children of Seth," the "children of Ham," and the "children of Israel." In the latter instance it is used to denote a whole nation. When not used in that figurative sense it means the immediate offspring of a man or woman. Smith v. Chapman (Va.) 1 Hen. & M. 240, 290.

The term "children" does not ordinarily, and properly speaking, comprehend grandchildren, or issue generally, yet sometimes that meaning is affixed to it in cases of necessity. Waldron v. Taylor, 45 S. E. 336, 338, 52 W. Va. 284.

Heirs.

In popular language children are often called "heirs," but the legal rule of construction, as applied in many cases of written instruments, is that the word "heirs" is to be accepted in its technical and artistic sense, unless there be something in the context to interpret it differently. Huss v. Stephens, 51 Pa. (1 P. F. Smith) 282, 287.

An allegation, in proceedings for the allotment of dower, that certain persons are the only "children" of decedent, is not a sufficient averment that they are his only heirs. There may have been others who "are not," but, having died, may have left children who would also be, heirs, although they would not in common parlance be the "children" of the decedent. Martin's Heirs v. Martin, 22 Ala. 86, 100.

As representative.

See "Representative."

Stepchildren.

Where the minor children of a wife are recognized and treated as members of the family of their stepfather, and are supported and maintained by him, he stands to them in loco parentis, and may exercise the control and authority of a parent over them. Gorman v. State, 42 Tex. 221, 222.

As a sufficient description.

The use of the word "children," in a notice by a town furnishing support to paupers, to the town liable therefor, that support has been furnished to A. and three children, is sufficient, the number of the children being given, and it not being suggested or shown that A. had a larger number of children. City of Lynn v. City of Newburyport, 87 Mass. (5 Allen) 545, 546; Inhabitants of Orange v. Inhabitants of Sudbury, 27 Mass. (10 Pick.) 22, 24.

The use of the word "children," in a notice by a town furnishing support to paupers, to the town chargeable therewith, that the support has been furnished to the children of A., is insufficient, by reason of its uncertainty, as a designation of the persons to whom the support has been furnished. Town of Middletown v. Town of Berlin, 18 Conn. 189, 195.

The words "child of W.," in a notice by a town furnishing support to the child, to the town chargeable with its support, that such support has been furnished to the child of W., is a sufficient description of the pauper. Inhabitants of Ware v. Inhabitants of Williamstown, 25 Mass. (8 Pick.) 388, 389.

The words "children of N.," in a deed conveying property to children of N., is sufficient as a description of the grantees, if it can be shown who were intended by such words, and that they were in life and capable of taking at the time the deed was executed. Hogg v. Odom (Ga.) Dud. 185.

Youth distinguished.

The words "children" and "youth" are frequently used in connection. The word "children" includes persons of both sexes, and "youth" differs from it only by referring to and including persons of somewhat more advanced age and proficiency. Nelson v. Cushing, 56 Mass. 519, 533.

CHILD—CHILDREN (In Conveyances).

After-born child.

The term "children," in a deed conveying property to the children of a person, will not include children born after the conveyance. Hogg v. Odom (Ga.) Dud. 185.

The term "children," in a deed to a woman and her children, will include a child en ventre sa mere, but not a child born more than a year after the conveyance. Heath v. Heath, 114 N. C. 547, 19 S. E. 155.

Where a father deeds certain lands to a daughter, her husband, and her children forever, it applies to the children then living and after-born children, where, familiar as the grantor was with his daughter's family, he forbore to name them as grantees, but used the broad and generic term "children," comprehensive enough to embrace all those who at any time were born to this daughter. Blackburn v. Blackburn, 73 S. W. 109, 110, 109 Tenn. 674.

Children living only.

"Children," when used in a deed by which the grantor conveys land in trust for his wife and her children, means only those children then living. Varner v. Young's Ex'r, 56 Ala. 260, 266.

Where a deed of trust provided that the income of the trust estate should, after the death of the settlor and his wife, go to the children and issue of the deceased's children, it was held that the words "children and issue" were intended to apply to the ones in being at that time. In re Eyre's Estate, 55 Atl. 541, 542, 205 Pa. 561.

Heirs.

"Children and heirs at law," as used in a deed creating a life estate in the grantee, and providing that after his death the title in fee simple should vest in his children and heirs at law equally, must be construed as constituting a class. The word "heirs at law" may well be construed as being interchangeable with "children." Waddell v. Waddell, 12 S. W. 349, 350, 99 Mo. 338, 17 Am. St. Rep. 575.

"Children," as used in an instrument reciting the purchase of a farm which the writer intended for the benefit of his sister and her children, cannot be given the effect of "heirs" as determinative of the nature of the estate. Cathcart v. Nelson's Adm'r, 40 Atl. 826, 827, 70 Vt. 317.

"Children," as used in a deed to a woman, and at her death to her children by her present husband, meant heirs. Ross v. Adams, 28 N. J. Law (4 Dutch.) 160, 169.

"Children," as used in a deed conveying real estate to one for and during her natural life, and at her death to the children of her body in fee simple, is a word of purchase and not of limitation, and is not synonymous with "heirs" or "heirs of the body," which are words of limitation, and the grantee took only a life estate. Burns v. Weesner, 34 N.

El. 10, 134 Ind. 442; Bowers v. Bowers, 51 Tenn. (4 Heisk.) 293, 295.

Heirs of body.

In a deed granting realty to A. and her children, her heirs and assigns, the word "children" will not be construed to mean heirs of the body. Sease v. Sease, 41 S. E. 898, 64 S. C. 218.

Issue.

The word "children" usually means descendants of the first degree, and, where used in a deed of property to a wife to have and to hold the land to her and to the children of her body begotten by E., her husband, being used in connection with the word "begotten," must be confined to immediate descendants—those of the first generation. Downing v. Birney, 70 N. W. 1006, 1008, 112 Mich. 474.

Legitimate children.

"Children," as used in a deed conveying the property to the grantee, and at her death to such child or children as she may leave living, does not include illegitimate children. Johnstone v. Tallafiero, 32 S. E. 931, 934, 107 Ga. 6, 45 L. R. A. 95. See, also, Hall v. Cressey, 43 Atl. 118, 119, 92 Me. 514.

Property was conveyed to trustees for the use of the grantor's freed mulatto woman during her life, and then for the use of her son C., and to his heirs and assigns, and, "in case of the death of C. without leaving issue, then to have and hold the property to any other quarteron child or children that she may have * * * but in case she should die without leaving issue of the aforesaid description, then to hold the property to and for use of her heirs and assigns forever." C. died without issue, and she executed a deed of the property, and died leaving illegitimate quarteron children, who claimed the property; but, as a trust to illegitimate children to be thereafter born is void as against good morals, the terms "issue" and "child or children" must be construed to mean legitimate children, and, as she left none such, the property passed under her deed to her grantee. Kingsley v. Broward, 19 Fla. 722, 745.

As words of inheritance.

"Children" usually means descendants of the first degree, and includes neither grandchildren nor more remote descendants, and as used in a deed will not be considered words of inheritance. Downing v. Birney, 70 N. W. 1006, 1008, 112 Mich. 474.

As words of purchase.

Ordinarily the words "child" and "children" are words of purchase, vesting a new estate in those persons, and not words of limitation, ineffectual to vest an estate, but effectual to mark out the limits of the ancestor's estate, showing it to be an estate of inheritance, and prescribing the course of descent. Therefore, when they are used in a deed, they are never words of limitation, and they are always words of purchase in a will, unless the context and circumstances are such as to show that they were used in a sense of "heirs," and with the intent to make them words of limitation. Martin v. Martin, 44 S. E. 198, 201, 52 W. Va. 381.

The words "children, issue of their or either of their bodies," are necessarily words of purchase in a deed, and ordinarily so in a will. Melshimer v. Gross, 58 Pa. (8 P. F. Smith) 412, 414.

The word "children," used in a grant to one and his children, etc., will be construed to be a word of purchase, and not a word of limitation. McIlhinny v. McIlhinny, 37 N. E. 147, 149, 137 Ind. 411, 24 L. R. A. 489, 45 Am. St. Rep. 186. "Children," as used in a deed to an unmarried woman and her children, is to be construed as a word of purchase, and hence the grantee took an estate for life with remainder to her children. "If there had been children living at the time of the grant, they probably would have been taken as tenants in common with their mother." Fales v. Currier, 55 N. H. 392, 394.

"Although the word 'children' is sometimes used to denote the entire class of persons who are to take in succession, and in such case is synonymous with the word 'heirs,' yet generally the word 'children' is used as a word of purchase." As used in a conveyance to the grantor's children for life, and after their death to their children, it was a word of purchase. Haywood's Heirs v. Moore, 21 Tenn. (2 Humph.) 584, 586; Perry v. Calhoun, 27 Tenn. (8 Humph.) 551, 556.

The rule in Wild's Case by which, where lands are devised to a person and his children, and he has no child at the time of the devise, the parent takes an estate tail, has no application to a case in which there is a child or children of the mother living at the time of the execution of the deed. The word "children" is not, therefore, a word of limitation, but of purchase. Coursey v. Davis, 46 Pa. (10 Wright) 25, 27, 84 Am. Dec. 519.

The word "children," in a deed conveying land to the grantee for life, and after his death to the then living children of his body, which declares that the grantee is to have no greater interest than a life estate, and that at his death said contract shall go to the children of his body then living, is a word of purchase, and not of limitation, and the grantee takes a life estate, remainder over to the children. Jackson v. Jackson, 26 N. E. 897, 127 Ind. 346.

CHILD—CHILDREN (In Criminal Law).As minor child.

The term "child," as used in the chapter of the Penal Code prohibiting the sale of obscene literature to minors, imports any person not exceeding 18 years of age. Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 7216.

The word "child," as used in the definition of aggravated assault, is not synonymous with "minor," or "one under 21 years of age," but is used in its ordinary signification. Allen v. State, 7 Tex. App. 298, 301; McGregor v. State, 4 Tex. App. 599, 601.

"Child," as defined by Black, means generally the young under the age of puberty, and a male person who has attained the physical strength and stature of manhood, and who is almost as large as his father, but not quite as strong, is not a "child" within Code, § 4612h, making any one guilty of a misdemeanor who shall torture, torment, misuse, etc., any child. Collins v. State, 25 S. E. 325, 326, 97 Ga. 433, 35 L. R. A. 501.

In construing the word "child" in article 496 of the Penal Code, declaring an assault aggravated when committed by an adult male upon a child, the court holds that inasmuch as no statutory definition of the word "child" has been given, and that as article 59 of the Code of Procedure requires words to be understood in their usual acceptation, except when their meaning is particularly defined by law, the word "child" means a young person as contradistinguished from a person whose age implies settled habits and discretion, and that the word when applied to a boy means a male not above the age of 14, and when applied to a girl means a female not above the age of 12. Bell v. State, 18 Tex. App. 53, 56, 51 Am. Rep. 293.

The use in the Penal Code of any word expressive of relationship, state, condition, office, or trust of any person, as the "parent," "child," "ascendant," "descendant," "minor," "infant," "ward," "guardian," or the like, or of the relative pronouns "he" or "they" in reference thereto, includes both males and females. Pen. Code Tex. 1895, art. 22.

As quick child.

"Child," as used in Pen. Code, § 81, relating to abortion, means a living child; that is to say, an unborn child so far developed as to be ordinarily called "quick," and which is still alive when the alleged unlawful means are employed to produce the miscarriage or abortion. Taylor v. State, 33 S. E. 190, 105 Ga. 846.

As under age of puberty.

"Child," as used in Cr. Code Neb. § 12, providing that any person who shall have carnal knowledge of a female child, etc., does not necessarily mean a child between birth and puberty, it being sufficient to prove that the female was not a child under the age of 15 years. The definition of "childhood," when used in the abstract, according to Webster, includes the time intervening between birth and puberty, and it is no doubt true that such definition should be applied in cases where the word is used in the concrete, but such definition is not applicable to the word in the sense in which it is used in this statute. The common law fixed the age of consent at 10, but with a provision that, if it be shown that the female was so far advanced physically and intellectually as to be able to understand the consequences of the act, the limitation did not apply. State v. Wright, 40 N. W. 596, 597, 25 Neb. 38.

"Child," as used in 3 How. Ann. St. § 9094, providing that if any person shall unlawfully carnally know or abuse any female child under the age of 14 years he shall be punished, includes any female under such age, even though she has attained the age of puberty. People v. Miller, 55 N. W. 675, 676, 96 Mich. 119.

"Child," as used in Pen. Code, art. 496, declaring an assault aggravated when committed by an adult on a child, means a young person as contradistinguished from a person whose age implies settled habits and discretion. When applied to a boy the term means a male not above the age of 14, and when applied to a girl means a female not above the age of 12. Bell v. State, 18 Tex. App. 53, 51 Am. Rep. 293.

The word "child" is quite frequently applied to any young person who is under age, less than majority, and is often used in the broader sense of offspring. As used in an indictment for rape, it means that the prosecutrix was immature, but it would be a false construction to say that it meant that she was not 13 years of age. State v. Gaston, 65 N. W. 415, 416, 96 Iowa, 505.

CHILD—CHILDREN (In Insurance).Adopted children.

"The word 'child,' in legal documents, is not always confined to immediate offspring. It may include grandchildren, step-children, children of adoption, etc., as may be necessary to carry out the intention." As used in a life policy payable to the wife of the insured, or to their children if the wife should die before the insured, which policy was written at the time when the insured had no children except an adopted child, it was construed to include such adopted child. Martin v. Aetna Life Ins. Co., 73 Me. 25, 27.

As used in the by-laws of a mutual insurance company providing that, on the death of a member leaving children and no wife, then the whole sum shall be paid to the "children," an adopted child will be held to be included, as under the laws of the state the adopted child became a member of the family of his adopter, the same as a natural child. Kemp v. New York Produce Exchange, 54 N. Y. Supp. 678, 679, 34 App. Div. 175.

Adults.

The terms "child or children," as used in a regulation of a benevolent association, providing that certain benefits shall be paid to the lodge of which deceased was a member for the use or benefit of his orphan child or children in equal shares, and that in case there should be no widow, child or children, or designated person or object, the amount shall be paid to his executor or administrator, necessarily relate to the child or children mentioned in a preceding clause, namely, orphan child or children. The last clause does not purport to create any right in any class of children, but merely undertakes to prevent a lapse or forfeiture in a certain case; and it is evident that it was not designed that the fund should lapse if deceased left adult children, and yet vest in the personal representative if he left no children at all. Hammerstein v. Parsons, 29 Mo. App. 509, 517.

After-born child.

A life policy expressed to be for the benefit of the wife and children of the assured vests, when issued, the amount of the policy in the wife and children then in being, to the exclusion of after-born children. Connecticut Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Baldwin, 23 Atl. 105, 106, 15 R. I. 106. Where a benefit certificate is payable to the children of the insured, the word "children" means those in existence at the time and those born afterward. Thomas v. Leake, 3 S. W. 703, 704, 67 Tex. 469.

The word "children," as used in a policy of life insurance providing that it should be payable to the children of the insured, includes children born after the issuance of the policy. In a policy of insurance payable to the children, the interests of the beneficiaries become vested at the time of the delivery of the policy, or when it takes effect, and will open and let in any after-born children whether of a first or second marriage. Scull v. Aetna Life Ins. Co., 43 S. E. 504, 505, 132 N. C. 30, 60 L. R. A. 615, 95 Am. St. Rep. 615.

Child by future marriage.

A life policy provided that the amount of the insurance should be payable on the insured's death to S., his wife, and in case of her death before his decease the policy should be paid to his children. S. died intestate before the insured, leaving children, after which insured married another, by whom he had a child, who, with its mother, survived the insured. Held, that the term "children" as used in the policy should not be construed as limited to the children of insured's first wife, but included children of both marriages. Ricker v. Charter Oak Life Ins. Co., 6 N. W. 771, 772, 27 Minn. 193, 38 Am. Rep. 289.

Grandchildren.

"Children," as used in the by-laws of a benevolent association providing that on the death of a member a sum of money should be paid to the widow of such member, if there be one, or, if he leaves no widow, then to the child or children or their lawful guardian, means immediate progeny, and cannot be extended to include grandchildren. In recognition of the fact that in the absence of such construction the amount of the insurance or benefit would revert to the association, the court says: "We should be very much inclined to hold that the word 'children' as used in the by-laws of the association is broad enough to include 'grandchildren,' such grandchildren to take in lieu of their parent by representation, if we could find in the charter or by-laws any language to warrant this construction, inasmuch as this construction is completely consonant with the spirit and purposes of the association. We know of no precedent in point. The only cases that we think of which afford an analogy are cases relating to the use of the word in wills. Those cases held that the word is to be understood in its simple and primary signification when it can be so understood, and that it cannot be held to include grandchildren unless it is necessary to hold so in order to give effect to the words of the will or the evident intent of the testator. These cases do not give countenance to the construction for which the defendant contends. To reach that construction it is necessary to take two steps away from the letter of the by-law. The first step is to hold that the word 'children' includes 'grandchildren'; the second step is to hold that grandchildren, though designated by the word 'children,' do not take per capita like the children, but only through their deceased parent by representation. To take these two steps would be rather to supply what may be supposed to be a defect or omission in the by-law, than simply to interpret it." Winsor v. Odd Fellows' Beneficial Ass'n, 13 R. I. 149, 150.

"Children," as used in a life insurance policy providing that payment shall be made to the children of the insured, or, if there are no such children surviving, then to his executors, etc., will not be held to have been used in the sense of "issue," so as to entitle a grandchild of a deceased child to an interest in the policy. Elgar v. Equitable Life Assur. Soc., 88 N. W. 927, 929, 113 Wis. 90.

"Children," as used in a life insurance policy payable to the insured's executors for the benefit of his widow, if any, and his then surviving children, mean the direct offspring, and not the grandchildren or later descendants. Grandchildren will not be considered as included in the term "children," unless such intention is clearly expressed. Small v. Jose, 29 Atl. 976, 86 Me. 120.

The term "children," in a life policy issued upon the life of a husband for the use of his wife if she survived him, otherwise payable to their children, was construed to include a grandchild of the insured, the issue of one of the children who died before his mother, who also died before insured. Hull v. Hull (N. Y.) 62 How. Prac. 100.

The term "children," in a life policy payable to the children of insured, includes a child of a child deceased at the time of the death of insured, though there are other children of insured living. Continental Life Ins. Co. v. Palmer, 42 Conn. 60, 64, 19 Am. Rep. 530.

Legitimate children.

St. 1888, c. 429, limiting the beneficiary of a member of a beneficial association to the husband, wife, "children," relatives of, or persons dependent on, such member, means legitimate children. Lavigne v. Ligue des Patriotes, 59 N. E. 674, 675, 178 Mass. 25, 54 L. R. A. 814, 86 Am. St. Rep. 460 (citing Kent v. Barker, 68 Mass. [2 Gray] 535; 2 Jarm. Wills [6th Am. Ed.] 1076).

CHILD—CHILDREN (In Statutes).

"Children," as used in the Constitution, providing that a guardian or trustee of a family of minor children shall be entitled to a homestead, etc., should not be construed as meaning exclusively the plural number, but may mean simply "child," so that one child would be a family of minor children. Rountree v. Dennard, 59 Ga. 629, 630, 27 Am. Rep. 401.

"Children," as used in Gantt's Dig. § 7, providing that when any man shall die leaving minor "children" and no widow, and his estate shall not be above a certain sum, it shall pass to and vest in the minor children for their support and education, and no administrator of said estate shall be required, means one child only, as well as several. Smith v. Allen, 31 Ark. 268, 271.

The words "child or children" may mean one or more children. Bates' Ann. St. Ohio 1904, § 548-38.

Adopted children.

Within the act exempting children from the collateral inheritance tax, an adopted child is not included in the term "child." Commonwealth v. Nancrede, 32 Pa. (8 Casey) 389, 390; In re Miller's Estate, 18 N. E. 139, 140, 110 N. Y. 216.

In Laws N. Y. 1887, c. 713, exempting from transfer tax transfers to child of a decedent, the word "child" will not include the child of a person who stood in the mutually acknowledged relation of child to the deceased, but was a stranger to the blood. In re Moore's Estate, 35 N. Y. Supp. 782, 784, 90 Hun, 162.

"Children" is not synonymous with "issue" and "heirs," and in Rev. St. 1855, p. 355, c. 32, § 5, changing an estate in fee tail into a life estate in the grantee, with remainder to his children, or, if he have no issue, then to his heirs, the word "children" was used in its primary technical sense as lineal descendants, so as to exclude a child by adoption. Clarkson v. Hatton, 44 S. W. 761, 762, 143 Mo. 47, 39 L. R. A. 748, 65 Am. St. Rep. 635.

In Elliot, Supp. § 423, providing that if a man marry a second wife, but has children alive by a former wife, the fee in his land shall on his death vest in such children, subject to a life estate in the widow, "children" includes a child adopted by the husband and his former wife, since an adopted child is entitled to all of the rights and interests in the estate of its adoptive father or mother, by descent or otherwise, that such child would be entitled to if it were a natural heir. Markover v. Krauss, 31 N. E. 1047, 1049, 132 Ind. 294, 17 L. R. A. 806.

The word "children" as used in statutes of descent is not confined to children born in lawful wedlock, but includes children by adoption. Power v. Halfey, 4 S. W. 683, 685, 85 Ky. 671; Ross v. Ross, 129 Mass. 243, 267, 37 Am. Rep. 321.

An "adopted child," within the meaning of the statute, is a legitimate child of its adopting parent, within the meaning of the statute of descent, though the word "child," as used by law-writers and in the adjudicated cases, means, unless otherwise designated, natural-born children. Bray v. Miles, 54 N. E. 446, 459, 23 Ind. App. 432.

The term "children" includes children by birth and by adoption. Rev. Codes, N. D. 1899, § 5112; Civ. Code S. D. 1903, § 2446; Rev. St. Okl. 1903, § 2785.

Adults.

The term "child," within the meaning of a statute authorizing a recovery, for the negligent killing of a husband or father, by the widow or child, does not include an adult child, and therefore, where there is no widow or minor children, there can be no recovery. Mott v. Central R. R., 70 Ga. 680, 48 Am. Rep. 595.

The term "child," within the meaning of the statute authorizing a recovery, for a wrongful killing, by the wife or children of deceased, includes a child over 21 years of age. Murray v. Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co., 11 S. W. 125, 131, 73 Tex. 2; Putman v. Southern Pac. Co., 27 Pac. 1033, 1037, 21 Or. 230.

The word "child," though usually meaning a person under age, is often applied to persons who have passed their majority, especially when dealing with the relation which involves parent and child. Putnam v. Southern Pac. Co., 27 Pac. 1033, 1037, 21 Or. 230.

Act Ga. Oct. 27, 1887 (Acts 1887, p. 43; Civ. Code 1897, § 3828), provides that the husband may recover for the homicide of his wife, and, if she leave "a child or children surviving," said husband shall sue jointly. Held, that the phrase "child or children surviving" is extremely broad language, and includes children who have attained their majority, as well as minors. Roberts v. Central of Georgia R. Co. (U. S.) 124 Fed. 471, 473.

Within the widow's exemption law, the word "children" does not necessarily mean minor children only, and adult unmarried daughters of a decedent, who lived with him and were dependent upon him for support, are included in the term. In re Young's Estate, 3 Pa. Dist. R. 758. "Children" who are entitled to an exemption on the death of their father are not necessarily minor children, but the word includes an unmarried daughter, without means of support, living with and dependent upon the father, equally with his minor children. In re Halbe's Estate (Pa.) 20 Phila. 117.

A person of the age of 21 years is not a "poor child" whom the parish officers are authorized to bind out as an apprentice, with the assent of two justices, within the meaning of 56 Geo. III, c. 139. Rex v. Inhabitants of St. John Bedwardine, 5 Barn. & Adol. 169.

The word "child" as commonly used, carries with it the idea of tender years and of minority. But one's child does not cease to be his child when it attains its majority. And though the statute providing that the record of adoption of children in other states may be filed and entered in the order book of any circuit court in this state, and when so entered have the same force and effect as though the original adoption was in this state, in all cases, in referring to the adopted person, refers to him as a "child," there is no reason why its provisions may not apply to adults equally with infants, and the record of the foreign adoption, filed after the adopted child has attained his majority, is equally as effective as if it had been filed before that time. Markover v. Krauss, 31 N. E. 1047, 1048, 132 Ind. 294, 17 L. R. A. 806

After-born child.

In the statute of distribution, providing that the children whom an intestate leaves shall take his property, "children" includes a posthumous child. Pearson v. Carlton, 18 S. C. 47, 56. As used in the statute of distribution, "children" means not only those living at the time of the ancestor's decease, but includes posthumous children. Hill v. Moore, 5 N. C. 233, 251.

Laws 1873, c. 646, providing that every child who shall be injured in means of support in consequence of the intoxication of any person may sue, etc., gives a child, born after its father's death from intoxication, a right to sue for the injury arising from such death. Quinlen v. Welch, 23 N. Y. Supp. 963, 964, 69 Hun, 584.

"Children," in statutes providing that an action on account of injuries causing death shall be for the sole and exclusive benefit of the surviving children, includes not only those children who are alive at the time, but those born afterward. Nelson v. Galveston H. & S. A. Ry. Co., 14 S. W. 1021, 1022, 78 Tex. 621, 11 L. R. A. 391, 22 Am. St. Rep. 81; Texas & P. Ry. Co. v. Robertson, 17 S. W. 1041, 82 Tex. 657, 27 Am. St. Rep. 929.

Child en ventre sa mere.

A child en ventre sa mere is a child while yet unborn. From the time of conception the infant is in esse for the purpose of taking any estate which is for his interest, whether by descent, devise, or under the statute of distributions. The early English doctrine that an unborn child is not to be regarded as in esse has been long ago exploded, and the decisions of the courts now are uniformly to the effect that children en ventre sa mere are included within the meaning of the word "children." This principle is so well established and so fully understood by the profession that it is not deemed necessary to cite authorities to support it. As bearing upon this point, however, we may call attention to section 1328, Code N. C., which reads as follows: "An infant unborn, but in esse shall be deemed a person capable of taking by deed or other writing any estate whatever in the same manner as if he were born." In re Seabolt (U. S.) 113 Fed. 766, 771. See, also, Heath v. Heath, 19 S. E. 155, 114 N. C. 547.

Children of both husband and wife.

"Children," as used in Mill. & V. Code, § 3128, providing that exempt personal property, on the death of the head of a family who leaves a wife or children surviving, shall go to the widow for herself, and in trust for the benefit of the children of the deceased or of the widow, or of both, means the young sons or daughters of either deceased or his widow who may form part of a family of which deceased was the head. Compton v. Perkins, 23 S. W. 66, 92 Tenn. (8 Pickle) 715.

Collateral heirs.

"Children," as used in the general provision of Const. § 10, entitling orphan children of early emigrants to public lands, is to be construed as including only the emigrant's own children, or at most his grandchildren or descendants, and can by no just interpretation be held to include his collateral relations or heirs. Kennedy's Heirs v. State, 11 Tex. 108, 110.

Grandchildren and other descendants.

"Children," as used in Code 1880, § 1277, providing that a homestead shall descend to the children of the decedent by a former marriage in case there are no children by the second marriage, does not include grandchildren. Peeler v. Peeler, 8 South. 392, 393, 68 Miss. 141.

The word "children," as used in the donation act, includes grandchildren, so that the children of a deceased child are entitled, by right of representation, to a child's part in the donation occupied therein by their grandparents. American Ins. Co. v. Canter, 26 U. S. (1 Pet.) 511, 546, 7 L. Ed. 242.

"Children," as used in Act July 4, 1836, providing that on the death of a pensioner the bounty shall be given to his widow, and if he leave no widow to his children, includes the grandchildren of the deceased pensioner, whether their parents die before or after his decease, and such grandchildren are entitled per stirpes to the distributive share of the deceased parent. Walton v. Cotton, 60 U. S. (19 How.) 355, 358, 15 L. Ed. 658.

The commonly accepted definition of the word "child" is a son or daughter in the first degree. Grandchildren are rarely called "children," the word "descendants" being ordinarily considered more comprehensive than the word "children" or "grandchild." The term "children" cannot be said to have a technical or peculiar meaning in the law, though it has been held to extend to grandchildren in some cases. In re Curry's Estate, 39 Cal. 529; Adams v. Law, 58 U. S. (17 How.) 417, 15 L. Ed. 149. This construction of the word "children" has been confirmed in many cases involving wills, although cases are not rare where the term "children" has been held coextensive with "issue" or "descendants." Such holdings are not put upon the ground that the word "children" has a technical or peculiar meaning in the law, but because such meaning is necessary to give effect to the instrument, or because of an evident intent on the part of the testator; but as used in 3 How. Ann. St. Mich. § 5772a, providing that the estate of an intestate shall descend to the children of deceased's brothers and sisters in certain cases, the word "children" will be held to have been used in its ordinary meaning, as a son or daughter in the first degree. In re Chapoton's Estate, 61 N. W. 892, 893, 104 Mich. 11, 53 Am. St. Rep. 454.

"Children," in the popular sense of the word, does not include grandchildren, but is confined to descendants in the first degree or immediate offspring; and in general the construction put on the word by law accords with its popular signification, and as used in Statute of Descents and Distributions, § 1, subd. 3, providing that if there be no issue, nor wife nor father, then the property shall be distributed in equal shares to the brothers and sisters of the intestate, and to the children of any deceased brother or sister by right of representation, the word must be confined to the immediate offspring of a deceased brother or sister, and not as including their grandchildren. In re Curry's Estate, 39 Cal. 529, 530.

"It is a general rule of the common law that the words 'child' and 'children' do not in their natural sense and proper signification include a grandchild or grandchildren, or descendants in a more remote degree. This rule is subject to some exceptions in case of sales and other conveyances, where it is apparent that it was intended to give the expression a more extended signification. These exceptions are perhaps generally and universally confined to cases where it was necessary to so hold in order to give effect to the words of the instrument, or to the evident intention of the party executing it." And as used in Rev. St. art. 1653, providing that upon the dissolution of the marriage relation by death, all the common property belonging to the community estate of the husband and wife shall go to the survivor if the deceased have no child or children, but if the deceased have a child or children his survivor shall be entitled to one-half of said property, "children" refers to descendants in the first degree only; and if a husband or wife die leaving grandchildren, but no children, the entire community estate passes to the surviving spouse. Burgess v. Hargrove, 64 Tex. 110, 112.

"Children," as used in Gen. St. c. 91, § 1, cl. 3, and chapter 94, § 1, providing that the estate of an intestate who leaves no issue or father shall go in equal shares to his mother, brothers, and sisters, and to the children of any deceased brother or sister by right of representation, cannot be construed to include more remote issue, as it is not synonymous with "issue," and does not include grandchildren of the deceased's sister. Bigelow v. Morong, 103 Mass. 287, 288.

"Child," as used in Rev. St. c. 61, § 2, providing that an illegitimate child shall be construed as an heir of his mother, and shall inherit her estate, is used in its strict sense, as meaning immediate progeny, and does not include grandchildren. Curtis v. Hewins, 52 Mass. (11 Metc.) 294.

"Children," as used in 9 Stat. 479, § 4, providing that the interest of a settler in a donation, in case of his death before patent, shall go to his devisee, or wife or children, or heirs, includes grandchildren, so that the children of a deceased child were entitled by right of representation to a child's part in the donation occupied by their grandparents, and, while Congress has not named grandchildren in the act, they are included in the equity of the statute. Cutting v. Cutting (U. S.) 6 Fed. 259, 265.

In the statute providing that the children of a deceased brother or sister shall take the share which their ancestors would have been entitled to had they survived, the word "children" does not include grandchildren. In all of the cases in which "children" have been held to include grandchildren, the construction was only to effectuate the intention of the donor, but they all show that this was a strange construction, and contrary to the proper import of the word. Certainly the meaning or general import of the word "children" is first descendants. Gadsden v. Poaug (S. C.) 2 Bay, 293, 305.

"Child," as used in Act April 8, 1833, § 16, relating to advancements to any child of the intestate, should be construed to include a grandchild of the testator who inherits as next of kin. Appeal of Storey, 83 Pa. 89, 96; Appeal of Eshleman, 74 Pa. (24 P. F. Smith) 42, 46.

Under an act declaring that the surviving widow shall have and enjoy the use of money received from the husband's succession during her widowhood, and that such money shall afterwards vest in and belong to other descendants of said deceased, the term "children" should be construed in its broadest sense as including grandchildren and other descendants. Succession of Vives, 35 La. Ann. 371, 374.

"Child," within a statute of descent providing that, if a husband and wife die leaving no child, the property shall go to the survivor, is equivalent to "children or their descendants." Kyle v. Kyle, 18 Ind. 108, 109. See, also, Dunlap v. Shreve's Ex'rs, 63 Ky. (2 Duv.) 334, 337.

"Children," as used in 2 Rev. St. p. 97, providing that, if any child of such deceased person shall have been advanced by the deceased by settlement or portion of real or personal estate, the value thereof shall be reckoned with that part of the surplus of the personal estate which shall remain to be distributed among the children, is used to designate all the descendants of the intestate who are entitled to share in the distribution of his estate, and cannot be construed in its popular sense as referring to the immediate offspring of the intestate. Beebe v. Estabrook, 79 N. Y. 248, 250.

"Children alive," as used in an Indiana statute providing that if a man marry a second or other subsequent wife, and has by her no children, but has children alive by a previous wife, the land which at his death descends to such wife shall at her death descend to his children, should be construed to mean "children or their descendants alive." Rushton v. Harvey, 43 N. E. 300, 301, 144 Ind. 382 (citing Scott v. Silvers, 64 Ind. 76).

"Child," as used in Pub. St. Mass. c. 148, § 8, providing that the term "child" in a grant, trust, settlement, etc., shall be held to include a child adopted by the settler, grantor, testator, etc., unless the contrary plainly appears, is the equivalent of such words as "issue," "descendant," or "heir at law." Wyeth v. Stone, 11 N. E. 729, 144 Mass. 441.

Legitimate children.

"The rule cannot be stated too broadly that the description 'child,' 'son,' 'issue,' and every word of that description, must be taken prima facie to mean legitimate child, son, or issue." Bell v. Bumstead, 14 N. Y. Supp. 697, 698, 60 Hun, 580; Miller v. Miller, 30 N. Y. Supp. 116, 117, 79 Hun, 197; Gates v. Seibert, 57 S. W. 1065, 1068, 157 Mo. 254, 80 Am. St. Rep. 625.

In the absence of some qualifying expression, the word "child" in legislative enactments, as in legal parlance, generally means only and exclusively a legitimate child. Overseers of Poor of Forest City v. Overseers of Poor of Damascus Tp., 34 Atl. 351, 176 Pa. 116.

The term "child," in the statute authorizing a child to sue for the wrongful death of its parent, cannot be limited to mean a legitimate child only. Marshall v. Wabash R. Co., 25 S. W. 179, 180, 120 Mo. 275. Contra, see Harkins v. Philadelphia & R. R. Co. (Pa.) 15 Phila. 286; Good v. Towns, 56 Vt. 410, 414, 48 Am. Rep. 799; Dickinson v. The Northeastern R. R. Co., 2 Hurl. & C. 735.

The word "child" or "children," when used in a statute or a will, means legitimate child or children only, and does not include those who are illegitimate, and hence a bastard is not a child within the meaning of Rev. St. Ind. 1894, § 267 (Rev. St. 1881, § 266), providing that a father may maintain an action for the death of a child. McDonald v. Pittsburgh, C., C. & St. L. Ry. Co., 43 N. E. 447, 448, 144 Ind. 459, 32 L. R. A. 309, 55 Am. St. Rep. 185.

In an order removing a widow and four of her children to her maiden settlement, "children" means legitimate children, and an illegitimate child, though specifically mentioned therein by his name, will be deemed to have been misdescribed, and the order as to him void. Regina v. Parish of Birmingham, 8 Adol. & E. (N. S.) 410.

"Children," as used in the statute regulating the descent of intestate estates, is used synonymously with "lawful issue," and hence does not embrace illegitimate children. Cooley v. Dewey, 21 Mass. (4 Pick.) 93, 95, 16 Am. Dec. 326; Heath v. White, 5 Conn. 228, 232; Orthwein v. Thomas (Ill.) 13 N. E. 564, 565; Blacklaws v. Milne, 82 Ill. 505, 507, 15 Am. Rep. 339. But it will include a child made legitimate by the marriage of its parents and acknowledgment by the father after its birth. Ross v. Ross, 129 Mass. 243, 267, 37 Am. Rep. 321. The word "child" or "children," as applied to statutes of inheritance, embraces only legitimate children, unless otherwise specified. Orthwein v. Thomas, 21 N. E. 430, 431, 127 Ill. 554, 4 L. R. A. 434, 11 Am. St. Rep. 159. The word "child," within the meaning of the English statute with reference to the subject of succession, has been limited to legitimates. Heath v. White, 5 Conn. 228, 232.

"Children," as used in the statute of descent and distribution, include all such children and issue as are by law capable of inheriting, and are not necessarily confined to children and issue born in lawful wedlock. Drain v. Violet, 65 Ky. (2 Bush) 155, 157; Appeal of Dickinson, 42 Conn. 491, 506, 19 Am. Rep. 553; Power v. Hadley, 4 S. W. 683, 685, 85 Ky. 671; Ross v. Ross, 129 Mass. 243, 267, 37 Am. Rep. 321.

"Child," as used in Code, § 2664, providing that "the exclusive possession by a child of lands belonging originally to the father, without payment of rent for the space of seven years, shall create conclusive presumption of a gift and convey title to the child," does not include an illegitimate child, but refers only to legitimate children, such being the well-established meaning of the word at common law. Floyd v. Floyd, 24 S. E. 451, 452, 97 Ga. 124.

As used in the statute of wills (1 Gross, St. p. 807, § 66), providing that, in case an illegitimate person leaving no widow, surviving husband, or descendant shall die, the property of such person shall descend and vest in the mother and her children, the word "children" is to be construed as being used "in its proper signification, and means the offspring of the mother, whether legitimate or illegitimate." Rogers v. Weller (U. S.) 20 Fed. Cas. 1130, 1131.

The term "children," as used in a statute providing that, where a testator omits to provide for any of his children, such children shall be entitled to the same share in the estate as they would have received had the testator died intestate, unless it shall appear that the omission was intentional, means legitimate children, and does not entitle an illegitimate child to share in the estate in the same manner as it would have taken had his parent died intestate. Kent v. Barker, 68 Mass. (2 Gray) 535, 536; In re Wardell's Estate, 57 Cal. 484, 491.

Prima facie, the words "child or children," when used in a statute, will, or deed, mean legitimate child or children. Johnstone v. Taliaferro, 107 Ga. 6, 32 S. E. 931, 45 L. R. A. 95. This definition will not be extended by implication so as to embrace other children, unless such construction be necessary to carry into effect the manifest intent of the testator. Hicks v. Smith, 94 Ga. 809, 22 S. E. 153. It was so held in Dickinson v. Northeastern Ry. Co., 2 Hurl. & C. 735, in relation to Lord Campbell's act, which is a prototype of our statute as to wrongful homicide. To the same effect is Clark v. Carlin Coal Co. [1891] App. Cas. 412, Harkins v. Philadelphia & R. R. Co. (Pa.) 15 Phila. 286, as to the meaning of the word as used in Act April 26, 1855, providing that persons entitled to recover damages for any injury causing death shall be the husband, widow, child, or parents of the deceased, and no other relative. Robinson v. Georgia R. & Banking Co., 43 S. E. 452, 453, 117 Ga. 168, 60 L. R. A. 555.

As minor child.

"Children," in its ordinary definition in relation to the father, are his sons and daughters, and, in an act providing that a homestead shall go to the widow and children of a deceased father, it means his sons and daughters, or either, and not minor children alone. Vandiver v. Vandiver, 20 Kan. 501, 503.

In Code, § 2920, providing that "a widow or if no widow, a child or children may recover for the homicide of the husband or parent," "children" means the minor children of the deceased father, and not an adult. Coleman v. Hyer, 38 S. E. 962, 963, 113 Ga. 420.

Within the provision of the statute of the United States that children of persons who have been or are citizens of the United States shall, though born out of the limits thereof, be considered as citizens thereof, the word "children" means minor and not adult children. Dryden v. Swinburne, 20 W. Va. 89, 131.

"Child," as used in Gen. St. 1878, c. 66, § 34, providing that a father, or, in case of his death or desertion of his family, the mother, may maintain an action for the injury of the child, means minor child. Schmit v. Mitchell, 61 N. W. 140, 59 Minn. 251 (citing Gardner v. Kellogg, 23 Minn. 463).

"Children," as used in Act 1883, No. 191, giving a right of action, against any person selling liquor to any children, in favor of any one injured in consequence of such sale, means all minors. Flower v. Witkovsky, 37 N. W. 364, 366, 69 Mich. 371.

The word "child" in Pub. St. c. 164, relative to the adoption of children, means minor child. In re Moore, 14 R. I. 38.

"Child or children" when used in statutes exempting the homestead from sale during the time it shall be occupied by the widow or child or children of any deceased person, etc., means minor child or minor children. Thomas v. Syper, 33 S. W. 1059, 1061, 61 Ark. 575; Batley v. Barker, 64 Pac. 79, 80, 62 Kan. 517, 56 L. R. A. 33; Hoffman v. Neuhaus, 30 Tex. 633, 636, 98 Am. Dec. 492; Quattlebaum v. Triplett, 61 S. W. 162, 163, 69 Ark. 91.

"Children," within the meaning of the statute providing that, whenever the widow or minor children of a deceased person shall be left in necessitous circumstances, the widow, or the legal representatives of the children, shall be entitled to demand and receive from the succession of their deceased father or husband $1,000, and the surviving widow shall have and enjoy the usufruct of the money, etc., is to be construed as meaning minor children, and other descendants who are minors. Succession of Durkin, 30 La. Ann. 669, 670.

In a statute providing that the action for the death of a child must be brought by the father, etc., the word "child" is not to be construed as equivalent to the word "minor," but is limited in its application to one who occupies the position of a child to a parent, as depending upon him for protection, support, and education, and cannot be held to include one who, although a minor, has assumed the relations and responsibilities evolving upon the head of a family. Webster says the word is applied to infants from their birth, but that the time when they cease ordinarily to be so called is not defined by custom. The position occupied by a person should determine the question rather than the age alone. Pittsburgh, Ft. W. & C. Ry. Co. v. Vining's Adm'r, 27 Ind. 513, 519, 92 Am. Dec. 269.

"Children," under an act declaring that the surviving widow shall have and enjoy the use of money received from the succession during her widowhood, and that such money shall afterwards vest in and belong to other descendants of said deceased, termed "children," should be construed as meaning minor children. Succession of Vives, 35 La. Ann. 371, 374.

The expression "children," as used in the act relating to charities and charitable and reformatory institutions, means minor persons under the age of 14 years. Gen. St. Kan. 1901, § 6650.

The expression "child," as used in the article relating to factories, means a person under the age of 14 years. Rev. St. Mo. 1899, § 10,104.

As referring to relationship.

In Pub. St. Mass. c. 100, § 24, giving a right of action to the child of a person in the habit of drinking liquor to excess against the person selling such liquor to the parent, "child" does not mean a minor child, but is used solely with reference to relationship. Neither does the question whether or not the child bringing the action is dependent on the parent for support have anything to do with the existence of the right of action, but the statute contemplates that the habitual drunkenness of the parent is a substantial injury and gives a right to recover damages, not only for any injury to the person or property, but for the shame and disgrace brought upon them. Taylor v. Carroll, 13 N. E. 348, 350, 145 Mass. 95.

The words "parents and children" in Act April 26, 1855, authorizing actions by parents or children for the wrongful death of the parents of the children or children of parents, are used to indicate the family relation in point of fact as the foundation of the right of action, without regard to age. The only condition to recovery in such case is the existence of the family relation, and a reasonable expectation, to the person bringing the action, of pecuniary advantage taken away by the death of the deceased. Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Adams, 35 Pa. (5 P. F. Smith) 499, 502.

Rev. St. Mo. § 968, providing for the adoption of children, uses the word "child" in the sense of its relation to the word "parent," and in the capacity of heir. It provides that, upon the execution of the deed of adoption, the child shall have the same rights in relation to the person adopting it as it would have in relation to its own parents. The intention of the statute is to enable a person to bestow upon the object of its favor the attribute that the law bestows on one's own offspring, and to establish as nearly as possible the relation of parent and child. The word "child," in relation to the word "parent," gives no suggestion as to age, and that is the sense in which it is used in the statute. The law has placed no limitation as to the age of the child to be adopted, and a person over the age of 21 years may be adopted as a child. In re Moran's Estate, 52 S. W. 377, 378, 151 Mo. 555.

Stepchildren.

The primary sense of "children" is offspring, and that is the sense in which it is ordinarily used when the question of relationship is involved. It is, indeed, often applied by elderly persons as a word of endearment or affection to one younger, where no relationship whatever exists. But it cannot be properly held, when found in a statute or contract, to include stepchildren. Tepper v. Supreme Council of Royal Arcanum, 45 Atl. 111, 115, 59 N. J. Eq. 321. See, also, Hussey v. Dillon, Ambler, 603; Cutter v. Doughty, 23 Wend. 513, 521.

CHILD—CHILDREN (In Wills).

A power given by will to appoint to "children" cannot be construed to authorize an appointment to the mother of the children. Salter v. Howell (Pa.) 15 Serg. & R. 188, 190.

A will providing that the testator's executors should give certain property to the testator's "children," in certain specified amounts, does not show an intention to exclude the children of a deceased daughter of the testator, and such children were entitled to a full share of the estate as if the deceased had died intestate. In re Utz's Estate, 48 Cal. 200, 201.

Adopted children.

"Children," as used in a will, does not authorize one adopted, under the statute providing that a child may be adopted so as to be capable of inheriting, to take under its terms. Russell v. Russell, 3 South. 900, 84 Ala. 48.

An adopted child of M., she being dead, takes as a legatee within the description of "children," under a will giving property to testator's three sons and his daughter M., with provision that in case of the death of either of the four the share of such deceased should go to the children of such deceased, under Burns' Rev. St. Ind. 1894, § 838, Horner's Rev. St. 1897, § 826, providing that after adoption the adopted parent shall occupy the same position as a natural parent. Bray v. Miles, 54 N. E. 446, 448, 23 Ind. App. 432.

Adults.

In a will providing that testator's wife should receive annually a sufficient amount of money to support her and her children, the term "children" means all of his children, and not only such as constitute a part of the family, and includes those who by marriage had ceased to be members of the family. Hollingsworth v. Hollingsworth's Ex'rs, 65 Ala. 321, 334.

After-born children.

The term "children," in a bequest to A. and his children, if A. has no children at the time the will is made, or when it takes effect by the death of the testator, has never been held to create any interest in after-born children as purchasers. Vanzant v. Morris, 25 Ala. 285, 292; Annable v. Patch, 20 Mass. (3 Pick.) 360, 363.

A devise in general terms to the testator's "children" does not include a posthumous child. Armistead v. Dangerfield (Va.) 3

Munf. 20, 5 Am. Dec. 501; Shotts v. Poe, 47 Md. 513, 518, 28 Am. Rep. 483.

The general rule is that, where a bequest or devise is made in a will to "children," the word refers to those living at the date of the death of the testator; but where a will was executed disinheriting the children, a child born after the execution of the will will not be included in the term "children" so as to be disinherited. Sutton v. Hancock, 42 S. E. 214, 217, 115 Ga. 857.

Within the meaning of a bequest "to my grandchildren, the children of my son E.," a grandchild born after the death of the testator is included. Swift v. Duffield (Pa.) 5 Serg. & R. 38, 39.

There is a settled rule of construction that an immediate gift to "children" as a class includes only those who are in existence at the date of the testator's death, but that where a particular estate or interest is carried out, with a gift over, the limitation in remainder will embrace those living at the testator's death, as well as those who shall subsequently come into existence before the period fixed for distribution. In re Landwehr's Estate, 23 Atl. 348, 349, 147 Pa. 121.

A devise was to D. and her "children." D., at the date of the devise, had no children, but afterwards had one child. Held, that the devise manifested a clear intention that the children of D. should take as purchasers; but as there were no children in being at the time of such devise, the only rational deduction was that the testator intended to give a life estate to D., with a remainder to the children she might thereafter have. Johnson v. Johnson, 59 Ky. (2 Metc.) 331, 335.

Child by former marriage.

Where testator devised land to his wife for life, with remainder to his then living children, and also directed that a certain sum from the residue of his estate should be divided among the children surviving him, the word "children" meant only by the wife mentioned in the will, and children by a former wife were not included in the term. Gelston v. Shields, 78 N. Y. 275.

Child by future marriage.

"When a parent or ancestor, in disposing of property and in designating the object of her bounty, speaks of 'children,' we think it more reasonable to assume that she intended those in being, or those likely to be born of an existing marriage, rather than those who at some remote or indifferent time in the future might possibly be born of a marriage neither existing nor contemplated." Webb v. Hitchins (Pa.) 14 Wkly. Notes Cas. 434, 436.

A bequest of a life estate to the testator's wife, which directed that in case at her death she left a child or children his estate was to descend in fee to such child or children, did not mean or contemplate a child born of the testator's widow by a second marriage, since a child not conceived at the death of the testator is as incapable of receiving a conditional legacy as he is of receiving a legacy without condition. Sevier v. Douglas, 10 South. 804, 44 La. Ann. 605.

"Child or children," as used in a will creating a trust for the benefit of testator's son, which in case of his death should be conveyed for the use and benefit of his wife and child or children until they should attain lawful age, means those in being, or likely to be born of an existing marriage, rather than those who at some remote or indefinite future time might possibly be born of a marriage neither existing nor in contemplation. In re Sharpe's Estate (Pa.) 15 Wkly. Notes Cas. 419, 421.

Child en ventre sa mere.

The words "youngest child," in a will creating a trust to continue to run until testator's youngest child shall attain the age of 21 years, are to be construed to include a child en ventre sa mere. In the famous case of Thellusson v. Woodford, 4 Ves. 227; Buller, J., at page 322 et seq., discusses the doctrine, comments upon the cases, and concludes: "Why should not children en ventre sa mere be considered generally in existence? They are entitled to all the privileges of other persons. In this case it is enough to say that such child is capable of having an estate given to him, and consequently to another person for his life." This decision is noticed by the chancellor in Marsellis v. Thalheimer, 2 Paige, 35, 21 Am. Dec. 66, where he says: "That it may be considered in existence in some cases for the benefit of others may perhaps be admitted, as in the case mentioned by Buller, J., in Thellusson v. Woodford, 4 Ves. 323, of an estate given to a third person for the life of an infant en ventre sa mere." In Stedfast v. Nicoll, 3 Johns. Cas. 18, Kent, J., notes "a late case" (Doe v. Clarke, 2 W. Bl. 400), where "the court go so far as to say that it is now settled that an infant en ventre sa mere shall be considered, generally speaking, as born, for all purposes for his own benefit. In that case Chief Justice Eyre observed 'that an infant en ventre sa mere comes clearly within the description of a child living at the time of his father's death.'" Cooper v. Heatherton, 73 N. Y. Supp. 14, 16, 65 App. Div. 561.

A will providing that, if the testator's son should at his death leave a child or children born in lawful wedlock, the remainder of certain real estate should go to and descend to such children, includes a child en ventre sa mere, and which was born after the son's decease, since in the construction of devises a child en ventre sa mere must be considered as a child in esse. Barker v.

Pearce, 30 Pa. (6 Casey) 173, 175, 72 Am. Dec. 691.

Children living.

The term "children," in a will devising property to the children of a person, means only those children living at the time of testator's death. Du Bois v. Ray, 35 N. Y. 162, 171; Robinson v. McDiarmid, 87 N. C. 455, 461; Echols v. Jordan, 39 Ala. 24, 29; Appeal of Fairfax (Pa.) 40 Leg. Int. 359. It is a general rule that, where the word "children" is used in a will as descriptive of persons who are to take an interest in the inheritance, it means children living and in being at the time the legacy vests. Gillespie v. Schuman, 62 Ga. 252, 256.

"Children," as used in a will devising a certain estate to the children of W., to be equally divided between them at W.'s decease, includes all the children living at the testator's death, and is not limited to such as should be living at the time of W.'s death, and the effect of the provision is merely to suspend the distribution of the estate until the decease of W. Lombard v. Willis, 16 N. E. 737, 739, 147 Mass. 13.

A "child," within a devise to "all the children of my sister and their heirs and assigns, including any and all of her children who may be living at her death," has no broader meaning than the primary signification of the word, and her children living at her death were the only class designated by the will. Ward v. Cooper, 13 South. 827, 69 Miss. 789.

A bequest to children as a class is to be construed as "only including those living at the date of the will, notwithstanding a provision in favor of issue in case of death, unless an intention to the contrary may be deduced from other clauses or phrases." Stires v. Van Renssalaer (N. Y.) 2 Bradf. Sur. 172, 174.

A trust was created so that in case husband and wife should at the death of the survivor leave any child or children, and such child or children attain 21, to convey to such child, if but one, and, if there should be more than one child who should live to attain 21, to convey to such children who should attain 21, according to the appointment of the father or the mother living, and, in default of appointment, equally. Held, that the words "child or children," as there used, included all the descendants lawfully begotten of both parents who attained 21, as well those who died in the life of one parent as those who survived both. King v. Hake, 9 Ves. 438, 444.

"Children," within the meaning of a devise to executors in trust for A. for life, and at her death to the use of her five children, and all she may hereafter have, and who may be then living, in fee simple, cannot be construed to include a grandchild whose parent was one of A.'s children, but the term is limited to children living at the date of the death of A. Shanks v. Mills, 25 S. C. 358, 360; Haywood's Heirs v. Moore, 21 Tenn. (2 Humph.) 584, 586.

Collateral heirs.

In a will by which testator devised his estate to his widow for life, and on her death the remainder to "my children and their heirs respectively, to be divided in equal shares between them," and at the time of the execution of the will testator had four children living, and four children had deceased before that time leaving living children, and one child had died many years before in infancy, the term "to my children and their heirs respectively" should be understood and was intended to mean "to my children and the heirs of my children respectively, to be equally divided," and the word "heirs" was intended to include only children and descendants, and not collateral heirs. Appeal of Bond, 31 Conn. 183, 192.

Grandchildren and other descendants.

"Children," when used in a will bequeathing property to testator's children, means the "immediate progeny of the parent, and does not include grandchildren. As wills are to be construed to effectuate the intention of the testator, the words should be construed in their most known and usual signification. When referring to the family relations, terms are used in their common meaning and acceptance to designate the classes or degrees intended. Thus 'parent and child' mean either father or mother and son or daughter, and ordinarily, if any difference is meant, the appropriate term is used, as 'grandparent' and 'grandchildren.' A man, in speaking of or providing for his 'children,' will refer to the issue of his body direct, and not to the issue of his issue. Nature suggests and maintains the respective distinctions, and directs the thought or mind to the several successive degrees of relationship only when the distinctive appropriate terms are used." Wharton v. Silliman's Ex'rs, 22 La. Ann. 343, 344.

"Children," in a bequest to a trustee for the sole use and benefit of a daughter and her children, means the immediate offspring of the daughter beyond controversy; a child or children born to his daughter. The term "children" expresses the immediate offspring of the parent. Neither in its vulgar nor its legal sense is it expressive of remote descendants. To make it so mean, it must be coupled with other expressions, which will give to it such signification. Turner v. Ivie, 52 Tenn. (5 Heisk.) 223, 230.

The word "children," in a will, does not, ordinarily and properly speaking, comprehend grandchildren or issue generally. Their being included in that term is only permitted in two cases, viz., from utter necessity, which occurs when the will would remain inoperative, unless the sense of the word "children" were extended beyond its natural import, and where a testator has clearly shown by his words that he did not intend to use the term "children" in the proper, actual meaning, but in a more extended sense. In re Steinmetz's Estate, 45 Atl. 663, 665, 194 Pa. 611; Appeal of Provident Life & Trust Co., Id.; In re Hunt's Estate, 19 Atl. 548, 549, 133 Pa. 260, 19 Am. "Child" or "children," when used in a will, cannot be construed as including grandchild or grandchildren, unless there is a clear intention to the contrary expressed in the instrument itself. *Yates v. Wilson, 53 Pa. (3 P. F. Smith) 74, 78; Izard v. Izard's Ex'rs, 2 Desaus. 308, 309; Russell v. Wright, 13 South. 594, 595, 98 Ala. 652; Radcliffe v. Buckley, 10 Ves. 195; Earl of Orford v. Churchill, 3 Ves. & B. 69. Which intention is not indicated by the mere use of the word "children." Phillips' Devises v. Beall, 39 Ky. (9 Dana) 1, 33 Am. Dec. 518.

"Children," as well as "issue," may stand in the collective sense for grandchildren, where the justice or reason of the case requires it." Prowitt v. Rodman, 37 N. Y. 42, 54; In re Paton, 18 N. E. 625, 627, 111 N. Y. 480; In re Logan, 30 N. E. 485, 486, 131 N. Y. 456.

The term "children" has often been construed to include grandchildren, but it is where succession is evidently intended by the use of the word "children" as equivalent to "issue." McKeenan v. Wilson, 53 Pa. (3 P. F. Smith) 74, 78. "Children," as used in a will, ordinarily does not extend further than to immediate descendants. Where, however, the testator uses the word "children" and the word "issue" indiscriminately, the meaning of the word "issue" may be given to the word "children," and thus include grandchildren. In re Goble's Will, 10 N. Y. Supp. 18, 19; Osgood v. Lovering, 33 Me. 464, 469; Heyward v. Hasell, 2 S. C. (2 Rich.) 509, 510; In re Fisher's Estate (Pa.) 13 Phila. 401.

In its technical legal import the word "children" concurs with its ordinary and popular signification, and does not include grandchildren, where there are any persons in existence at the date of the will, or when the bequest or legacy takes effect, answering such meaning of the term. In such case the word "children" will never denote or signify grandchildren. West v. Rassman, 34 N. E. 991, 996, 135 Ind. 278; Ward's Ex'rs v. Sutton, 40 N. C. 421. But the word will not be construed as including grandchildren when it is evident from a review of the will that testator knew perfectly well how to distinguish between his children and grandchildren in the several bequests of his will. Izard v. Izard's Ex'rs (S. C.) 2 Desaus. 308, 312; Scott

v. Nelson (Ala.) 3 Port. 452, 463, 29 Am. Dec. 266.

The word "children," in a will which, after various devises and bequests, containing, among others, a provision for a granddaughter, gives the testator's residuary estate to his wife and all his living "children," share and share alike, and which contains specific directions for the investment and management of the portions of testator's two daughters, is to be construed as being used in its primary signification, and not to include the granddaughter. Low v. Harmony, 72 N. Y. 408, 413.

The word "children," as used in a will, will not be construed to include grandchildren, "when there are persons to answer the description of children, unless there be some ambiguity in the language rendering it necessary, or unless the testator's intent, expressed in other parts of the will, could not be otherwise satisfied." Where the testator also uses the word "grandson" in the same connection as he uses the word "children," it is sufficient to show that he did not mean to include grandchildren by the use of the word "children." Tillinghast v. De Wolf, 8 R. I. 69, 73.

The term "children," in a devise of property, only includes grandchildren when there are no children in existence. Ewing's Heirs v. Handley's Ex'rs, 14 Ky. (4 Litt.) 346, 357, 14 Am. Dec. 140; In re Fisher's Estate (Pa.) 13 Phila. 401; Jackson v. Kip (U. S.) 13 Fed. Cas. 220, 224; Palmer v. Horn (N. Y.) 20 Hun, 70, 71.

"As ordinarily used in a will, 'children' is a word of description and limited to immediate offspring. Yet the cases are numerous where a more extended meaning has been given to carry out the presumed intention of the testator and prevent the disinheritance of grandchildren whose parents were not living. Where a clause is fairly susceptible of two constructions, that is to be preferred which inclines to the inheritance of the children of a deceased child." Bowker v. Bowker, 19 N. E. 213, 215, 148 Mass. 198.

"Children," as used in a will directing testator's estate to be divided into parts and set apart for the use of each of his children for life, should be construed in its primary signification, as referring to the testator's immediate descendants, and not to grandchildren. In re Truslow, 35 N. E. 955, 956, 140 N. Y. 599; Tayloe v. Mosher, 29 Md. 443, 458.

"Child," as used in a will giving a certain sum of money to the child of a certain person, should be construed to include grandchildren, though it is but a truism to say that the word "child" does not ordinarily include grandchildren. In almost all the cases in which judges have held that the word "child" cannot be construed to mean grandchildren, an exception has been noted as possible to arise out of the necessity of the case. Dunn v. Cory, 39 Atl. 368, 369, 56 N. J. Eq. 507.

Where testator's will directed that after the decease of the wife, and after the youngest child should arrive at the age of 21, all his property should be sold, and the proceeds equally divided among the children he may then have, the word "children" included grandchildren. In re Paton (N. Y.) 41 Hun, 497, 500.

The word "children," as used in a will devising a life estate to the testator's children, and providing that upon their death the estate was to go to his grandchildren then living, cannot be construed to mean grandchildren, so that the word "grandchildren" may be interpreted to mean great-grandchildren. Bragg v. Carter, 50 N. E. 640, 171 Mass. 324.

"Children," as used in a will providing that, if a certain devisee should die without issue, then and in that event the devise should go to the children of H., must be taken in its primary signification, and cannot include H.'s grandchildren whose parents were dead at the time the will was executed. Pugh v. Pugh, 5 N. E. 673, 674, 105 Ind. 552.

In a clause in a will providing that "all the before-mentioned legacies bequeathed to my children I give unto them and their heirs, forever, according to the way they are stated," the term "children" does not include grandchildren; it being clear that the word "heirs" is not used in the sense of heirs general, but heirs special, of their bodies. Graham v. Graham, 4 W. Va. 320, 323.

In a devise to the widow of testator's son, for "the benefit of her children, until the estate be settled," cannot be held to extend to grandchildren. Taylor v. Mosher, 29 Md. 443, 458.

Where testator gives his entire estate to his children, share and share alike, and at the time the will was made he had living ten children and one grandchild, the daughter of a deceased daughter, with whom he was on friendly terms, cannot be construed to include the granddaughter. Culp v. Culp, 41 N. E. 363, 364, 142 Ind. 159.

In a will directing that the interest on a certain fund be paid to testator's daughter during her life, and after the death of the daughter to be given to her children, the word "children" is to be construed as not including grandchildren of the daughter. Felt's Ex'rs v. Vanatta, 21 N. J. Eq. (6 C. E. Green) 84, 85.

The technical and legal meaning of the words "child or children" is immediate offspring, and does not include grandchildren; and where a will devised property to the testatrix's sister, "and, if she be dead, to her children," and a sister and a child of hers died thereafter, but before the testatrix, the children of the deceased child, who were living when the testatrix died, did not take under the will. Grant v. Mosely (Tenn.) 52 S. W. 508.

The term "children," used to designate the remaindermen in a will devising an estate to A. for life, and at his death to and among the children and issue of the said A. in such shares and proportions and for such estates as he by will or other appointment in writing shall direct, and giving the remainder to the children of A., or the children of any deceased child, does not include a grandchild of A., whose parent was living at the time of the death of A. Wickersham v. Savage, 58 Pa. (8 P. F. Smith) 365, 370.

A will recited that the testator, knowing that his wife would ever continue the same kind, devoted mother to her children which she had always proven herself, gave all his property to his wife, expressly excluding said children. Held, that the word "children" was used in an enlarged sense, which includes descendants of the second as well as the first degree, and therefore included grandchildren as well as children. Rhoton v. Blevin, 34 Pac. 513, 514, 99 Cal. 645. Thus grandchildren are not entitled to take under a will by which testator bequeaths to his wife a certain slave for her life, and after her death the proceeds of the sale of the slave to be equally divided among testator's children then living. Denny v. Closse, 39 N. C. 102, 105.

The word "children," in a will devising a fund to a trustee for the support and maintenance of a lunatic daughter during life, and directing that after her death her share should be equally divided among testator's children, or, if they or any of them be dead, to their legal representatives, share and share alike, cannot be construed to include grandsons of testator, who are children of a daughter who was deceased at the time the will was made, and for whom he had otherwise provided in his will. Herr's Estate, 28 Pa. (4 Casey) 467, 470.

In a bequest to children, grandchildren will not take, even where by statute lapse is provided against in the case of children dying in the lifetime of the testator; but in a gift to children and heirs, grandchildren and great-grandchildren and descendants to the remotest degree are entitled to take, and the persons so entitled may change from day to day after the execution of the will and in the lifetime of the testator, both in name and degree of relationship, so that the devise will be held to be per stirpes, and not per capita. In re Ashburner's Estate, 28 Atl. 361, 159 Pa. 545.

In Hussey v. Dillon, Amb. 603, it is held that "children" means those in the degree of relationship in the first descent, while the word "grandchildren" takes in those of the second descent, and even the third, viz., great-grandchildren; for these are still grandchildren, though of a more remote degree. "This," says the Lord Chancellor, "accords with the common parlance, which is the true way of interpreting words in a will." Cutter v. Doughty (N. Y.) 23 Wend. 513, 521.

The primary meaning of the word "children," when used in a devise of property to a certain person, with remainder to children, is descendants of the first taker. Harrison v. McAdam, 76 N. Y. Supp. 701, 703, 38 Misc. Rep. 18.

The word "children" has several ordinary and popular significations. One includes all descendants. Another is limited to descendants of the first degree. As used in a will providing that, when the youngest of the children of testator's daughter should arrive at a certain age, all of his estate should be theirs, should be construed in its limited sense. The youngest of all future generations was not the individual named for the purpose of fixing the time of distribution. The general and substantially universal understanding that, as a description of legatees and devisees, "children" includes the issue of those who die after the will is made, is sufficient evidence that the devise to children expresses an intent to include such issue. Edgerly v. Barker, 31 Atl. 900, 903, 66 N. H. 434, 28 L. R. A. 328.

"There can be no dispute that the term 'children' is not a technical word of limitation, but is ordinarily a word of purchase. 'Children,' in its primary and ordinary sense, means the legitimate descendants of the first generation of the person named; and, where there is nothing to show in a will that the donor intended to use the term in a different sense, it will not include illegitimate offspring, or stepchildren, or grandchildren, or more remote descendants. Remoter descendants are sometimes permitted to take under an enlarged sense of the term 'children,' in support of the intention of the testator, where the will would be otherwise inoperative, or where the context, by the employment of the term 'issue' or 'descendants' promiscuously with 'children,' exhibits the intention of testator to use the term 'children' in a secondary and liberal sense. Such liberal construction of the term 'children' is never made, except for the benefit of the issue of children, or from the force of the context. It is not made when persons exist who accurately fulfill the terms of the description." Matthis v. Hammond (S. C.) 6 Rich. Eq. 399, 401.

The word "children," as it is ordinarily used in a will, means immediate descendants; that is, of the first generation. It does not include grandchildren, unless it is necessary to give it that meaning in order to give effect to the will, or unless the testator has clearly shown by other language in his will that he does not use the word in its ordinary sense, but intends it to have a more extended signification. Tiffany v. Emmet, 53 Atl. 281, 282, 24 R. I. 411 (citing Williams v. Knight, 18 R. I. 333, 338, 27 Atl. 210; Tillinghast v. De Wolf, 8 R. I. 69; Winsor v. Odd Fellows' Beneficial Ass'n, 13 R. I. 149, 159).

Where testatrix provided for the distribution of her estate among her "children," of whom she had seven living at her death, the use of the word was free from ambiguity, and the uniform current of authority in this and other courts sustains the proposition that it will not be construed to include grandchildren, unless from necessity, which occurs when the will would be inoperative unless the sense of the word "children" were extended beyond its natural import, and when the testator has clearly shown by other words that he did not use the term "children" in the ordinary, actual meaning of the word, but in a more extensive sense, that this construction can only arise from a clear intention or necessary implication, as where there are no children, but are grandchildren, or where the term "children" is further explained by a limitation over in default of issue. Denny v. Closse, 39 N. C. 102. The gifts being to children, the general rule is that, where there are persons who answer that description, grandchildren cannot take. Lee v. Baird, 44 S. E. 605, 607, 132 N. C. 755 (citing Ward's Ex'rs v. Sutton, 40 N. C. 421).

The word "child," as used in a will giving to each of testator's children, and his or her heirs, a separate tract of land, providing that, if any of his (testator's) heirs died leaving no child or children, then the share of the one so dying was to go to the survivors, will be construed to include a grandchild. Miller v. Carlisle, 14 S. W. 75, 76, 90 Ky. 205.

Under the name of "children," as used in the title on wills, are included descendants, of whatever degree they may be; it being understood they are only counted for the child they represent. Rev. St. Tex. 1895, art. 5346.

Same—In powers of appointment.

"Children" ordinarily and properly does not include grandchildren; but it has been so construed in the case of wills, where it appeared from the context that such was the intention of the testator. A power to appoint an estate to the use of children has been held not to include grandchildren; but Chancellor Kent, while admitting this to be the settled rule in the construction of powers, does not hesitate to characterize it as a very strict and harsh one. Cutting v. Cutting (U. S.) 6 Fed. 259, 263. See, also, Horwitz v. Norris, 49 Pa. (13 Wright) 213, 218; Carson v. Carson, 62 N. C. 57, 58; Jarnagin v. Conway, 21 Tenn. (2 Humph.) 50, 51; Cruse v. McKee, 39 Tenn. (2 Head) 1, 4, 73 Am. Dec. 186.

Where a power of appointment was given among such of the children of certain persons in such proportions as the donee of the power might appoint, this includes grandchildren, though they were not specifically mentioned, but it being provided that issue of children were provided for in default of appointment, for such must have been the donor's intention. "It is undoubtedly a general rule, in the construction both of wills and deeds of settlement, that, while the word 'issue' will be construed to include grandchildren, the word 'child' or 'children' will not receive such construction. Hence it has been laid down as an established rule that a power of appointment to children will not authorize an appointment to grandchildren. Neither will a legacy or devise to children be construed to include grandchildren. When there is nothing in the deed or will to show that the testator or donor did not use these words in a different sense, this rule of construction should not be departed from." Ingraham v. Meade (U. S.) 13 Fed. Cas. 50, 54.

"Children," as first used in a power to appoint to the children of certain persons, or to the issue of such children as may have died previously leaving issue, cannot be construed to include grandchildren, and therefore an appointment cannot be made to grandchildren, unless their parents are dead, when such appointment is authorized by the latter clause of the power. In re Fottrell's Estate, 12 Pa. Co. Ct. R. 548, 549.

The term "children," in a power in a will giving testator's wife the right to dispose of his property among all testator's children, does not include grandchildren, and therefore the widow has no power to partially dispose of the estate among testator's grandchildren. Little v. Bennett, 58 N. C. 156, 161.

Heirs.

In the construction of wills, the words "heirs," "issue," and "children" may be construed interchangeably to effectuate the clear intent of the testator. Butler v. Huestis, 68 Ill. 594, 602, 18 Am. Rep. 589; Graham v. Graham, 4 W. Va. 320, 323.

In a devise to them and their children, forever, the word "children" is used in the sense of heirs or heirs of the body. Lachland's Heirs v. Downing's Ex'rs, 50 Ky. (11 B. Mon.) 32, 33.

"Child" and "heir," in common speech, are often used as synonymous. Smith v. Sheehan, 39 Atl. 332, 333, 67 N. H. 344. The technical distinction between the terms is not to be resorted to in the construction of a will, except in nicely balanced cases. Appeal of Lockwood, 10 Atl. 517, 519, 55 Conn. 157.

In holding that the word "children" in a will should be construed as synonymous with "heirs," the courts say that it is true that the word "children" is not necessarily a word of purchase, and that, though this be its general character, it may nevertheless be controlled by other and repugnant words in the will. Robert v. West, 15 Ga. 122, 144.

A will providing that the portion of any devisee dying without "child or children" should go to and be equally divided among the survivors means immediate offspring, and not an indefinite line of heirs. Bruce v. Goodbar, 58 S. W. 282, 284, 104 Tenn. 638.

In a residuary clause of a will, providing that any property remaining after finally settling up the business of the estate, each heir being accountable for all personal property advanced to them, should be equally divided among the testator's children, "children" should be construed as synonymous with "heirs," and would include the grandchildren of the testator. Hughes v. Hughes, 51 Ky. (12 B. Mon.) 115.

"Children," as last used in a devise of real estate to a beneficiary and his children, and to their children thereafter, is to be construed to mean "heirs." Schaefer v. Schaefer, 81 N. E. 136, 141 Ill. 337.

Testator, after giving to each of his four sons in fee a tenth share of his estate, bequeathed to each of six daughters, naming them, the rent, interest, and income of one of the ten shares. The will then proceeded as follows: "And on the death of any or either of my said daughters I give and bequeath unto such child or children as my said daughters so dying shall have or leave living at their decease, and to the heirs and assigns of such child or children, one part or share of my said estate." Held, that the child of each daughter and her heirs, whether the immediate issue were living or not, should participate in the share of the daughter. In re Brown's Estate, 29 Hun. 412, 417.

A testator devised land to his wife during her widowhood, and provided that at her death it should go to his daughter and her children and to his son and his children. He also bequeathed to his daughter and her children and to his son and his children $5,000; the money to be invested in bank stock until they were 25 years of age. Held, that as it was manifest that the word "children," as used in reference to the bequest of money, was used as equivalent to "heirs," the word as used in reference to land should be taken in the same sense. Childers v. Logan (Ky.) 65 S. W. 124, 125.

Testator, who died childless, gave by his will two-sevenths of his residual estate "to the children of B., my deceased sister; her granddaughter D., wife of Col. D., to take the share which her father, W. B., would take, if living." Held, that the word "children" was used synonymously with the word "issue," "heirs," or "descendants." Dunlap v. Shreve's Ex'rs, 63 Ky. (2 Duv.) 334, 337.

The term "children," or "heirs," in a will, means heirs of the grantee of the life estate; the word "heirs" being used as a synonym, to enlarge and explain the preceding word, which otherwise might fail of its real intentment. Shapley v. Diehl, 53 Atl. 374, 375, 203 Pa. 566.

Heirs of body.

The word "children" embraces only immediate descendants, and, when used in a will, is not sufficient to create an estate tail, while the words "heirs begotten of the body" embrace descendants of every period, and are the correct and technical terms to be used in the creation of an estate tail. Johnson v. Johnson, 59 Ky. (2 Metc.) 331, 335.

The term "children," as used in a will bequeathing certain property to the testator's daughter, to have and to hold the same to her and her "children," cannot be construed as synonymous with "heirs" or "heirs of the body," so as to give an absolute estate to the legatee. Bowers v. Bowers, 51 Tenn. (4 Heisk.) 293, 295; Burns v. Weesner, 34 N. E. 10, 134 Ind. 442.

"Children," as used by a testator in providing that, if any of testator's children died leaving a "child or children," such child or children should inherit the property to which its parent was entitled, did not mean heirs of the body, but was a word of purchase without limitation, and the first taker did not take a fee absolute or a fee defeasible, but only a life estate. Robert v. Ellis, 37 S. E. 250, 258, 59 S. C. 137.

A will giving property to a certain person and to the heirs of her body, but, if she should die and leave no "child or children," the property given to her should be sold and equally divided among others named, should be construed in their legal sense, and not to explain the meaning of the words "heirs of her body." The happening of the contingency—the death of the first taker, leaving no child or children—was to abridge the estate, and make effectual the devise over to the other legatees and their heirs. The executory estate was limited, and was to take effect after a definite failure of issue of the first taker. Ralston v. Truesdell, 35 Atl. 813, 814, 178 Pa. 429.

Where there was a devise in trust for the use of S. during his natural life, and testator directed that after decease of S. the property devised should be held for the children of S. until the oldest arrive at age, when it should be conveyed to such children, the word "children" meant the immediate offspring, and was not synonymous with "heirs of the body." Smith v. Smith, 24 S. C. 304, 314.

The words "children" and "issue" may be interpreted to mean "heirs of the body," when this is the evident intent of the testator. Dodson v. Ball, 60 Pa. (10 P. F. Smith) 492, 500, 100 Am. Dec. 586.

Issue.

The word "children," in its natural sense, only embraces the immediate descendants of the person named or described, and does not include descendants of a more remote degree. Hone v. Van Schaick (N. Y.) 3 Barb. Ch. 488, 505; Stump v. Jordan, 54 Md. 619, 628.

In the ordinary and proper sense of the word, "children" means the immediate descendants of a person, as distinguished from "issue"; but in its legal signification, as applied to testamentary instruments, unless the manifest intention requires a different construction, it is extended to all the descendants, whether mediate or immediate, of the ancestor. Wiley v. Smith, 3 Ga. (3 Kelly) 551, 563.

The word "children," in its ordinary legal signification, comprehends only the immediate offspring, unless a clear intention to use it in a larger sense can be fairly collected from the instrument in which it was employed. Russell v. Russell, 64 Ala. 500; Kirk v. Cashman (N. Y.) 3 Dem. Sur. 242, 244; Cummings v. Plummer, 94 Ind. 403, 404, 48 Am. Rep. 167; Mefford v. Dougherty, 11 S. W. 716, 89 Ky. 58, 25 Am. St. Rep. 521.

Though the primary sense of the word "children" is merely a descriptio personarum, it will be construed as meaning issue or heirs of the body, when the term is used in a will and such construction is necessary to carry out the intention of the testator. It was construed in such sense in the case of a devise to a certain beneficiary and the children of such beneficiary, when the beneficiary at the time of the making of the will had no children. Parkman v. Bowdoin (U. S.) 18 Fed. Cas. 1213, 1215; Smith v. Webber, 1 Barn. & Ald. 714, 720 (citing Wild's Case, 6 Coke, 17; Royle v. Hamilton, 4 Ves. 437; Doe v. Cavendish, 4 Term R. 741; Radcliffe v. Buckley, 10 Ves. Jr. 201); Moore v. Gary, 48 N. E. 630, 631, 149 Ind. 51; Butler v. Ralston, 69 Ga. 485, 489; Bowers v. Bowers, 51 Tenn. (4 Heisk.) 293, 295; In re Schedel, 15 Pac. 297, 298, 78 Cal. 594; Palmer v. Horn, 84 N. Y. 516, 518; In re Robinson's Estate, 10 N. Y. Supp. 692, 693, 57 Hun. 395; McLeod v. Dell, 9 Fla. 427, 443; Smith v. Fox's Adm'r, 82 Va. 763, 767, 1 S. E. 200; In re Kennedy's Estate, 42 Atl. 459, 460, 190 Pa. 79; Cummings v. Plummer, 94 Ind. 403, 404, 48 Am. Rep. 167; Butler v. Huestis, 68 Ill. 594, 602, 18 Am. Rep. 589; Dunlap v. Shreve's Ex'rs, 63 Ky. (2 Duv.) 334, 337.

joined with it, it has, in general, no other meaning but issue in the first degree. In order that it may be construed to mean lineal descendants of a more remote degree, there must be something on the face of the will to show that it was so intended, for no rule is better settled than that technical words are presumed to be used technically, and that words of a definite legal signification are to be understood as used in their definite legal sense, unless the contrary appears on the face of the instrument. Brett v. Donaghe's Guardian (Va.) 45 S. E. 324, 325.

The word "children" is ordinarily a word of personal description, while the word "issue" indicates succession. Appeal of Bedford, 40 Pa. (4 Wright) 18, 21; In re Kennedy's Estate, 42 Atl. 459, 460, 190 Pa. 79. "Doubtless the word 'children' may be construed to mean 'issue' when the context of the will affirmatively shows that the testator intended to use it in that sense. More frequently, however, the indiscriminate use of the words 'children' and 'issue' has the effect of causing them both to be held as words of purchase." Thus, in a case where the word "children" was used, and the word "issue" was not used, it was held that "children" was to be given its ordinary meaning; there being nothing to indicate an intention to use it in any other sense. Appeal of Bedford, 40 Pa. (4 Wright) 18, 21.

As used in a will, directing that testator's property be equally divided among his children, the word "children" is a designation for the immediate offspring of the testator, as it only includes a wider range of objects when it is used synonymously with a word of larger import, as "issue." The word indicates a class of persons, and not a line of indefinite descent, like "issue," or "heirs of the body." Bannister v. Bull, 16 S. C. 220, 227; Waring v. Waring, 32 S. E. 150, 151, 96 Va. 641. Thus, where a testator devised certain real estate to each of his beneficiaries, who were without issue, and to their heirs and assigns, forever, but a subsequent clause directed that, if either should die without child or children, the survivor or survivors should inherit the deceased one's portion. Held, that the words "child or children," in the latter clause, meant issue, and it refers to an indefinite failure of issue, so that each beneficiary took an estate tail in the property devised to him. Caulk's Lessee v. Caulk (Del.) 52 Atl. 340, 3 Pennewill, 528; Fahrney v. Holsinger, 65 Pa. (15 P. F. Smith) 388, 393; Thomason v. Anderson (Va.) 4 Leigh 118, 122; Booker v. Booker, 24 Tenn. (5 Humph.) 505, 510.

The word "children," as used in a will, will not include issue more remote, including grandchildren and great-grandchildren, where it is clearly shown that testator understood the distinction between them, and it does not appear that the testator intended to use the term, not in its proper actual meaning, but in a more extensive sense. Boylan v. Boylan, 62 N. C. 160.

In a will providing that property willed to certain daughters should be held in trust for the separate use of them and their children, free from the control of their husbands, and in no manner liable for their husbands' debts, "children" may be construed to mean "issue," in order to effectuate the testator's intention, and would vest a fee. Smith v. Fox's Adm'r, 1 S. E. 200, 201, 82 Va. 763.

A testator, who died childless, gave by his will two-sevenths of his residuary estate to "the children of B.; B.'s granddaughter, D., to take the share which her father, W. B., would take if living." Three of B.'s children were living at the time the will was published; and two others had died before the publication, one of whom died leaving an only child, the granddaughter mentioned in the will, and the other, M., who also left an only child, the plaintiff, who claimed under the will the share that her mother would have taken if living. Held, that the word "children," as used in the will, was synonymous with "issue," "heirs," or "descendants," and hence that the plaintiff was entitled to the share claimed. Dunlap v. Shreve's Ex'rs, 63 Ky. (2 Duv.) 334, 337.

The words "legal heirs," as used in the phrase "his children or legal heirs," are equivalent to descendants, and the entire phrase has the force of the word "issue." Sheeley v. Neldhammer, 37 Atl. 939, 940, 182 Pa. 163.

Same—In limitations over.

The term "children" is not equivalent to "issue." The latter extends to the whole line of descendants. The former has not been extended beyond grandchildren, and it is only received in its extended meaning when used in a will to prevent exclusion, so that the manifest intention may be carried out. A limitation over on the failure of children is a limitation which must take effect within the life of the tenant for life and 21 years and 9 months after. Brummet v. Barber (S. C.) 2 Hill, Law, 543, 552.

The term "children," in a will devising property to a certain beneficiary for life, then to his children, but, in the absence of children, to a third beneficiary, in its proper sense includes only the next generation to the first taker, and, to make it include more, there must be something in the will to show that it is used in a broader sense. Burton v. Black, 30 Ga. 638, 641.

"Children," as used in a will providing that upon the death of certain devisees the lands devised to them should descend to their children, and, "if no children," to others, imports an indefinite failure of issue, where the word "children" is used in the sense of

"heirs of the body" or "issue." Potts v. Kilne, 34 Atl. 191, 192, 174 Pa. 513 (citing Armstrong v. Michener, 160 Pa. 21, 23, 28 Atl. 447); In re Campbell's Estate, 51 Atl. 1099, 1100, 202 Pa. 459. "Child or children," as used in a will providing that, should testator's daughter die without issue, or if her "child or children" surviving her should die before arriving at the age of 21 years, the estate devised should revert to testator's other children and their heirs, is synonymous with "issue." Jordan v. Roach, 32 Miss. 481, 604. In a will giving a life estate to one, and at her death to the children who might be the surviving heirs of her body, "children" is synonymous with issue and includes descendants of every degree. Houghton v. Kendall, 89 Mass. (7 Allen) 72, 75; Wiley v. Smith, 3 Ga. (3 Kelly) 551, 563. Thus, where D., being seised in fee, devises to his niece E. for her life only, and, should she marry and have "issue," then to go to her "children," or, if she have no "issue," then to go to W., the words "children" and "issue" were synonymous. Voller v. Carter, 4 El. & Bl. 173, 179, 28 Eng. Law & Eq. 267, 269.

Where a testator bequeathed property to his nephew for life, and after his decease to the child or children of the nephew, whether sons or daughters, they, if more than one, to take as tenants in common, and for want of such issue to his own right heirs, forever, the words "child or children" were not equivalent to "issue"; but the words "such issue" must be confined to the previous words "child or children," and the nephew took only an estate for life, and after his death his children took only an estate for life as tenants in common. Liversage v. Vaughan, 5 Barn. & Ald. 464.

In a will providing that a certain sum of money should be divided into as many shares as there should be lawful issue of testator's deceased nephew, the interest and income of each of such shares to be applied to the use of each of the children, respectively, "children" is not synonymous with "issue." Palmer v. Horn, 84 N. Y. 516, 518.

The words "child" and "children," as used in a will, designate descendants in the first degree, and have not the technical force of the word "issue" in a limitation over. When used in a devise of a life estate to a beneficiary, with a limitation over in case the beneficiary dies without child or children, the terms mean child or children at the time of the death of the life tenant. Sherman v. Sherman (N. Y.) 3 Barb. 385, 387.

In a will lending a certain tract of land to the testator's daughter during her natural life and the natural life or widowhood of any husband she may have, and providing that at her death and the death or future marriage of her husband the land should be equally divided among her children, if she has any, "children" means issue in the first degree, and in general the word "children" can have no other meaning, unless there be other words in the will to extend its application; and, in order to construe the word as embracing grandchildren or other descendants or issue indefinitely, it must appear from the will that such was the testator's intention. Moon v. Stone's Ex'r (Va.) 19 Grat. 130, 328.

Where a testator left a money legacy and devise of land to his granddaughter, and, in case she should die and leave no child or children, or the descendants of any of her children, to survive her, then this legacy and devise to her should revert to testator's children, the words "child or children, or the descendants of any of her children," meant issue. In re Gormley's Estate, 25 Atl. 814, 815, 154 Pa. 378.

Legitimate children.

A devise to children generally means lawful children, and an illegitimate child cannot take thereunder. Cartwright v. Vawdry, 5 Ves. Jr. 530, 534; Harris v. Lloyd, 1 Turn. & R. 310; In re Overhill's Trusts, 17 Eng. Law & Eq. 323; Thompson v. McDonald, 22 N. C. 463, 480; Flora v. Anderson (U. S.) 67 Fed. 182, 185; Adams v. Adams, 28 N. E. 260, 261, 154 Mass. 290, 13 L. R. A. 275; In re Scholl's Estate, 76 N. W. 616, 618, 100 Wis. 650; Collins v. Hoxie (N. Y.) 9 Paige, 81, 88.

"Children" will not be extended by implication to embrace children other than legitimate children, unless such construction be necessary to carry into effect the manifest purpose of the testator. Hicks v. Smith, 22 S. E. 153, 156, 94 Ga. 809; Gelston v. Shields (N. Y.) 16 Hun, 143, 151; Cromer v. Pinckney (N. Y.) 3 Barb. Ch. 466; Shearman v. Angel (S. C.) Bailey, Eq. 351, 356, 23 Am. Dec. 166; Heater v. Van Auken, 14 N. J. Eq. (1 McCart.) 159, 164; Appeal of Byers, 98 Pa. 479, 481; Wettach v. Horn, 50 Atl. 1001, 1002, 201 Pa. 201; Lyon v. Lyon, 88 Me. 395, 405, 34 Atl. 180.

The word "children," as used in a will, must be legally construed to mean only legitimate children, and hence a contingency of dying unmarried and without children cannot properly be said to mean anything more than the latter event, as legally speaking there can be no children without marriage. Bell v. Phyn, 7 Ves. 453, 458.

The words "my children," in a will, will ordinarily be construed to mean testator's legitimate children. "But when it is plain, from the surrounding circumstances, that he used the words in a different sense, they cannot be given that meaning. Elliott v. Elliott, 20 N. E. 264, 266, 117 Ind. 380, 10 Am. St. Rep. 54.

"Children," within a bequest to the children of testator's sister, includes her natural children, where she has no other, in order to prevent the gift from failing for want of a donee or recipient. Howell v. Tyler, 91 N. C. 207, 210.

"Children," as used in a will devising property to testatrix's daughter during her life, "and at her death to all the children of her body," includes the two illegitimate children then living, and other children born, both before and after the will was made, by the man with whom she was living when the will was made. Sullivan v. Parker, 113 N. C. 301, 303, 18 S. E. 347.

Where a testator has legitimate children living, the term "children," as used in his will, will not be construed to include illegitimate children. Crosby v. Lewis (N. Y.) 2 Edm. Sel. Cas. 26, 27. But, where the only children of testator are natural children, parol evidence is admissible to show the situation of testator's family, to enable the court to ascertain testator's intention. Gardner v. Heyer (N. Y.) 2 Paige, 11, 14.

The word "children," when used in a will of a bachelor, will be construed to mean illegitimate children, as he could have no other. Bray v. Miles, 54 N. E. 446, 448, 23 Ind. App. 432 (citing Clifton v. Goodbun, L. R. 6 Eq. 278).

Where a testator bequeathed an estate "to such child, or children, if more than one, as A. may happen to be enceinte by me," a natural child of which she was then pregnant was not entitled to take under the bequest, since the language of the bequest must be construed to mean legitimate children only. Earle v. Wilson, 17 Ves. 528.

Representatives.

The word "children," as used in a will, may be interpreted as including representatives of the deceased child, if such appears to be the intention of the testator from the context. In re Paine, 57 N. E. 346, 347, 176 Mass. 242.

Sons and daughters.

The term "children," as used in a will providing that testator's estate should be equally divided among his "children," has a legal significance, extending, as the case may be, to grandchildren, and even illegitimate children, and includes both sons and daughters; there being nothing in the will to indicate that the testator meant thereby only his sons, and not his daughters. Weatherhead's Lessee v. Baskerville, 52 U. S. (11 How.) 329, 358, 13 L. Ed. 717.

Stepchildren.

The word "child" does not mean stepchild, even when the same is used in wills, where the rules of construction are not so strict as those governing statutes. Thornburg v. American Strawboard Co., 40 N. E.

1062, 1063, 141 Ind. 443, 50 Am. St. Rep. 334; Barnes v. Greenzebach (N. Y.) 1 Edw. Ch. 41, 43.

A will providing that, in case of the death of any of testator's children or his stepdaughter without lawful issue, the share which by the will would have gone to such issue should be divided equally among the "survivors of my children" cannot be construed to include the testator's stepdaughter. In re Hallet (N. Y.) 8 Paige 375, 376.

"Children," as used in a will giving a cash legacy to each "of my daughters, and also my stepdaughter Elizabeth, and the remainder of my property to be equally divided among my eleven children," is to be construed as synonymous with "daughters," as there used, and not to include the stepdaughter. Lawrence v. Hebbard (N. Y.) 1 Bradf. Sur. 252, 255.

Testator gave legacies to his stepchildren, which he designated as children "which came to me by marriage with my wife," as well as to his own children and wife, and then provided that the "second division" should go to his wife and "children." Held, that the word "children" as last used, meant his children by his wife. In re Kurtz's Estate, 23 Atl. 322, 145 Pa. 637.

The word "children," in common parlance, does not include stepchildren or grandchildren, or any other than the immediate descendants in the first degree of the person named as the ancestor, but will be held to include stepchildren, where it is clear from the whole will that such was the testator's intention. Cutter v. Doughty, 7 Hill, 305, 310.

Where a will provided that the testator left all his property to his nieces and nephew, "children of the late W. S.," the words quoted were construed not to include a stepchild of the late W. S., though such stepchild was also a niece of the testator. Sydnor v. Palmer, 29 Wis. 226, 244.

As creating tenancy in common.

"Children," as used in a will by which testator bequeathed his personal estate, after several legacies, to his brother J. and his "children" and the child of his sister, to be equally divided among them and their heirs and assigns, forever, should be construed as a word of purchase, and not of limitation, and made J. and the children tenants in common of the personalty. Armstrong v. Moran (N. Y.) 1 Bradf. Sur. 314, 315.

"Children," as used in a will devising certain property to the testator's daughter and her "children," entitled the children to share in the devise, and it passes to the daughter and her children in common. In re Utz's Estate, 43 Cal. 200, 204.

Where lands are devised to a woman and her children, she having children living at the time of the devise, the word "children" is to be construed as a word of purchase, and the children take a joint estate with the mother. Jones' Ex'rs v. Jones, 13 N. J. Eq. (2 Beasl.) 236, 239. As used in a will providing that the testator's daughter and her children should have 50 acres of land in equal parts, it is a term of purchase, and not of limitation, and imports that the testator's daughter and her children are to take equal shares as tenants in common. Turner v. Patterson, 35 Ky. (5 Dana) 292, 296.

Whether a devise is to a class is a matter that must always be determined by the particular language of the will in which the devise is contained. The learned judge in Re Russell, 168 N. Y. 169, 174, 61 N. E. 166, 167, says: "Whether a devise or bequest in a will is to a class, or to the infants as tenants in common, must depend upon the language employed by the testator in making the gift. All the provisions of the will may be consulted, and sometimes aid may be sought from the situation and relation of the parties. I have not been able to find in any of the adjudged cases any attempt to define or formulate with much accuracy the language or circumstances necessary to constitute a gift to a class." And where a devise is made to testator's son for life, and at his death "to his children," the children took distributively as tenants in common, and not as a class. Manhattan Real Estate & Building Ass'n v. Cudlipp, 80 N. Y. Supp. 993, 996, 80 App. Div. 532.

As word of description.

In law the word "children" has and has had a well-defined meaning, which is found to run through the text-books and reports, and upon the proper adherence to which the stability and very existence of many titles in the commonwealth depend. Defining it from a positive standpoint, it is a word of personal description, it points to individual acquisition, and, so far as designation goes, it differs in no way from a mention of individuals by name. Defining it negatively, it is not a word of limitation. It does not point to hereditary succession. It is employed in contradistinction to the term "issue" and "heirs of the body." These are used in the creation of estates tail, and point to a contingent, hereditary succession, while the term "children" is one of personal description and individual acquisition. Crawford v. Forest Oil Co. (U. S.) 77 Fed. 534, 536.

"Children" is ordinarily used as a word of description, limited to persons standing in the same relation, and has the same effect as if all their names had been given; but the word "heirs," in the absence of controlling or explanatory words, includes more remote descendants. Balcom v. Haynes, 96 Mass. (14 Allen) 204, 205.

"Child," as used in a will giving the rents and profits of certain land to a certain person until his youngest child should become of age, upon the happening of which event such person took a fee simple to himself and heirs, is not descriptive of the object of the testatrix's bounty, but is simply used as marking the time when the devisee's estate shall ripen into an absolute fee simple. Shimer v. Mann, 99 Ind. 190, 191, 50 Am. Rep. 82.

While "children" is sometimes held to mean "heirs," such a construction is not permissible where certain specified children of the grantee in a deed are named in the deed as the persons to whom the title should pass, thus clearly excluding the inference that it was the purpose of the parties that the property should go to the persons who might be his heirs at his death. As used in such a case, the word "children" is merely descriptive, being employed for the purpose of identifying the particular persons named in the deed as remaindermen. Rupert v. Penner, 53 N. W. 598, 599, 603, 35 Neb. 587, 17 L. R. A. 824.

As word of inheritance.

In a will devising to A. during life, and then to B., not to be subject to sale or mortgage, but to descend to his children free and unincumbered, the words "to his children" are not to be construed in their strict legal meaning, implying that the children were to take by inheritance, but are to be construed with regard to the intention, and vest a remainder in fee. Leavitt v. Logan (U. S.) 15 Fed. Cas. 131, 132.

As word of limitation.

The word "children" is a very flexible expression, "and according to a correct use of the English language has more meanings than one. Authoritative writers, as well as the habits of educated society, show that an accurate speaker may, without impropriety, use the term 'children' for the purpose of indicating offspring, or descendants, or posterity, in whatever degree. It is agreed that the word 'children,' when used in a will for the purpose of indicating relationship and not age, must generally or universally, in the absence of an explanatory context or extraneous evidence showing facts rendering it impossible, or at least very highly improbable, that it could have been used as what lawyers call a 'word of purchase,' or as indicating offspring only in the first degree, be construed as a word of purchase, and to mean only offspring in the first degree." Earl of Tyrone v. Marquis of Waterford, 1 De Gex, F. & J. 637 (cited in Prowitt v. Rodman, 37 N. Y. 42, 55).

"Children" is not, like "heirs," or "heirs of the body," a word of limitation, imparting by its own force a fee-simple estate. Nevertheless it has often been found necessary, in order to effectuate the intent of the testator, made manifest by considering the whole will, to give it a different meaning from its legal, and perhaps popular, signification. Accordingly it has in some instances been held to indicate a life estate, and in others a joint estate, and in others courts have not hesitated to interpret it in the sense of heirs, and allowing it the same effect. Williams v. Duncan, 17 S. W. 330, 331, 92 Ky. 125.

The word "children," in its primary or natural sense, is always a word of purchase, and not a word of limitation. Schoonmaker v. Sheely (N. Y.) 3 Denio, 485, 490; Taylor v. Gould (N. Y.) 10 Barb. 388, 395; Nelson v. Davis, 35 Ind. 474, 478; Shimer v. Mann, 99 Ind. 190, 192, 50 Am. Rep. 82. The word "children" is a word of purchase, and not of limitation. Shannon v. Bonham, 60 N. E. 951, 953, 27 Ind. App. 369; Ridgeway v. Lanphear, 99 Ind. 251, 255; Taylor v. Taylor, 63 Pa. (13 P. F. Smith) 481, 3 Am. Rep. 565; Crandell v. Barker, 78 N. W. 347, 348, 8 N. D. 263.

The word "children," in a devise to a certain person and his "children," is a word either of limitation or of purchase, according to the intent of the testator. Appeal of Yarnall, 70 Pa. 335, 341.

The word "children" is usually a word of purchase, requiring strong language to change it into a word of limitation. Beecher v. Hicks, 75 Tenn. (7 Lea) 207, 213; Hubbard v. Selser, 44 Miss. 705, 711; Lancaster v. Flowers, 48 Atl. 896, 897, 198 Pa. 614.

The word "children" in a will is strictly a word of purchase, and must be so construed, unless it clearly appears that it was intended to be a word of limitation; and as a general rule such intention must be gathered from the instrument itself. Williams v. Sneed, 43 Tenn. (3 Cold.) 533, 538; Kay v. Connor, 27 Tenn. (8 Humph.) 624, 633, 49 Am. Dec. 690; Chapin v. Crow, 35 N. E. 536, 538, 147 Ill. 219, 37 Am. St. Rep. 213; In re Sanders (N. Y.) 4 Paige, 293, 296; Lytle v. Beveridge, 58 N. Y. 592, 604; Collins v. Williams, 41 S. W. 1056, 1057, 98 Tenn. 525; Steward v. Knight, 49 Atl. 535, 537, 62 N. J. Eq. 232; Stokes v. Tilly, 9 N. J. Eq. (1 Stockt.) 130, 136; Potts v. Kline, 34 Atl. 191, 174 Pa. 513; May v. Ritchie, 65 Ala. 602, 604. The word "children," when used in its ordinary sense, is a word of purchase, and not of limitation. Its meaning may be qualified by other parts of the will and be shown to be used in the sense of "heirs" or "issue" to effect the intention of the testator, and when so used it is a word of limitation, but not otherwise. In re Smith's Estate (Pa.) 9 Phila. 348, 349; Aunabale v. Patch, 20 Mass. (3 Pick.) 360, 363.

In its ordinary and popular signification, the word "children" means immediate offspring, and such in general is its legal construction. When used in a will, it is a word of purchase, and not of limitation, unless the context clearly shows it to be otherwise intended. The case in which it has a broader signification, and where it has been held synonymous with "heirs," or "issue," or "descendants," are well illustrated by the resolutions in Wild's Case, 6 Rep. 16. In that case, says Lord Coke, "it was resolved for good law that if A. devises his land to B. and his children or issues, and if he hath any issue at the time of the devise, the same is an estate tail; for the intent of the testator is manifest and certain that his children or issues should take, and as immediate devisees they cannot take because they are not rerum natura, and by way of remainder they cannot take, for that was not his intent, for the gift is immediate. Therefore such words shall be taken as words of limitation scilicet as much as children or issues of his body. But it was resolved that if a man devises land to husband and wife, and after their decease to their children, or the remainder to their children, in this case, although they have not any child at the time, yet every child which they shall have after may take by way of remainder, according to the rule of the law; for his intent appears that their children should not take immediately, but after the decease of the husband and wife." Stump v. Jordan, 54 Md. 619, 628 (citing Parkman v. Bowdoin (U. S.) 18 Fed. Cas. 1213; Nightingale v. Burrell, 32 Mass. [15 Pick.] 104; Broadhurst v. Morris, 2 Barn. & Adol. 1).

In determining the construction of any instrument of entailment, the word "children" is rarely held synonymous with "heirs" or "heirs of the body." The principal cases in which it is so held are the instances restricting the rule announced in Wild's Case—that is to say, where there is an immediate grant or devise to a man and his children, and the grantee is without children; it being manifested in such case that the intent was to pass an estate in present, and that being impossible by reason of the nonexistence of a portion of those named, in order to effectuate the intentions, the word "children" must be construed as a word of limitation, and not of purchase, because otherwise there would be a grant or devise of a life estate only, and the fee would remain in the heirs of the devisor or in the person of the grantor as the case might be. Cannon v. Barry, 59 Miss. 289, 300.

Where the word "child" or "children" is used in a will devising property to certain beneficiaries and their children, and it clearly appears that these words are used in the sense of "issue" or "heirs of the body," they are to be treated as words of limitation, describing lineal succession to an entail, and not as words of purchase, in their usual sense. Haldeman v. Haldeman, 40 Pa. (4 Wright) 29, 35.

"Children" is considered a word of limitation in one class of cases only; that is, where there is a present devise to one and his children, when he has no children at the time. There, if the word should be interpreted as a word of purchase, future children could not take at all, and in order that the will of the testator may operate favorably to them, and not confine the gift to the parent for life, "children" is then deemed a word of limitation. Chrystie v. Phyfe, 19 N. Y. 344, 354; Vanzant v. Morris, 25 Ala. 285, 292; Addison v. Addison (S. C.) 9 Rich. Eq. 58, 67; Nightingale v. Burrell, 32 Mass. (15 Pick.) 104, 114; Wood v. Baron, 1 East, 259; Davie v. Stevens, 1 Doug. 321.

As word of purchase.

The word "child" and "children," when used in a will, are never words of limitation, but are words of purchase, indicating a new stock, and are properly descriptive of a particular class or generation of issue. They point not at heritable succession, but to individual acquisition. Appeal of Guthrie, 37 Pa. (1 Wright) 9, 14; Gernet v. Lynn, 31 Pa. (7 Casey) 94, 98; Mason v. Ammon, 11 Atl. 449, 450, 117 Pa. 127 (citing Hayes, 35).

The word "children," when used in a will giving a devise to one and his "children," is generally a word of purchase, and not of limitation. Tate v. Townsend, 61 Miss. 316, 319; In re McIntosh's Estate, 27 Atl. 1044, 1047, 158 Pa. 528; Downes v. Long, 29 Atl. 827, 828, 79 Md. 382; Bonner v. Bonner, 62 N. E. 497, 499, 28 Ind. App. 147; Appeal of Huber, 80 Pa. (30 P. F. Smith) 348, 355. The presumption that it is used in the sense of a word of purchase is strengthened by the fact that the testator in other paragraphs of his will uses the word "heirs," as it indicates an extending of a distinction in meaning between the words. Kay v. Connor, 27 Tenn. (8 Humph.) 624, 633, 49 Am. Dec. 690. But whenever the words "children," "heirs," and "heirs of the body" are indiscriminately used to designate remaindermen, they have been regarded as words of purchase, designating a class of persons who were to take on the expiration of the particular estate, not from the tenant of that estate, but from the donor; a different intention not being clearly indicated. May v. Richie, 65 Ala. 602, 604. Testator devised and bequeathed to his daughter M., wife of T., and "such heir, child, or children as shall at her decease be living, and shall thereafter attain the age of 21 years, the residue of his estate." Held, that the words "and such heir, child, or children," etc., were words of purchase, and not of limitation, and hence Mrs. T. took only a life estate, with remainder to such of her children as satisfied the condition of the devise. Tayloe v. Gould (N. Y.) 10 Barb. 388. The word "children" in a devise of land to testator's son and daughter, and after their decease to their children, the heirs of their bodies, forever, was construed, in connection with the other language of the will, to have been used as a word of limitation, and it was held that the son and daughter only took a life estate, and that their children took the remainder in fee. Patterson v. Jackman, 5 Ind. 283, 285. A devise to one for life, with remainder to his children, their heirs, executors, and administrators, as tenants in common, creates only a life estate in the first taker; the remaindermen taking as purchasers. Appeal of Chew, 37 Pa. (1 Wright) 23, 27; Murphy v. Harvey (N. Y.) 4 Edw. Ch. 131, 132; Appeal of Keim, 17 Atl. 463, 464, 125 Pa. 480.

The word "children," in a devise of property to a beneficiary, and at the beneficiary's death to his children, is a word of purchase, and not of limitation, giving the beneficiary a life estate. Johnson v. Robertson (Ky.) 45 S. W. 523, 524; Affolter v. May, 8 Atl. 20, 22, 115 Pa. 54, 19 Wkly. Notes Cas. 44; In re Giffin's Estate, 138 Pa. 327, 22 Atl. 91; Bonner v. Bonner, 62 N. E. 497, 498, 28 Ind. App. 147; Stubbs v. Stubbs, 30 Tenn. (11 Humph.) 43, 44; In re Fetherman's Estate, 37 Atl. 516, 517, 181 Pa. 349; Echols v. Jordan, 39 Ala. 24, 32; Daley v. Koons, 90 Pa. 246, 249.

In construing a bequest "to my daughter Maria for life, and at her death to her heirs or children," the court in Dunn v. Davis, 12 Ala. 135, held that the term "children" explained what the testator meant by heirs, and that no estate tail was created, but that the children took vested remainders. Ewing v. Standefer, 18 Ala. 400, 404.

In holding that a will devising a tract of land to D. and her children passed an estate for life to D. and the remainder over to her child, although it was not born at the time of the devise, the courts say "that in general the word 'children' is a word of purchase, and not of limitation, and as it was acknowledged by the jurists of England that the word in its present connection manifested a certain intent on the part of the testator that the children should take under the devise, and as they would do so there, if the word was construed to be a word of limitation and not a word of purchase, it was natural and easy for the English judges to make an exception to the general acceptance of the words, and so construe it as to render the estate devised an estate tail; and, as this was a convenient mode of giving effect to the intention of the testator, the courts of England adopted it, without, perhaps, bestowing much consideration on the question whether the testator might not have intended to give a life estate to the person in esse, remainder to the children, which might equally have ef-fectuated his intention. However this may be, it is clear that they adopted their rule of construction to promote the intention of the testator; and, our law having converted estates tail into absolute fee simple estates, it is equally clear that, if we adopt the same rule of construction, the acknowledged intention will be frustrated and defeated, as the children could then take nothing under the devise. In order, therefore, to effectuate the acknowledged and manifest intent of the testator, it is obvious that a different rule of construction must be resorted to in this state. Carr v. Estill, 55 Ky. (16 B. Mon.) 309, 313, 63 Am. Dec. 548.

A will devising land to testator's son, to hold the same to him during his life, and after his decease to his children, must be construed to give a life estate to the son and a vested remainder in fee to his children in being at the death of the testator. Such a construction is not contrary to the rule in Shelley's Case, which is that when the ancestor by any gift or conveyance takes an estate of freehold, and in the same gift or conveyance an estate is limited mediately or immediately to his heirs in fee simple or in fee tail, there the words "his heirs" are words of limitation, and not of purchase; its object being to fix the legal meaning of the word "heirs" when used in the connection set forth in the rule. The rule only operates on the word "issue" when it appears to have been used to mean an indefinite succession of lineal descendants, in which case it is synonymous with the term "heirs of the body." When "issue" is used as synonymous with "children," it is not within the meaning of the rule. It is therefore very clear that when the term "children" is used to designate the object of the testator's bounty, and some of them are in esse at the date of the will and when it takes effect, neither the policy nor the words of the rule apply. In such a case the remainder neither hangs in abeyance nor vests in the life estate to await the coming of claimants. Gernet v. Lynn, 31 Pa. (7 Casey) 94, 97.

In a devise to parent and children, if there are any children living at the time the will is executed, the term "children" is prima facie not a word of limitation, but of purchase. Gordon v. Jackson, 43 Atl. 98, 99, 58 N. J. Eq. 166.

The word "children," in a devise of property to a certain beneficiary, with remainder to the children, "is a word of purchase, and makes the person to take as certain as if the names of the remaindermen had been given. It is otherwise when the word 'heirs' is used, unless it can properly be construed to mean children." Johnson v. Robertson (Ky.) 45 S. W. 523, 524.

A testator, in devising his estate, gave his wife a life estate in the property, and provided that on her death the whole estate should be equally divided between his six children, "to wit, my five daughters and my son; my effects thus coming into the hands of my daughters not to be subject to the control of any husband, but the same to belong to my said daughters and their children." It was held that the word "children," in the clause "the same to belong to my said daughters and their children," was a word of purchase, and not of limitation, so that the daughters and their children were tenants in common of the property. Sumpter v. Carter, 42 S. E. 324, 326, 115 Ga. 893, 60 L. R. A. 274.

The words "child" and "children," as used in a will providing that at the death of testator's wife the property shall be equally divided among the children, and "that, in all cases where I speak of dividing my property among my children, I mean to give to the child or children of such of them as may be dead that portion of my estate that the parent of such child or children would have taken, had he or she been living," are words of purchase, and not of inheritance. Sometimes courts hold that, when a testator uses the word "child," he uses it in the sense of "heir"; but there is nothing in this will to show that it is used in any other than its usual legal sense, which is a word of purchase. Aultman Co. v. Gibson's Guardian (Ky.) 67 S. W. 57, 58.

The word "children," in a will where testator bequeathed a farm to his son, with a clause providing that, in case he should be spared to have a family, the estate should go to the use of his children, was a word of purchase, and not of limitation. "The word 'children,' when used in a will, is primarily and generally a word of purchase, and, while it may be used to signify 'heirs' or 'heirs of the body,' it will not be so construed, unless the testator has employed other words indicative of an intention to use it as a word of limitation." Oyster v. Knoll, 20 Atl. 624, 137 Pa. 448, 21 Am. St. Rep. 890.

Testator's will declared: "I give and bequeath to my son S. my farm, * * * for his support and estate, to be and remain bequeathed to his children during their natural lives." Held that, the context not indicating any contrary intention, the word "children" was employed as a word of purchase, and hence testator's son took but a life estate. Oyster v. Oyster, 100 Pa. 538, 541, 45 Am. Rep. 388.

In a will devising certain lands to trustees for the use and benefit of the testator's wife and her heirs, forever; that is, the children, if any, begotten by the testator—"children" was not a word of limitation, but of purchase, and therefore entitled the wife to a life estate, with a remainder in fee to the children begotten by the testator as a class. Wolford v. Morgenthal, 91 Pa. 30, 45.

CHILDREN FOREVER.

Where testator bequeaths property to his daughter and her children, forever, the phrase "children, forever," is to be construed as "heirs" of inheritance, and used in the sense of "heirs" or "heirs of the body." Moran v. Dillehay, 71 Ky. (8 Bush) 434, 440; Lachland's Heirs v. Downing's Ex'rs, 50 Ky. (11 B. Mon.) 32, 33.

"Children," as used in a will by which testator gave property to his daughter, to her and her children, forever, should be construed as synonymous with "issue"; it being necessary to effectuate the manifest intention of the testator. Merryman v. Merryman (Va.) 5 Munf. 440, 441.

CHILDREN OF THE POOR.

A will directing that the interest of a certain fund should be expended by his executors in the education of the "children of the poor in the village of H." refers to a class of persons who come into existence from time to time, not by inheritance, or in any order of succession defined by law, but who are to be ascertained only by their answering the description mentioned. Such a line of succession is not known or recognized by the ordinary rules of law, and cannot be made the channel for the perpetual transmission of the legal or beneficial ownership of property. Williams v. Williams, 8 N. Y. (4 Seld.) 525, 540.

CHILDISH.

"Childish" refers to simplicity or weakness of mind, and certainly expresses a degree of reason or intelligence. A person who is childish is not non compos mentis, for one non compos mentis, as defined by Lord Coke, "is a person who was of good and sound memory, and by the visitation of God had lost it, or he that by sickness, grief, or other accident wholly loseth his understanding." Lord Hardwicke says: "Non compos, of unsound mind, imports a total deprivation of sense. Now weakness does not carry this idea along with it." These terms mean, in respect to the condition of the mind of a person, a total want of understanding. Mulloy v. Ingalls, 4 Neb. 115, 120.

CHINA.

The words "chinaware and porcelain-ware," in the tariff act fixing a duty on such ware, does not include porcelain on which pictures have been painted, the porcelain being manufactured and used only for the purpose of being used for such purpose, but such articles are only dutiable as "paintings not otherwise provided for." Arthur v. Jacoby, 103 U. S. 677, 678, 28 L. Ed. 454.

CHINESE.

As white persons, see "White Person."

"Chinese person," as used in Act July 5, 1884, c. 220, 23 Stat. 115 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1305], requiring every Chinese person other than a laborer to procure a certificate in order to thereafter return to this country after leaving it, meant every Chinese person whatsoever, and included the wife or minor child of a Chinese man. In re Ah Quan (U. S.) 21 Fed. 182, 186.

CHINESE LABORER.

The words "Chinese laborers," as used in an act providing for the exclusion of Chinese, shall be construed to mean both skilled and unskilled laborers, and Chinese employed in mining. U. S. Comp. St. 1901, pp. 1311, 1318.

"Chinese laborers," as used in Act Nov. 3, 1893, c. 14, § 1, 28 Stat. 7 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1322], relating to certificates of residence, refer not only to those actually engaged in manual labor at the date of the passage of that act, but were intended to include all Chinese persons dependent upon their manual labor as a means of securing an honest livelihood and self-support, and those who are not "officers, teachers, students, merchants or travelers for curiosity," within the meaning of the treaty of November 17, 1880, between the United States and China. United States v. Chung Ki Foon (U. S.) 83 Fed. 143, 144.

"Chinese laborers," as used in Act Cong. May 6, 1882, c. 126, 22 Stat. 58 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1305], making it a misdemeanor for the master of any vessel to knowingly bring within the United States on such vessel, and to land or permit to be landed, any "Chinese laborers" from any foreign port or place, must be construed as having the same signification as used in the supplementary treaty of November 17, 1880, between China and the United States, article 1 of which provides that when the coming of "Chinese laborers" to the United States, or their residence therein, affects the interests of that country, the government of the United States may regulate, limit, or suspend such coming; but it shall be reasonable, and apply only to Chinese who go to the United States as laborers, and means the subjects of the government of China, and cannot be construed as applying to persons of the Chinese race who are not and never were subjects or residents within the Chinese Empire. United States v. Douglas (U. S.) 17 Fed. 634.

A Chinese laborer born on the Island of Hong Kong after its cession to Great Britain is within the provisions of Act Cong. May 6, 1882, c. 126, 22 Stat. 58 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1305], restricting the migration of Chinese laborers to the United States. The purpose of the act was to exclude laborers coming from China subject to the stipulations of the treaty of 1880, and to exclude laborers of the Chinese race coming from any other part of the world. In re Ah Lung (U. S.) 18 Fed. 28, 29.

The words "laborer" and "laborers," as used in an act providing for the exclusion of Chinese, shall be construed to mean both skilled and unskilled manual laborers, including Chinese employed in mining, fishing, huckstering, peddling, laundrymen, or those engaged in taking, drying, or otherwise preserving shell or other fish for home consumption or exportation. U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1322.

Actor or performer.

"Laborers," as used in the treaty with China of November 17, 1880, and the act in aid thereof of May 6, 1882, c. 126, 22 Stat. 58 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1305], providing that Chinese laborers shall not be permitted to come and reside in the United States, etc., is used in its popular sense, meaning only those persons whose occupation involves physical toil and who work for wages. The term does not include a Chinese actor or theatrical performer. In re Ho King (U. S.) 14 Fed. 724, 725.

Gamblers and highbinders.

Act May 5, 1892, c. 60, § 6, 27 Stat. 25 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1320], prohibits the coming of Chinese laborers to the United States, etc. The treaty with China of 1880 (22 Stat. 826) provides that no Chinese shall be entitled to come to this country except those who come for purposes of teaching, studying, mercantile transactions, travel, or curiosity. Held, that the words "Chinese laborers" should be construed to include Chinese gamblers and highbinders. The words "Chinese laborers" should not be confined to those engaged in hard manual work, but to include all those not included in the exception contained in the treaty. United States v. Ah Fawn (U. S.) 57 Fed. 591, 596.

Laundryman.

A Chinaman whose chief occupation was that of a laundryman, but who was an active, voluntary, unpaid teacher in a Sunday school, and actively conversed with his countrymen upon religious subjects, is a laborer, and not a Christian missionary, within the meaning of the registration and deportation acts of May 5, 1892, c. 60, 27 Stat. 25 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1319], and of November 3, 1893, c. 14, 28 Stat. 7 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1322]. In re Leung (U. S.) 86 Fed. 303, 304, 30 C. C. A. 69.

Member of mercantile firm.

A Chinaman who is a member of a firm of Chinese merchants engaged in buying and selling merchandise at a fixed place of business, and who is sent out by such firm as an employé to take charge of another mercantile establishment in which said firm owns a one-half interest, is a merchant, and not a "laborer," within the meaning of Act Nov. 3, 1893, c. 14, 28 Stat. 7 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1322], and is not liable to deportation while thus employed. In re Chu Poy (U. S.) 81 Fed. 826, 828.

A Chinaman who owns an interest in a mercantile firm, but is not actively engaged in the conduct of business, and who works as head cook in a restaurant of which he is part proprietor, is a "laborer," and not a merchant, within the terms of Act Nov. 3, 1893, c. 14, 28 Stat. 7 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1322], which defines a merchant as a person engaged in buying and selling merchandise at a fixed place of business, which business is conducted in his name, and who during the time he claims to be engaged as a merchant does not engage in the performance of any manual labor except such as is necessary in the conduct of his business as merchant, and he is therefore entitled only to such rights and privileges as pertain to Chinese persons of his class. Mar Bing Guey v. United States (U. S.) 97 Fed. 576, 579.

A Chinaman who was a peddler at the time of the passage of Act May 5, 1892, c. 60, 27 Stat. 25 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1319], relating to registration of Chinese laborers, but who ceased peddling and became a member of a trading firm prior to the passage of Act Nov. 3, 1893, c. 14, 28 Stat. 7 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1322], which includes Chinese peddlers, etc., in the term "laborers," is not a laborer and liable to deportation for want of registration. United States v. Mark Ying (U. S.) 76 Fed. 450, 451.

The fact that a Chinese member of a trading firm who lives at the store with several other members of the firm does the housework for them does not constitute him a "laborer" within the meaning of the registration and deportation Acts of May 5, 1892, c. 60, 27 Stat. 25 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1319], and of November 3, 1893, c. 14, 28 Stat. 7 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1322]. In the Standard Dictionary the definition of "laborer" excludes domestic service. United States v. Sun (U. S.) 76 Fed. 450.

A Chinaman came to the United States for the first time in June, 1897. From that time until his arrest on September 9, 1897, under the statute relative to Chinese emigration, he worked in a laundry in Missouri. He testified that he had an interest of $1,000 in the Chinese grocery business conducted under the name of One Lung, 43 Mott street, New York City. Held, that this did not constitute him a merchant under Act Nov. 3, 1893, c. 14, 28 Stat. 7 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1322], but that he was a laborer. United States v. Yong Yew (U. S.) 83 Fed. 832.

Physician.

A Chinese physician is not a laborer within the Chinese exclusion act. United States v. Chin Fee (U. S.) 94 Fed. 828, 829.

Prisoner at hard labor.

"Laborer," as used in Act May 5, 1892, c. 60, § 6, 27 Stat. 25 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1320], prohibiting the coming of Chinese persons into the United States, and exempting Chinese merchants from such rule, includes a Chinaman serving a term of imprisonment at hard labor. United States v. Wong Ah Hung (U. S.) 62 Fed. 1005, 1006.

Prostitute.

The term "Chinese laborers" as used in Act Cong. May 5, 1892, c. 60, 27 Stat. 25 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1319], entitled "An act to prohibit the coming of Chinese persons into the United States," and the act of November 3, 1893, amendatory thereof, includes a Chinese prostitute. Lee Ah Yin v. United States (U. S.) 116 Fed. 614, 54 C. C. A. 70.

Restaurant keeper.

The term "laborer," as used in the statutes describing the class of Chinese who are not privileged to enter the United States, includes master mechanics and tradesmen, such as blacksmiths, cabinetmakers, tailors, and shoemakers, who receive orders, and cut and make up materials in such forms and of such dimensions as their customers require, and it also includes a restaurant keeper. In re Ah Yow (U. S.) 59 Fed. 561, 562.

Seaman.

"Chinese laborers," as used in the treaty of 1894 with the empire of China and the acts of Congress of Sept. 13, 1888, c. 1015, 25 Stat. 476 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1312], and 1894, excluding "Chinese laborers" from coming into the United States, do not include a Chinese seaman who ships as steward bound for a port in the United States, and who lands with the intention and desire to reship as soon as possible. In re Jam (U. S.) 101 Fed. 989.

The Chinese members of a crew of a boat entering a port of the United States are not "laborers" within the meaning of Act May 6, 1882, c. 126, § 2, 22 Stat. 59 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1306], making it a misdemeanor punishable by fine and imprisonment for the master of any vessel to knowingly bring within the United States on such vessel, and land or permit to be landed, any Chinese laborers from any foreign port or place. True, the vocation of such Chinese is labor, but they are not brought to this country to remain and enter into competition with the labor and inhabitants of the country. They labor upon the high seas in the navigation of a vessel engaged in the exchange of commodities between this country and other ports of the world. In re Moncan (U. S.) 14 Fed. 44, 47.

The phrase "Chinese laborers," in the treaty of 1880, art. 1, providing that the suspension shall apply only to Chinese who may come to the United States as laborers, has no reference to seamen, in the ordinary pursuit of navigation in the high seas, who may touch on the shores and land temporarily for the purpose of obtaining a chance to ship on some other foreign voyage. In re Ah Kee (U. S.) 22 Fed. 519, 520.

CHINESE MARRIAGE.

According to the Encyclopedia Britannica a "marriage in China" is an arrangement with which the parties most concerned have nothing to do. The duty of filial piety is said to be the final object of Chinese religious teaching, and, under its influence, parental will is a supreme authority, from which there is no appeal. Marriage, therefore, is not the result of acquaintanceship. "The bridegroom rarely sees his betrothed until she has become his wife." The preliminaries are entirely arranged by professional go-betweens with the parents and families of the respective parties. The correspondence between the two, thus conducted, is in writing, and is of the briefest character. If the arrangements proceed satisfactorily, the particulars of the engagement are committed to writing upon duplicate cards. These are sewn together, and the ceremony is complete. The bride journeys to the home of her husband, who may then see her for the first time. In re Lum Lin Ying (U. S.) 59 Fed. 682, 683.

CHINESE SUBJECTS.

The Burlingame treaty of July 28, 1868, between the United States and China, art. 6, providing that "Chinese subjects visiting or residing in the United States" shall enjoy the same privileges, immunities, and exemptions in respect to travel or residence as may be enjoyed by citizens or subjects of the most favored nation, refers to those traveling for instruction or from curiosity, or engaging in some legitimate avocation, and whose ingress may not lawfully be prohibited by reason of some objection personal to themselves and dependent on their nationality. Ex parte Ah Fook, 49 Cal. 402, 405.

CHIP HAT.

"A chip hat is a hat made of the ligneous strips of a tree." United States v. Goodwin (U. S.) 25 Fed. Cas. 1362, 1363.

CHLOROFORM.

Chloroform is an oily liquid of an aromatic ethereal odor, consisting of carbon, hydrogen, and chlorine. State v. Baldwin, 12 Pac. 318, 323, 36 Kan. 1 (citing Webst. Dict.).

CHOCOLATE.

Chocolate is a cocoa bean roasted, cracked, shelled, crushed, ground, and molded in cakes. It contains no sugar, and is in general use in families. Sweetened chocolate is manufactured in the same way, but the paste is mixed with sugar, and is used by confectioners in making chocolate confections. In re Schilling (U. S.) 53 Fed. 81, 82, 3 C. C. A. 440.

"Chocolate," as used in 17 Stat. 234, imposing a duty of five cents per pound on "chocolate" and various higher duties on confectionery, means any article composed of chocolate, in whatever form manufactured, though it be in a form ordinarily sold as confectionery. Arthur v. Stephan, 96 U. S. 125, 126, 24 L. Ed. 771.

CHOICE.

See, also, "Choose."

"Choice" or "selection" means the power to determine between two or more. No choice or selection can be made when there is no alternative. People v. Mosher, 61 N. Y. Supp. 452, 454, 45 App. Div. 68.

The word "choice," in a bequest of five head of horses, one yoke of oxen, etc., of the choice of the beneficiary, operates to render the bequest specific. Everitt v. Lane, 37 N. C. 548, 551.

Where a testator in his will gives to his son the "choice" of one of two tracts of land, and provides that the other tract shall be sold by his executors and the proceeds distributed among his daughters, though there are no words of inheritance in the devise to the son, the intent to give him an absolute estate in one of the tracts of which he gives him the choice seems manifest where testator professes in a preliminary clause to dispose of his entire estate, and it is evident that he did not intend to place his son on a worse footing than his daughters, but rather on a better. Clark v. Mikell (S. C.) 3 Desaus. 168.

CHOKE.

To "choke" is to prevent or interfere with the passage of air through the windpipe, either by internal or external pressure. To choke a person is, in other words, to fill his mouth or throat with a towel or other substance, or to seize and compress his throat so as to obstruct his breathing, and an indictment charging murder by "choking" is not indefinite in its description of the manner of the killing. Hicks v. State, 31 S. E. 579, 580, 105 Ga. 627.

"Choked" means rendered unable to breathe by filling, pressing upon, or squeezing the windpipe; suffocated; stifled; strangled. As used in the term "mortally choked, suffocated and drowned" it means dead. United States v. Barber, 20 D. C. 79, 93.

CHOOSE.

See, also, "Choice."

Mutually chosen, see "Mutually."

The term "choose" includes "elect" and "appoint." Laws N. Y. 1892, c. 677, § 17.

"Choose," as used in a will giving testator's widow a life estate in his property, with power to sell and convey any property she may choose for her comfort and support, is synonymous with "wish" or "desire," rather than implying a mere right of selection. Cain v. Cain, 29 South. 846, 847, 127 Ala. 440.

The word "choose," when used by the appointing power appointing a person to office, is equivalent to the word "appoint." People v. Fitzsimmons, 68 N. Y. 514, 519.

A person is chosen to an office, within the statute providing for the filling of vacancies, although he dies, after the votes are cast, though before they are counted. State v. Hunt, 54 N. H. 431, 432.

CHOSE.

Bouvier defines "chose" as personal property. Vawter v. Griffin, 40 Ind. 593, 601.

CHOSE IN ACTION.

Other chose in action, see "Other."

The term "chose in action" includes all debts, and all claims for damages, for breach of contract, or for torts connected with contract, which cannot be enforced without action. Bushnell v. Kennedy, 76 U. S. (9 Wall.) 387, 390, 19 L. Ed. 736; Sellers v. Arie, 68 N. W. 814, 815, 99 Iowa, 515; Denning v. Nelson, 10 West. Law J. 215, 218, 1 Ohio Dec. 503; Magee v. Toland (Ala.) 8 Port. 36, 40; Pitts v. Curtis, 4 Ala. 350, 351; Streever v. Birch, 17 N. Y. Supp. 195, 197, 62 Hun, 298; Campbell v. Perry, 9 N. Y. Supp. 330, 333, 56 Hun, 639.

A thing or chose in action is defined in 2 Bl. Comm. 16, to be where a man hath not the occupation, but merely the right to occupy the thing in question, the possession of which may be recovered by a suit or action at law. Turner v. State, 1 Ohio St. 422, 426.

A "thing in action" "is a term in contradistinction to a chose or thing in possession, and is applicable to cases where the title to the money or property is in one person and the possession is in another, which by contract he is bound to deliver to the owner." Ayres v. Western R. Corp. (N. Y.) 48 Barb. 132, 135.

"The term 'chose in action' is one of comprehensive import. It includes the infinite variety of contracts, covenants, and promises which confer on one party a right to recover a personal chattel or a sum of money from another by action." Sheldon v. Sill, 49 U. S. (8 How.) 441, 449, 12 L. Ed. 1147; Coler v. Grainger County (U. S.) 74 Fed. 16, 21, 20 C. C. A. 267; Simons v. Ypsilanti Paper Co. (U. S.) 33 Fed. 193, 194; Mexican Nat. R. Co. v. Davidson, 15 Sup. Ct. 563, 564, 157 U. S. 201, 39 L. Ed. 672; Kirkman v. Kirkman, 49 N. Y. Supp. 683, 685, 686, 26 App. Div. 395.

"Chose in action," taken in its broadest sense, comprehends not only a demand arising on contract, but also on wrong or injury to the property or person. But for the purposes of any sort of assignment, legal or equitable, I can nowhere find that the term has ever been carried beyond a claim due either on contract, or such whereby some special damage has arisen to the estate of the assignor. People v. Tioga Common Pleas (N. Y.) 19 Wend. 73, 75.

Personalty to which the owner has a right of possession in fact, or a right of immediate possession wrongfully withheld, is termed by law a "chose in action." Civ. Code Ga. 1895, § 3072.

A chose in action is a right not reduced to possession, or a right under a contract which, in case of nonperformance, can only be reduced to beneficial possession by an action or suit. Haskell v. Blair, 57 Mass. (3 Cush.) 534, 546 (citing Chit. Bills [10th Am. Ed.] 6).

"As defined by Burrill, a 'chose in action' is a thing which a man has not the actual possession of, but which he has a right to demand by action; as a debt or demand due from another." Ramsey v. Gould (N. Y.) 57 Barb. 398, 408.

By the provisions of Civ. Code Cal. § 953, a "thing in action" is a right to recover money or other personal property by a judicial proceeding. Henderson v. Henshall (U. S.) 54 Fed. 320, 331, 4 C. C. A. 357; Haskins v. Jordan, 55 Pac. 786, 787, 123 Cal. 157.

A "chose in action," used in its broadest sense, means all demands, whether arising from contract, or from wrong or injury to the property or person, but for purposes of any sort of assignment the term does not include anything beyond claims due either on contract or where some special damage has arisen to the estate of the assignor. People v. Tioga Common Pleas (N. Y.) 19 Wend. 73, 75.

"Chose in action" is generally used to mean the right to bring an action to recover a debt or redress a wrong, and "includes all rights to personal property, not in possession, which may be enforced by action; demands arising out of torts as well as contracts." Sterling v. Sims, 72 Ga. 51, 53.

A chose in action is said to be a thing not in occupation or enjoyment, but merely a bare right to be recovered by an action; hence its name. United States v. Moulton (U. S.) 27 Fed. Cas. 11, 12.

A thing in action is the right to recover money or other personal property by a judicial proceeding. Civ. Code Cal. 1903, § 953; Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 3466; Civ. Code S. D. 1903, § 383; Rev. St. Okl. 1903, § 4162; Civ. Code Mont. 1895, § 1350.

Action of review.

An action of review is a "chose in action," within the meaning of a statute providing that all the bankrupt's choses in actions shall at once vest in his assignee. The assignee of a bankrupt is alone competent to prosecute the action, though commenced before the bankruptcy. Zollar v. Janvrin, 49 N. H. 114, 115, 118, 6 Am. Rep. 469.

As anything recoverable by assumpsit.

The term "chose in action," as used in Civ. Code Prac. § 439, providing that the plaintiff, in an execution returned "No property found," may institute an equitable action for the discovery of any money, chose in action, equitable or legal interest, and all other property to which the defendant is entitled, should be construed to include any claim of the debtor against another on which an action of assumpsit would lie at common law. Merriwether v. Bell, 58 S. W. 987, 988, 22 Ky. Law Rep. 844.

Bill of lading.

A bill of lading is a chose in action, and an assignee thereof cannot maintain thereon a suit in his own name. Knight v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. Ry. Co., 40 Ill. App. 471, 473.

Breach of contract.

The term "chose in action," as used in Act March 3, 1875, c. 137, 18 Stat. 470 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 507], providing that no Circuit or District Court shall have cognizance of any suit to recover the contents of any promissory note or other chose in action in favor of an assignee, unless such suit might have been prosecuted in such court if no assignment had been made, includes actions for damage growing out of rights of action founded on contracts which contain within themselves such promises or duties to be performed. Goldman v. Furness, Withy & Co. (U. S.) 101 Fed. 467, 468.

An action to recover damages for a refusal to accept and pay for merchandise purchased under an oral contract is a suit to recover the contents of a chose in action. Simons v. Ypsilanti Paper Co. (U. S.) 33 Fed. 193, 194.

As chattels or effects.

See "Chattel"; "Effects."

Claim for money.

A chose in action is assignable in Iowa, so that a claim for the recovery of money paid for intoxicating liquors, under Code, § 1550, providing that all such payments shall be deemed to have been received upon a valid promise and agreement to repay the same on demand, is a chose in action and assignable. Sellers v. Arie, 68 N. W. 814, 815, 99 Iowa, 515.

A claim founded on contract to recover a sum of money out of a fund in the hands of a railroad company is a chose in action, within the meaning of the provision which denies to the assignee of a chose in action the right to sue in the federal courts if no action could have been maintained there in the absence of an assignment. Mexican Nat. R. Co. v. Davidson, 15 Sup. Ct. 563, 564, 157 U. S. 201, 39 L. Ed. 672.

The statute, by "chooses in action," refers to a species of property recognized by the law, and which, upon the death of the owner, would be inventoried as such by his legal representatives. Dry Dock Bank v. American Life Ins. & Trust Co., 3 N. Y. (3 Comst.) 344, 356. The claim for compensation by an owner of land acquired by the city of New York is a thing in action within the meaning of the tax law, and is subject to taxation. People v. Halsted, 49 N. Y. Supp. 685, 686, 26 App. Div. 316.

In People v. Tioga Common Pleas (N. Y.) 19 Wend. 73, 75, Cowen, J., defines a "chose in action" as "a demand arising on contract, but also for a wrong or injury to the property or person." It is also defined as a right of proceeding in a court of law to procure the payment of a sum of money. Under such definition the right of one having a liquor tax certificate to have its surrender value returned on discontinuing the traffic, as provided by Laws 1896, c. 112, § 25, is in the nature of a chose in action. Niles v. Mathusa, 47 N. Y. Supp. 38, 41, 20 App. Div. 483.

Claim for overcharge in freight.

The term "chose in action," as used in Removal Act Aug. 13, 1888, c. 866, 25 Stat. 433 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 508], will not be construed to include a claim against a railroad company for overcharges in freight. Conn v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. (U. S.) 48 Fed. 177, 178.

Credits.

The term "chooses in action" means a particular species of property recognized by law, and which, on the death of the owner, would be inventoried as such by his legal representatives, and does not include credit, and, though credit may be a benefit to the possessor as a means of procuring property, it is not in itself recognized in law as property. Dry Dock Bank v. American Life Ins. & Trust Co., 3 N. Y. (3 Comst.) 344, 356.

Choses in action are not credits within the statutes relating to trustee process. Perry v. Coates, 9 Mass. 537; Lupton v. Cutter, 25 Mass. (8 Pick.) 298, 300.

Debt distinguished.

The terms or phrases "chose in action" and "debt" are used by courts to represent the same thing when viewed from opposite sides. "Chose in action" is the right of a creditor to be paid, while "debt" is the personal obligation of the debtor to pay. Smead v. Chandler, 76 S. W. 1066, 1068, 71 Ark. 505.

Evidences of indebtedness.

An evidence of indebtedness, under whatsoever name it may be termed, whether note, bond, bill of exchange, or other instrument, and however secured, is a mere chattel personal included within the term "chose in action." Easton v. Board of Review of Peoria County, 55 N. E. 716, 717, 183 Ill. 255.

Goods.

See "Goods."

As intangible or incorporeal.

"Choses in action correspond substantially to, or at least are included within, the civil-law definitions of 'incorporeal rights.'" Gordon v. Muchler, 34 La. Ann. 604, 608.

Debts and choses in action are a species of intangible property that, for purposes of taxation, are generally held to be situated at the domicile of the owner. Scripps v. Fulton County Board of Review, 55 N. E. 700, 701, 183 Ill. 278.

A "chose in action" is defined by Kent as a personal right not reduced into possession, but recoverable by a suit at law. Money due on bond, note, or other contract, damages due for the breach of contract for the detention of chattels, or for torts, are included under this general head or title of things in action. A chose in action is a mere right of action due, a personal chattel not in actual possession. Such being the definition of "chose in action," a certificate of stock which is a chose in action is not within Code, § 2414, declaring that no gift of goods and chattels shall be valid unless by deed or will, or unless the donee have actual possession, the words "goods and chattels" relating purely to tangible and movable things. First Nat. Bank v. Holland, 39 S. E. 126, 129, 99 Va. 495, 55 L. R. A. 155, 86 Am. St. Rep. 898.

Judgment.

A judgment is a mere chose in action. It passes to an assignee charged with all the equities which can be asserted against it in the hands of an assignor. Tiffany v. Stewart, 14 N. W. 241, 243, 60 Iowa, 207.

The words "chose in action," as used in 2 Rev. St. (2d Ed.) p. 274, § 5, enacting that an assignee for a valuable consideration of any bond, note, or other chose in action which has been or may hereafter be assigned, etc., comprehends a judgment. Murphy v. Cochran (N. Y.) 1 Hill, 339, 342.

Life insurance policy.

A policy of life insurance is a chose in action. Prudential Ins. Co. v. Hunn, 52 N. E. 772, 774, 21 Ind. App. 525, 69 Am. St. Rep. 380.

A policy of life insurance is, after the death of the insured, unquestionably a chose in action, it then being simply a promise to pay money. It has been held in numerous cases that a policy of life insurance, even before the death of the insured, is a chose in action. Steele v. Gatlin, 42 S. E. 253, 254, 115 Ga. 929, 59 L. R. A. 129.

Loss of services.

Loss of services by the injury of one who was bound to serve plaintiff in consideration of his support and maintenance is not a chose in action. Streever v. Birch, 17 N. Y. Supp. 195, 197, 62 Hun, 298.

Mortgage.

The term "chose in action," in 1 Stat. 78, includes a mortgage. Chief Justice Marshall in Sere v. Pilot, 10 U. S. (6 Cranch) 332, 3 L. Ed. 240, remarks: "Without doubt, assignable paper, being the chose in action most usually transferred, was in the mind of the Legislature when the law was formed, and the words of the provision are therefore best adapted to that class of assignments; but there is no reason to believe that the Legislature were not equally disposed to except from the jurisdiction of the federal courts those who could sue in virtue of legal assignments." Hill v. Winne (U. S.) 12 Fed. Cas. 185, 186.

A chose in action is a thing in action, a right of action, a thing recoverable in action, a debt, a demand, a promissory note, a right to recover damages. A chose in action was originally a right of action not assignable at law. It was a cause of suit for a debt due or a wrong done. Therefore, while a bond with a mortgage securing it may be a chose in action so far as the debt is concerned, the estate conveyed by the mortgage cannot be said to be a chose in action, since it is real estate conveyed to the mortgagee which in law is absolute and perfect; and hence a mortgage is not a chose in action within the act of Congress restraining the Circuit Court from taking cognizance of any suit to recover the contents of a chose in action by an assignee when the original holder could not have maintained the suit in a federal court. Sheldon v. Sill, 49 U. S. (8 How.) 441, 447, 12 L. Ed. 1147.

A real estate mortgage is a chose in action, as it is now a lien upon and not a title to or in land, but a mere security for debt. Hall v. Bartlett (N. Y.) 9 Barb. 297, 299.

Personal injury.

The term "chose in action," in its broadest sense, includes a right of action for a personal injury. Bennett v. Bennett, 23 N. E. 17, 21, 116 N. Y. 584, 6 L. R. A. 553.

As personal property.

See "Personal Property."

As confined to personality.

"Choses in action" are said to be things wherein a man is not possessed, but is put to his action for the recovery of them. 1 Lill. Ab. 378. And a "chose" has been defined to mean the legal interest possessed by a party in a contract or a right, which, in case of opposition, cannot be reduced into beneficial enjoyment without an action or suit. 5 Petersd. Ab. 404. But it is not confined to claims to personality. A condition and power of re-entry into land upon a feoffment, gift, or grant, before the performance of the condition, is of the nature of a chose in action. Hall v. Bartlett (N. Y.) 9 Barb. 297, 299, 300 (citing Tom. Dict. "Chose").

The term "chose in action" "is applied exclusively to property in chattels personal, of which there are choses in possession and choses in action, the latter being those of which a man has only the bare right, without any occupation or enjoyment. All property in action depends entirely upon contracts, either express or implied, which are the only regular means of acquiring a chose in action." Van Wicklen v. Paulson (N. Y.) 14 Barb. 654, 656 (citing 2 Bl. Comm. 389).

As requiring present right of action.

A chose in action does not require a present right of action. Thus a note payable on time is a chose in action as soon as it is made. So a note payable in work is assignable as a chose in action, though the performance of the work has not been demanded. Haskell v. Blair, 57 Mass. (3 Cush.) 534, 536.

Promissory note distinguished.

See "Promissory Note."

One who transfers a promissory note or bill by indorsement or delivery is not an assignor of a thing in action, so as to be precluded from testifying in an action thereon under a statute prohibiting such an assignor from testifying in certain cases. McHose v. Cain, 22 Wis. 486.

As property.

See "Property."

Rent not due.

Rent not yet due is not a chose in action; it is a part of the realty, and passes as such with the estate. Van Wicklen v. Paulson (N. Y.) 14 Barb. 654, 655.

Right in bailment for remainder to slave.

A right to the remainder in a slave devised to another for a period of years is not a chose in action. Pitts v. Curtis, 4 Ala. 350, 351.

A slave held by a bailee for hire from the wife is not a chose in action, but a thing in possession. Magee v. Toland (Ala.) 8 Port. 36, 40.

Right to recover possession.

A thing or chose in action is defined in 2 Bl. Comm. 16, to be where a man hath not the occupation, but merely the right to occupy the thing in question, the possession of which may be recovered by a suit or action at law. Turner v. State, 1 Ohio St. 422, 426; Magee v. Poland (Ala.) 8 Port. 36, 40.

A right of action for the conversion of personal property is a chose in action. Gillet v. Fairchild (N. Y.) 4 Denio, 80, 82; Denning v. Nelson, 10 West. Law J. 215, 218, 1 Ohio Dec. 503.

"Chose in action," as used in Bankr. Law 1867 (14 Stat. 517) § 14, declaring that all of the property conveyed by the bankrupt in fraud of his creditors, all rights in equity or "chooses in action," etc., shall be vested in the assignee, means rights of action for real or personal property, for the unlawful taking or detention of property, or for injuries thereto, and does not embrace causes of action for merely personal injuries. Noonan v. Orton, 34 Wis. 259, 264, 17 Am. Rep. 441.

The term "chose in action" is sometimes used as a right of bringing the action. Thus the right to have the interest of an heir in an estate in the hands of his administrator is a chose in action. Sterling v. Sims, 72 Ga. 51, 53.

Specific performance of contract.

"Chose in action," as used in Rev. St. § 629 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 503], declaring that no Circuit Court shall have cognizance of any suit to recover the contents of any chose in action in favor of an assignee, unless a suit might have been prosecuted in such court to recover the said contents if no assignment had been made, etc., includes a suit to enforce the performance of a contract, such suit being one to recover the contents of a "chose in action." Shoecraft v. Trustees of Internal Imp. Fund, 8 Sup. Ct. 686, 689, 124 U. S. 730, 31 L. Ed. 574.

Stock.

The purchase of stock in a corporation is not the purchase of a "chose in action," within the meaning of an instrument forbidding such purchase. Ramsey v. Gould (N. Y.) 57 Barb. 398, 408.

Stock subscription.

The term "chose in action" includes unpaid subscriptions to the capital stock of a corporation, and therefore an action at law may be maintained thereon by a receiver of the corporation on its insolvency. Barkalow v. Totten, 32 Atl. 2, 3, 53 N. J. Eq. (8 Dick.) 573; Coler v. Grainger County (U. S.) 74 Fed. 16, 21, 20 C. C. A. 267.

Torts.

"While a 'chose in action' is ordinarily understood as a right of action for money arising under contract, the term is undoubtedly of much broader signification, and includes the right to recover pecuniary damages for a wrong inflicted either on the person or property. It embraces demands arising out of tort, as well as causes of action originating in the breach of the contract." City of Cincinnati v. Hafer, 30 N. E. 197, 198, 49 Ohio St. 60.

Chose in action "includes all rights to personal property not in possession which may be enforced by action, and it makes no difference whether the owner has been deprived of his property by the tortious act of another, or by his breach of a contract express or implied. In both cases the debt or damages of the owner is a thing in action." Gillet v. Fairchild (N. Y.) 4 Denio, 80, 82.

CHOSE IN POSSESSION.

Choses in possession are personal things of which one has possession. Vawter v. Griffin, 40 Ind. 593, 601.

A chose in possession is a chose which the person has not only the right to enjoy, but also the actual enjoyment thereof. Sterling v. Sims, 72 Ga. 51, 53.

CHOUSE.

To "chouse" means to cheat, trick, or defraud—followed by "of" or "out of," as "to chouse one of his money." Southern Kansas Ry. Co. v. Isaacs, 49 S. W. 690, 691, 20 Tex. Civ. App. 468.

CHRIST.

Where a petition alleged the making of a note sued on by Christopher McElhenon, and the note was signed "Christy" or "Christ." McElhenon, there was no material variance or misnomer, the given name attached to the note being abbreviations of the name alleged. Weaver v. McElhenon, 13 Mo. 89, 90.

CHRISTIAN.

"Christian," as applied to the doctrine of Christian Science, means Christlike; the teachings of Jesus understood and followed; science; truth understood. State v. Buswell, 58 N. W. 728, 730, 40 Neb. 158, 24 L. R. A. 68.

New Hampshire Bill of Rights, art. 6, says that every denomination of "Christians" demeaning themselves quietly and as good subjects of the state shall be equally under the protection of the law, and no subordination of any one sect or denomination to another shall ever be established by law. In construing the Bill of Rights the court said: "The Encyclopædia of Religious Knowledge says the term 'Christian,' when used in its more strict scriptural and theological sense, denotes one who really believes the Gospel, imbibes the spirit, is influenced by the grace and obedient to the will of Christ, and this it calls the 'sacred and proper' use of the word. It mentions another use of the word, which it calls the 'political or conventional' use, which denotes one who assents to the doctrines of the religion of Christ, and who, being born of Christian parents or in a Christian country, does not profess any other religion or belong to any other of the divisions of men, such as Jews, Mohammedans, deists, pagans, and atheists; or, as is said in another part of the article, Christians may be considered as nominal and real." In the opinion the court uses the term "Christian" in its political and conventional sense, as above stated, that being the sense in which it is ordinarily used in constitutions and statutes and legal documents. As used in the Bill of Rights, the word is not used in a sense having no reference to Christianity as a system of religious doctrines, or in some indefinite sense which would include all good men who behave well without regard to their religious belief. It is the belief in the Christian religion, and in Jesus Christ as its author and as the true Messiah, that makes a Christian. A man may be a Christian, in the political or conventional sense in which we use the word, if he assents to the truth of the Christian system. If he lives an upright life it makes him a good, or, as might be said, a consistent, Christian. But any amount of good living will not make a pagan a Christian until he believes the Christian faith. There is and can be no doubt as to what the word "Christian" means in its common use and acceptation, and as it is generally understood. It is to be presumed that the framers of the Constitution, when they used the word in the Bill of Rights, used it in its common and ordinary sense. Such is the ordinary and universal rule, unless something appears to restrict or qualify such ordinary meaning. Hale v. Everett, 53 N. H. 9, 53, 16 Am. Rep. 82.

CHRISTIAN NAME.

Where a statute provides that a writ be indorsed with the "Christian and sur name" of the attorney, it is sufficiently complied with by indorsing the surname and the initials of the Christian name. Stratton v. Foster, 11 Me. (2 Fairf.) 467.

The term "Christian name" is used in the sense of "given name," and includes the name given to a corporation by the Legislature. Johnson v. Central R. R., 74 Ga. 397.

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE.

As medicine, see "Medicine."

"The adherents of 'Christian Science' believe that matter has no existence except as a manifestation of mind; that the divine mind is all-controlling; that the human mind, by becoming clean and purified, can, to a degree, realize and employ the powers of the divine mind; that all sickness and bodily ills are merely a species of sin, error, or evil, and exist only in the apprehension of the human mind, and are in no wise phenomena of matter; that the divine mind has the same power to relieve one of such sin or error, manifested in the form of disease, as it has to expel any other unclean or evil thought; and that the human mind, if it can only so perfect itself as to partake in a sufficient degree of the omnipotence of the divine mind, also will be able to throw off and rid itself of disease. These beliefs are embodied in a book called 'Science and Health,' which purports to derive them from the teachings of the Bible. Demonstrations of these teachings are attempted by Christian Scientists, who are known as 'healers,' and who treat disease without the use of any material means whatever; the treatment, as one of them testified, being always a prayer. They do not claim to cure all bodily ills, but they attribute their failures, not to the nature of the illness, but to the imperfect realization by the healer of the divine mind, since to them the possibilities of Christian Science are infinite. It is their belief, on the other hand, that, when a patient does recover, the healer has realized sufficiently the truths as taught by 'Science and Health' and the Bible, and has, by his understanding of the power of God, as thus demonstrated by Christian Science, been able to remove the imperfections of which the disease was the result. It is therefore evident that, however opposed these teachings may be to the beliefs or notions of others, they are founded on the religious convictions of those professing them. This being so, the court cannot say that those persons are mentally unsound. The truth or falsity of a religious belief is beyond the scope of a judicial inquiry." Thus it was held that the fact that a testator believed in Christian Science did not show that she was lacking in testamentary capacity. In re Brush's Will, 72 N. Y. Supp. 421, 425, 35 Misc. Rep. 689.

CHRISTIANITY.

Christianity "is the religion that is revealed and taught in the Bible." People v. Ruggles (N. Y.) 8 Johns. 290, 297, 5 Am. Dec. 335.

Christianity "is the religion of those who believe that Jesus Christ is the true Messiah and Savior of men, and who receive the Holy Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments as the Word of God. The grand subdivisions among Christians are, first, the Greek or Eastern Church; second, the Roman Catholics, who acknowledge the authority of the Pope; third, the Protestant or Reformed Churches, or sects who reject the authority of the Pope." Hale v. Everett, 53 N. H. 954, 16 Am. Rep. 82.

As part of common law.

The maxim that Christianity is a part of the common law is liable to misconstruction and to be misunderstood, and the declarations of Lord Hale, Lord Raymond, and others who pronounced Christianity to be a parcel of the common law are all to be taken in reference to the cases of blasphemy before them, and, for the purpose of punishing such blasphemy as they condemned, they noticed that Christianity was the religion of England, and in this sense a part of the common law, and, while the ecclesiastical courts punished blasphemy as a spiritual offense pro salute animæ, the common law only punished it when it tended to create a riot or break the peace, or subvert the very foundation on which civil society rested. It took cognizance of and gave faith and credit to the religion of Christ as the religion of the common people, and acknowledged their right voluntarily to prefer that religion and to be protected in the enjoyment of it, and it carried that protection to the full length of punishing any man who outraged the feelings of the people and insulted civil society by wantonly and maliciously reviling and ridiculing the religion which they had freely preferred. State v. Chandler (Del.) 2 Har. 553, 563.

The assertion that Christianity is a part of the common law of the country, lying behind and above the constitutions, can hardly be a serious one. If Christianity is a law of the state, it must have a sanction. Adequate penalties must be provided to enforce obedience to its requirements and its precepts. The only foundation for the proposition that Christianity is a part of the law of the country is the fact that it is a Christian country, and that its constitution and laws are made by a Christian people. Board of Education of City of Cincinnati v. Miner, 28 Ohio St. 211, 242, 13 Am. Rep. 233.

It is said, and truly, that the Christian religion is a part of the common law of Pennsylvania. But this proposition is to be received with its appropriate qualifications, and in connection with the Bill of Rights of that state, as found in its Constitution of government. Although Christianity be a part of the common law of the state, yet it is so in this qualified sense that its divine origin and truth are admitted, and therefore it is not to be maliciously and openly reviled and blasphemed against, to the annoyance of believers or the injury of the public. Vidal v. Girard's Ex'rs, 43 U. S. (2 How.) 127, 198, 11 L. Ed. 205; Specht v. Commonwealth, 8 Pa. 312, 322, 49 Am. Dec. 518; Harvey v. Boies (Pa.) 1 Pen. & W. 1213. By the term "Christianity," as part of the common law, is not intended a doctrine of worship of any particular church or sect, but Christianity with liberty of conscience to all men. Updegraph v. Commonwealth (Pa.) 11 Serg. & R. 394, 408; Sparhawk v. Union Pass. Ry. Co., 54 Pa. (4 P. F. Smith) 401, 432.

The declaration that Christianity is part of the law of the land is a summary description of an existing and very obvious condition of our institutions. We are Christian people in so far as we have entered into the spirit of Christian institutions and become imbued with the sentiments and principles of Christianity, and we cannot be imbued with them and yet prevent them from entering into and influencing, more or less, all our social institutions, customs, and relations, as well as all our individual modes of thinking and acting. Mohney v. Cook, 26 Pa. (2 Casey) 342, 347, 67 Am. Dec. 419.

Christianity is not the legal religion of the state as established by law. If it were, it would be a civil or political institution, which it is not; but this is not inconsistent with the idea that it is in fact and ever has been the religion of the people. This fact is everywhere prominent in our civil and political history, and has been from the first recognized and acted upon by the people as well as by constitutional conventions, legislatures, and courts of justice. It is a part of the common law of England. It may be conceded to be the established religion to the qualified extent mentioned, while perfect civil and political equality, with freedom of conscience and religious preference, is secured to individuals of every other creed and profession. Lindenmuller v. People (N. Y.) 33 Barb. 548, 561.

Ours is a Christian country, but Christianity is not established by law, and the genius of our institution requires that the church and state should be kept separate. Melvin v. Easley, 52 N. C. 356, 360.

Christianity is a part of the common law, and to write against it in general is an offense punishable in the temporal courts. Rex v. Woolston, 2 Strange, 834.

Under the Constitution of Ohio declaring that all men should have a natural right to worship God according to the dictates of conscience, with which right no human authority can interfere, and that no preference shall ever be given to any religious society or mode of worship, neither Christianity nor any other system of religion is a part of the law of the land of Ohio. Bloom v. Richards, 2 Ohio St. 387, 390.

The system of religion is recognized as constituting a part and parcel of the common law, and as such all of the institutions growing out of it or in any way connected with it, in case they shall not be found to interfere with the rights of conscience, are entitled to the most profound respect, and can originally claim the protection of the law-making powers of the state. Shover v. State, 10 Ark. (5 Eng.) 259, 263.

Christianity lies at the foundation of that provision of the Constitution of South Carolina declaring that free exercise of religious worship shall forever be allowed in the state, and that liberty of conscience shall not be so construed so as to justify practices inconsistent with the peace of the state, and upon such religion are based many of the principles and usages constantly acknowledged and enforced in the courts of justice. In the courts Christianity is daily acknowledged as the most solemn part of the administration of justice. City Council of Charleston v. Benjamin (S. C.) 2 Strob. 508, 521, 49 Am. Dec. 606.

It has been frequently said that Christianity is a part of the law of the land, and while, in a certain sense and for certain purposes, it may be true in those states which adopted and have retained the common law, it must be remembered that that system never prevailed nor had any lodgment in this state, save the brief period between the acquisition of this country by the United States and the act of 1805, when the criminal part of that system was in force. And it has been said by another court that Christianity was never considered a part of the common law, so far as that for a violation of its injunctions, independent of the established laws of man, and without the sanction of any positive act of the Parliament of England made to enforce those injunctions, any man could be drawn to answer in a common-law court. State v. Bott, 31 La. Ann. 663, 665, 33 Am. Rep. 224 (citing State v. Chandler [Del.] 2 Har. 553, 555).

Christianity is a part of the common law of the state of Nevada, as it is of the United States, in the qualified sense that its defined origin and truth are admitted. State v. Hallock, 16 Nev. 373, 374.

CHRISTMAS.

As legal holiday, see "Legal Holidays."

CHROMATE OF IRON.

Where land is sold, reserving to the grantor all mineral or magnesia of any kind, it entitles the grantor to chromate of iron afterwards found. Gibson v. Tyseon (Pa.) 5 Watts, 34, 38.

CHROME TANNING.

"Chrome tanning," is contradistinguished from other tanning, characterizes itself by making use of mineral salts in the tanning process, rather than vegetable matter. As is well known, the older method of obtaining leather was to immerse the hide or skin in some liquid containing tannic acid, which was commonly obtained from oak or hemlock bark. Tannage Patent Co. v. Zahn (U. S.) 66 Fed. 986, 988.

CHROMO.

In Rev. St. § 4956 U. S. Comp. St. 1901. p. 3407, providing for the copyright, among other things, of a chromo, it is apparent that Congress used the word with its dictionary meaning, viz., an abbreviation of "chromolithograph," and that it understood the word "lithograph," to cover a print made from a drawing or drawings on stone. Hills & Co. v. Austrich (U. S.) 120 Fed. 862, 863.

CHRONIC.

In order to distinguish a disease as "chronic," it is necessary that it should have been of long standing as applied to diseases of a body. "Chronic" and "acute" are the antithesis of each other. An acute disease is one usually attended with violent symptoms, while a chronic disease is deep-seated and obstinate, threatening a long continuance. Jones v. Yarbrough, 2 Ala. 524, 525.

"Chronic" is defined as in effect meaning "persistent," so that, as used in a question in an application for an insurance policy as to whether applicant ever had "chronic" and "persistent" hoarseness, the two words were intended in the same sense. Blumenthal v. Berkshire Life Ins. Co. (Mich.) 96 N. W. 17, 18.

CHUCK-A-LUCK.

The courts cannot be supposed to judicially know the appellatives of gamblers, nor to know what kind of a game chuck-a-luck is, and therefore a description, in an indictment for gaming, that accused played a game of chance, is sufficiently definite without using the word "chuck-a-luck," which does not of itself identify to the accused, the court, or the world any one game of chance, or necessarily import that what is thus characterized was a game of chance. Montee v. Commonwealth, 26 Ky. (3 J. J. Marsh.) 132, 134.

CHURCH.

See "Congregational Church"; "Parish Church."

Building exclusively occupied as a church, see "Exclusively Used."

The terms "church" and "society" are popularly used to express the same thing, viz., a religious body organized to sustain public worship. Church & Congregational Soc. v. Hatch, 48 N. H. 393, 396; Josey v. Union Loan & Trust Co., 32 S. E. 628, 629, 160 Ga. 608.

In Baptist polity, as it exists in this state, there is no distinction between a "church" and a "religious society." These terms, as commonly used in our law, are interchangeable. Riffe v. Proctor, 74 S. W. 409, 410, 99 Mo. App. 601.

The term "church" imports an organization for religious purposes. McAlister v. Burgess, 37 N. E. 173, 161 Mass. 269, 24 L. R. A. 158 (quoting Baker v. Fales, 16 Mass. 488, 495).

As far as all questions of property are concerned, the term "church" means "the body of communicants gathered into church order, according to the established usage in any town, parish, precinct, or religious society established according to the law, and actually connected and associated therewith for religious purposes." Stebbins v. Jennings, 27 Mass. (10 Pick.) 172, 193.

A church is a voluntary association of Christians united for discipline and worship, connected with and forming a part of some religious society having a legal existence. Anderson v. Brock, 3 Me. (3 Greenl.) 243, 247.

In the constitution of the body of Christians known as "Presbyterians," we find that "church," as therein defined, consists of those persons in every nation, together with their children, who make profession of the holy religion of Christ, and of submission to his laws. But as this multitude could not meet together in one place, it is declared that they should be divided into particular churches, which last is defined as follows: "A particular church consists of a number of professing Christians voluntarily associated together for divine worship, or actually living agreeably to the Holy Scriptures, and submitting to a certain form of government." The pastor and the ruling elders of a congregation compose what is called the "church session," who, representing the congregation, are the official governing body of the church in the administration of its affairs. Tate v. Lawrence, 58 Tenn. (11 Heisk.) 503, 531; Wilson v. Perry, 1 S. E. 302, 304, 314, 29 W. Va. 169.

All creeds.

A "church" has been defined to be a building consecrated to the honor of God and religion (Robertson v. Bullions [N. Y.] 9 Barb. 64, 95); or persons who profess the Christian religion, and the place where such persons regularly assemble for worship; and as used in Laws 1896, c. 112, § 24, providing that traffic in liquors shall not be permitted within 200 feet of any building occupied as a church, includes all the multifarious denominations or societies of those professing a Christian faith, no matter what their varying shades of belief or doctrine may be, and no matter with what ceremony or absence of ceremonies their faith may be evinced; and the fact that such building is occupied by two or more societies does not deprive it of its standing as a "church." In re Zinzow, 43 N. Y. Supp. 714, 719, 18 Misc. Rep. 653.

Within an act authorizing the incorporation of churches, the word "churches" is not restricted to individual churches or societies singly, the design of the Legislature being to secure to every Christian association by their own action the rights and privileges which before the act it was usual to acquire by the separate action of the Legislature upon each case as presented to them. And, under the definition, every church, society, and congregation, of whatever denomination, may unite and form one society or congregation within the meaning of the act. That every Christian church may assert the privilege does not necessarily imply that two may not unite that differ in principles of discipline or doctrine. Neale v. Vestry of St. Paul's Church (Md.) 8 Gill, 116, 118.

"Church or chapel," as used in 7 & 8 Geo. IV, c. 29, § 10, relating to the breaking and entering a church or chapel, does not refer to or include a Wesleyan chapel, but only chapels of the Church of England. Rex v. Nixon, 7 Car. & P. 442, 443.

As the building.

As building, see "Building (In Lien Laws)."

As public building, see "Public Building."

Correctly speaking, it is a body of people or worshipers associated together for religious purposes that constitutes a church.

and it is equally protected by the statute against disturbance though assembled at a camp ground, or in the open air, or in a private house. But under a statute punishing the disturbing of any congregation assembled in any church or other place, applying to private families as well as to congregations assembled, it must be construed in reference to localities, and in this sense the word "church" means the building or house used on the occasion of the disturbance alleged, and, if the disturbance was in a church or in some other place, the description of that place must be set out. Stratton v. State, 13 Ark. 688, 691.

A church is a building within the mechanic's lien law. A building is defined by Webster to be "an edifice erected for use and convenience, such as a house or church." All churches are spoken of in common parlance as "buildings," and travelers speak of the magnificent building of St. Peter's at Rome, and St. Paul's in London. Presbyterian Church v. Allison, 10 Pa. (10 Barr) 413, 416.

The grant of a church at San Antonio, Gollad, and Victoria clearly means the edifices, and cannot be a lot on which there is no edifice of any kind whatever, and which was not connected with any such edifice. Blair v. Odin, 3 Tex. 288, 301.

As congregation.

See, also, "Congregation."

In a decision of the proper tribunal of a religious organization that certain members have withdrawn from the church, the word "church" is used for "congregation." Gaff v. Greer, 88 Ind. 122, 131, 45 Am. Rep. 449.

The word "church" may mean either a temple or building consecrated to the honor of God and religion, or an assembly of persons, united by the profession of the same Christian faith, met together for religious worship. In the New York statutes relating to the incorporation of religious societies, churches, congregations, etc., the word is used in the sense of the latter definition. Robertson v. Bullions, 9 Barb. 64, 67. And the latter meaning is contemplated by Civ. Code, § 2361, providing that where a church has incurred a valid debt, in the absence of other property the church edifice and site are liable to sale for its payment. Josey v. Union Loan & Trust Co., 32 S. E. 628, 629, 106 Ga. 608.

As used in Gen St. Conn. § 3820, providing that buildings or portions of buildings exclusively "occupied as a church" shall be exempt from taxation, means occupied as a church building is usually occupied, or as a church building may properly be occupied, because that is the ordinary meaning of the words. A building belonging to a church societly, regularly and statedly occupied for religious worship, is "occupied as a church" within the meaning of the statute, though it is rented for entertainments, and at times for political conventions. First Unitarian Soc. v. Town of Hartford, 34 Atl. 89, 90, 66 Conn. 368.

As parish.

"The 'church' consists of an indefinite number of persons, of one or both sexes, who have made a public profession of religion, and who are associated together by a covenant of church fellowship for the purpose of celebrating the sacrament and watching over the spiritual welfare of each other. But a religious association or congregation is what is usually denominated a 'poll parish.' It consists of a voluntary association of individuals or families uniting for the purpose of having a common place of worship, and to provide a proper teacher to instruct them in religious doctrines and duties, and to administer the ordinances of baptism, etc. Though a church or body of professing Christians is almost uniformly connected with such an association or congregation, the members of the church have no other or greater rights than any other members of the society who statedly attend with them for the purpose of divine worship. Over the church, as such, the legal or temporal tribunals of this state do not profess to have any jurisdiction whatever, except so far as is necessary to protect the civil rights of others and to preserve the public peace. All questions relating to the faith and practice of the church and its members belong to the church judicatories to which they have voluntarily subjected themselves. But as a general principle these ecclesiastical judicatories cannot interfere with the temporal concerns of the congregation or society with which the church or the members thereof are connected." Baptist Church in Hartford v. Witherell (N. Y.) 3 Paige, 296, 301, 24 Am. Dec. 223.

"Before the migration of our ancestors to this country, it is believed a congregational church was, as it was in the earliest times of Christianity, an assembly of Christians meeting together in the same place for the public worship of God under the same minister or ministers. Mr. Wise, a writer on this subject, defines a particular church to be 'a society of Christians meeting together in one place under their proper pastors, for the performance of religious worship and the exercising of Christian discipline, united by covenant,' as most of those undoubtedly were who composed that society. 'Parochia, or parish,' he says, 'signifies in a large sense a competent number of persons dwelling near and having one bishop, pastor, etc., or somebody set over them.' Therefore 'parish' in this sense is the same as a particular church or congregation, and this, he observes, is plainly agreeable with the sense, custom, and platform of the New England churches. A whole diocese is one parish, it not exceeding in ancient times the bounds of a parish, or a small town, or a part of a town. All the people of a diocese did every Sunday meet together at one place to celebrate divine service. The bishop had but one altar or communion table in his diocese, at which his whole flock received the sacrament from him. The whole diocese met together on Sunday, when he gave them the eucharist. All the people were present at church censures. None were restored without the knowledge and consent of the whole diocese. They might plead their cause before the whole people. When a bishop died, all the people met together in one place to choose a new bishop. The whole diocese met together to manage church affairs. Such was the church in the early times of Christianity, and such, it is presumed, was the church as understood by our ancestors in the first settlement of this country. From this account of the ancient state of things, it may well be conceived that a person intending to give property to pious uses, and particularly for the support and maintenance of public worship, within the first half century after the migration of our ancestors would denominate the donees, the 'church,' meaning the whole society of worshipping Christians, and, if this donation should be afterward applied to the use of a few Christians who had constituted themselves the church instead of the whole society, his bounty would be perverted. Any number of the members of a church who disagree with their brethren, or with the minister, or with the parish, may withdraw from fellowship with them, and act as a church in a religious point of view, having the ordinances administered and other religious offices performed. As to all civil purposes, the secession of the whole from the parish would be an extinction of the church, and it is competent for the members of the parish to institute a new church, or to ingraft one upon the old stock if any of it remain. No particular number is necessary to constitute a church, nor is there any established quorum which would have a right to manage the concerns of the body. According to the Cambridge Platform, c. 3, § 4, the number is to be no larger than can conveniently meet together in one place, nor ordinarily fewer than may conveniently carry on church work. A diminution of its numbers will not affect its identity. A church may exist in an ecclesiastical sense without any officers, and, without doubt, in the same sense, a church may be composed only of females covert and minors having no civil capacity. The only circumstance which gives a church any legal character is its connection with some regularly constituted society, and those who withdraw from the society cease to be members of that particular church, and the remaining members continue to be the identical church." Baker v. Fales, 16 Mass. 488, 498.

As religious corporation.

"The term 'church' is one of very comprehensive signification. It anciently signified any public meeting convened to consult upon the common welfare of the state, was afterward used to designate the place of sacred or religious meetings, and again it is applied to religious congregations, assemblies, or associations; but at the present time, and under our institutions and laws, it must be understood to express a spiritual or religious corporation." Trustees of Baptist Soc. v. Fisher, 18 N. J. Law (3 Har.) 354, 357.

A church is a separate body formed within a parish or religious society, whose rights and usages are well known, and to a great extent defined and established by law. It is not a "religious society" in the legal sense of that term, for, though the term "religious society" may with propriety be applied in a certain sense to a church, as that of "religious association," "religious union," or the like, yet, as commonly used in our law, it is synonymous with "parish," "precinct," etc., and designates an incorporated society created and maintained for the support and maintenance of public worship. A church is an aggregate body, so far vested with legal powers that they may sue by a committee, and are not bound to sue in the names of all the members. Weld v. May, 63 Mass. (9 Cush.) 181, 188.

A church is a body of persons associated together for the purpose of maintaining Christian worship and ordinances. A church and society are often united in maintaining worship, and in such cases the society commonly owns the property and makes the pecuniary contract with the minister, but in many cases societies exist without a church, and churches without a society. Churches are not corporate bodies, and commonly have no occasion for the exercise of corporate powers. Silsby v. Barlow, 82 Mass. (16 Gray) 329, 330.

"Church," in one sense, is understood to mean a number of Christian people, agreeing in their faith, usually assembling together at one place for purposes of worship, submitting to its ordinances, and receiving its sacraments. This is entirely distinct from the meaning of the word "church" as applied to a corporation. In the former sense many persons are usually members of the church, and most commonly a large community, who neither are nor can be members of the corporation—married women, infants, and slaves. When persons are incorporated by the name of "church," this can be regarded only as a name or designation, or, at least, as indicating, when property is given to them, the trust upon which it is given. This does not constitute the corporation a "church" in what I consider the proper sense of the word, no more than if they were called by any other name. Nor do I think a corporation for the managing of church funds can properly be called an "ecclesiastical corporation," any more than if the property were given to a society for the support of a minister of the church. In other words, they are merely trustees of the entire body of worshippers, and they are a civil institution for the management of property. Wilson v. Presbyterian Church (S. C.) 2 Rich. Eq. 192, 198.

As a place for worship only.

A deed granting land on condition that it be continually used as a site for a "meeting house and church" means a house to meet in for religious worship, but does not require that it should be constantly used for that purpose. It must, however, be kept for that use, and not put to any other use substantially inconsistent with that. Howe v. School Dist. No. 3, 43 Vt. 282, 288.

Within a statute exempting all churches, meetinghouses, or other places of stated religious worship from taxation, the term "churches" includes all places suited to regular stated religious worship, without exception of any kind; so that property leased by a religious congregation for stated religious worship is by such act exempt from taxation, where it was built for church purposes, and in its present condition can be used only for church purposes. Howell v. City of Philadelphia (Pa.) 8 Phila. 280, 281.

A building, the first floor of which is used for religious meetings, the rest being used as offices for directors and physicians, dormitories, and storerooms, the whole constituting a mission for reformation purposes, but not connected with any church, and with which no clergyman is associated, is not a "church" within a law forbidding the issuance of a license to sell liquors within a certain distance of a building used as a church. People v. Dalton, 30 N. Y. Supp. 407, 408, 9 Misc. Rep. 249.

"Church," as used in the statute declaring it to be a misdemeanor to sell spirituous liquors within half a mile of any church, did not apply to a building which was intended by its donor to be used for the purpose of an academy and for the convenience of preaching, and which had for a number of years been used as a schoolhouse and a place for public worship. The distinction between "church" and "places of public worship" is known to our law, and has been many times recognized in our statutes, as, for instance, in the act of 1846 it is declared to be a misdemeanor to injure or deface any "church," inhabited house, etc., and by the act of 1875 it is forbidden to obstruct the way leading to any place of public worship, while the act of 1807 makes it an offense for a person to be intoxicated at a "church" or "place appointed for divine worship." State v. Midgett, 85 N. C. 538, 540.

The terms "church, meetinghouse, or other place of religious worship," within the meaning of a statute exempting such places from taxation, do not include a parsonage belonging to an Episcopal church, if it is not actually annexed to the church edifice or its curtilage. Dauphin County Treasurer v. St. Stephen's Church (Pa.) 3 Phila. 189, 190.

A "church" or "meetinghouse," within the meaning of Act May 14, 1874, which provides that all churches, meetinghouses, or other regular places of stated worship, with the grounds thereto annexed necessary for the occupancy of the same, shall be exempt from taxation, is confined to churches which, in the language of the law, are regular places of stated worship. A mere foundation or partly erected walls might by a forced construction be called an unfinished church or "meetinghouse," but it cannot by any construction be made a regular place of stated worship. Erle County Com'rs v. Bishop (Pa.) 13 Phila. 509, 510.

CHURCH LOTS.

The words "church lots" were written on a plat of the city of W., filed by the persons laying out the town, and the dedication written out on a plat and duly acknowledged, recited that the lots were dedicated to church purposes. On the records of the company appeared a resolution that the lots "should be, and the same are, hereby appropriated as church lots." Held that, whether this was a statutory dedication or not, it was good as an appropriation for pious uses, which would be enforced at the instance of any church proving its right to be regarded as a personal beneficiary. Com'rs of Wyandotte County v. First Presbyterian Church of Wyandotte, 1 Pac. 109, 115, 30 Kan. 620.

CHURCH MEMBER.

To constitute one a "church member," two points at least are essential, without meaning to say that others are not so—a profession of its faith, and a submission to its government. Simply holding the same faith, without submitting to the government and discipline of a church, cannot make or keep a man a member of that church. If a person without religious faith, or having the faith of one sect, becomes a convert to the spiritual usage of another denomination, he does not thereby become ipso facto a member of the latter. The members of the Reformed Dutch Church in the United States are not members of the Presbyterian Church, nor the Presbyterians members of the Reformed Dutch Church, although their faith is the same, the difference between them consisting in the form and mode of church government. Day v. Bolton, 12 N. J. Law (7 Hal.) 206, 214.

CHURCH OF ENGLAND.

"The phrase 'Church of England,' so familiar in our laws and judicial treatises, is nothing more than a compendious expression for the religious establishment of the realm, considered in the aggregate, under the superintendence of its spiritual head. In this sense the 'Church of England' is said to have peculiar rights and privileges, not as a corporation, but as an ecclesiastical institution under the patronage of the state." It is not a corporation. Town of Pawlet v. Clark, 13 U. S. (9 Cranch) 292, 325, 3 L. Ed. 735.

CHURCH PROPERTY.

In 2 Starr & C. Ann. St. c. 120, § 2, cl. 2, exempting from taxation all church property actually and exclusively used for public worship where the land is owned by the congregation, the term "church property" means the church building and a lot of reasonable size for its location, and does not include camp meeting grounds used by several congregations. People v. Watseka Camp-Meeting Ass'n, 43 N. E. 716, 717, 160 Ill. 576.

In the clause of Const. art. 9, § 3, providing that all churches, "church property used for religious purposes," and houses of worship shall by general laws be exempt from taxation, the words "church property used for religious purposes," if they refer to land and buildings, do not intend any except those whose primary use is for religious purposes. A rectory or parsonage belongs to a church, so, its primary use being for the residence of the pastor or minister and secular purposes, is not exempt because some part of it has been also used for religious services. Ramsey County v. Church of the Good Shepherd, 47 N. W. 783, 784, 45 Minn. 229, 11 L. R. A. 175.

CHURCH PURPOSES.

A dedication to "church purposes" is a dedication to public purposes, and the inhabitants of the town in which the dedication is made have an interest in the ground reserved for such use. We all know that is meant by the phrase. To deny that church purposes are public purposes is to argue that the maintenance, support, and propagation of the Christian religion is not a matter of public concern. Our laws, though they recognize no particular religious establishment, are not insensible to the advantages of Christianity, and extend their protection to all in that faith and mode of worship they may choose to adopt. City of Hannibal v. Draper, 15 Mo. 634, 635.

CHURCH SQUARE.

The words "church square," written on the plat, in laying out a town, which is designated as a "church square," are not sufficient to show a dedication and grant of the square to a certain church, although at the time of the laying out of the town it was the only church established in the town. Christian Church at Pella v. Scholte, 2 Iowa (2 Clarke) 27, 28.

CHUTE.

Pub. & Loc. Laws 1864, c. 84, as amended by Pub. & Loc. Laws 1866, c. 447, authorizes a company to improve the navigation of a certain river by removing obstructions, breaking jams, deepening, widening, and straightening the channel, and closing up the "chutes" and side cuts leading from such river into another river. Held, that the term "chute" means, in the common language of the river men, any opening in the banks of a stream where a part of its waters diverge from the main stream, irrespective of the question whether it flows out with a rapid or slow current. Black River Imp. Co. v. La Crosse Booming & Transportation Co., 11 N. W. 443, 448, 54 Wis. 659, 41 Am. Rep. 66.

CHYMOSIN.

Chymosin is a fermenting and curdling agent found in the stomach of calves and hogs, and used on account of its coagulating properties, for curdling milk by cheesemakers. Blumenthal v. Burrell (U. S.) 43 Fed. 667.

CIDER.

See "Fermented Cider."

"Cider" is an equivocal term. It may apply to the juice when first pressed from the apple, or to the manufactured article when the whole process is complete, and in the construction of a contract the court must look both to the conditions and language of the parties to see what was meant. Studdy v. Sanders, 5 Barn. & C. 628, 639.

In construing the term "cider" in Rev. Laws, § 3800, cl. 6, prohibiting the sale of cider in certain places, the court said: "It is said that the juice of apples is not 'cider' until it is fermented. This is perhaps technically correct, but not in popular understanding. Apple juice, when it comes from the cider press, is immediately and universally called 'cider' by the people generally. The term should be construed according to such universal use and understanding. Presumably, no class of men understand better the difference between sweet and sour cider than our legislators, because they are mostly farmers who make the cider, and those who are not living in this cider-producing state could hardly claim ignorance on so familiar a subject, yet in their prohibitory enactment they ignore all distinction and simply say 'cider.'" State v. Spaulding, 17 Atl. 844, 847, 61 Vt. 505.

As V. S. 4460, prohibits the sale of intoxicating liquor, and declares fermented cider such a liquor, the word "cider," as used in section 4463, declaring that the sale of cider is not prohibited, but that it shall not be sold in a public resort, relates to unfermented cider. State v. Thorburn, 52 Atl. 1039, 75 Vt. 18.

Laws 1898, p. 17, c. 5, § 13, requiring dealers in cider, except "pure apple cider" of domestic growth, to obtain a license, means pure unfermented juice of apples, and does not include any beverage, though made from the juice of apples, in which alcohol has developed by fermentation. State v. Crawley, 23 South. 625, 626, 75 Miss. 919.

As a fermented liquor.

Cider is an alcoholic beverage obtained by fermentation of the juice of apples. In a popular sense the term "cider" includes the pressed juice of apples, either fermented or unfermented, and hence the terms "sweet cider" and "hard cider" are in popular use to distinguish between the juice of the apple before and after fermentation. In strictness the juice of the apple before fermentation is simply apple juice, and it is only by fermentation that it becomes cider, and, when the word "cider" alone is used in the law or commerce, it is commonly understood to mean the fermented juice of apples. Eureka Vinegar Co. v. Gazette Printing Co. (U. S.) 35 Fed. 570, 571.

Cider is a fermented liquor made from the juice of apples. State v. Schaefer, 24 Pac. 92, 93, 44 Kan. 90.

"Hard cider" is cider excessively fermented, and therefore, presumptively, hard cider is not only a fermented liquor, but intoxicating. State v. McLafferty, 27 Pac. 843, 47 Kan. 140.

As intoxicating or strong liquor.

Cider is a strong drink, a beverage; in no sense a necessity more than is beer or wine. It is as distinctly a beverage as either beer or wine. It is not as intoxicating, but its classification as a beverage is as distinct as either of the others. Cider is an intoxicating liquor to such an extent that a city is authorized, in the exercise of its general police power, to impose a license tax on persons engaged in the occupation of selling cider. Town of Pikeville v. Huffman, 65 S. W. 794, 795, 112 Ky. 360.

Cider is not an intoxicating liquor within the meaning of St. 1869, c. 415, §§ 31, 36, prohibiting the keeping with intent to sell of any intoxicating liquor, unless it is shown to be actually intoxicating, as it is not included in section 30, enumerating the liquors which shall be deemed to be intoxicating. Commonwealth v. Chappel, 116 Mass. 7. See, also, Johnston v. State, 23 Ohio St. 556, 558.

Unfermented cider is an intoxicating liquor within the meaning of a statute defining "Intoxicating liquors" as including ale, cider, and wines. Commonwealth v. Dean, 80 Mass. (14 Gray) 99.

It is a question for the jury as to whether cider is an intoxicating liquor. State v. Bidde, 54 N. H. 379, 380; State v. Page, 66 Me. 418, 419; Hewitt v. People, 57 N. E. 1077, 1078, 186 Ill. 336.

As spirituous or vinous liquor.

Cider is not included within the term "spirituous liquor." It is neither produced by distillation nor by fermentation, and though liable to fermentation, and when subjected to distillation it is capable of producing a spirituous liquor, yet the ultimate product is no more like cider than rum is like the juice of sugar cane from which it is manufactured. State v. Oliver, 26 W. Va. 422, 426, 53 Am. Rep. 79.

In common acceptance "cider" is not understood to be either a vinous or spirituous beverage, yet when fermented it doubtless contains a percentage of alcohol sufficient to bring it within the fair meaning of the term "vinous," and, although not the product of distillation, it may, when mixed with spirituous liquor and sold in that condition under the name of "cider," be regarded as spirituous, within the meaning of a statute prohibiting the sale of vinous and spirituous liquors without a license. Whether it is a vinous or spirituous liquor is a question for the jury. Commonwealth v. Reyburg, 16 Atl. 351, 352, 122 Pa. 299, 2 L. R. A. 415.

Cider is never called a vinous liquor or wine, and for some period of time after the juice is pressed from the apple has no intoxicating principle in it at all, and is not within the spirit of an act forbidding the sale of "spirituous, vinous, and malt liquors." Feldman v. City of Morrison, 1 Ill. App. (1 Bradw.) 460, 463.

Fermented or hard cider, though an intoxicating liquor, is not a spirituous, vinous, or malt liquor. Allred v. State, 8 South. 56, 57, 89 Ala. 112.

As wine.

See "Wine."

CIDER VINEGAR.

The term "cider vinegar," as used in an act to prevent the manufacture and sale of adulterated cider vinegar, shall be understood to mean vinegar made exclusively of pure apple juice. Code Supp. Va. 1898, § 1898a.

CIGAR.

A cigar is a bunch of tobacco rolled together and put into shape for smoking, and intended for that use. D'Estrinoz v. Gerker (U. S.) 43 Fed. 285, 286.

Cigars are manufactured articles familiar to everybody. The materials of which they are composed are carefully prepared and put into form until they lose their original character as mere materials, and become articles of commerce known by a new name and adapted to a particular use. Cigars sold by a tobacconist in the ordinary way are not "drugs" or "medicines," within the meaning of those words as used in St. 1887, c. 391, § 2, permitting the retail sale of drugs and medicines on Sunday. Commonwealth v. Marzynski, 21 N. E. 228, 229, 149 Mass. 68.

CIGAR MAKERS.

"Cigar makers," as used in a complaint brought by the Cigar Makers' International Union of America claiming title to a trade-mark, indicated that the complainants were skilled workmen in the manufacture of cigars, and did not indicate that they set up title to the trade-mark as manufacturers or dealers in cigars. Schneider v. Williams, 14 Atl. 812, 816, 44 N. J. Eq. (17 Stew.) 391.

CIPHER DISPATCH OR MESSAGE.

A "cipher dispatch," as used in a condition limiting the liability of a telegraph company in such cases, is a message in which words are used to mean things entirely variant from their meaning in the language as they are ordinarily used, but do not include words which were mere abbreviations, and which had clear and well-defined meanings in the trade in which they were used. Pepper v. Western Union Tel. Co., 87 Tenn. (3 Pickle) 554, 11 S. W. 783, 784, 4 L. R. A. 660, 10 Am. St. Rep. 699.

An enigmatical message is commonly called a "cipher message," or one which, though not such a message, is yet one so obscure that it is not intelligible to the telegraph operator. Beatty Lumber Co. v. Western Union Tel. Co., 44 S. E. 309, 310, 52 W. Va. 410.

CIRCUIT.

A circuit is "a division of the country appointed for a particular judge to visit for trial of causes or administration of justice." Bouvier. "Circuits," as the term is used in England, may be otherwise defined to be the periodical progresses of the judges of the superior courts of the common law through the several counties of England and Wales for the purpose of administering civil and criminal justice. Black, Law Dict.

The word "circuit" means judicial circuit. Civ. Code Ala. 1896, § 2.

CIRCUIT COURT.

The words "circuit court," used in the act of 1875 in designating who should make the appointment of city commissioners, was intended by the Legislature to confer jurisdiction upon the person who held the office of circuit judge, and not upon the court as a court. In re Johnson, 12 Kan. 102. Hence such act is not unconstitutional as an attempt to confer executive power on the judiciary, as prohibited by the Constitution. City of Terre Haute v. Evansville & T. H. R. Co., 46 N. E. 77, 78, 149 Ind. 174, 37 L. R. A. 189.

In all cases where the words "circuit court" are used, they shall be taken and construed to mean and intend "district court." Comp. Laws N. M. 1897, § 3803.

CIRCUIT COURT COMMISSIONER.

See "Commissioner of Circuit Court."

CIRCUIT JUDGE.

"The terms 'circuit judge' and 'judge of the circuit court' are convertible—they mean precisely the same thing—and if there is no circuit court there can be no circuit judge, or judge of the circuit court." Crozler v. Lyons, 34 N. W. 186, 188, 72 Iowa, 401.

CIRCUIT JUSTICE.

The words "circuit justice," when used in the title relating to the judiciary, shall be understood to designate the justice of the Supreme Court who is allotted to any circuit; but the word "judge," when applied generally to any circuit, shall be understood to include such justice. U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 486.

CIRCULAR.

See "Printed Circular."

A schedule setting out the prizes offered in a lottery, printed on the back of all lottery tickets sent out for a particular drawing, is a "circular" within the meaning of Rev. St. § 3894 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 2659], forbidding the mailing of any letter or circular concerning lotteries. United States v. Clark (U. S.) 22 Fed. 708, 710.

Letters distinguished.

In Rev. St. § 3894 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 2659], providing that no letter or "circular" concerning lotteries shall be carried in the mail, the term "circular" means a written or printed communication which is general and not personal in its character, and the same paper may be both a letter and a circular. No doubt there are many circulars which are not letters, but a circular which is in the form of a letter may be well described as a "letter and a circular." United States v. Noelke (U. S.) 1 Fed. 426, 429; United States v. Mason (U. S.) 22 Fed. 707.

A sealed circular is, for all purposes affecting the postal offices, a letter. United States v. Dauphin (U. S.) 20 Fed. 625, 630.

A circular is not a letter within Act Cong. March 3, 1825, § 28, relating to the franking of letters. In re Dewees (U. S.) 7 Fed. Cas. 571.

CIRCULATION.

See "General Circulation."

"A 'circulation' is an act by which a literary proprietor parts with possession of the original manuscript, or a written or printed copy, for any purpose not exclusively confidential." Keene v. Wheatley (U. S.) 14 Fed. Cas. 180, 192.

Of banks.

The word "circulation," in its relation to finance, is defined by the lexicographers as "currency or circulating notes or bills current for coin," and its use in Act Cong. Feb. 8, 1875, § 19, imposing a tax on notes used for circulation, has no reference to the so-called "notes," issued by mercantile firms, to be redeemed in goods. United States v. White (U. S.) 19 Fed. 723, 724.

"Circulation," within Rev. St. § 3408, providing for the taxation of circulation of banks, etc., means certificates or bills intended to circulate as money, and did not include receiver's certificates not intended to so circulate, but simply to be evidences of indebtedness. United States v. Wilson, 106 U. S. 620, 2 Sup. Ct. 85, 27 L. Ed. 310.

CIRCUMFERENCE.

"Circumference," as used in a grant of land consisting of five great flats or plains in circumference four English miles, is to be construed as meaning "the exterior line surrounding the flats. Nor does it convey any determinate idea as to shape, for in its common application, as to an island, which has some analogy to the present use, the most discerning mind could not, from the information that it was four miles in circumference, determine whether it was round, triangular, or square, for the term would be equally and properly used in all these cases for describing the extent of the line along the water board." Van Gordon v. Jackson (N. Y.) 5 Johns. 440, 451.

CIRCUMSTANCE.

See "Extraordinary Circumstances"; "Failing Circumstances."

A circumstance is an event, a fact, a particular incident; and, as used in an instruction that in view of the law, the evidence, facts, and "circumstances" proved on the trial, and from all these circumstances, the jury should determine upon which side is the preponderance of the evidence, should not be construed as limiting the jury to the consideration of circumstances, without the consideration of evidence and facts as the basis for determining the preponderance of the evidence, since the word "circumstances" does not imply events, facts, and incidents arising outside of the evidence and disconnected from the trial. Pfaffenback v. Lake Shore & M. S. Ry. Co., 41 N. E. 530, 531, 532, 142 Ind. 246.

An instruction that the jury must take into consideration all the "circumstances concerning the case" does not mean that the jury shall be at liberty to go outside of the case for circumstances on which to predicate their verdict, but refers to such circumstances as are to be gleaned from the pleadings and evidence, and which appear properly in the case, and not those outside of it. Dufour v. Central Pac. R. Co., 7 Pac. 769, 772, 67 Cal. 319.

As fact.

The word "circumstance" and the word "fact" are frequently used interchangeably. In 1 Bouv. Dict. 569, they are given as synonyms, and instances sometimes arise when it would puzzle a professional philologist which of the two words would more accurately characterize the given action or thing done. In cases where the conviction depends upon circumstantial evidence, it often happens that one or more of the ultimate or essential matters may very appropriately be called "circumstances." Whether spoken of as "circumstances" or as "facts," they must be established by the state beyond a reasonable doubt. Clare v. People, 10 Pac. 799, 800, 9 Colo. 122.

In an action for malicious prosecution, the expression "circumstances tending to show malice" includes such matters as the bad character of accused, and is broader than the word "facts," which might not be supposed to include such matters, though the bad character of the accused ought to be regarded as an existing fact. Vinal v. Core, 18 W. Va. 1, 38.

On a criminal prosecution the court charged that the state's witness was an accomplice under his own testimony; that a person cannot be convicted on an accomplice's testimony, unless corroborated by other evidence connecting defendant with the offense; and that the corroboration is insufficient if it merely shows the commission of "the offense or circumstances thereof." This instruction was in the identical language of Code, § 4559, except that the word "the" was omitted immediately preceding the concluding words "circumstances thereof," and it was contended that the omission of the word "the" imported that less than all the circumstances would be sufficient corroboration, but the court held such not to be the case, and that the term "circumstances thereof" practically meant all the circumstances. State v. Russell, 58 N. W. 890, 90 Iowa, 493.

CIRCUMSTANCED.

"Circumstanced," as used in a will providing, "By this I intend that the bequest to Kate S., circumstanced as above stated, shall pass to my son and daughter," etc., is equivalent to "under the circumstances, or upon the contingencies, above expressed," and the language serves to exclude the idea that other contingencies were to be added by legal construction or otherwise. Beck v. Ennis, 7 N. Y. Supp. 264, 265, 54 Hun, 126.

CIRCUMSTANCES.

The phrase "circumstances of the testator," in a statute providing that wills shall only be revoked in certain manner, but expressly excepting any revocation implied by law from the changes in the circumstances of the testator, etc., relates only to new family ties, and not to changes in testator's property. In the case of a woman it was limited to the change produced by marriage, and in the case of a man it was limited by the change occasioned by new family ties, including birth as an essential ingredient. Holtt v. Holtt, 3 Atl. 604, 615, 63 N. H. 475, 56 Am. Rep. 530.

"Circumstances," as used in Code Civ. Proc. § 638, declaring that an objection against one appointed as an executor may be made on the ground that his circumstances are such that they do not afford adequate security to the creditors of the decedent, does not merely mean pecuniary responsibility, but includes thrift, integrity, good repute, and stability of character. Martin v. Duke (N. Y.) 5 Redf. Sur. 597, 599.

"Adequate security and circumstances," mentioned in Code Civ. Proc. § 2638, to be considered by the surrogate in issuing letters testamentary, do not relate primarily or exclusively to the pecuniary responsibility of the executor, but to his moral qualification. The question presented to the court is: Is it safe to put this estate in the hands of the person named as executor? Can he be trusted to administer it faithfully and honestly, as directed by the will? In re Wischmann, 80 N. Y. Supp. 789, 791, 80 App. Div. 520.

"Circumstances and condition in life," within the meaning of the rule that it is the duty of a husband to furnish his wife with a present comfortable support and maintenance in a manner corresponding with their circumstances and station in life, includes their social standing. "How could it be said that, in fixing the obligation of a husband for the support of his wife, her social position in society, which is the synonym of 'rank' or 'station,' should not be considered? Such is the rule in awarding alimony and in fixing the rights of a wife for separate support." Thill v. Pohlman, 41 N. W. 385, 386, 76 Iowa, 638.

"Circumstances," as used in a statute relating to bankrupts, providing that there should be exempt to the bankrupt the necessary household and kitchen furniture, and such other articles and necessities belonging to him as his assignee should designate and set apart, having reference in the amount to the family, condition, and circumstances of the bankrupt, but altogether not to exceed a certain specified sum, means "something antecedent, because the operative clause of the section has taken every vestige of property from him, leaving him as destitute in existing circumstances as if he had never been other than one of the most impoverished of the human family. In determining what he is entitled to, or what should be reserved for or delivered back to him, the court must consider under what circumstances of estate he had enjoyed that of which he has been deprived." In re Ludlow, 1 N. Y. Leg. Obs. 322, 323.

CIRCUMSTANCES APPEARING ON THE TRIAL.

The use of the words "the surrounding circumstances appearing on the trial," in an instruction, cannot be considered erroneous on the ground that they do not limit the jury to the consideration of such matters as were directly connected with the testimony offered on the trial, but are equivalent to the words "circumstances shown on the trial." Jessen v. Donahue (Neb.) 96 N. W. 639, 640.

CIRCUMSTANCES OF EVIDENCE.

Where any new fact has been brought in to a case involving a trust, it is sometimes spoken of as a "circumstance of evidence." Walston v. Smith, 39 Atl. 252, 253, 70 Vt. 19.

CIRCUMSTANCES OF TERROR.

"Circumstances of terror," as used in Acts 1865-66, p. 768, § 1, denouncing all entries into premises at the time in the actual peaceable possession of another, if made with violence and strong hand, whether such entry be by the actual breaking into the house situated on the premises, or by any kind of violence or circumstances of terror, should be construed to include an entry upon premises by the tearing down of a fence by a large number of men early in the morning shortly after daylight, erecting a shed or kind of a house thereon in the course of a few hours, and the firing of pistols during the erection. Gray v. Collins, 42 Cal. 152, 158.

CIRCUMSTANCES OF THE PARTIES.

The phrase "circumstances of the parties," as used in the statutory provisions in relation to alimony, is quite comprehensive, and relates not only to the pecuniary circumstances and requirements of the parties in view of the manner in which they had lived, but also a consideration of the conduct of each; and if the wife was to some extent responsible for the misconduct of her husband, or in fault, though this did not justify his acts, yet it might be considered in determining the amount of alimony. Goodsell v. Goodsell, 81 N. Y. Supp. 806, 808, 82 App. Div. 65.

CIRCUMSTANTIAL EVIDENCE.

See "Chain of Circumstances"; "Corroborating Circumstances."

Circumstantial evidence is of two kinds, namely, certain, that from which the conclusion must necessarily follow; and uncertain, or that from which the conclusion does not necessarily follow, but is probable only, and is obtained by process of reasoning. Liverpool & L. & G. Ins. Co. v. Southern Pac. Co., 58 Pac. 55, 58, 125 Cal. 434 (citing Greenleaf, Ev.); Gannon v. People, 21 N. E. 525, 529, 127 Ill. 507, 11 Am. St. Rep. 147; Ross v. City of New York, 27 N. Y. Super. Ct. (4 Rob.) 49, 54; People v. Morrow, 60 Cal. 142, 143.

"Circumstantial evidence is the proof of certain facts and circumstances in a given case, from which a jury may infer other connected facts which usually and reasonably follow, according to the common experience of mankind." State v. Avery (Mo.) 21 S. W. 193, 197, 113 Mo. 475; State v. Dickson, 78 Mo. 438, 441; State v. Tate, 56 S. W. 1099, 1100, 156 Mo. 119; Baird v. City of New York, 96 N. Y. 567, 593; State v. Kornstett (Kan.) 61 Pac. 805, 808, 62 Kan. 221; Ross v. City of New York, 27 N. Y. Super. Ct. (4 Rob.) 49, 54.

"'Circumstantial evidence' is defined to be where the proof applies immediately to collateral facts supposed to have a connection near or remote with the fact in controversy." United States Exp. Co. v. Jenkins, 25 N. W. 549, 550, 64 Wis. 542; Eberhardt v. Sanger, 8 N. W. 111, 114, 51 Wis. 72.

Circumstantial evidence "is composed of circumstances or relative facts bearing indirectly on the fact at issue or which is sought to be proved, and requiring in its application to such facts a process of special inference leading to the conclusion denied." Howard v. State, 34 Ark. 433, 440.

Circumstantial evidence is a recognized instrumentality of the law in the ascertainment of truth, and, when properly understood and applied, highly satisfactory in matters of grievous moment. State v. Wilcox, 44 S. E. 625, 631, 132 N. C. 1120.

Circumstantial or presumptive evidence is where, some facts being proved, another fact follows as a natural or very probable conclusion from the facts actually proved, so as readily to gain the assent of the mind from the mere probability of its actually having occurred. It is the inference of a fact from other facts proved, and the fact thus inferred and assented to by the mind is said to be "presumed"; that is to say, it is taken for granted until the contrary is proved. State v. Evans (Del.) 41 Atl. 136, 138, 1 Marv. 477.

Circumstantial evidence is the proof of such facts and circumstances connected with or surrounding the commission of the crime charged as to tend to show the guilt or innocence of the defendant. Horn v. Territory, 56 Pac. 846, 847, 8 Okl. 52. "Circumstantial evidence," as the term is commonly understood, is evidence which tends to prove the ultimate fact in issue. Buel v. State, 80 N. W. 78, 81, 104 Wis. 132.

Circumstantial evidence is evidence of facts of so conclusive a character as to warrant a firm belief of another fact which is in issue, which belief is as strong and certain as that on which discreet men are accustomed to act in relation to their most important concerns. Commonwealth v. Webster, 59 Mass. (5 Cush.) 295, 319, 52 Am. Dec. 711.

"It is not necessary or requisite that circumstantial evidence should have a direct relation to the immediate subject of inquiry, much less that the inference drawn from the circumstances should be absolutely certain or necessary. It is sufficient if the evidence be such as to produce a fair and reasonable presumption of the facts in issue, and if it has that tendency it ought to be received and left to the consideration of the jury, to whom alone it belongs to determine the precise force and effect of the circumstances produced." Gardner v. Preston (Conn.) 2 Day, 205, 208, 210, 2 Am. Dec. 91.

The term "circumstantial evidence" is used to designate testimony not based on actual and personal knowledge of the existence of the fact in controversy, but of other facts from which it is satisfactorily proved. The proof in such case rests not alone upon the faith in the veracity, impartiality, opportunity for observation, accuracy of memory, etc., of the witnesses, but also on the experience and connection between the collateral facts proved and the fact in controversy. State v. Miller (Del.) 32 Atl. 137, 141, 9 Houst. 564.

Indirect or circumstantial evidence is that which tends to establish the issue by proof of various facts sustaining by their consistency the hypothesis claimed. Civ. Code Ga. 1895, § 5143; Pen. Code Ga. 1895, § 983.

Compared to chain or cable.

Circumstantial evidence simply comprises the minor relative facts standing around (circumstantia) the principal fact to be proved. To use the expressive term of the Roman law, these facts are the "Indicia of truth," serving to point out the object sought. This method of investigating truth by circumstances is often characterized as a "convergence of rays of light to a common focus or center," but more frequently as the formation of a chain out of a number of separate links. State v. Richards, 27 Atl. 122, 123, 85 Me. 252.

Circumstantial evidence may be of two kinds, consisting either of a number of consecutive links, each depending upon the other, or a number of independent circumstances all pointing in the same direction. In the former case it is said that each link must be complete in itself, and that the resulting chain cannot be stronger than its weakest link. In the latter case the individual circumstances are compared to the strands in a rope, where no one of them may be sufficient in itself, but all together may be strong enough, to prove the guilt of defendant beyond a reasonable doubt. But in either case every individual circumstance must in itself at least tend to prove defendant's guilt before it can be admitted as evidence. On a prosecution for larceny of money it was error for the court to refuse to charge that the finding of a sack of money in a public lot two days after the defendant's imprisonment was not a circumstance against the defendant, where it was not shown that the defendant had placed the money there or had any connection with it. State v. Austin, 40 S. E. 4, 5, 129 N. C. 534.

Circumstantial evidence, strictly speaking, consists of a number of disconnected and independent facts which converge toward the fact at issue as a common center. These concurrent and coincident facts are arranged in combination by a mental process of reasoning and inference, enlightened by common observation, experience, and knowledge. Where a presumption arises from a number of connected and dependent facts, every fact essential to the series must be proved. Such evidence is like a chain, of which no link must be missing or broken which destroys its continuity. Circumstantial evidence is like a wire cable, composed of many small associated but independent wires.

The strength of the cable depends upon the number of wires which are combined, but some of the wires may be broken, and yet the cable is sufficiently strong to uphold the structure. As no chain is stronger than its weakest link, a chain is less reliable when it has a great number of links, but a wire cable is strengthened by an increase in the number of its wires. When circumstantial evidence consists of a number of independent circumstances, coming from several witnesses and different sources, each of which is consistent and tends to the same conclusions, the probability of the truth of the fact in issue is increased in proportion to the number of such circumstances. United States v. Searcy (U. S.) 26 Fed. 435, 437.

Conclusiveness.

"The term 'circumstantial evidence' is merely a name for the application of reason to facts. It is convincing when different circumstances point to a single conclusion. It may be much more satisfactory than the fallible memories of any half dozen witnesses. It is the only kind of testimony which may bring to life the complicity of a principal who necessarily acts through agents, and hides himself from contact with those who execute the crime." Voisin v. Commercial Mut. Ins. Co., 66 N. Y. Supp. 638, 643, 32 Misc. Rep. 393.

Circumstantial evidence is in the abstract nearly, although perhaps not altogether, as strong as positive evidence. In the concrete it may be infinitely stronger. Chief Justice Whitman, of Maine, in State v. Thomas, 6 Law Rep. 634, says that circumstantial evidence is often stronger and more satisfactory than direct, because it is not liable to delusion or fraud. Circumstantial evidence consists of a body of facts of so conclusive a character as to warrant a firm belief of the fact, quite as strong and certain as that on which discreet men are accustomed to act in relation to their most important concerns. It is of two kinds, certain and uncertain, or that from which the conclusion in question necessarily follows, and that from which it does not necessarily follow, but is probable only, and is obtained by a process of reasoning. People v. Morrow, 60 Cal. 142, 145.

"Circumstantial evidence consists in reasoning from facts which are known or proved to establish such as are conjectured to exist, but the process is fatally vicious if the circumstance from which we seek to deduce the conclusion depends itself upon conjecture." People v. Kennedy, 32 N. Y. 141, 146.

Starkie, Ev. 572, says: "It is always insufficient where, assuming all to be proved which the evidence tends to prove, some other hypothesis may still be true, for it is the actual exclusion of every other hypothesis which invests mere circumstances with the force of truth. Whenever, therefore, the evidence leaves it indifferent which of several hypotheses is true, or merely establishes some finite probability in favor of one hypothesis rather than another, such evidence cannot amount to proof, however great the probability may be." Algheri v. State, 25 Miss. (3 Cushm.) 584, 589.

In a prosecution for larceny of a mule, an instruction that "the jury may from circumstantial evidence alone find the defendant guilty when the facts established are inconsistent with any other theory than that of his guilt, but in order to find the defendant guilty upon circumstantial evidence the facts proven must be wholly inconsistent with the innocence of the accused, and incapable of explanation upon any other reasonable hypothesis than that of his guilt," is a clear declaration of the law upon the subject. State v. Hill, 65 Mo. 84, 87. See, also, State v. Evans (Del.) 41 Atl. 136, 138, 1 Marv. 477; State v. Avery, 21 S. W. 193, 197, 113 Mo. 475; State v. Tate, 56 S. W. 1099, 1100, 156 Mo. 119; Ross v. City of New York, 27 N. Y. Super. Ct. (4 Rob.) 49, 54.

A conviction cannot be based on circumstantial evidence alone, unless the state has proven defendant's guilt from the evidence, beyond a reasonable doubt, by facts and circumstances all of which are consistent with each other and with his guilt, and absolutely inconsistent with any reasonable theory of innocence. State v. Moxley, 14 S. W. 969, 973, 102 Mo. 374 (citing Burrill Circ. Ev. p. 181; 2 Best, Ev. § 451; People v. Cunningham, 6 Parker, Cr. R. 398; People v. Strong, 30 Cal. 151; Harrison v. State, 6 Tex. App. 42).

Nature of facts constituting.

Circumstantial evidence is proof by testimony of a chain of circumstances pointing sufficiently strongly to the commission of the crime by the defendant. Such evidence may consist of admissions by the defendant, plans laid for the commission of the crime, such as putting himself in position to commit it; in short, any acts, declarations, or circumstances admitted in evidence tending to connect the defendant with the commission of the crime. People v. Morrow, 60 Cal. 142, 143.

The term "circumstantial evidence" may be correctly applied to evidence that stolen money was found on the person of defendant. Commonwealth v. Connors, 27 Atl. 366, 368, 156 Pa. 147.

Circumstantial evidence is proof of a minor fact which, by indirection, logically and rationally demonstrates the factum probandum. This is illustrated by proof of recent possession of stolen property. In such a case, resting alone upon such inculpatory evidence, the eye of no witness saw the thief in the act of taking the property stolen, but the witness may testify directly to the fact of seeing the thief recently after the crime in possession of the stolen property, and that when his possession was challenged he either declined to explain, or gave an explanation which was false, from which circumstances of the possession, directly sworn to, and circumstances of a failure to explain or false explanation, the fact of the taking is inferred or deduced by the process of reasoning. Beason v. State, 67 S. W. 96, 98, 43 Tex. Cr. R. 442.

The term "circumstantial evidence" may be used to designate evidence that a scaffolding which fell and injured an employé did not conform with the statute as to the manner of constructing such scaffolding, as the omission of such duty, in the absence of other evidence, warrants the jury in believing that to have been the cause of the injury. Stewart v. Ferguson, 58 N. E. 662, 663, 164 N. Y. 553.

CIRCUMVENTION.

Circumvention is nearly, if not quite, synonymous with fraud. It is any fraud whereby a person is induced by deceit to make a deed or other instrument. It must be borne in mind, however, that the fraud or circumvention must relate to the instrument itself, and not to the consideration on which it is based, nor can such fraud relate to the quality, quantity, value, or character of the consideration which moves the contract, but it is such a trick or device as induces the giving of one character of instrument under the belief that it is one of a different character. Town of Oregon v. Jennings, 7 Sup. Ct. 124, 130, 119 U. S. 74, 30 L. Ed. 323.

CIRCUS.

A "circus," anciently, was an edifice or inclosure used for the exhibition of games and shows to the people; such was the Circus Maximus, which was nearly a mile in circumference. Now the word means a circular inclosure for the exhibitions of feats of horsemanship. Rowland v. Kleber, 1 Pittsb. R. 68, 71.

Every building, space, tent, or area where feats of horsemanship or acrobatic sports or theatrical performances are exhibited shall be regarded as a circus within the meaning of the war revenue act of 1898. U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 2287.

As theater.

The term "circus" is not synonymous with "theater." The dramatic performances which belong to a theater are those adapted to the stage. A "circus," on the other hand, has no stage, but a ring, and the performances are of a character that can take place in the circle in the absence of the stage and its appurtenances. They may both be arranged under the general term "amusements," but differ from each other as one species differs from another under the same genus. Jacko v. State, 22 Ala. 73, 74.

CITATION.

"In the civil law and in ecclesiastical courts, the term 'citation' means the original summons by which a defendant is notified to appear and answer in the action. In our practice it is often used to denote interlocutory notices issued during the pendency of a suit or proceeding. Thus, in probate proceedings, a judge may cite a person suspected of stealing the estate of the person deceased to appear and answer. The term 'citation' cannot be held to mean the original summons or process which issues upon a libel for a divorce." Leavitt v. Leavitt, 135 Mass. 191, 193.

Citation is a summons to appear, applied particularly to processes in the spiritual court, but adopted in civil procedure from the canon and civil law. State v. McCann, 87 Me. 372, 374 (citing Jac. Law Dict.).

A citation is an order from the court to the defendant to appear and answer, and this order can emanate only from the clerk and only under his signature. It is the clerk's signature that imparts legal life to the document called a "citation." Without the clerk's signature the document is nothing more than mere writing or print. Schwartz v. Lake, 34 South. 96, 109 La. 1081.

A citation in its general character is a summons. Bacigalupo v. Superior Court of City and County of San Francisco, 40 Pac. 1055, 108 Cal. 92.

A citation is a writ issued out of a court of competent jurisdiction, commanding the person therein named to appear on the day named and do something therein mentioned, or show cause why he should not. Johns v. Phoenix Nat. Bank (Ariz.) 56 Pac. 725, 726.

In case of a removal of a cause to any court by writ of error a citation "is simply notice to the opposite party that the record is transferred into another court, where he may appear, or decline to appear, as his judgment or inclination may determine. This notice is not a suit, nor has it the effect of process. If the party does not choose to appear, he cannot be brought into court, nor is his failure to appear considered as a default. Judgment cannot be given against him for his nonappearance, but the judgment is to be re-examined, and reversed or affirmed, in like manner as if the party had appeared and argued his cause." Cohens v. Virginia, 19 U. S. (6 Wheat.) 264, 410, 5 L. Ed. 257.

The citation is a matter separate and distinct from the sheriff's return. A citation may be thoroughly legal, while the return may fail in making the recitals the sheriff ought to make, and, on the other hand, the return may be beyond criticism, and yet the fact be that no legal citation has been made. The citation itself is the important legal fact upon which the validity of the judgment rests, while the return is simply evidence in respect to that fact. Baham v. Stewart Bros. & Co., 34 South. 54, 56, 109 La. 999.

CITIZEN.

See "Adopted Citizens"; "Foreign Citizen"; "Lawful Citizen"; "Native-Born Citizens"; "Natural Born Citizen."

"The word 'citizen' is derived from the Latin 'civis,' and meant in Rome one vested with the freedom and privileges of the city. Rees' Encyc. tit. 'Citizen.' Butler says: 'Citizens were the highest class of subjects at Rome to whom jus civitatis belonged, and those who had it possessed all rights and privileges, civil, political, religious.' Hora Judicane, 26, 27. Dictionnaire L'Academie les Citoyen defines it thus: 'In its strict and rigorous sense, an inhabitant of a state, who by right may vote in the public assembly, and is a part of the sovereign power.' Johnson defines it: 'A freeman of a city.' Webster: 'The native of a city, or an inhabitant, who enjoys the freedom and privileges of a city in which he resides; a freeman of a city, distinguished from a foreigner, or one not entitled to franchises.' The word is never used by the people in a monarchy, since it involves an idea not enjoyed by subjects, to wit, the inherent right to partake in the government. The republics of the Old World were cities, and the word 'citizen' has been usually in human history only applied to inhabitants of cities. As, however, states have in modern times arisen, and republics have been established, in which the word 'subjects' could not be properly applied, the people of those republics have been called 'citizens,' for the simple and obvious reason that their relation to the state was such as was the relation of citizens to the city." And as used in Code, § 1648, providing that among the rights of citizens are the enjoyment of personal security, of personal liberty, of private property and the disposition thereof, the elective franchise, the right to hold office, to appeal to the courts, to testify as a witness, to perform all civil functions, and to keep and bear arms, the word means those persons who, unless it is otherwise expressly provided by law, are entitled to the rights mentioned. White v. Clements, 39 Ga. 232, 259.

"Citizens," as used in the United States Constitution, providing that the citizens of each state shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens of the several states, mean those who are entitled, upon the terms prescribed by the institutions of the state, to all the rights and privileges conferred by those institutions upon the highest class of society. "Females and infants do not personally possess those rights and privileges in any state in the Union, but they are generally dependent upon adult males, through whom they enjoy the benefits of those rights and privileges; and it is a rule of common law, as well as of common sense, that females and infants should in this respect partake of the quality of those adult males who belong to the same class and condition in society, and, of course, they will or will not be citizens as the adult males of the same class are or are not so. Nor do we mean to say that it is necessary even for an adult male, to be a citizen, that he should be in the actual enjoyment of all those rights and privileges; but he may even not possess those qualifications of property, of age, or of residence which most of the states prescribe as requisites to the enjoyment of some of their highest privileges and immunities, and yet be a citizen. But to be a citizen it is necessary that he should be entitled to the enjoyment of those privileges and immunities upon the same terms upon which they are conferred upon other citizens, and, unless he is so entitled, he cannot, in the proper sense of the term, be a 'citizen.' In England, birth in the country was alone sufficient to make any one a subject. Even a villein or a slave born within the King's allegiance is according to the principles of the common law a subject, but it never can be admitted that he is a citizen. One may, no doubt, be a citizen by birth as well as a subject, but subject and citizen are evidently words of different import, and it indisputably requires something more to make a citizen than it does to make a subject. It is, in fact, not the place of a man's birth, but the rights and privileges he may be entitled to enjoy, which make him a citizen. The term 'citizen' is derived from the Latin word 'civis,' and its primary sense signifies one who is vested with the freedom and privileges of a city. At an early period after the subversion of the Roman Empire, when civilization had again begun to progress, the cities in every part of Europe, either by usurpation or concession from their sovereigns, obtained extraordinary privileges in addition to those which were common to the other subjects of their respective countries, and one who was invested with these extraordinary privileges, whether he was an inhabitant of the city or not, or whether he was born in it or not, was deemed a citizen. In England a citizen is not only entitled to all the local privileges of the city to which he belongs, but he has also the right of electing and being elected to Parliament, which is itself rather an extraordinary privilege, since it does not belong to every class of subjects. If we go back to Rome, whence the term 'citizen' has its origin, we shall find in the illustrious period of her republic that citizens were the highest class of subjects to whom the jus civitatis belonged, and that the jus civitatis conferred upon those who were in possession of it all rights and privileges, civil, political, and religious. When the term came to be applied to the inhabitants of the state, it necessarily carried with it the same significance with reference to the privileges of the state which had been implied by it with reference to the privileges of a city when it was applied to the inhabitants of the city, and it is in this sense that the term 'citizen' is believed to be generally, if not universally, understood in the United States." Amy v. Smith, 11 Ky. (1 Litt.) 326, 331.

The term "citizen" has come to us from antiquity, and was used in the Roman government to designate a person who had the freedom of the city and the right to exercise all political and civil privileges of the government. Thomasson v. State, 15 Ind. 449, 451 (citing Adams' Roman Antiquities, pp. 44, 60; 2 Kent, Comm. p. 76, note).

A "citizen" is defined by Webster to be "a person, native or naturalized, who has the privilege of voting for public officers and who is qualified to fill public offices in the gift of the people; also either native-born or naturalized person, of either sex, who is entitled to full protection in the exercise and enjoyment of so-called private rights." Bouvier gives the definition of a citizen in American law as one who under the Constitution and law of the United States has a right to vote for Representatives in Congress and other public officers, and who is qualified to fill offices in the gift of the people. All persons born or naturalized, in the United States and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the state wherein they reside. Abbott defines it thus: "A person who owes allegiance to and may claim reciprocal protection from a government; one who is a member of the United States, or of the body politic of a sovereign state. Age or majority is not involved. Women are citizens as fully and truly as men. Nor does a recognition of women's citizenship involve a grant of political rights, such as are indeed usually conferred only on citizens, but do not inhere in that status." State ex rel. McCabell v. County Court, 2 S. W. 788, 789, 90 Mo. 593 (citing 1 Abb. Law Dict. 223). See, also, In re Wehlitz, 16 Wis. 443, 449, 84 Am. Dec. 700.

The word "citizen," as used in the Constitution and laws of the United States, has uniformly conveyed the idea of membership of a nation, and nothing more. Cronly v. City of Tucson (Ariz.) 56 Pac. 876, 877; Minor v. Happersett, 88 U. S. (21 Wall.) 162, 22 L. Ed. 627.

Chancellor Kent defines "citizens" as follows: "'Citizens,' under our Constitution and laws, mean free inhabitants born within the United States or naturalized under the laws of Congress." The possession of political rights is not essential to citizenship. Every citizen and freeman is endowed with certain rights and privileges, to enjoy which no written law or statute is required. These are fundamental or natural rights, recognized among all free people. United States v. Morris (U. S.) 125 Fed. 322, 325.

Citizens are members of the political community to which they belong. They are the people who compose the community, and who in their associated capacity have established or submitted themselves to the dominion of a government for the promotion of their welfare and protection of their individual, as well as their collective, rights. United States v. Cruikshank, 92 U. S. 542, 549, 23 L. Ed. 588.

In common parlance, all people are citizens. Steketee v. Kimm, 12 N. W. 177, 178, 48 Mich. 322.

All persons who are citizens of the United States and who are domiciled in the commonwealth are citizens thereof. Rev. Laws Mass. 1902, p. 55, c. 1, § 1.

"Citizen," as used in Const. art. 5, § 2, providing that no person shall be eligible to the office of Governor who shall not have been for two years a citizen of the United States and of this state, means a person who is an American citizen by birth, or a person of foreign birth who has been naturalized under the provisions of the uniform rule of naturalization established by Congress. State v. Boyd, 48 N. W. 739, 740, 745, 31 Neb. 682.

All persons born in this state; all persons born in any other state of this Union, who may be or become residents of this state; all aliens naturalized under the laws of the United States, who may be or become residents of this state; all persons who have obtained a right to citizenship under former laws; and all children, wherever born, whose father, or, if he be dead, whose mother, shall be a citizen of this state at the time of the birth of such children—shall be deemed citizens of this state. Code Va. 1887, § 39.

Aliens.

A native of Great Britain, born before the Revolution, is not a citizen of this country, as born under a common allegiance before the severance of the two countries. Ex parte Dupont, Harp. Eq. (S. C.) 5, 10.

As used in Rev. St. § 5508 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3712], providing a punishment to be inflicted on those who conspire to injure, oppress, threaten, or intimidate any citizen in the free exercise or enjoyment of any right or privilege secured to him by the Constitution or laws of the United States, it is used in its strict sense, as contrasted with "alien," and is not synonymous with "resident," "inhabitant," or "person." Baldwin v. Franks, 7 Sup. Ct. 656, 662, 120 U. S. 678, 32 L. Ed. 766; Logan v. United States, 12 Sup. Ct. 617, 626, 144 U. S. 263, 36 L. Ed. 429.

All persons born or naturalized in the United States and subject to the jurisdiction thereof are citizens of the United States. A person born in a foreign country, out of the jurisdiction of the United States, whose father is not a citizen of the United States, can only become a citizen by naturalization. North Noonday Min. Co. v. Orient Min. Co. (U. S.) 1 Fed. 522, 527.

A party may not be a "citizen" for political purposes, and yet be a citizen for commercial or business purposes. An unnaturalized foreigner, residing and doing business in this state, is, for commercial purposes, in contemplation of our attachment laws, a "citizen" of this state. Field v. Adreon, 7 Md. 209, 214.

Children of American parents born abroad.

Persons born in a foreign country of American parents, who resided there, but who never renounced their citizenship, are citizens of the United States. Ware v. Wiener (U. S.) 50 Fed. 810, 812.

Children of resident aliens.

The term "citizens," defined in the fourteenth amendment of the federal Constitution as all persons born or naturalized in the United States and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, must be interpreted in the light of the common law, the principles and history of which were familiarly known to the Constitution. The Supreme Court, speaking through Gray, J., after stating the above doctrine, and giving an extended review of English, American, and foreign authorities, held that the fourteenth amendment affirmed "the ancient rule of citizenship by birth within the territory, in the allegiance and under the protection of the country, including all children here born of resident aliens, except the children of foreign sovereigns or their ministers, or born on foreign public ships or of enemies during hostile occupation, and children of Indians owing direct tribal allegiance. It includes the children of all other persons, of whatever race or color, domiciled within the United States. The fourteenth amendment of the Constitution contemplates two sources of citizenship and two only—birth and naturalization. Every person born in the United States and subject to the jurisdiction thereof becomes a citizen at once, and needs no naturalization. A person born out of the jurisdiction can only become a citizen by being naturalized, either by treaty or by authority of Congress, in declaring certain classes of persons to be citizens, or by enabling foreigners individually to become citizens by proceedings in judicial tribunals." United States v. Wong Kim Ark, 18 Sup. Ct. 456, 459, 169 U. S. 649, 42 L. Ed. 890.

By the common law a child born within the allegiance and the jurisdiction of the United States is born a subject or citizen thereof, without reference to the political status or condition of its parents. McKay v. Campbell (U. S.) 16 Fed. Cas. 161; In re Look Tin Sing (U. S.) 21 Fed. 905. This, of course, does not include children born in the United States of parents engaged in the diplomatic service of foreign governments. The rule of common law has been incorporated into the fundamental law of the land, and the fourteenth amendment provides that all persons born in the United States are citizens of the United States. Ex parte Chin King (U. S.) 35 Fed. 354, 355.

All persons born or naturalized in the United States and subject to the jurisdiction thereof are citizens of the United States, and hence a person born within the United States of Chinese parents, residing therein and not engaged in any diplomatic or official capacity under the Emperor of China, is a citizen of the United States. In re Look Tin Sing (U. S.) 21 Fed. 905, 906; In re Wy Shing (U. S.) 36 Fed. 553, 554; In re Yung Sing Hee (U. S.) 36 Fed. 437, 438; Lee Sing Far v. United States (U. S.) 94 Fed. 834, 35 C. C. A. 377; In re Wong Kim Ark (U. S.) 71 Fed. 382, 392; Gee Fook Sing v. United States (U. S.) 49 Fed. 146, 147, 1 C. C. A. 211.

The laws of Congress and of Wisconsin use the word "citizen" as designating those who are liable to be enrolled in the militia. Persons of foreign birth, who have declared their intention to become citizens of the United States, and have become qualified electors of the state of Wisconsin under the state Constitution, and have exercised the right of suffrage, are liable to be enrolled in the militia of the state, and to be drafted into the military service of the United States, under the acts of Congress and the state Legislature in force July 9, 1863. But the children of such citizens, who came into this country with their parents while minors, and have since attained full age and resided in the state more than one year, are not qualified electors, nor liable to such enrollment and draft, in case their fathers were never fully naturalized, and they themselves have never declared their intention in conformity with the naturalization laws. In re Conway, 17 Wis. 526, 528.

As citizen of state.

"Citizens," as used in Bill of Rights, § 17, declaring that no distinction shall ever be made between citizens and aliens in respect to the purchase, enjoyment, or descent of property, means citizens of Kansas, and not citizens of other states. Buffington v. Grosvenor, 27 Pac. 137, 138, 46 Kan. 730, 13 L. R. A. 282.

Const. art. 6, § 8, providing that any male citizen of the age of 21 years of proper qualifications shall be entitled to admission to practice of law in all courts of the state, means citizens of the state. In re Henry, 40 N. Y. 560.

The term "citizen of a state," as used in the judiciary act, does not include a citizen of the District of Columbia. Land Company of New Mexico v. Elkins (U. S.) 20 Fed. 545.

Citizens of a state, within the removal act, mean citizens of one of the United States, and the suits contemplated are suits between citizens of one of the states of the Union on one side, and foreign states, or citizens or subjects on the other. Roberts v. Pacific & A. Ry. & Navigation Co. (U. S.) 121 Fed. 785, 789, 58 C. C. A. 61.

Citizen of state and United States distinguished.

A man may be a citizen of the United States without being a citizen of the state; but an important element is necessary to convert the former into the latter. He must reside within the state to be a citizen of it, but it is only necessary that he should be born or naturalized in the United States to be a citizen of the Union. Butchers Benev. Ass'n v. Crescent City Livestock Landing & Slaughter House Co., 83 U. S. (16 Wall.) 36, 73, 74, 21 L. Ed. 394. See, also, Short v. State, 31 Atl. 322, 323, 80 Md. 892, 29 L. R. A. 404.

As citizen of United States.

The term "citizen of the United States" must be understood to mean those who were citizens of the state as such after the Union had commenced and the several states had assumed their sovereignty. Before that period there were no citizens of the United States. Inhabitants of Manchester v. Inhabitants of Boston, 16 Mass. 230, 235.

Const. U. S. art. 4, § 2, declaring that the "citizens of each state shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several states" means only citizens of the United States. Davis v. Pierse, 7 Minn. 13, 21 (Gil. 1, 9) 82 Am. Dec. 65.

The word "citizen," as used in section 25 of the Bill of Rights, providing that no distinction shall ever be made by law between aliens and citizens in reference to the possession, enjoyment, and descent of property, relates to the political status of persons as respects their relation to the United States. Glynn v. Glynn, 87 N. W. 1052, 62 Neb. 872.

Citizenship may be conferred by a nation or state, but not by a political subdivision thereof. A county is a political subdivision of the state. It cannot confer citizenship, and it follows that there cannot be such a civic character as a citizen of a county. The true meaning, therefore, of the words "citizen of the county" in Cr. Code, § 223, which provides that the grand jury is a body of men, returned at stated periods, from the "citizens of the county," is citizens of the United States, who are residents of the county. People v. Scannell, 75 N. Y. Supp. 500, 508, 37 Misc. Rep. 345.

Corporation.

A corporation is not a citizen, within the meaning of the constitutional provision, and hence has not the privileges and immunities secured to citizens against state legislation. Orient Ins. Co. v. Daggs, 19 Sup. Ct. 281, 282, 172 U. S. 557, 43 L. Ed. 552 (citing Paul v. Virginia, 75 U. S. [8 Wall.] 168, 19 L. Ed. 357; Blake v. McClung, 172 U. S. 239, 19 Sup. Ct. 165, 43 L. "Citizen," ordinarily means only a natural person, and will not be construed to include a corporation, unless the general purpose and import of the statute in which the term is found seem to require it. International & Life Assur. Co. v. Haight, 35 N. J. Law (6 Vroom) 279, 282.

A corporation is not a "citizen" of the United States or of any state, within the meaning of the word as used in the Constitution, giving United States courts jurisdiction of suits between citizens of different states. Winkler v. Chicago & E. I. R. Co. (U. S.) 108 Fed. 305, 308; Carnegie, Phipps & Co. v. Hulbert (U. S.) 53 Fed. 10, 11, 3 C. C. A. 391; Ohio & Miss. R. R. Co. v. Wheeler, 66 U. S. (1 Black) 286, 295, 17 L. Ed. 130; Anglo-American Provision Co. v. Davis Provision Co., 62 N. E. 587, 589, 169 N. Y. 506, 82 Am. St. Rep. 608.

The term "citizen," as used in the federal Constitution and statutes defining the jurisdiction of the federal courts, includes a corporation created by one of the states, when such corporation is regarded as a citizen of that state for the purpose of determining its residence. Wisconsin v. Pelican Ins. Co., 8 Sup. Ct. 1370, 1378, 127 U. S. 265, 32 L. Ed. 239. See, also, Baughman v. National Waterworks Co. (U. S.) 46 Fed. 4, 7. A corporation is not considered as a citizen, or entitled to the privileges of a citizen, except for the purpose of giving jurisdiction to the federal courts, for which a corporation may be considered a citizen of the state by which it is incorporated. Tatem v. Wright, 23 N. J. Law (3 Zab.) 429, 445.

Corporations organized under state laws are "citizens of the United States," within the meaning of Act March 3, 1891, c. 538, 26 Stat. 851 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 758], giving the Court of Claims jurisdiction over claims for property of citizens of the United States destroyed by Indians. United States v. Northwestern Express, Stage & Transportation Co., 17 Sup. Ct. 206, 207, 164 U. S. 686, 41 L. Ed. 599.

A corporation is not a citizen, within the meaning of the act of Congress authorizing a foreign corporation to transact business in the state, and providing that thereby it becomes a domestic corporation. Hollingsworth v. Southern R. Co. (U. S.) 86 Fed. 353, 356.

Within Act May 10, 1872, providing that all valuable mineral deposits in lands belonging to the United States shall be free and open to exploration and purchase by citizens of the United States, under such regulations as shall be prescribed by law, a corporation lawfully created and existing is a citizen. North Noonday Min. Co. v. Orient Min. Co. (U. S.) 1 Fed. 522, 538.

Citizenship, within the federal judiciary act, as applied to corporations, is based on the presumption that the members of the corporation are citizens of the state in which alone the corporate body has a legal existence and under the laws of which the corporation is created; and, since a suit by or against the corporation in its corporate name must be presumed to be a suit by or against citizens of the state which created the body, no averment or evidence to the contrary is admissible for the purpose of withdrawing the suit from the jurisdiction of the United States courts. Zambrino v. Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. (U. S.) 38 Fed. 449, 451.

A corporation, as an artificial person, exists only by force of the law which created it. It has no extraterritorial existence, and what rights it may exercise in other jurisdictions are permitted upon the principle of comity. It is not a citizen of the state in the constitutional sense. Anglo-American Provision Co. v. Davis Provision Co., 62 N. E. 587, 589, 169 N. Y. 506, 88 Am. St. Rep. 608.

A compliance by a foreign railroad corporation with the statute providing that such corporation shall not be entitled to the right of eminent domain, or have power to acquire a right of way or real estate, until they shall have become bodies corporate in accordance with the laws of the commonwealth, and prescribing the manner of such incorporation, does not render the corporation a "citizen" of the state, in such sense as to deprive it of the right to remove to the federal court actions instituted against it by a citizen of the state. Davis v. Chesapeake & O. Ry. Co., 75 S. W. 275, 277, 25 Ky. Law Rep. 342.

"Citizens," within the meaning of Rev. St. U. S. § 5219, providing that the taxation of national banks shall not be at a higher rate than assessed on other moneyed capital in the hands of individual citizens of the state, means natural persons, and not corporations. The term "individual citizens" in this section is not substantially different from the term "individual" in the state statute, which only differs from the statute quoted in substituting the word "individual" for the words "individual citizens." Primm v. Fort, 57 S. W. 972, 23 Tex. Civ. App. 605.

The words "citizen" and "person," as used in the article relating to taxes on incomes, shall be deemed to include all natural persons, all copartners, and all members of any incorporated association, and to exclude, except as hereinafter included, all corporations duly chartered by the laws of the United States and of this or any other state. Civ. Code S. C. 1902, § 327.

Declaration of intention.

Within Rev. St. art. 3010, providing that no person shall be qualified to serve as a juror unless he is a citizen of the state and of the county in which he is to serve, the term "citizen" should be construed to include one who has declared his intention to become a citizen in due form and possesses the other conditions of age and residence within the state and voting district for the appropriate length of time, becoming thereby a qualified elector. A citizen is a person, native or civilized, who has the privilege of voting for public officers and who is qualified to fill offices in the gift of the people; one who, under the Constitution and laws of the United States, has a right to vote for Representatives in Congress and for public officers, and who is qualified to fill offices in the gift of the people. Abrigo v. State, 15 S. W. 408, 410, 29 Tex. App. 143.

Militia Act May 8, 1792, designating the persons to be enrolled for militia duty, provided that "every free, able-bodied, white, male citizen of the respective states, resident therein," etc., should be liable to militia duty. Held, that the word "citizen," as there used, included a resident alien who had declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States pursuant to the naturalization laws of the United States. In re Wehlitz, 16 Wis. 443, 445, 84 Am. Dec. 700.

Domicile as determining.

"Citizen," as the term is used, in the federal Constitution and judiciary act, with reference to the jurisdiction of federal courts, means a citizen of the United States residing permanently in any state; otherwise, a citizen by statute would never belong to any state, and could never maintain a suit in the courts of the United States. In the sense of the Constitution and judiciary act, he who is incorporated into the body of the state by permanent residence therein, so as to become a member of it, must be a citizen of that state, though born in another; or, to use the phrase more familiar in the books, "a citizen of the United States must be a citizen of that state in which his domicile is placed." Prentiss v. Barton (U. S.) 19 Fed. Cas. 1276; Gardner v. Sharp (U. S.) 9 Fed. Cas. 1196, 1199.

The word "citizen," as it is used in the statute providing for the jurisdiction of the federal courts as between citizens of different states, means a person who has a domicile in a state. A person does not lose his citizenship by removing from one state to another, providing such removal is in good faith and with the intention thereby to change his citizenship; but such removal must be real, animo manendi, and not merely ostensible, and, if so, he becomes a citizen for the purpose of the jurisdiction of the federal courts, though the time has not expired within which he could exercise all the rights of citizenship in such state. Case v. Clarke (U. S.) 5 Fed. Cas. 254; Catlett v. Pacific Ins. Co., Id. 291.

Laws 1893, p. 239, § 6, provides that no person shall be entitled to a divorce unless a bona fide resident and citizen of the state for one year prior to the commencement of the action. It was held that, though in a restricted sense a citizen of a state is a citizen of the United States domiciled in a state, yet the Legislature used the word "citizen" in the statute cited as meaning one who has in the state a fixed habitation and a permanent residence, without any present intention of removing therefrom. Cairnes v. Cairnes, 68 Pac. 233, 234, 29 Colo. 260, 93 Am. St. Rep. 55.

Indian.

An Indian, born a member of one of the Indian tribes within the United States, but which still exists and is recognized as a tribe by the government of the United States, who has voluntarily separated himself from his tribe and taken up a residence among the white citizens of the state, but who has not been naturalized, or taxed, or recognized as a citizen, either by the United States or by the state, is styled a citizen of the tribe or Indian nation in which he was born, and does not by his withdrawal from such tribe become a citizen of the United States, within the federal Constitution, since, being born a member of an independent political community, he is not born subject to the jurisdiction of the United States—not born in its allegiance—and hence cannot become a citizen thereof by any act of his own, without the consent and co-operation of the government. Elk v. Wilkins, 5 Sup. Ct. 41, 49, 112 U. S. 94, 28 L. Ed. 643; Smith v. United States, 14 Sup. Ct. 234, 236, 151 U. S. 50, 38 L. Ed. 67; Stevenson v. Christie, 42 S. W. 418, 420, 64 Ark. 72.

Indians are not citizens, although born in the United States. Whether or not the government can subject them to its jurisdiction, it has not done so in the case of offenses committed by one Indian upon another; and, not being subject to the jurisdiction of the United States, they are not citizens thereof. Under the laws as they now are, an Indian, if a member of a tribe, is not a member of the body politic. The tribes are permitted by the United States to exist as distinct nations, or as distinct political societies, separated from others, capable of managing their own affairs and governing themselves. So long as the government of the United States, through its legislative department, continues to treat them as beyond the jurisdiction of the United States, so long they must be held to be quasi foreign nations, whose citizens are not regarded as American citizens, and not subject to the responsibilities of such citizens. In re Reynolds (U. S.) 20 Fed. Cas. 582, 583 (citing Jackson v. Goodell [N. Y.] 20 Johns. 188, 193; Cherokee Nation v. Georgia, 30 U. S. [5 Pet.] 1, 8 L. Ed. 25; Worcester v. Georgia, 31 U. S. [6 Pet.] 515, 8 L. Ed. 483; Kansas Indians v. Johnson, 72 U. S. [5 Wall.] 737, 18 L. Ed. 667; Scott v. Sandford, 60 U. S. [19 How.] 393, 403, 15 L. Ed. 691); United States v. Osborn (U. S.) 2 Fed. 58, 59.

As inhabitant.

A citizen "is a native or naturalized person." It has a more extensive signification than the word "inhabitant," which only means one who dwells or resides permanently in a place. State v. Kilroy, 86 Ind. 118, 120.

"The word 'citizen' may properly be construed a member of a political society; and although he might be absent for years, and cease to be an inhabitant of its territory, the right of citizenship may not thereby be forfeited, but may be resumed whenever he may choose to return." "Citizen" and "inhabitant" cannot be considered synonymous. The word "inhabitant" comprehends a single fact, locality of existence; the word "citizen," a combination of civil privileges, some of which may be enjoyed in any state in the Union. In book 1, c. 19, § 213, Vattel says: "The inhabitants, as distinguished from citizens, are strangers who are permitted to settle and stay in the country. Bound by their residence to the society, they are subject to the laws of the state while they reside there, and they are bound to protect it while it grants them protection, though they do not participate in all the rights of citizens." This authority shows very plainly the distinction between the citizen and the inhabitant, and that the latter appellation is derived from abode and habitation, and not from political privileges. Spragins v. Houghton, 3 Ill. (2 Scam.) 377, 392, 402.

"Citizen" is usually defined as an inhabitant of a city, town, or place; but this definition is subject to various limitations, depending on the context in which it is found. It may indicate a permanent resident, or one who remains for a time, or from time to time. The word must always be taken in that sense which best harmonizes with the subject-matter in which it is used. Union Hotel Co. v. Hersee, 79 N. Y. 454, 461, 35 Am. Rep. 536.

The word "citizen," as used in Act March 23, 1860, § 3, providing that the territory adjoining the city of Nashville may be added thereto if 12 citizens, freeholders in the territory proposed to be added and included in the corporate limits of the city, shall sign a petition in writing, describing the particular territory proposed to be added, and shall submit the same to the mayor and aldermen for consent and approval, and, if the mayor and citizens in the territory consent, then it shall become a part of the city, is equivalent to resident or inhabitant, and hence no nonresident freeholder had a right to vote at the election; otherwise, the whole territory might have been annexed without an inhabitant having a chance to vote on the question. Morris v. City of Nashville, 74 Tenn. (6 Lea) 337, 341.

An ordinance prescribing the rate to be charged the "citizens" of the municipality for the use of water from a chartered waterworks company means "inhabitants." Smith v. Birmingham Waterworks Co., 16 South. 123, 126, 104 Ala. 315.

Webster defines "citizen," first, as one who enjoys the freedom and privileges of a city, i. e., the freemen of the state, as distinguished from a foreigner, or one not entitled to its franchise, and, second, as an inhabitant in any city, town, or place; and, as used in Rev. St. 1881, § 2097, providing that "whoever keeps a place where intoxicating liquors are sold * * * or suffered to be drunk in a disorderly manner, to the annoyance * * * of any part of the citizens of this state," etc., "citizens" is synonymous with "inhabitants" or "residents." Sunman v. Clark, 22 N. E. 113, 116, 120 Ind. 142.

As used in Acts 1795, c. 56, prohibiting the issuance of an attachment upon warrant without an affidavit that the debtor was not a citizen of the state and not residing therein, or that, being a citizen, he has absconded, etc., the word is synonymous with "inhabitant" or "permanent resident." Risewick v. Davis, 19 Md. 82, 93.

As used in the insolvent law, which provides that any citizen may have the benefit thereof, "citizen" is used synonymously with "inhabitant." Judd v. Lawrence, 55 Mass. (1 Cush.) 531, 535.

Laws 1889 provided that personal property of inhabitants of Michigan should be subject to taxation. Comp. Laws 1897, § 3831, eliminated the word "inhabitant," and declared that for the purpose of taxation all shares in foreign corporations owned by citizens of Michigan should be included. It was held that the contention that the word "citizen," as so used, applied only to those citizens of the state who resided elsewhere, and not to resident citizens, because otherwise a nonresident citizen would escape taxation, and that the change made in the statute, with the word "citizen" substituted, to prevent nonresident citizens from escaping taxation, cannot be sustained, since the word was evidently used in its common meaning, as synonymous with "inhabitant" or "resident." Bacon v. State Tax Com'rs, 85 N. W. 307, 309, 126 Mich. 22, 60 L. R. A. 321, 86 Am. St. Rep. 524.

By the act of 1841, ca. sa. is prohibited from issuing against any citizen of the state without a previous affidavit of fraud, and by the act of 1785 ca. sa. is prohibited from issuing against any inhabitant of the state. It was contended that the act of 1841 was to be construed in connection with the act of 1785, but that, taken together, the restriction intended by the Legislature to be imposed on issuing process to take the body was designed to apply to resident citizens or inhabitants, and that the word "citizen," used in the act of 1841, was to be taken in that sense. It is true these laws are on the same subject, but they are distinct enactments, applying in terms to different persons, the former to inhabitants, and the latter to citizens, and there is nothing from which it can be collected that the Legislature meant the same thing by both. On the contrary, by the use of different terms not having the same meaning, we are to suppose they mean different things. A man may be a citizen without being an inhabitant of the state, as a man may be an inhabitant without being a citizen. This is not only an obvious distinction, but one which the Constitution itself makes, as, in the qualification of voters, it requires both citizenship and residence. Quinby v. Duncan (Del.) 4 Har. 383, 384.

Within Gould's Dig. c. 68, § 29, providing that every free white citizen of the state, male or female, being a householder or the head of a family, shall be entitled to a homestead exempt from sale or execution, the term "citizen" means an inhabitant, a resident of a town, state, or county, without any implication of political or civil privileges. McKenzie v. Murphy, 24 Ark. 155, 157.

The term "citizen," as used in Hart. Dig. art. 1270, declaring that there shall be reserved of every citizen or head of a family in this Republic, free and independent of the power of a writ of fieri facias or other execution, one horse, is not to be taken in a restricted sense as designating a native-born or naturalized citizen, but in its general acceptance, as descriptive of the inhabitants of the country. Cobbs v. Coleman, 14 Tex. 594, 597.

Our Constitution and statutes with great uniformity use the word "citizen" to designate one who is a citizen of the state and of the United States, and the term "inhabitant" to designate the domiciled resident of a town; and such is the general acceptance of the terms. Bull v. Town of Warren, 36 Conn. 83, 85.

Negro.

A free man of color, born within the United States, is a "citizen" of the United States, and as such is entitled to be a citizen of any one of the several states by becoming a citizen thereof. Smith v. Moody, 26 Ind. 299, 303; United States v. Rhodes (U. S.) 27 Fed. Cas. 785, 786.

"Citizen" means a freeman. In the United States it means a person, native or naturalized, who has the privileges of exercising the elective franchise and of purchasing and holding real estate. Colored persons are not citizens. Crandall v. State, 10 Conn. 339, 340, 345.

As people of United States.

"In the federal Constitution the words 'people of the United States' and 'citizens,' are synonymous terms and mean the same thing. They both describe the political body, who, according to our republican institutions, form the sovereignty, and who hold the power and conduct the government through their representatives. They are what we familiarly call the 'sovereign people,' and every citizen is one of these people, and a constituent member of this sovereignty." Scott v. Sandford, 60 U. S. (19 How.) 393, 404, 15 L. Ed. 691; Civil Rights Cases, 3 Sup. Ct. 18, 36, 109 U. S. 3, 27 L. Ed. 835.

Porto Rican.

Within the meaning of Laws 1896, c. 909, § 34, subd. 1, requiring a person, in order to be entitled to vote at the state election, to be a male "citizen" of the United States, the term "citizen" does not include a native-born citizen of Porto Rico, who resided there until September, 1899, when he moved to the United States, and who has never been naturalized, as the treaty by which Porto Rico was acquired did not operate as a collective naturalization of the inhabitants thereof. "In Elk v. Wilkins, 112 U. S. 94, 5 Sup. Ct. 41, 28 L. Ed. 643, the Supreme Court of the United States, defining the rights of persons individually or collectively to become citizens under the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States, says: 'This section contemplates two sources of citizenship, and two sources only—birth and naturalization. The persons declared to be citizens are all persons born or naturalized in the United States and subject to the jurisdiction thereof. The evident meaning of these last words is not merely subject in some respect or degree to the jurisdiction of the United States, but completely subject to their political jurisdiction and owing them direct and immediate allegiance; and the words relate to the time of birth in one case as they do to the time of naturalization in the other. Persons not thus subject to the jurisdiction of the United States at the time of birth cannot become so afterward, except by being naturalized, either individually or by proceedings under the naturalization acts, or collectively as by the force of a treaty by which foreign territory is acquired.'" People v. Board of Inspectors, 67 N. Y. Supp. 236, 237, 32 Misc. Rep. 584.

As resident.

The word "citizen" does not always mean the same thing. Thus, we speak of a person as a citizen of a particular place, when we mean nothing more than that he is a resident of the place. When we speak of a citizen of the United States, we mean one who was born within the limits of, or who has been naturalized by the laws of, the United States. As used in the act relating to the acquisition of public lands by religious societies (Act March 14, 1831), requiring such societies to furnish a list of the names of their members, specifying that they are citizens of the township, the word "citizens" is used as synonymous with "resident." State v. Trustees of Section 29, Delhi Tp., 11 Ohio, 24, 28.

Within Act March 3, 1887, c. 373, 24 Stat. 552 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 508], providing that any other suit of a civil nature at law or in equity, of which the Circuit Courts of the United States are given jurisdiction and which are now pending, or which may hereafter be brought in any state court, may be removed into the Circuit Court for the proper district by the defendant or defendants therein, being nonresidents of the state, and when, in any suit mentioned in this section, there shall be a controversy which is wholly between citizens of different states, and which can be fully determined as between them, then one or more of the defendants actually interested may remove the suit into a Circuit Court of the United States for the proper district, the words "citizens" and "residents" are interchangeable and synonymous, and whenever a corporation is a citizen of the state it is a resident of that state, and citizenship and residence in respect to corporations are treated by the courts as one and the same. Baughman v. National Waterworks Co. (U. S.) 46 Fed. 4, 7.

In Southern Pac. Co. v. Denton, 146 U. S. 202, 13 Sup. Ct. 44, 36 L. Ed. 942, it was said that it has been long stated that an allegation that a party is a resident does not show that he is a citizen, within the meaning of the judiciary acts. Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. v. Gonzales, 14 Sup. Ct. 401, 403, 151 U. S. 496, 38 L. Ed. 248. See, also, Parker v. Overman, 59 U. S. (18 How.) 137, 141, 15 L. Ed. 318; Tug River Coal & Salt Co. v. Brigel (U. S.) 67 Fed. 625, 628, 14 C. C. A. 577; Sharon v. Hill (U. S.) 26 Fed. 337, 342; Zambrino v. Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. (U. S.) 38 Fed. 449; Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. Ry. Co. v. Monaghan, 30 N. E. 869, 871, 140 Ill. 474; Brock v. Doyle, 18 Fla. 172, 173.

"Citizenship" and "residence" are not synonymous terms, so that testimony of plaintiff that he lives in a certain state does not show his citizenship. Danahy v. National Bank of Denison (U. S.) 64 Fed. 148, 149, 12 C. C. A. 75.

A plaintiff's citizenship, for the purposes of the jurisdiction of a federal court, depends upon his domicile, which is a different thing from his residence, and may be in a different state. A person does not lose his citizenship in one state by removing to another to reside temporarily, with the intention of returning to his former residence at a definite time in the future. Collins v. City of Ashland (U. S.) 112 Fed. 175, 176, 177; Illinois Life Ins. Co. v. Shenehon (U. S.) 109 Fed. 674, 675.

One may be a citizen of one state, within the meaning of Act Cong. March 2, 1867, providing for the removal of a cause from a state court to a federal court, and yet be a resident of another state. Darst v. Bates, 51 Ill. 439, 440.

State.

A "citizen" is "a member of a nation or sovereign state, especially of a republic; one who owes allegiance to a government and is entitled to protection from it." Standard Dict. There is nothing under the act regulating the removal of suits to the federal courts to indicate that the words "state" and "citizen," when used therein, were intended to have other than their ordinary signification; and, as they are in no wise synonymous terms, the logical conclusion is that the term "citizens" has reference to the various persons who compose the members and citizenship of the several states, and not to the states themselves. O'Connor v. State (Tex.) 71 S. W. 409, 410.

A state is not a citizen within the removal act of Congress. Chicago, St. L. & N. O. R. Co. v. Commonwealth (Ky.) 72 S. W. 1119, 1121 (citing Stone v. South Carolina, 117 U. S. 430, 6 Sup. Ct. 799, 29 L. Ed. 962; Postal Telegraph Cable Co. v. Alabama, 135 U. S. 482, 15 Sup. Ct. 192, 39 L. Ed. 231); State of Arkansas v. Kansas & T. Coal Co., 22 Sup. Ct. 47, 48, 183 U. S. 185, 46 L. Ed. 144; State v. O'Connor (Tex.) 74 S. W. 899.

As subject.

The word "citizens," as used in a treaty between the United States and a foreign monarchical state, must be construed in the same sense as the term "subjects" or "inhabitants," when applied to persons owing allegiance to the United States, and extends to all persons domiciled in the foreign state. The Pizarro, 15 U. S. (2 Wheat.) 227, 245, 4 L. Ed. 226.

A "citizen" is a freeman who has kept a family in the city. Roy v. Hanger, 1 Rolle, 138, 149. The term "citizen," as understood in our law, is precisely analogous to the term "subject" in the common law, and the change of phrases has entirely resulted from the change of government. The sovereignty has been changed from one man to a collective body of people, and he who before was a subject of the king is now a citizen of the state. "Citizens," under our Constitution and laws, means free inhabitants born within the United States or naturalized under the laws of Congress. United States v. Rhodes (U. S.) 27 Fed. Cas. 785, 788 (citing 1 Kent, Comm. 292, note).

As voter.

"Citizen," as used in article 1, § 23, of the Constitution, refers only to those who participated in the formation of the government or have a right to participate in its administration; and these include only white male citizens of the United States of the age of 21 years and white males of foreign birth of like age who have declared their intention under the act of Congress to become citizens of the United States and have resided in this state six months. Thomasson v. State, 15 Ind. 449.

A citizen "is a member of a civil state, entitled to all its privileges. According to Webster a citizen is 'a person, native or naturalized, who has the privilege of voting for public officers and who is qualified to fill offices in the gift of the people.' While the rights to vote and hold office are not always necessary constituents of citizenship, still the commonly accepted meaning of the word conveys the idea of a qualified voter." Crandall v. State, 10 Conn. 339, 340, 345.

"Citizen" means an elector, as used in Sand. & H. Dig. § 6984, denoting the persons who may sign petitions for change of school district boundaries. School Dist. No. 11 v. School Dist. No. 20, 39 S. W. 850, 851, 63 Ark. 543.

A "citizen," in the popular and appropriate sense of the term, is one who, by birth, naturalization, or otherwise, is a member of an independent political society called a "state," "kingdom," or "empire," and as such is subject to its laws and entitled to its protection and all his rights incident to that relation; and the right to vote is not necessarily incident to or coextensive with the right of citizenship. Dorsey v. Brigham, 52 N. E. 303, 304, 177 Ill. 250, 42 L. R. A. 809, 69 Am. St. Rep. 228 (citing Blanck v. Pausch, 113 Ill. 60).

Alleging that one is a citizen is not equivalent to saying that he is an elector, as used in Rev. St. 1874, c. 46, § 112, providing that an elector of a town may contest an election. Blanck v. Pausch, 113 Ill. 60, 64.

"Citizens" and "legal voters" are not synonymous. Minors and females may be citizens, and yet not legal voters. Suffrage is not a right of citizenship, and citizenship is not essential to the right of suffrage. Dorsey v. Brigham, 52 N. E. 303, 304, 177 Ill. 250, 42 L. R. A. 809, 69 Am. St. Rep. 228 (citing People v. Oldtown Sup'rs, 88 Ill. 202).

A citizen is a person born in the United States; one who owes to government allegiance, service, and money by way of taxation, and to whom the state in turn grants and guarantees liberty of person and of conscience, the right of acquiring and possessing property, of marriage and social relations, of suit and defense, and security in personal estate and reputation. It is not necessary, for a person to be a citizen, that he should be in the actual enjoyment of all these rights and privileges which belong to a citizen. Thus women are citizens, although they cannot vote; and, within the statute providing that every juror shall be a male citizen of the state, resident of the county, persons are competent as jurors when they are residents of the county, though not qualified to vote therein. State v. Fairlamb, 25 S. W. 895, 899, 121 Mo. 137.

The charter of a town provided that the town authorities should have power to license the sale of spirituous and malt liquors, but should not grant any application for such license unless the same was accompanied by a petition signed by two-thirds of the citizens of such town asking for the license. It was held that the term "citizens," as used in the charter, embraced only the qualified voters of the town. Wray v. Harrison, 42 S. E. 351, 352, 116 Ga. 93.

"Citizen," as used in a statute providing that any citizen of the county may maintain an action to enjoin a nuisance, means any male person over 21 years of age who has his present home and domicile in such county, although it may be for a temporary purpose, provided he has a fixed intention of remaining there for an indefinite period of time, and has no home, domicile, or right of citizenship elsewhere, and does not necessarily mean a voter. Fuller v. McDonnell, 39 N. W. 277, 278, 75 Iowa, 220.

Woman or minor.

"The word 'citizen,' when used in its most common and most comprehensive sense, doubtless includes women; but a woman is not, by virtue of her citizenship, vested by the Constitution of the United States or by the Constitution of the commonwealth with any absolute right, independent of legislation, to take part in the government, either as a voter or as an officer, or to be admitted to practice as an attorney." The word "citizen" in St. 1876, c. 197, authorizing the admission of citizens to practice law, is but a repetition of the word originally adopted with a view of excluding aliens. In re Robinson, 131 Mass. 376, 41 Am. Rep. 239. See, also, In re Ricker, 29 Atl. 539, 66 N. H. 207, 24 L. R. A. 740.

A woman is both a "citizen" and a "person," within the meaning of a section of the Constitution providing against any law abridging the privileges of citizens of the United States, or depriving any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, since the right to contract is property; and the act declaring that no female shall be employed in any factory or workshop more than 8 hours in any one day, or 48 hours in any one week, is unconstitutional.

Ritohle v. People, 40 N. E. 454, 458, 155 Ill. 98, 29 L. R. A. 79, 46 Am. St. Rep. 315.

The word "citizens," in the organic act of Washington Territory (10 Stat. 174, § 5), providing that every white male inhabitant over the age of 21 years residing within the territory shall be a voter at the first election, but the qualifications of voters at subsequent elections shall be as prescribed by the legislative assembly, providing that the right of suffrage shall be exercised only by citizens of the United States over the age of 21 years, or by those above that age who have declared on oath their intention to become such, means only male inhabitants, so that an act conferring the right of suffrage upon women is void. Bloomer v. Todd, 19 Pac. 135, 142, 3 Wash. T. 599, 1 L. R. A. 111. For a contrary holding see Cronly v. City of Tucson (Ariz.) 56 Pac. 876, 877.

Acts Mo. 1883, p. 86, making it unlawful to grant a dramshop license, except on petition of a majority of the "assessed taxpaying citizens," meant persons entitled to the protection of the government and enjoyment of a citizen's rights, and did not exclude women or minors. State v. Howard County Court, 2 S. W. 788, 789, 90 Mo. 593.

The word "citizen," as used in a Texas statute, providing that a given number of citizens and freeholders may apply for an election to change the county seat, means those who are recognized by law as competent to exercise political rights, including particularly the sovereign right of voting, and does not include women and children. Scarborough v. Eubank (Tex.) 52 S. W. 569, 571.

"Citizen" is more commonly used to describe a person living under a republican form of government. When used in this sense it conveys the idea of membership of a nation. In that sense women, if born of citizen parents within the jurisdiction of the United States, have always been considered citizens of the United States. Minor v. Happersett, 88 U. S. (21 Wall.) 162, 166, 22 L. Ed. 627.

CITIZEN OF TEXAS.

By section 8 of the declaration of the Texas general convention, it was declared that the state would give donations of land to all who volunteered their services in the Texas struggle against Mexico for independence and receive them as citizens. 4 Sayles' St. Tex. p. 138. Held, that a citizen of Illinois, who entered the military service of Texas as a volunteer in such war after the adoption of such declaration of promised citizenship, and who died in her service, became a citizen of Texas, though his wife remained in Illinois until after his death, and that she and his children also thereby became citizens of Texas, and were thus entitled to bounty lands under such provision. Kircher v. Murray (U. S.) 54 Fed. 617, 621.

CITIZENSHIP.

Citizenship "is the state of being vested with the rights and privileges of a citizen." Abrigo v. State, 15 S. W. 408, 410, 29 Tex. App. 143.

"Citizenship," within the meaning of Act May 15, 1820, c. 113, §§ 4, 5, providing that if any citizen of the United States, being of the crew or ship's company of any foreign vessel engaged in the slave trade, or any other person whatever, shall land from any such vessel and on any foreign shore seize any negro or mulatto, with intent to make such negro or mulatto a slave, shall be adjudged a pirate, means "that unequivocal relation between every American and his country which binds him to allegiance and pledges to him that protection that goes with him wherever he goes, stamping him a traitor if he be found in the ranks of an enemy, as a criminal if violating her law, but watching over him and covering him with the shield of her power, though he traverse the sea under a strange flag, or sojourn on a foreign shore. It is not the citizenship of domicile; the citizenship of the man who comes to be a guest on our shores, and who is entitled to protection, just as the stranger becomes a member of the household when invited to stay for the night. That is not the citizenship the act refers to, for that subjects to no liability whatever beyond the territorial limits of the country in which the domicile is; nor is it what some law books have called judicial citizenship, for that has no relation to a subject like this, but applies only to the question whether the party can sue or be sued in the courts of the United States, or whether their litigation must go over to the state courts; nor is it what some might call 'diplomatic citizenship'—that grade of inchoate citizenship which might be claimed by one who has declared his intention to become a citizen hereafter, prospective in its allegiance, actual in its asserted rights. Such is not the citizenship meant by the act of Congress. It is that citizenship which makes us constituent members of this country, and that binds us everywhere to obey its laws, because it protects us everywhere. The right and the duty are inseparable. They begin and end together." United States v. Darnaud (U. S.) 25 Fed. Cas. 754, 762.

Alienage distinguished.

The right of citizenship, as distinguished from alienage, is a national right, character, or condition, and does not pertain to the individual states separately considered. The question is of national, and not individual, sovereignty, and is governed by the principles of the common law, which prevail in the United States and become, under the Constitution, to a limited extent a system of national jurisprudence. Town of New Hartford v. Town of Canaan, 5 Atl. 360, 362, 54 Conn. 39.

Domicile distinguished.

"Citizenship," "habitation," and "residence" are several words which may in a particular case mean precisely the same as "domicile," but very frequently they may have other and inconsistent meanings; and while, in one use of language, the expression a change of domicile, of citizenship, of habitation, or of residence, are necessarily identical and synonymous, in a different use of language they may import different things. In general, "citizenship," while including "domicile," means something more. It means allegiance to the government of the domicile, or a part of the community entitled to all the rights, privileges, and immunities of members thereof. Borland v. City of Boston, 132 Mass. 89, 93, 42 Am. Rep. 424.

As inhabitancy.

Citizenship, as a jurisdictional fact, is precisely similar to inhabitancy. They are established, when controverted, by similar evidence, and one is as easily proved as the other. To give the national courts jurisdiction on the ground of citizenship, the opposing parties must be either citizens of different states, or one must be a citizen and the other an alien. Unless this condition exists, the court has no jurisdiction, and the court in which the case is brought must necessarily determine for itself whether the jurisdictional fact exists or not. When this jurisdictional fact is alleged in the pleadings, established to the satisfaction of the court, and determined by it, its adjudication upon the fact is conclusive. Holmes v. Oregon & C. R. Co. (U. S.) 9 Fed. 229, 233.

"Citizenship," as used in a statute authorizing suits in the federal courts by reason of diverse citizenship, means "residence with intention of remaining permanently at that place. A man may reside in a state for an indefinite period of time without becoming a citizen, but the moment a man takes up his residence in a state different from that where he formerly was domiciled, or was a citizen, with intent and purpose of making the new place of residence his future home, that moment he loses his former domicile and becomes domiciled in the new place, or, in other words, he ceases to be a citizen of the former place of residence and becomes a citizen of the state of his adoption." Winn v. Gilmer (U. S.) 27 Fed. 817.

Residence distinguished.

As used in the act defining the jurisdiction of the federal courts, citizenship means that the parties to the suit are actual citizens of different states, and hence an allegation in a petition for removal, showing diverse residence of the parties only, was insufficient; the terms "citizenship," and "residence" in that connection not being synonymous. Pennsylvania Co. v. Bender, 13 Sup. Ct. 591, 148 U. S. 255, 37 L. Ed. 441; Wolfe v. Hartford Life & Annuity Ins. Co., 13 Sup. Ct. 602, 603, 148 U. S. 389, 37 L. Ed. 493. Contra, see Cooper v. Galbraith (U. S.) 6 Fed. Cas. 472, 475. And see Baughman v. National Waterworks Co. (U. S.) 46 Fed. 4, 5, 7.

An averment in a bill of the residence of the parties is not an equivalent of an averment of citizenship, and an averment of residence in a particular state is not an averment of citizenship. In Denny v. Pironi, 141 U. S. 121, 123, 11 Sup. Ct. 966, 967, 35 L. Ed. 657, it is said that an averment of residence is not the equivalent of an averment of citizenship, and that it is insufficient to give the Circuit Court jurisdiction has been settled in a multitude of cases. Gale v. Southern Building & Loan Ass'n (U. S.) 117 Fed. 732, 733. See, also, Dinet v. City of Delavan (U. S.) 117 Fed. 978.

"Citizenship" and "residence" are not synonymous terms, though "resident" and "inhabitant" are usually so regarded. While a person may be said to have but one domicile, he may have several residences. Thus Mr. Morse, in his treatise on Citizenship (page 99), says: "While an individual can have but one domicile, he may have many residences. The residence may be constructive; the word 'reside' being used in two senses—the one, constructive, technical, legal; the other, denoting the personal, actual habitation of individuals." Zambrino v. Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. (U. S.) 38 Fed. 449, 453.

"Citizenship" and "residence," as has often been declared by the courts, are not convertible terms. Citizenship is a status or condition, and is the result of both act and intent. An adult person cannot become a citizen of a state by simply intending to, nor does any one become such citizen by mere residence. The residence and intent must co-exist and correspond, and though, under ordinary circumstances, the former may be sufficient evidence of the latter, it is not conclusive, and the contrary may always be shown. Sharon v. Hill (U. S.) 26 Fed. 337, 342; Illinois Life Ins. Co. v. Shenehon (U. S.) 109 Fed. 674, 675; Danahy v. National Bank of Denison (U. S.) 64 Fed. 148, 149, 12 C. C. A. 75; Tug River Coal & Salt Co. v. Brigel (U. S.) 67 Fed. 625, 628, 14 C. C. A. 577; Allen B. Wrisley Co. v. George E. Rouse Soap Co. (U. S.) 90 Fed. 5, 6, 32 C. C. A. 496.

CITRON.

Citron is the fruit of the citrus or citron tree. It belongs to the family of fruits, and falls within the great group of that family designated as "dried fruits." In common speech and by the language of trade and commerce it is a dried fruit. United States v. Nordlinger (U. S.) 121 Fed. 690, 691, 58 C. C. A. 438.

CITY.

See "Incorporated City."

In England the term "city" does not depend upon the number of its inhabitants, but upon its being the seat of a bishop. For instance, Chester, with a few thousand inhabitants, has been for centuries a city, while the city of Liverpool, with many times the population, was only a town, until comparatively recently, when it became a city by being given a bishop. State v. Green, 35 S. E. 462, 463, 126 N. C. 1032.

By the term "city" in Spanish jurisprudence was understood a place surrounded by walls. Villars' Heirs v. Kennedy, 5 La. Ann. 724, 725.

"City," as used in Act 1874 relative to city courts, may be construed in a plural, as well as in a singular, sense. People v. Common Council of City of Aurora, 84 Ill. 157, 160.

A city is a body politic and corporate, with the general powers of the corporation, and the powers specified or necessarily implied in the title relating to the government of cities, or any special laws. Pol. Code Cal. 1903, § 4354.

The word "city" includes all places incorporated as such. Cobbey's Ann. St. Neb. 1903, § 10407.

The word "city" shall be construed to mean a town containing a population of 5,000 or more and having a corporation or hustings court. Code Va. 1887, § 5.

Compactness implied.

The legal, as well as the popular, idea of a town or city, in this country, both by name and use, is that of oneness, community, locality, vicinity; a collective body, not several bodies; collective body of inhabitants; that is, a body of people collected or gathered in one mass, not separated into distinct masses, and having a community of interest, because residents of the same place, not different places. So, as to territorial extent, the idea of a city is one of unity, not of plurality; of compactness or contiguity, not separation or segregation. City of Denver v. Coulehan, 39 Pac. 425, 427, 20 Colo. 471, 27 L. R. A. 751.

A city is an assembly of inhabitants living in the vicinity of each other, and not separated by any other intervening civil division of the state. Town of Enterprise v. State, 10 South. 740, 744, 29 Fla. 128.

A city designates a closely and thickly settled place, the houses and stores contiguous or near each other, with a great amount and variety of travel, as distinguished from places thinly settled and houses scattered, in which there is little variety of travel, when used in relation to the liability of cities and towns for defective highways. Fitz v. City of Boston, 58 Mass. (4 Cush.) 365, 366.

As included in county.

Under a statute prohibiting counties from subscribing for stock in any incorporated company, unless the same be paid for at the time of such subscription, it is held that cities, though an integral part of the county, are not intended to be included in the prohibition. Thompson v. City of Peru, 29 Ind. 305, 307; City of Aurora v. West, 9 Ind. 74, 77.

As governed by corporate limits.

A city is defined by Webster as a large number of houses and inhabitants established in one place, but such definition has no relation to the technical limits of a legal corporation. Appeal of State Soc. of Cincinnati, 26 Atl. 647, 649, 154 Pa. 621.

The term "city of W.," in a statute vacating the streets and alleys in a certain addition in the "city of W.," was construed to mean the city in fact, as composed of the collective body of people in that vicinity which in reality constituted the city, and not as determined by its corporate limits, and therefore the fact that the addition in question was not within the corporate limits of the city did not defeat the operation of the statute. City of Wichita v. Burleigh, 12 Pac. 332, 336, 36 Kan. 34.

Code 1880, § 1047, providing that any person who may be injured by the locomotive or cars of a railroad company, while such cars are running at a greater rate of speed than six miles an hour through any city, town or village, shall have a right of action, etc., refers to an incorporated city, town, or village, and the statute applies to all violations of its terms within the legal or corporate limits of such city, town, or village, without regard to the irregular and variable lines of settlement and improvement of such city. Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Jordan, 63 Miss. 458, 461.

As limited to existing cities.

The word "cities" in Const. 1894, art. 6, § 17, requiring judicial officers of cities not otherwise provided for to be chosen by vote of the electors of the city, refers to municipalities existing as cities at the time provision was originally made by law for the establishment of the court or the creation of the judicial office, and a statute providing for a choice of such judicial officers by the electors throughout the whole territory of such a city is not rendered unconstitutional by a subsequent incorporation of that city in a larger one, so long as the jurisdiction of the court and its judges remain confined to the territory in which the judges are voted for. People v. Dooley, 75 N. Y. Supp. 350, 357, 69 App. Div. 512.

The word "city," in Burns' Rev. St. 1901, § 5915, providing that the common council of each city and the board of trustees of each incorporated town shall, at their first regular meeting in the month of June, elect three school trustees, and annually thereafter shall elect one school trustee, does not include a city incorporated after the passage of the act, and therefore such city is not entitled to elect three school trustees, but the trustees of the incorporated town, which was incorporated into the city, continue until the expiration of the terms for which they were elected. State v. Ogan, 63 N. E. 227, 159 Ind. 119.

As incorporated towns.

A city is a town incorporated by that name. Van Riper v. Parsons, 40 N. J. Law (11 Vroom) 1, 4; Borders v. State (Tex.) 66 S. W. 1102, 1103.

"City," as used in Act 1872, providing that taxation on all real and personal property in all incorporated towns and cities in every county throughout the state shall be uniform, and providing for the repeal of all special laws requiring any city to support and provide for its paupers, should be construed to include incorporated towns. Webster says a city is "a corporated town, a town or collective body of inhabitants incorporated and governed by particular officers, as a mayor and alderman." Burke v. Monroe County, 77 Ill. 610, 612.

"Cities," as used in Act March 10, 1880, entitled "An act concerning cities," cannot be construed to include incorporated towns. Day v. City of Morristown, 41 Atl. 964, 965, 62 N. J. Law, 571.

Const. art. 15, § 1, provides for the appointment of commissioners to establish harbor lines in navigable waters lying in front of cities. Held, that the word "cities" not only meant cities strictly speaking, but included incorporated towns. State v. Board of Harbor Line Com'rs, 29 Pac. 938, 939, 4 Wash. 6.

The terms "villages," "cities," and "townships," in a statute authorizing villages, cities, and townships to issue bonds in aid of railroads does not include an incorporated town. Welch v. Post, 99 Ill. 471, 473.

Laws 1899, c. 11, § 51, providing for a license tax on sale of meats in cities and towns, applies only to incorporated towns, without reference to population. State v. Green, 35 S. E. 462, 463, 126 N. C. 1032.

In determining whether the term "town" or "city," within the meaning of Const. art. 16, § 15, providing that the homestead, not in a town or city, shall consist of not more than 200 acres of land, and that the homestead in a city, town, or village shall consist of lot or lots, embraces a certain tract of land, the fact of incorporation or not is not of controlling influence, and will not of itself determine that the land is or is not within the limits of a city or town. Posey v. Bass, 14 S. W. 156, 77 Tex. 512. The property in question may be within the corporate limits of a town or city and still be a rural homestead, within the meaning of the Constitution, or it may be actually within the limits of a town or village not incorporated and be an urban homestead in its character. Wilder v. McConnell, 45 S. W. 145, 146, 91 Tex. 600.

Municipal corporation imported.

The word "city," as used in a complaint in an action for injuries against a railroad, alleging that the defendant railroad runs through the city of West Plains, and that there was duly passed, published, and in force, at the time of the accident, an ordinance in said city regulating the speed of railroad trains and cars within its corporate limits, is equivalent to municipal corporation, so that the complaint in effect alleges that West Plains is a municipal corporation. Jackson v. Kansas City, Ft. S. & M. R. Co., 58 S. W. 32, 35, 157 Mo. 621, 80 Am. St. Rep. 650.

"City," as used in Act April 6, 1866, providing that, whenever any person or persons shall lay out any town or addition to any city or town in the state before the plat thereof shall be recorded, the lands shall be valued, etc., imports a municipal corporation. Mitchell v. Franklin County Treasurer, 25 Ohio St. 143, 154.

As political subdivision of state.

A city is only a political subdivision of the state, made for convenient administration of the government. It is an instrumentality with powers more or less enlarged, according to the requirements of the public, and which may be increased or repealed at the will of the Legislature. Jefferson City Gas-Light Co. v. Clark, 95 U. S. 644, 654, 24 L. Ed. 521; City of Guthrie v. Territory, 31 Pac. 190, 192, 1 Okl. 188, 21 L. R. A. 841; City of Guthrie v. New Vienna Bank, 38 Pac. 4, 5, 4 Okl. 194. It is only a political subdivision of the state, made for the convenient administration of the government. It is an instrumentality, with powers more or less enlarged, according to the requirements of the public, and which may be increased or repealed at the will of the Legislature. Johnson v. City of San Diego, 42 Pac. 249, 250, 109 Cal. 468, 80 L. R. A. 178.

Cities are the creatures of the legislative will, and are created by express legislative enactment, for the purpose, mainly, that the people within their territorial limits may thereby be enabled for their own interest and advantage to administer their local or internal concerns, or, in other words, that they may have the power of local self-government; and a municipal corporation possesses and can exercise the following powers, and no others. First, those granted in express words; second, those necessarily or fairly implied in or incident to the powers expressly granted; third, those essential to the declared objects and purposes of the corporation—not simply convenient, but indispensable. Logan City v. Buck, 2 Pac. 706, 707, 3 Utah, 301.

Cities are political subdivisions of the state, which is the concrete whole. Whatever is done by such subdivision under and by virtue of the permission of the state is the act of the state, and may reasonably and properly be designated as state action, at least indirectly. In this sense a city debt created by authority of the Legislature is the act of the state, being created by the exercise of the state sovereignty acting through one of its political divisions. This would not make the state as a whole, however, liable for the payment of such debt, because in the creation and under the contract with the lender the liability for such payment was expressly limited to the property within the limits of the city. State v. Levy Court (Del.) 43 Atl. 522, 524, 1 Pennewill, 597.

A city is a public corporation designed for local government. It is an agency of the state to assist in the civil government of the territory and people of the state embraced within its limits. It is a public agency, and acts for the public. Brooks v. City of Wichita (U. S.) 114 Fed. 297, 298, 52 C. C. A. 209.

A city is only a political subdivision of the state, made for the convenient administration of government. It is an instrumentality with powers more or less enlarged, according to the requirements of the public. Wooster v. Plymouth, 62 N. H. 193, 208.

Town distinguished.

See, also, "Town."

"Town" is a generic word. Of the genus "cities" and "boroughs" are species. New York & L. B. R. Co. v. Drummond, 46 N. J. Law (17 Vroom) 644, 646.

According to lexicographers there is no marked distinction between a "city" and a "town"; the former being more important than the latter. Heard v. State, 39 S. E. 118, 113 Ga. 444.

A city is a town incorporated by that name, and the word "town," as used in the state Constitution, is sufficiently elastic to take in, when put to some of its uses, the institution denoted by the term "city." Mr. Tomlin in his Law Dictionary says: "Under the name 'town' or 'village' boroughs and cities are contained, for every borough or city is a town." State ex rel. Rice v. Simmons, 35 Mo. App. 374, 380.

A town is not always a city, but a city is always a town. Webster's definition of a city is that it is a large town; an incorporated town. Harvey v. Osborn, 55 Ind. 535, 542.

A city is a municipal corporation of the larger class, with powers of government confided in officers who are usually elected by popular vote. As defined by Black, the term is used in America to denote a municipal corporation of a larger class, the distinctive feature of whose organization is its government by a chief executive and a legislative body. In the Standard Dictionary, a city is defined to be a place inhabited by a permanent, organized community, more important than a town. As a matter of law the words "town" and "city" are not synonymous. Wight & Weslosky Co. v. Wolff, 87 S. E. 395, 112 Ga. 169.

In St. 1884, c. 320, § 2, to provide for the appointment of persons to fill offices in the government of the commonwealth of the several cities, etc., the term "cities" includes towns having a population of 12,000 inhabitants or over, under the provisions of St. 1894, c. 267. Johnson v. Kimball, 48 N. E. 1020, 1021, 170 Mass. 58.

A city is a town within the meaning of that word as used in this country as embracing all kinds of municipal corporations which have the right to make police rules or regulations controlling all persons and things within certain specified limits. It is a municipal corporation possessing all the powers of other municipal corporations, with such additions and limitations as are contained in the charter which gives it existence as the city. That which is its chief distinguishing characteristic consists in the mode in which its general affairs are administered by means of certain officers, such as mayor, aldermen, and councils, to whom the citizens intrust most of the legislative and the executive powers which in towns they exercise in person in town meetings. State v. Glennon, 3 R. I. 276, 278.

"City," as used in the Illinois township organization law of 1874, when included within the limits of a town, may be considered as a component part thereof, and as provided for under the word "town." Allen v. People, 84 Ill. 502.

As township.

See "Township."

2 Wds. & P.—12

CITY COUNCIL.

A city council is a miniature General Assembly, and its authorized ordinances have the force of laws passed by the Legislature of the state. City of Richmond v. Henrico County Sup'rs, 2 S. E. 26, 30, 83 Va. 204 (citing Taylor v. City of Carondelet, 22 Mo. 105).

A city council is a part of the legislative power of the state within the limited district of an incorporated municipality, and, within the sphere of the powers so delegated to it by the state Legislature, has absolute control, in the absence of fraud or manifest abuse of such powers. In other words, a city council is the city's lawmaking power. City of Huron v. Campbell, 53 N. W. 182, 185, 3 S. D. 309.

The words "city council," as used in an act relating to reformatory institutions established by counties and cities, shall be taken and held to mean the corporate authorities of any city or town, by whatever name or style the same may be designated. Shannon's Code Tenn. 1896, § 4416.

CITY COURT.

As an inferior court, see "Inferior Courts."

The phrase "city court," as used in Const. art. 6, § 5, par. 1, which declares that, in any county within which there is or hereafter may be a city court, the judge of said court and the judge of a superior court may preside in the courts of each other in cases where the judge of either court is disqualified, refers exclusively to city courts designated in par. 5, § 2, of the same article, providing for city courts where writs of error lie to the Supreme Court. Wells v. Newton, 28 S. E. 640, 641, 101 Ga. 141.

CITY ELECTION.

The term "city election," as used in the chapter relating to elections, shall apply to any municipal election held in a city or town. Code Iowa 1897, § 1089.

In statutes relative to elections, the term "city election" shall apply to any election held in a city for the choice of a city officer by the voters, whether for a full term or for the filling of a vacancy. Rev. Laws Mass. 1902, p. 104, c. 11, § 1.

The term "city election," as used in acts relating to ballots and manner of voting in counties of 50,000 inhabitants or more, applies to any municipal election so held in a city. Shannon's Code Tenn. 1896, § 1231.

CITY ENGINEER.

A contract which required the amount of gravel deposited in filling up to a fixed grade to be measured on the ground by the city engineer did not require that it should be made by the engineer in person or in his actual presence; but it was sufficient, if made by his assistants according to his directions, if subsequently revised by him. Palmer v. Clark, 106 Mass. 373, 383.

CITY LAW.

The phrase "laws relating to the property, affairs, and government of cities, and the several departments thereof," within the meaning of Const. art. 12, § 2, which provides that such laws are divided into general and special city laws, and which requires such laws, when special, to be passed by the Legislature after a nonacceptance by the mayor, means laws connected with or in some wise affecting the city government and its affairs. A statute changing the constitutional offices of sheriff, county clerk, and register, and providing for a change from the fee system to that of salaries, is not a city law. McGrath v. Grout, 74 N. Y. Supp. 779, 781, 37 Misc. Rep. 64.

CITY LIMITS.

In Pen. Code, art. 198, prohibiting gaming for money within the limits of any city on Sunday, the term "city limits" means the corporate limits of the city, so that a person cannot be convicted for gaming at a residence outside of the corporate limits of the city, though the residence was on platted ground adjacent to the city. Borders v. State (Tex.) 66 S. W. 1102, 1103.

CITY OFFICER.

City officers are those appointed or elected for a city, and who must reside therein and perform their functions within the limits thereof, such as mayor, recorder, alderman, etc. In re Whiting (N. Y.) 1 Edm. Sel. Cas. 498, 500.

"City, town, or village officers" within the meaning of a constitutional provision designating a separate mode of election for city, town, or village officers, county officers, and all other officers, are those who are appointed or elected for a city, and must reside and perform the duties of their offices within their cities, such as mayor, recorder, alderman, and the like. In re Whiting (N. Y.) 2 Barb. 513, 516.

Where a city charter provided that the council should have power to fix the compensation of all city officers, the term "city officers" referred to the respective officers appointed by the city council, and not to the aldermen, since to give such a construction would be in contravention of the well-settled rule that no public officer shall fix his own compensation. McFarland v. Gordon, 41 Atl. 507, 508, 70 Vt. 453.

In statutes relative to elections, the term "city officer" shall apply to any person to be chosen by the voters at a city election. Rev. Laws Mass. 1902, p. 104, c. 11, § 1.

The term "city officer," as used in acts relating to ballots and manner of voting in counties of 50,000 inhabitants or more, applies to any person to be chosen by the qualified voters at such an election. Shannon's Code Tenn. 1896, § 1231.

Assessor.

An assessor, elected pursuant to Code 1873, § 390, which provides that "in any township in which is situated a city or incorporated town two township assessors shall be elected, one by the voters of said township residing without the corporate limits of such city or town at the general election, and the other by the voters thereof residing within such limits at the municipal election in said city or town, and each in the discharge of his duties as assessor shall be confined to that portion of his township for which he is elected as hereinbefore provided; and said city or town assessor shall hold his office for one year," etc., is not a city officer. Kinnie v. City of Waverly, 42 Iowa, 486, 487.

Clerk of district court.

A clerk of the district court of New York, whose appointment, at the time of the adoption of the Constitution, was vested in the mayor, aldermen, and commonalty of the city, which body had also the power of removal, and whose duties were all to be performed within the city, was a city officer, within the meaning of the constitutional provision that all city officers should be elected in a certain manner. People v. Batchelor, 22 N. Y. 128, 140.

Foreman of sidewalks.

While the foreman of sidewalks may not be city officers in one sense, they are in another, and notice of defects in sidewalks given to a foreman of sidewalks, appointed by and clothed with general power to repair throughout a large district of the city by the executive board, who are the commissioners of highways, is notice to a city officer having charge of highways, required by the charter to be given a reasonable time before the accident to charge the city with liability. A strict construction would confine the words "city officers" to officers proper, named as such in the charter; but a liberal construction, in view of the object of the statute, would extend these words to any person having charge of the highways, by virtue of superintendence delegated to him by the executive board. Sprague v. City of Rochester, 53 N. E. 697, 699, 159 N. Y. 20.

Police officer.

Under the various provisions of the acts of 1863 and 1865 an individual commissioner of the board of police, as such, possessed no official authority and had no official duties. The word "commissioner" merely served to describe a member of the board, which possessed the official power and exercised the official duties while the commissioner as such could do nothing except in the name of the board and by means of its concurrence. Consequently the mayor's bill of 1872, providing that all "city officers" whose election by qualified voters was not provided for by law, and also all members of boards organized under the charter, except those appointed by the Governor of the state, should be appointed by the mayor, applied to a commissioner of the board of police, though formerly his election by the voters was provided for by law. People v. Wright, 70 Ill. 388, 390, 395.

The charter of the city of Grand Rapids by title 2, § 1, provides that the officers of said city shall be one mayor, one treasurer, etc. In no place in the charter are police officers named or designated as such officers. Laws May 24, 1881, § 8, creating the board of police and fire commissioners of the city of Grand Rapids, vests the board with sole power to elect, appoint, and remove police constables, and gives it the management of the officers of police and policemen. How. St. § 6576, as amended by Laws 1881, p. 97, provides that the superior court shall have exclusive jurisdiction of actions of a civil nature by or against the city or any of its officers. Held, that the term "city officers," as used in the latter statute, means only such officers as are provided for by the charter for general municipal purposes, and does not include policemen or police officers. City policemen and police officers are not named in the charter, and are not subject to removal under the provisions of law for the removal of city officers. They are not elected or appointed under the provisions of the charter, but by authority vested in the board of police of the city; hence they are not, properly speaking, city officers. Burroughs v. Eastman, 53 N. W. 532, 533, 93 Mich. 433.

The president of the city council of Minneapolis is not an officer of the city within the meaning of either the city charter or the Constitution, but is merely the officer or servant of the legislative body which elected him. State v. Klitchli, 53 Minn. 147, 155 54 N. W. 1069, 1071, 19 L. R. A. 477.

As trustees.

The "officers of the city" are trustees in the management and application of the funds and property of the people of the city. Russell v. Tate, 13 S. W. 130, 132, 52 Ark. 541, 7 L. R. A. 180, 20 Am. St. Rep. 193 (citing 2 Dillon, Mun. Corp. 915).

CITY ORDINANCE.

See "Ordinance."

CITY PRINTER.

A city charter provides that after the publication of an ordinance the city printer shall file with the city clerk a copy of such publication, with his affidavit or the affidavit of his foreman of the length of time the same has been published, etc. It is made the duty of a common council to let all the printing and publication necessary to be done by the city to the lowest bidder, who shall be styled the "city printer." Hence the charter makes the person who does the work or causes it to be done the city printer, or, in other words, makes the publisher of the official paper the city printer, and, while the publisher or the irresponsible party who obtains the contract may not do any of the manual labor performed in printing a paper, he is the city printer, under the charter, who is to make the affidavit required. Schwartz v. City of Oshkosh, 13 N. W. 450, 451, 55 Wis. 490.

CITY PURPOSE.Bridge between cities.

"City purpose," as used in Const. art. 8, § 11, providing that no city shall give any money or property, or loan its credit, to or in aid of any individual association or corporation, or become directly or indirectly the owner of stock in or bonds of any association or corporation, nor incur any indebtedness, except for "city purposes," should be construed to include the construction of a bridge over a river between two cities. "It is impossible to define in a general way with entire accuracy what a city purpose is within the meaning of the Constitution. Each case must largely depend on its own facts, and the meaning of these words must be evolved by a process of exclusion and inclusion in judicial construction. It would not be a city purpose for the city of New York to build a railroad from that city to Philadelphia or to improve the navigation of the Hudson River generally between that city and Albany, though incidental benefits might flow to the city. Such works have never been regarded as within the legitimate scope of municipal government. On the contrary, it would be a city purpose to procure a supply of water outside of the city and convey it into the city, and for such a purpose a city debt could be created. Such improvements are for the common and general benefit of all the citizens, and have always been regarded as within the scope of municipal government. It cannot, therefore, be held that what is meant by a city purpose is some work or expenditure within the city limits." People v. Kelly, 76 N. Y. 475, 484.

Lighting of streets.

Const. art. 8, § 11, providing that a city should not be allowed to incur any indebtedness, except for city purposes, should be construed to include the lighting of the streets and public places of a city by means of an electric light system. Hequembourg v. City of Dunkirk, 2 N. Y. Supp. 447, 448, 49 Hun, 550.

Park.

Const. art. 8, § 11, forbidding a city to contract debts, except for city purposes, means some purpose which "must be primarily for the benefit, use, or convenience of the city, as distinguished from that of the public, outside of it." It authorizes the purchase of property for parks when the property is so situated that it may be used by the inhabitants of the city. In re City of New York, 2 N. E. 642, 651, 99 N. Y. 569.

It is impossible to formulate a proper definition of what is meant by "city purpose." Yet two characteristics it must have. The purpose must be primarily the benefit, use, and convenience of the city, as distinguished from that of the public outside of it, and the work be of such character as to show plainly the predominance of that purpose. Acquiring and maintaining parks is within the language. City of Lexington v. Kentucky Chautauqua Assembly (Ky.) 71 S. W. 943, 944 (citing People v. Kelly, 76 N. Y. 487).

School tax.

Under an act exempting certain lands from taxation from general "city or town purposes" (Acts 1877, Sp. Sess. p. 74), a school tax was held not a tax for general city or town purposes. City of South Bend v. University of Notre Dame Du Lac, 69 Ind. 344, 347.

Street railway.

A street railway is a highway, and, being necessary, and constructed by the city after failure to induce construction by private capital, is for a city purpose, within Const. art. 8, § 10, prohibiting the incurring of indebtedness by a city, except for a city purpose. Sun Printing & Publishing Ass'n v. City of New York, 46 N. E. 499, 500, 152 N. Y. 257, 37 L. R. A. 788; Sun Printing & Publishing Ass'n v. City of New York, 40 N. Y. Supp. 607, 609, 8 App. Div. 230.

Water supply.

The establishment by the city of a water department for the supply of water to the city and its inhabitants is a city purpose, within the meaning of a constitutional provision that no city shall be allowed to incur any indebtedness, except for city purposes. Comstock v. City of Syracuse, 5 N. Y. Supp. 874, 879.

CITY RAILWAY.

The term "city railway," as used in a grant of an exclusive franchise to a street railway company to operate a "city railway," must be taken to mean only what is essential to the definition of the term, and obviously no particular motive power is essential, and, no kind of motive power being mentioned, it should be taken to indicate that the Legislature meant what it said—a city railway, however propelled, whether by powers then familiar or those they know not of; in fact any kind of power which the ingenuity of man may contrive that does not constitute an additional burden upon the highway, or an injury and annoyance to the public. Wilmington City R. Co. v. Wilmington & B. S. R. Co. (Del.) 46 Atl. 12, 23.

CITY SUPPLIES.

See "Supplies."

CITY TAX.

A highway tax, which is levied by the authority of a city, the highways of which are under its control, is a city tax, within the meaning of a contract relieving a water works company from "city taxes" in consideration of free water for public purposes. Alpena City Water Co. v. City of Alpena, 90 N. W. 323, 324, 130 Mich. 518.

CIUDADES.

The Spanish name for cities. It is distinguished from towns (pueblos) and villages (villas). Hart v. Burnett, 15 Cal. 530, 537.

CIVIL.

Webster's Unabridged Dictionary defines the ordinary meaning of the word "civil" to be: "Relating to rights and remedies sought by action or suit, distinct from criminal proceedings." Bouvier's Law Dictionary defines the legal or technical meaning of the word "civil" to be: "In contradistinction to criminal, to indicate the private rights and remedies of men as members of the community, in contrast to those which are public and relate to the government; thus, we speak of 'civil process' and 'criminal process,' 'civil jurisdiction' and 'criminal jurisdiction.'" Anderson's Law Dictionary defines the word thus: "Concerning the rights of and wrongs to individuals, considered as private persons, in contradistinction to criminal, or that which concerns the whole political society, the community, state, government: as civil action, case, code, court, damage, injury, proceeding, procedure, process, remedy." Thus "civil cases" and "civil causes," as used in Acts 1877, p. 43, § 10, defining the jurisdiction of the superior court of Allen county, are used in contradistinction to "criminal cases," and include drainage proceedings had before the county commissioners. Hockemeyer v. Thompson, 49 N. E. 1059, 1060, 150 Ind. 176.

CIVIL ACTION—CASE—SUIT—ETC.

See "Proper Civil Action"; "Suit of Civil Nature."

A civil action is a proceeding in a court of justice by one party against another for the enforcement or protection of a private right, or for the redress or prevention of a private wrong. Brown v. Crego, 29 Iowa, 321, 322; Iowa v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. (U. S.) 37 Fed. 497, 498, 3 L. R. A. 554; Tate v. Powe, 64 N. C. 644, 646, holding, also, that any proceeding that under the old mode was commenced by a capias ad respondendum (including ejectment), or by a bill in equity for relief, is a civil action, and that to enforce a right or redress a wrong is the purpose of the suit in equity as well as at law; and there is as much reason for including the one as the other under the term "civil action."

"A civil action is a personal action which is instituted to compel payment or the doing of something which is purely civil." "At common law: an action which has for its object the recovery of a private or civil right, or compensation for their infraction." Iowa v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. (U. S.) 37 Fed. 497, 498, 3 L. R. A. 554 (quoting Bouv. Law Dict. 317). Civil actions are those actions which have for their object the recovery of private or civil rights, or of compensation for their infraction. State v. Schomber, 63 Pac. 221, 222, 23 Wash. 573 (citing Bouv. Law Dict.). A civil action at common law is defined to be an action which has for its object the recovery of private or civil rights, or a compensation for their infraction. In re Farnum, 51 N. H. 376, 383; State v. Frost, 89 N. W. 915, 918, 113 Wis. 623.

A civil action is one brought to recover some civil right, or to obtain redress for some wrong, not being a crime or misdemeanor. Landers v. Staten Island R. Co. (N. Y.) 14 Abb. Prac. (N. S.) 346, 353 (citing Burrell, Law Dict.); Iowa v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. (U. S.) 37 Fed. 497, 498, 3 L. R. A. 554.

Civil suits are suits which relate to the rights of the parties against whom they are brought; individual rights which are within their individual control, and which they may part with at their pleasure; and the design of which suits is the enforcement of merely private obligations and duties. Can- cemi v. People, 18 N. Y. 128, 136; Duplex Printing Press Co. v. Journal Printing Co., 43 Atl. 840, 1 Pennewill, 565.

A "civil action" has been variously defined to be the rightful method of obtaining in court what is due to any one; the lawful demand of one's right in a court of justice; the lawful demand of one's right in the form given by law; the form of a suit given by law for the recovery of that which is one's due; the lawful demand of one's rights; a remedial instrument of justice whereby redress is obtained for any wrong committed or right withheld; any judicial proceeding which, conducted to a termination, will result in a judgment. Jefferson County v. Philpot, 60 S. W. 453, 66 Ark. 243.

A civil action is an action wherein an issue is presented for trial, formed by the averments of the complaint and the denials of the answer, or the replication to new matter, and the trial takes place by the introduction of legal evidence to support the allegations of the pleadings; and a judgment in such an action is conclusive upon the rights of the parties, and could be pleaded in bar. Berry v. Berry, 46 N. E. 470, 471, 147 Ind. 176; Evans v. Evans, 5 N. E. 24, 105 Ind. 204; Deer Lodge County v. Kohrs, 2 Mont. 66, 71.

And. Law Dict. p. 185, gives the definition of the word "civil" as "concerning the rights of and wrongs to individuals, construed as private persons, in contradistinction to criminal, or that which concerns the whole political society." State v. Frost, 89 N. W. 915, 918, 113 Wis. 623.

The term "civil action" embraces every form and character of action at law, or suit in equity, that was known to legal jurisprudence prior to the enactment of the Civil Code. It embraces actions ex contractu, ex delicto, suits in equity, mixed actions, and all their various modifications; so that under Civ. Code, § 190, providing that the plaintiff in a civil action for the recovery of money may have an attachment against the property of the defendant upon certain grounds, it is immaterial whether it be an action on contract, an action to recover damages for a tort, or an action for equitable relief. Hendrickson v. Brown, 65 Pac. 935, 11 Okl. 41.

The term "civil action," as used in Rev. St. c. 99, §§ 1, 19, and St. 1791, c. 17, § 1, providing that the Supreme Court has authority to grant a review in any civil action, means a suit brought by one person against another to obtain redress for himself for an injury done him, and includes a liability for injuries. Lucas v. Lucas, 69 Mass. (3 Gray) 136.

"Civil actions," as used in Act July 2, 1864, which provides that there shall be no exclusion of any witness in civil actions in the courts of the United States because the witness is a party or interested in the issue tried, will be construed to include actions in which the government is a party, as well as those between private persons. Green v. United States, 76 U. S. (9 Wall.) 655, 658, 19 L. Ed. 806.

Under Civ. Code Prac. § 2, a "civil action" is a demand, by pleadings in a court of justice, for the enforcement of an alleged right of a plaintiff against a defendant. Combs v. Commonwealth (Ky.) 71 S. W. 504, 505.

Code Civ. Proc. (Revision, 1883) § 118, provides that in all cases where more than one attachment shall be issued against the same person or persons, and returned to the same court to which they are returnable, and when a judgment in a civil action shall also be rendered at the same term against the defendant, who is the same person and defendant in the attachment or attachments, the court shall direct the clerk to make an estimate of the several amounts each attaching or judgment creditor will be entitled to, out of the property of the defendant attached, either in the hands of the garnishee or otherwise, etc., so that each attaching and judgment creditor will receive a just part thereof in proportion to his demand. Held, that the term "civil action" includes both classes of creditors—first, those who are plaintiffs in actions wherein writs of attachment have been issued; second, those obtaining judgments in civil actions at the same term of court to which the writs of attachment are returnable. Brady v. Farwell, 5 Pac. 808, 8 Colo. 97.

By Code, § 3, a "civil action" is a substitute for all proceedings, such as prior thereto were known as "actions at law" or "suits in equity." Chinn v. Fayette Trustees, 32 Ohio St. 236, 237.

A criminal action is one prosecuted by the state as a party, against a person charged with a public offense, for the punishment thereof. Every other is a civil action. Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, §§ 5159, 5160; Code Civ. Proc. S. D. 1903, §§ 15, 16; Code Civ. Proc. S. C. 1902, §§ 5, 6; Rev. St. Okl. 1903, §§ 4205, 4206; Rev. St. Wis. 1898, §§ 2598, 2599.

In a general sense, "civil actions" include actions at law, suits in chancery, proceedings in admiralty, and other judicial controversies in which the rights of property are involved. Lamson v. Hutchings (U. S.) 118 Fed. 321, 323, 55 C. C. A. 245.

A civil action is an ordinary proceeding in a court of justice by one party against another for the enforcement or protection of a private right, or the redress or prevention of a private wrong. It may also be brought for the recovery of a penalty or forfeiture. Ann. St. Ind. T. 1899, § 3117.

A criminal action is (1) an action prosecuted by the state as a party, against a person charged with a public offense, for the punishment thereof; (2) an action prosecuted by the state, at the expense of an individual, to prevent an apprehended crime against his person or property. Every other is a civil action. Clark's Code N. C. 1900, §§ 129, 130.

A civil action is one founded on private rights, arising either from contract or tort. Civ. Code Ga. 1895, § 4932. See, also, Western Union Tel. Co. v. Taylor, 84 Ga. 408, 418, 11 S. E. 396, 8 L. R. A. 189.

Account render.

Act March 20, 1810, authorizing arbitration in all "civil suits," will not be construed to include an action of account render. Jones v. Stratton (Pa.) 4 Serg. & R. 76, 77.

Acknowledgments.

"A civil case is a suit at law to redress the violation of some contract, or repair some injury to property, or to the person or personal rights of individuals." Hence, under a statute giving a mayor all the powers of justices of the peace in civil cases, he is not given power to take acknowledgments of deeds. Shultz's Lessee v. Moore (Ohio) Wright, 280, 281.

Actions for fines, forfeitures, or penalties.

"Under the Code all ordinary civil proceedings are covered by the term 'civil action.'" Prosecutions for violation of municipal ordinances are therefore civil actions. City of Greeley v. Hamman, 20 Pac. 1, 3, 12 Colo. 94. See, also, Miller v. O'Reilly, 84 Ind. 168, 169.

A proceeding for a violation of a city ordinance is a civil, and not a criminal, action. Cassville v. Jimerson, 75 Mo. App. 426.

Proceedings for the violation of town or city ordinances are "civil actions" in Colorado. And where a jury is called in a prosecution for the violation of such an ordinance, and they find defendant guilty, they must also fix his fine, where it is not fixed by the ordinance; the action being in the form of debt, and the jury taking the place of the magistrate. Walton v. Canon City, 13 Colo. App. 77, 56 Pac. 671.

An action brought by a municipal corporation to enforce a penalty for a violation of an ordinance is a civil action. City of Hammond v. New York, C. & St. L. Ry., 31 N. E. 817, 820, 5 Ind. App. 526; City of Greenburg v. Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. Ry. Co., 55 N. E. 46, 23 Ind. App. 141; City of Gallatin v. Tarwater, 44 S. W. 750, 751, 143 Mo. 40; Hoyer v. Town of Mascoutah, 59 Ill. 137, 138; City of St. Louis v. Knox, 74 Mo. 79, 81.

An action to recover a penalty for hawking and peddling without a license is a civil action, entitling either party to an appeal. Webster v. People, 14 Ill. 365, 366.

An action instituted for the recovery of a penalty provided for by a municipal ordinance, prohibiting use of profane and obscene language, is a civil action, though the person charged with such breach may be brought into court under a warrant; and therefore either party has the right of appeal. Knowles v. Wayne City, 31 Ill. App. 471.

Where the violation of a city ordinance is punishable by fine only, the proceeding before a justice of the peace for violation of the ordinance is regarded as a civil suit. Unger v. Fanwood Tp. (N. J.) 55 Atl. 42, 43.

The phrase "civil action" includes actions to recover a penalty or forfeiture for the violation of some law. Ives v. Jefferson County Sup'rs, 18 Wis. 166, 168.

An action for the fine, under the Massachusetts statute providing that, in cases of death resulting from negligence of a railroad or street railway corporation or its servants, the corporation shall be punished by a fine of not less than $500 nor more than $5,000, is not a suit of a civil nature, within the meaning of the acts of Congress, but is rather an action to recover a penalty. Lyman v. Boston & A. R. Co. (U. S.) 70 Fed. 409, 413.

An action for a penalty under Act Iowa April 5, 1888, § 27, providing that any railroad guilty of extortion shall forfeit and pay to the state a certain sum, to be recovered in a civil action by ordinary proceedings instituted in the name of the state, is one of a criminal nature, and not removable under Act Cong. March 3, 1887, c. 373 (24 Stat. 553), providing that any suit of a civil nature may be removed. Iowa v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. (U. S.) 37 Fed. 497, 498, 3 L. R. A. 554.

An action of qui tam for the rescue by defendant of certain sheep, contrary to the statute against pound breach, which gives the penalty one half to the prosecutor and the other half to the town in which the offense is committed, is a civil action within the statute relating to the jurisdiction of a justice of the peace, and hence, since one-half of the debt recovered was payable to the town of which the justice was a rated inhabitant, he was interested, and was therefore without jurisdiction. Waters v. Day, 10 Vt. 487, 480.

"Civil actions," as the term is popularly used in law, is not limited to actions for damages merely, but extends to and includes actions to recover penalties in which the state is a party, and hence an action by the state to recover a penalty for the obstruction of a highway is a civil action, in which the state is entitled to appeal from a judgment against it. State v. Smith, 8 N. W. 870, 872, 62 Wis. 134.

A "civil case," as used in Code, p. 778 (Ed. 1891) c. 116, § 21, allowing a special jury in civil cases, does not include a prosecution under Code, c. 5, § 10, providing that if any person, whether a candidate or not, offer, give, or distribute any intoxicating drink to any voter on the day of election, he shall forfeit not less than ten nor more than fifty dollars, such prosecution being rather one of a quasi criminal nature to recover a penalty or forfeiture. State v. Pearis, 13 S. E. 1006, 1007, 35 W. Va. 320.

A statute only giving a court admiralty jurisdiction in civil cases will be construed to include a proceeding against the vessel to establish penalties and forfeitures. Ketland v. Cassius, 2 U. S. (2 Dall.) 365, 368, 1 L. Ed. 418.

In Martin v. McNight, 1 Tenn. (1 Overt.) 330, it was held that an action for a penalty is a civil proceeding. So it is held that a fine, forfeiture, or penalty imposed by ordinances of a municipal corporation may be recovered by warrant in debt. Meaher v. City of Chattanooga, 38 Tenn. (1 Head) 76. "Debt," says the court, "is a proper action for penalties prescribed for certain offenses by acts or ordinances." Undeniably, then, a suit to enforce a penalty is a civil cause of action. McCreary v. First Nat. Bank, 70 S. W. 821, 823, 109 Tenn. 128.

Actions for flowing lands.

The term "civil action," as used in St. 1836, c. 273, abolishing special pleadings in civil actions, construed as being used in contradistinction to criminal proceedings, and not to be limited to the technical common-law meaning of the term, and includes an action for flowing lands. Howard v. Proprietors of Locks & Canals, 66 Mass. (12 Cush.) 259, 263.

A complaint for flowing land is a civil action or proceeding, and the complainant is a competent witness, within the express language of St. 1859, c. 305. Hosmer v. Warner, 81 Mass. (15 Gray) 46, 48.

Proceedings brought against the United States under authority of Act Cong. March 3, 1875, c. 134 (18 Stat. 456), to recover damages caused to lands by the improvement of the Fox and Wisconsin rivers, though of a special statutory character under the Wisconsin Laws, are yet, after transference to the federal court, to be regarded as civil actions, which is a part of the district attorney's regular duty to prosecute. Colman v. United States (U. S.) 66 Fed. 695, 699, 14 C. C. A. 65.

Actions on forfeited undertaking.

An action on a forfeited undertaking, given to secure appearance in a criminal case, is itself a civil action on a contract with liquidated damages. United States v. Ensign, 2 Mont. 396, 397.

Actions to enforce trust.

An action to enforce a trust is a civil action, equitable in its nature. Brinkerhoff v. Smith, 49 N. E. 1025, 1026, 57 Ohio St. 610.

Adjudications of insanity.

A proceeding to adjudge a person insane and commit him to an insane asylum is a special proceeding, and not a civil action, within the meaning of Code Iowa, § 2505, defining a "civil action" as a proceeding in which one party, known as plaintiff, demands against another party, known as defendant, the protection of a private right or the redress of a private wrong. In re Bresee, 48 N. W. 991, 992, 82 Iowa, 573.

Admiralty proceedings.

Act Cong. March 3, 1887, c. 373, § 1, 24 Stat. 552 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 508], providing that "no person shall be arrested in one district for trial in another in any civil action," etc., does not apply to causes of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, and hence a libel in admiralty in personam may be maintained against a corporation of another state in any district in which service may be had on it. In re Louisville Underwriters, 10 Sup. Ct. 587, 134 U. S. 488, 33 L. Ed. 991.

"Civil suit," as used in Judiciary Act, § 11 (1 Stat. 78), declaring that no civil suit shall be brought before certain federal courts against an inhabitant of the United States, by any original process, in any other district than that whereof he is an inhabitant, or in which he shall be found at the time of serving the writ, the term "civil suit" means ordinary proceedings in courts of law and equity, and was not intended to include cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction. Atkins v. Fibre Disintegrating Co. (U. S.) 2 Fed. Cas. 78.

Bastardy proceedings.

A prosecution for bastardy to compel the father to support the bastard is a civil, and not a criminal, suit, though begun in the name of the people. Maloney v. People, 38 Ill. 62, 63; Steinert v. Sobey, 44 N. Y. Supp. 146, 148, 14 App. Div. 505; In re Comstock, 61 Pac. 921, 922, 10 Okl. 299; Bond v. State, 15 South. 591, 592, 34 Fla. 45; In re Walker, 86 N. W. 510, 511, 61 Neb. 803; Coney v. Holland, 56 N. E. 701, 702, 175 Mass. 469.

A prosecution under the statute for the support of bastard children is not a civil proceeding, but a criminal proceeding, and cannot be tried at a term of the court which is restricted to the transaction of civil business only. Hyde v. Chapin, 56 Mass. (2 Cush.) 77, 79.

A prosecution for bastardy, the object of which is to procure an order upon the putative father compelling him to aid the mother in support of the child, is not a "civil cause" within the meaning of the statute authorizing a review in civil causes tried before the county court. Sweet v. Sherman, 21 Vt. 23.

A proceeding under the bastardy act is a civil, and not a criminal, proceeding. Though in form criminal, it is essentially of the nature of a civil action, the object being, not the imposition of a penalty, but merely to compel the putative father to contribute to the support of his illegitimate child. Therefore such a proceeding is not embraced within Laws 1879, § 88, providing that, in all criminal cases below the grade of felony, the appeal from the county court shall be taken directly to the Appellate Court. Rawlings v. People, 102 Ill. 475, 476, 478.

Civil cause and action distinguished.

As used in the statute providing that in civil causes at law the party prevailing shall recover costs, except where otherwise provided, "civil causes" is a term of wider meaning than "civil actions," and would apply to proceedings under special statutes. Aldrich v. City of Providence, 10 Atl. 592, 15 B. I. 613.

Claims against estates.

The term "civil action," as used in the Indiana statute declaring that the court in term, or the judge thereof in vacation, may change the venue of any civil action upon the application of either party, made upon affidavit, showing one or more of specified causes, includes a claim filed against an estate and placed on an appearance docket for trial. Lester v. Lester, 70 Ind. 201, 202.

Condemnation proceedings.

A proceeding for assessing the amount of just compensation for private property taken for public uses is not a civil suit. It is a special proceeding, provided and authorized by the sovereign power, by whose authority the property is taken, to determine a specific fact. Kennebec Water Dist. v. City of Waterville, 52 Atl. 774, 780, 96 Me. 234.

Civil cases are suits between two or more parties in the ordinary course of law, and do not extend to special proceedings provided by statute, as, for instance, to a proceeding to condemn property for a railroad right of way. Convers v. Grand Rapids & I. R. Co., 18 Mich. 459, 468.

Not every case which is not a criminal case is a civil one, chancery causes, and proceedings for the assessment of damages to real estate taken for public works, not being considered civil cases. Lake Erie, W. & St. L. R. Co. v. Heath, 9 Ind. 558, 559.

Contempt proceedings.

Code, § 416, providing that civil actions shall be commenced by the service of a summons, does not include an application by the receiver of taxes in New York City for the enforcement of a tax on personal property, such application being commenced by an order to show cause why a defendant should not be committed for contempt. McLean v. Jephson, 13 N. Y. Supp. 834, 835.

The term "civil suit," as used in Rev. St. § 643 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 521], which provides for the removal into the Circuit Court of the United States for the proper district of any civil suit commenced in any court of a state against any officer appointed under or acting by authority of any revenue law of the United States, etc., includes a rule upon a United States internal revenue collector, granted by a state court upon the petition of a sheriff, to show cause why an attachment should not issue against him for contempt of the process of the latter court in refusing to permit the sheriff to enter a bonded warehouse of the United States and seize, in execution, whisky which is there held for the internal revenue tax. McCullough v. Large (U. S.) 20 Fed. 309, 310.

Criminal proceedings distinguished.

The term "civil actions" includes actions at law or suits in equity, and all other judicial controversies in which rights of property are involved, and is used in contradistinction to "criminal actions." A "civil action" is instituted for the purpose of enforcing a private or civil right, or to redress a private wrong, as distinguished from actions to punish crimes which are known as "criminal actions." Fenstermacher v. State, 25 Pac. 142, 143, 19 Or. 504.

A civil action is an action "brought to recover some civil right or to obtain redress for some wrong, not being a crime or misdemeanor, and is thus distinguished from a criminal action or prosecution." Landers v. Staten Island R. Co., 53 N. Y. 450, 456.

"Civil cause," as used in Bill of Rights, declaring that no retrospective law shall be made for the decision of civil causes, means causes in which private rights are involved, as distinguished from "criminal causes," in which the public alone is concerned. Dow v. Norris, 4 N. H. 16, 18, 17 Am. Dec. 400.

"The purpose of a civil action is not to punish crime, but to enable persons who have been injured or damaged to obtain redress from those who are responsible by reason of their own conduct or that of their servants, agents, or employes." City of Hammond v. New York, C. & St. L. R. Co., 81 N. E. 817, 820, 5 Ind. App. 526.

A civil action does not become a criminal proceeding because it becomes necessary for a party to prove that his opponent has committed a crime. No one is being prosecuted or proceeded against criminally. In re Leslie (U. S.) 119 Fed. 406, 410.

Disbarment proceedings.

A civil action at common law is an action which has for its object the recovery of private or civil rights, or compensation for their infraction. Under such definition a proceeding for the disbarment of an attorney is not a civil action, within the meaning of the Constitution of Texas, giving the court of appeals jurisdiction in civil cases. Scott v. State, 25 S. W. 337, 6 Tex. Civ. App. 343.

Divorce proceedings.

While an action for divorce is, in a certain sense, a judicial proceeding, jurisdiction of it was not originally vested in the courts of the common law, and the trial and proceedings were not according to the course of the common law. And though, in a certain sense, the object of the libellant is to obtain redress for a grievance or private injury, yet it is not by way of recovery of damages or obtaining property, but rather for ascertaining and declaring the status or social and civil condition of a party, and will not be included in the term "civil action." Lucas v. Lucas, 69 Mass. (3 Gray) 136.

Any judicial proceeding which, conducted to a termination, will result in a judgment, is an action, and hence a divorce case, being one in which issues are formed, evidence heard, and judgment rendered, settling the parties' rights of property, which judgment is conclusive and may be pleaded in bar, is a "civil action" within the meaning of the statute of Indiana authorizing change of venue in civil actions; for the question of divorce, the custody of children, the amount of alimony, and final settlement of property rights make the proceeding an action for the enforcement or protection of private rights and redress of private wrongs, at least for the purpose of a change of venue. Evans v. Evans, 5 N. E. 24, 105 Ind. 204.

"Civil cases," as used in Act 1848, p. 32, conferring upon the circuit courts of the state jurisdiction in all civil cases both of law and equity, includes cases for divorce, which are to be regarded as civil proceedings in jurisdictions where no ecclesiastical tribunals have ever been established. Ellis v. Hatfield, 20 Ind. 101, 102.

"Civil cases," as used in Code, § 99, providing that judgments in civil cases taken by default, through mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect may be set aside, does not include a divorce proceeding. Ewing v. Ewing, 24 Ind. 468, 475.

A suit for a divorce is a civil proceeding, and, if the respondent appears and defends, either party may testify fully against the other. Act May 23, 1887, § 5, cl. 3. Costello v. Costello, 43 Atl. 240, 244, 191 Pa. 379.

"Civil action," as used in Rev. St. 1881, § 249, providing that there shall be one form of action for the enforcement or protection of private rights and the redress of private wrongs, which shall be denominated as "civil actions," does not include divorce cases. Powell v. Powell, 3 N. E. 639, 641, 104 Ind. 18.

A suit for divorce is a civil suit. A judgment in such a suit is not followed by any penal consequences. Sullivan v. Sullivan, 42 Atl. 230, 92 Me. 84.

Drainage proceedings.

The phrases "civil cases" and "civil causes," as used in Acts 1877, p. 43, § 10, defining the jurisdiction of the superior courts, are used in contradistinction to "criminal cases," for the purpose of including all cases other than criminal cases, and include drainage proceedings had before the board of commissioners. Hockemeyer v. Thompson, 48 N. E. 1029, 1030, 1059, 150 Ind. 176.

Decisions by a state supreme court that a special statutory proceeding under the state laws, such as a proceeding to establish a drain and assess benefits, etc., is not a "civil suit," are not controlling on the federal courts, when the question is whether the proceeding is a civil suit, in law or equity, within the meaning of the acts relating to the removal of causes. In re The Jarnecke Ditch (U. S.) 69 Fed. 161, 163.

Election contests.

Within a statute providing a rule for the taxing of costs in a "civil action," a contest of an election for the removal of a county seat is not a civil action. Bayard v. Klinge, 16 Minn. 249, 260 (Gil. 221, 233).

An election contest is not a "civil cause," within Shannon's Code, § 1309, providing that the chancery court shall have concurrent jurisdiction of all "civil causes" triable in the circuit court. Shields v. Davis, 53 S. W. 948, 949, 103 Tenn. 538.

The contesting of an election of a county officer under Gen. St. c. 1, providing for the contesting of elections and the introduction of testimony, etc., and giving the court power to secure attendance of witnesses, is a special proceeding, and not a civil action. Ford v. Wright, 13 Minn. 518, 520 (Gil. 480, 487).

Forcible entry and detainer proceedings.

The term "civil case," as used in Const. art. 11, § 1, which provides that the jurisdiction of the justices of the peace shall extend to all civil cases, includes special proceedings, and hence includes an action of forcible entry and detainer. Herkimer v. Keeler, 81 N. W. 178, 180, 109 Iowa, 680.

The term "civil action" does not include summary or special proceedings, such as certiorari, mandamus, etc. A summary proceeding to remove a tenant holding over after his term is not a civil action. People v. Hamilton, 39 N. Y. 107, 109.

Forcible entry and detainer proceedings are not "civil cases," within the meaning of that term as used in a constitutional provision relative to appeals in civil cases. Adkins v. Andrews (Neb.) 96 N. W. 228.

Foreclosure proceedings.

A proceeding to enforce a mechanic's lien is a "civil action," under Pub. St. c. 191, § 12, providing that the petition therein may "be inserted in a writ of original summons and be served, returned and entered, as in other civil cases." Graham v. Lord, 48 N. E. 778, 779, 170 Mass. 1.

The term "civil actions," in St. 1893, c. 396, § 13, providing that civil actions brought in certain courts shall be brought in the court in the district where some one of the parties live or has his usual place of business, has reference to transitory and personal actions, and not to local or statutory actions, as a proceeding to establish a mechanic's lien. Boyle v. Gould, 41 N. E. 114, 115, 164 Mass. 144.

An action to foreclose a mortgage securing notes is a "civil action," within the definition of the Statutes of Oklahoma. Stahl v. Wade, 69 Pac. 301, 11 Okl. 483.

Garnishment proceedings.

Within the provision that the total amount of the justice's fees taxed in any civil action shall not exceed a certain sum, the term "civil action" means a suit. Thus in United States v. Ten Thousand Cigars (U. S.) 28 Fed. Cas. 39, Mr. Justice Miller said the "phrase 'civil action' includes all actions at law, suits in chancery, proceedings in admiralty, and all other judicial controversies in which the rights of property are involved." It is also held that, in a legal sense, "action," "suit," and "cause" are convertible terms. A garnishment proceeding in aid of an attachment is a suit, and hence a civil action within such provision. Nylan v. Renhard, 49 Pac. 266, 267, 10 Colo. App. 46.

Habeas corpus proceedings.

The writ of habeas corpus is the remedy which the law gives for the enforcement of the civil right of personal liberty. Resort to it sometimes becomes necessary because of what is done to enforce laws for the punishment of crimes; but the judicial proceeding under it is not to inquire into the criminal act which is complained of, but into the right of liberty notwithstanding the act.

Proceedings to enforce civil rights are civil proceedings, and hence habeas corpus proceedings are civil proceedings. Ex parte Tom Tong, 2 Sup. Ct. 871, 872, 108 U. S. 556, 27 L. Ed. 828; Legate v. Legate, 28 S. W. 281, 282, 87 Tex. 248; In re Borrego, 46 Pac. 211, 8 N. M. 655. Contra, see McFarland v. Johnson, 27 Tex. 105, 109.

"Civil action," as used in 2 Gavin & H. St. 154, § 207, providing for a change of venue in any civil action, means a proceeding for the enforcement or protection of a private right or the prevention or redress of a private wrong, and hence does not include a proceeding by habeas corpus. Garner v. Gordon, 41 Ind. 92, 101.

Civil cases are essentially those in which a defendant or party against whom relief is sought is a natural person or corporation other than the state, and do not include cases in which a party is detained on the charge of a crime or disobedience of police regulations, and the like, and seeks release by habeas corpus. State v. Judge of Commercial Court, 15 La. 192, 194.

Injunction proceedings.

The term "civil action," as used in Code, § 3416, providing that all controversies which may be the subject of civil actions may be submitted to the decision of one or more arbitrators, includes all proceedings, either at law or in chancery, except those which are of a criminal nature; hence it includes an injunction suit, to restrain the maintenance of a nuisance, which is not coupled with a claim for damages. Richards v. Holt, 16 N. W. 595, 596, 61 Iowa, 529.

Anciently in England many proceedings by information were classed not as civil, but rather as criminal, although their purpose was not strictly punishment, but the recovery of moneys or property of which the sovereign claimed to be wrongfully deprived. While a proceeding by the state, even in its sovereign capacity, to accomplish a purpose other than its penal laws, is not a "civil action" within the above definitions, it is of a civil nature, and those words are used in Acts Cong. 1888, c. 866, §§ 1, 2, conferring on the United States Circuit Courts jurisdiction of suits of a civil nature, and authorizing the removal of such suits into such courts when not originally brought there; and hence an information in equity, in behalf of the state, to enjoin the receiver of a railroad, must be regarded as falling within such provisions. State v. Frost, 89 N. W. 915, 918, 113 Wis. 623.

A petition for an injunction under Laws 1887, c. 77, declaring any building used for the illegal sale of liquors to be a common nuisance, and providing for its abatement in equity, is a civil proceeding, and therefore depositions may be taken and used therein. Rancour's Petition, 66 N. H. 172, 20 Atl. 930.

Mandamus proceedings.

"Mandamus is a civil remedy, and the name of the state in such a proceeding is only nominally used." Brower v. O'Brien, 2 Ind. (2 Cart.) 423, 431. See, also, In re Brown, 39 Pac. 469, 471, 2 Okl. 590; Territory v. Chicago, R. I. & P. Ry. Co., 39 Pac. 389, 2 Okl. 108; Leigh v. State, 69 Ala. 261, 266; State v. Jefferson County, 11 Kan. 66, 71; State v. Marston, 6 Kan. 524, 532.

In Ohio it is held that mandamus is not a civil action and is not appealable. State v. Smiley, 14 Ohio Cir. Ct. R. 660, 8 O. C. D. 117.

Under Rev. St. § 2600, providing that the distinctions between actions at law and suits in equity, and the forms of all such actions and suits, have been abolished, and that there shall be but one form of action, which shall be denominated a "civil action," a proceeding by mandamus is a civil action. Though at common law the words "civil actions" did not include writs of mandamus, in substance mandamus is a civil remedy for the citizen who has been deprived of a clear legal right, notwithstanding it has been commenced and prosecuted in the name of the state; and hence, as to the sufficiency of the general pleadings, proceedings by mandamus must be governed and controlled by the same rules which prevail in other civil actions. State v. Jennings, 14 N. W. 28, 29, 30, 56 Wis. 113. So, also, under a like statute. Brown v. Crego, 29 Iowa, 321, 322.

Act Feb. 24, 1806, § 19, providing that the Supreme Court shall have no original jurisdiction in "civil actions," does not include mandamus, certiorari, or habeas corpus. Commonwealth v. Lancaster County Com'rs (Pa.) 6 Bin. 5, 8.

Motions.

A proceeding by motion against the stockholders of a corporation, after the recovery of a judgment against the corporation, is a "civil action," although termed a "motion," within the meaning of the term as used in the Kansas statute of limitations. Crissey v. Morrill (U. S.) 125 Fed. 878, 885, 60 C. C. A. 460.

A motion under Rev. St. § 4030, to enforce in the circuit court a justice's judgment against a railroad company, is a civil action, and the same pleadings may be filed and issue formed therein as in other actions. Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Summers, 14 N. E. 733, 735, 113 Ind. 10, 3 Am. St. Rep. 616.

Partition proceedings.

Under Code Proc. § 2, defining a "civil action" as a regular judicial proceeding in which a party prosecutes another for the enforcement or prosecution of a right or the redress or prevention of a wrong, the old suit in equity for the partition of lands is now merged in the civil action, and may be prosecuted by summons and complaint, since it is a regular proceeding prosecuted according to the same forms of proceeding and rules of practice as other actions under the Code. Myers v. Rasback (N. Y.) 4 How. Prac. 83, 85; Backus v. Stillwell (N. Y.) 8 How. Prac. 318.

"Civil cases at law," as used in Act March 23, 1852, providing that an appeal may be had from all final judgments in civil cases at law, decrees in chancery, and interlocutory decrees rendered by the court of common pleas in which that court had original jurisdiction, means all civil cases at law, whether the action be given by statute or existed at common law, and includes a petition for partition, as well as the various other suits or actions authorized by statute. It would not embrace mere motions or summary proceedings, based upon other matters before the court, which do not belong to the class of remedies by original suit or action destined to be comprehended by the expression "civil cases at law." The expression "civil cases at law" distinguishes a class of remedies from suits in equity and the criminal modes of procedure. Mack v. Bonner, 3 Ohio St. 366, 367.

Since by Code, § 3, the term "civil action" embraces only such cases as were, before the enactment of the Code, known "as actions at law" and "suits in equity," a petition for partition under the statute is not a civil action. Barger v. Cochran, 15 Ohio St. 460, 461.

Petition for writ of review.

Rev. St. c. 100, § 22, provides "that the court in which a 'civil action' is pending may allow amendments of any process, pleading, or proceeding in the same." Though, in the strict technical sense, "civil actions" might not include petitions yet considering that the statute is remedial, that the term "civil action" is used in immediate connection with the more general word "proceeding" in the immediately preceding section, and that the statute from which the revision was taken did in terms extend to all legal proceedings, the term "civil action" will be held to include petitions for writ of review. Davenport v. Holland, 56 Mass. (2 Cush.) 1, 13.

Probate proceedings.

Where petitions have been filed to compel an administrator to pay claims which have been allowed against insolvent estates, and the only question is whether the administrator has a right to settle the estate without paying them, it is not a "civil action" within Rev. St. 1881, § 412, Rev. St. 1894, § 416, granting a change in such an action on the application of the other party. Everroad v. Lewis, 43 N. E. 1010, 1011, 16 Ind. App. 65.

"Civil suits," as used in Const. art. 7, § 18, authorizing the Legislature to impose a tax on civil suits, does not include the settlement of estates in probate. State v. Mann, 45 N. W. 526, 528, 76 Wis. 469.

"Civil case," in Acts 1871-72, p. 188, relating to payment of jury fees in a civil case by a party, as a condition to bringing other proceedings, embraces a trial arising on an application made to revoke the probate of a will through a special proceeding, since it is a civil case, though not a civil action. Carpenter v. Jones, 121 Cal. 362, 53 Pac. 842.

Proceedings for assignment of dower.

The phrase "civil action," in Rev. St. § 5226, giving an appeal from a judgment or final order in a civil action rendered by the court of common pleas, includes a proceeding by a widow for the assignment of dower in the lands of her deceased husband. Corry v. Lamb, 2 N. E. 851, 852, 43 Ohio St. 390.

Proceedings in rem.

Proceedings on an information in rem are civil, and not criminal, proceedings. Anonymous (U. S.) 1 Fed. Cas. 996, 997.

Proceedings to assess damages for diversion of water.

A proceeding in a Massachusetts court under St. Mass. 1881, c. 268, for the appointment of commissioners for the assessment of damages suffered by plaintiffs, millowners in Rhode Island, by reason of the diversion of the water of a stream in Massachusetts by the defendant, is a "suit of a civil nature either at law or in equity," within the statute as to removal of causes, where it does not appear that there is no reason why the federal court may not administer relief by the appointment of commissioners, as well as the state court. Banigan v. City of Worcester (U. S.) 30 Fed. 392, 393.

Proceedings to assess damages for establishment of highway.

A civil case is an ordinary contention between parties, in which the courts are always open to the party feeling himself aggrieved; but where a case cannot be litigated in the ordinary mode, but requires the interposition of the lawmaking power in order to decide the manner of fixing damages, or some other material point, the proceeding is not a civil one, within a constitutional provision giving certain courts jurisdiction of civil cases. In the general acceptance of the term, chancery causes, proceedings to assess damages caused by the laying out of highways, and contested election cases, are not "civil cases." Norristown, H. & St. L. Turnpike Co. v. Burket, 26 Ind. 53, 62.

A rule of court, requiring the appellant to docket appeals in "civil cases" from justice courts or other inferior tribunals, includes a proceeding before the board of supervisors to determine a claim for damages caused by the establishment of a highway through the claimant's lands. Scott v. Lasell, 32 N. W. 322, 324, 71 Iowa, 180.

Proceedings to vacate judgments.

A petition to vacate a judgment is entered as a separate suit, like a petition for a writ of review, and is in a broad sense a civil action, and as such is appealable from the justice court to the superior court, under Pub. St. c. 154, § 3943, allowing appeals to the superior court. Clarke v. Bacall, 50 N. E. 614, 171 Mass. 292.

A statute providing that an appeal may be taken from all "civil actions" does not include a statutory proceeding to modify or vacate a judgment by the court rendering such judgment, since they are merely special proceedings in an action. Coates v. Chillicothe Branch State Bank of Ohio, 23 Ohio St. 415, 431.

Quo warranto proceedings.

A proceeding for dissolution of a corporation under Code, § 3167, by filing a petition setting forth the facts and praying a writ of quo warranto, is not a civil action within the meaning of section 2651, requiring all civil actions in courts of record to be commenced by service of summons. Capital City Water Co. v. State (Ala.) 18 South. 62; 66, 29 L. R. A. 743.

An action in the nature of a quo warranto, filed by a district court attorney of Mississippi in one of the circuit courts thereof, under the provisions of the act of 1843 making it the duty of any district attorney who shall have reason to believe that any party in the state has been guilty of a violation of its charter, or upon the affidavit of one or more credible persons to that fact, forthwith to file such information, is a civil, and not a criminal, proceeding. Commercial Bank v. State, 12 Miss. (4 Smedes & M.) 439, 503.

The remedy by information in the nature of quo warranto in Kansas is a civil proceeding. Foster v. State of Kansas, 5 Sup. Ct. 97, 98, 112 U. S. 201, 28 L. Ed. 629.

Scire facias.

The term "civil action," in that section of the practice act providing that there shall be in this state but one form of civil action for the enforcements of rights, etc., includes remedies of scire facias, provided for the enforcement of judgments. Humiston v. Smith, 21 Cal. 129, 134.

The term "civil action," as used in St. 1866, c. 279, § 9, providing for the removal from the municipal court of Boston to the superior court of a civil action wherein the debt or damage demanded exceeds a certain amount, must be construed as meaning a proceeding before the court in which a debt or damage is demanded, and hence a writ of scire facias returnable before the municipal court of Boston, in which no debt or damage is demanded, is not a civil action, and cannot be removed to the superior court. Gray v. Thrasher, 104 Mass. 373, 375. See, also, State v. Murmann (Mo.) 28 S. W. 2, 8.

A scire facias brought to recover the forfeiture on a recognizance conditioned on the appearance of the principal therein to answer a criminal charge is a civil action, and must be prosecuted in a court having civil jurisdiction. No crime attaches to the sureties for permitting a forfeiture, any more than in failing to perform any other civil contract, and a court of criminal jurisdiction, alone, has therefore, in the absence of statutory provisions, no power to issue any process for the collection of the sums forfeited. State v. Kinne, 39 N. H. 129, 135.

Seizures for violation of law.

Under a complaint and search warrant under St. 1855, c. 215, § 25, for intoxicating liquors unlawfully kept for sale, liquors were seized, and subsequently the proceedings were quashed for informality, and the liquors ordered to be returned to the claimant, who moved for costs. The court were of the opinion that this was not a civil suit or proceeding in which the claimant could recover costs of the commonwealth. The process on which the liquors were seized was a criminal process, and the proceedings after the seizure were proceedings in a criminal prosecution. Commonwealth v. Certain Intoxicating Liquors, 80 Mass. (14 Gray) 375, 376.

As used in 13 Stat. 351, providing that no witness shall be excluded in the courts of the United States in any civil action because he is a party to or interested in the issue tried, the term "civil action" "includes actions at law, suits in chancery, proceedings in admiralty, and all other judicial controversies in which the rights of property are involved, whether between private parties, or such parties and the government. It is used here in contradistinction to prosecutions for crime." A seizure of property for a violation of the internal revenue law is a civil action within the meaning of the act. United States v. Ten Thousand Cigars (U. S.) 28 Fed. Cas. 89.

Special proceedings distinguished.

"Civil cases" is defined by Code, § 2504, to include actions and special proceedings.

College of Physicians & Surgeons of Keokuk v. Guilbert, 69 N. W. 453, 455, 100 Iowa, 213.

"Civil cases," as used in Code, § 351, providing for the review of justices' judgments, is synonymous with "actions," in contradistinction to the term "special proceedings." People v. Bigelow (N. Y.) 11 How. Prac. 83, 86.

"Civil cases," as used in the Bill of Rights, § 20, providing that in civil cases the right of trial by jury shall remain inviolate, "does not include cases in equity nor special statutory proceedings, and therefore in such cases the Legislature may provide for the trial by the court without jury." Powell v. Powell, 3 N. E. 639, 641, 104 Ind. 18.

The term "civil action," as used in Code 1851, includes not only actions on the law side of the court, but actions formerly denominated "suits in equity." The term is used to distinguish civil proceedings from proceedings in other actions, and to distinguish actions from special proceedings or particular relief. Kramer v. Rebman, 9 Iowa, 114, 118.

A "civil action" is defined to be an ordinary proceeding in a court of justice by which one side prosecutes another for the enforcement or protection of a right or for the redress or prevention of a wrong. Every other civil remedy is defined to be a "special proceeding." A proceeding on a petition for the sale of estrays is a special proceeding, and not an action. In re Rafferty, 43 N. Y. Supp. 760, 761, 14 App. Div. 55.

Submission of controversy.

"Civil action," as used in Rev. St. c. 121, § 21, providing that costs may be allowed to the prevailing party in a civil action, cannot be construed to include a submission entered into before a magistrate, for neither party can be said to be the plaintiff or defendant. It is true that each stands in that relation toward the other so far as their respective claims and demands are submitted to the determination of the arbitrators, but the proceeding derives all its force and effect from the mutual assent of the parties, and in this respect essentially differs from an action at law or in equity, in which one party compels the other to appear and litigate his rights. It is therefore a civil proceeding rather than a civil action. Bond v. Fay, 83 Mass. (1 Allen) 212.

Suit.

See "Suit."

Suits in equity.

A civil case is one which involves disputes or contests between man and man, and which only terminates in the adjustment of the rights of plaintiffs and defendants, and means all cases, whatever technical appellation they may assume, in the shape of an action or chancery bill, which cannot legally be denominated "criminal cases"; and hence equity proceedings must be denominated a "civil case." Grimball v. Ross (Ga.) 1 T. U. P. Charlt. 175, 181.

"Civil cases," as used in Const. art. 3, § 1, declaring that the inferior courts shall have jurisdiction of all other civil cases save those of which the superior court has jurisdiction, does not embrace equity cases. Gilbert v. Thomas, 3 Ga. (3 Kelly) 575, 578.

The term "civil action" is used in Kansas as the name of the one form of proceedings authorized by the Kansas Statutes, which abolished the distinction between law and equity. Broadway Nat. Bank v. Baker, 57 N. E. 603, 605, 176 Mass. 294.

The expression "civil action," as used in Act 1859, § 34, providing that in all civil actions, in any court of law or equity of this state, any party thereto may be sworn and examined as a witness, includes all proceedings which are not criminal, and suits in equity as well as actions at law. Smith v. Burnet, 35 N. J. Eq. (8 Stew.) 314, 320.

Civil actions include all judicial controversies in which the rights of parties are involved, whether between private parties or such parties and the government, and the term is used in contradistinction to "prosecutions for crime," and hence includes actions in equity. Fenstermacher v. State, 25 Pac. 142, 143, 19 Or. 504.

Act Cong. July 2, 1864 (13 Stat. 351), provides that in courts of the United States there shall be no exclusion of any witness on account of color, nor in any "civil actions" because he is a party to or interested in the issue tried. Held, that the phrase "civil actions" as there used was undoubtedly used as opposed to "criminal actions," and therefore includes suits in chancery as well as actions at law. Green v. United States, 76 U. S. (9 Wall.) 655, 658, 19 L. Ed. 806; Rison v. Cribbs (U. S.) 20 Fed. Cas. 833, 834.

As the term "civil cases" is used in Bill of Rights, § 20, providing that in all civil cases the right of trial by jury shall remain inviolate, it means only such cases as were known as "civil cases" before and at the time the Constitution was adopted, and does not include cases which are termed "civil cases" after the adoption of the Code abolishing the distinction between actions at law and suits in equity. Powell v. Powell, 3 N. E. 639, 641, 104 Ind. 18.

The term "civil actions," as used in the statute giving probate courts in civil cases concurrent jurisdiction with district courts where the sum involved does not exceed

$1,000, is used as opposed to "criminal cases," and includes any action in which a litigant may be entitled to a civil remedy; that is, to a remedy which is legal in its character, or to a remedy which is equitable in its character. Rogers v. Bonnett, 37 Pac. 1078, 1079, 2 Okl. 553.

Whether a proceeding is deemed civil or criminal depends upon the form permitted, not upon the question whether the penalty described is denominated a "fine" or "forfeiture." State v. McConnell (N. H.) 46 Atl. 458, 459.

Code, § 5091, enacts that the court shall render judgment without the verdict of a jury in all "civil cases founded on contract" where an issuable defense is not filed on oath. Held, that the phrase "civil cases founded on contract" means cases at law and not in equity, the words "civil cases" referring to actions at law, as also does the word "judgment." Isaacs v. Tinley, 58 Ga. 457, 459.

Suits to recover possession of land.

A suit to recover the possession of land is a civil action, and not a special proceeding. Woodley v. Gilliam, 64 N. C. 649.

Supplementary proceedings.

"Civil action," as used in Rev. St. 1881, § 412, relating to the change of venue of any civil action, includes proceedings supplementary to execution. Burkett v. Holman, 3 N. E. 406, 408, 104 Ind. 6.

Trespass quare clausum fregit.

As used in the Constitution, providing that all civil cases shall be tried in the county wherein the defendant resides, the term "civil cases" includes an action of trespass quare clausum fregit. Osmond v. Flournoy, 34 Ga. 509, 510.

CIVIL BUSINESS.

"Civil and criminal business," as used in Const. art. 8, § 5, providing that all civil and criminal business arising in any county must be tried in such county, etc., will not be held to mean simply business of the court, but as a general term to include all causes of action, and all other business which might arise in any county. Konold v. Rio Grande W. R. Co., 51 Pac. 256, 257, 16 Utah, 151.

The phrase "civil business," in Const. art. 8, § 5, providing that all civil and criminal business arising in any county must be tried in such county, unless a change of venue be taken in such cases as may be provided by law, means the fact or facts that constitute the cause of action. Condon v. Leipsiger, 55 Pac. 82, 17 Utah, 498.

The phrase "civil business," as used in Const. art. 8, § 5, providing that all civil and criminal business arising in any county must be tried in such county unless a change of venue be taken, means such civil business as amounts to a cause of action as the law defines a cause of action, so that where defendant's false and fraudulent testimony and concealment of material facts misled the court sitting in Salt Lake county, and he obtained a decree declaring plaintiff's deed to be a mortgage, an action to set the decree aside and to decree plaintiff's title to be absolute was properly brought in that county, notwithstanding the land was situated in Tooele county. Mosby v. Gisborn, 54 Pac. 121, 126, 17 Utah, 257.

CIVIL CASE.

See "Civil Action—Case—Suit—etc."

CIVIL CAUSE.

See "Civil Action—Case—Suit—etc."

CIVIL CODE.

The term "Civil Code" means the Code of Civil Procedure. Laws 1892 N. Y. c. 677, § 29.

CIVIL COMMOTION.

"Riot, insurrection, and civil commotion" were held to import occasional local or temporary outbreaks of unlawful violence, which, though temporarily destructive in their effects, did not rise to the proportions of organized rebellion against the government. Boon v. Aetna Ins. Company, 40 Conn. 575, 584.

A civil commotion must necessarily arise where there is a civil war. It is true that there may be a civil commotion without civil war, but, within an exception in an insurance policy of risks from civil commotion, it cannot be said that there was no civil commotion in Virginia between 1861 and 1865. Grame v. Mutual Assur. Soc., 5 Sup. Ct. 150, 112 U. S. 273, 28 L. Ed. 716.

The expression "civil commotion," as used in a life policy wherein it is provided that the same shall be void if the insured die by means of any civil commotion, means the wild or irregular action or tumultuous conduct on the part of any persons assembled together. Spruill v. North Carolina Mut. Life Ins. Co., 46 N. C. 126, 127.

CIVIL CONSPIRACY.

The term "civil" is used to designate a conspiracy which will furnish ground for a civil action, as where, in carrying out the design of the conspirators, overt acts were done causing legal damage, the person damaged has a right of action. It is said that the gist of civil conspiracy is the injury or damage. While criminal conspiracy does not require such overt acts, yet, so far as the rights and remedies are concerned, all criminal conspiracies are embraced within civil conspiracies. Brown v. Jacobs Pharmacy Co., 41 S. E. 553, 555, 115 Ga. 429, 57 L. R. A. 547, 90 Am. St. Rep. 128.

CIVIL CONTEMPT.

"Civil contempts are those quasi contempts which consist in failing to do something which the contemnor is ordered by the court to do for the benefit or advantage of another party to the proceedings before the court." Wyatt v. People, 28 Pac. 961, 963, 17 Colo. 252; State v. Downing, 66 Pac. 917, 921, 40 Or. 309.

A civil contempt is not an offense against the dignity of the court, but against the party in whose behalf the mandate of the court has been issued, and a fine is imposed solely as indemnity of the insured party. People v. McKane, 28 N. Y. Supp. 981, 983, 78 Hun, 154.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 14, declaring a "civil contempt" any misconduct by which a right or remedy of a party to a civil action or a special proceeding pending in the court may be defeated, impaired, impeded, or prejudiced, the misconduct cognizable is such as arises out of an injury or wrong done to a party who is a suitor before the court, and has established a claim on its protection. Citing People v. Court of Oyen & Terminer, 101 N. Y. 245, 4 N. E. 259, 54 Am. Rep. 691. So that the surety on a bond given to indemnify the sheriff on an attachment is not punishable for contempt in making a false affidavit of justification, where the only person injured thereby was not a party to the attachment suit. Schreiber v. Raymond & Campbell Mfg. Co., 45 N. Y. Supp. 442, 443, 18 App. Div. 158.

Criminal contempt distinguished.

There seems to be a well-defined distinction between "contempts" which are merely criminal or punitive, and those which are termed "civil contempts," the latter applying to such as are remedial in character. The two classes of contempts are often distinguished as "direct" and "constructive" or "consequential." Civil contempts are those quasi contempts which consist in failing to do something which the contemnor is ordered by the court to do for the benefit or advantage of another party to the prosecution before the court, while criminal contempts are those acts in disrespect of the court or its processes, or which obstruct the administration of justice or tend to bring the court into disrespect. Criminal contempts are those committed in the immediate view and presence of the court, such as insulting language or acts of violence which interrupt the regular proceedings of the court. This class of contempts may and shall be punished summarily. Laramie Nat. Bank v. Steinhoff, 53 Pac. 299, 300, 7 Wyo. 464. See, also, In re Wilson, 17 Pac. 698, 700, 75 Cal. 580; State v. Downing, 66 Pac. 917, 921, 40 Or. 309. This classification is not affected by the fact that the procedure is in most instances substantially the same whether the contempt be civil or criminal, nor is the character of the contempt in this regard controlled by the character of the court in which it occurs. State v. Downing, 66 Pac. 917, 921, 40 Or. 309.

Contempts are of two classes: First, those which are purely criminal, and are noticed and punished merely to vindicate and to preserve the authority of judicial tribunals, and propriety of conduct in their proceedings; second, civil contempts, which, though criminal in nature, as to procedure are primarily a means of conferring civil rights. Originally this was the usual method of enforcing decrees and orders made in courts of chancery, and in England it was long, if not yet, a concurrent method after the court was authorized to issue rights of fieri facias and elegit. City of Eaton Rapids v. Horner, 85 N. W. 264, 265, 126 Mich. 52.

"Civil contempts" are such contempts as affect a private person, as, for instance, where a party refuses to obey an order of court which will benefit such private person. In civil contempts the case is not punitive, but executive, and the punishment is to commit the offender until he complies with the order. State ex Inf. Crow v. Shepherd, 76 S. W. 79, 86, 177 Mo. 205.

Proceedings for contempt instituted to preserve and enforce the rights of private parties to suits, and to compel obedience of orders to decrees made to enforce the rights and administer the remedy to which the court has found them to be entitled, are civil, remedial, and coercive in their nature, and the parties chiefly in interest are the individuals whose private rights and remedies they were instituted to protect and enforce. In re Nevitt (U. S.) 117 Fed. 448, 458, 54 C. C. A. 622.

Violation of injunction.

By Rev. Code, § 5934, "civil contempts" is defined as follows: "Every court of record has power to punish by fine or imprisonment for either a neglect or violation of duty, or other misconduct by which a right or remedy of a party to a civil action or proceeding pending in the court may be defeated, impaired, impeded, or prejudiced in the following cases." Subdivision 3 provides "or for any other disobedience to any lawful order, judgment or process of court." Under such definition the violation by a defendant of an injunction is a civil contempt, and not a criminal one. Merchant v. Pielke, 83 N. W. 18, 19, 9 N. D. 245.

A petition alleging that certain parties were violating an injunction restraining them from certain acts is a proceeding for civil contempt. City of Eaton Rapids v. Horner, 85 N. W. 264, 265, 126 Mich. 52.

CIVIL COURT.

A court created by the Legislature, which operates on the persons and property of private citizens in civil life by way of fine to punish for neglect of military duty, and not acting at all on the person to compel obedience, is a "civil court," though the court be composed of military officers. State v. Davis, 4 N. J. Law (1 Southard) 311, 312.

CIVIL DAMAGE LAW.

"Civil damage laws" are the statutory laws of various states which impose a liability on liquor dealers for damages to third persons caused by the sale of intoxicating liquors to others. Thus, St. Mass. 1879, c. 297, which was an act to provide for the recovery of damages for injuries caused by the use of intoxicating liquors, and provides that every husband, wife, child, parent, guardian, employer, or other person who shall be injured in person or property or means of support by any intoxicated person, or in consequence of the intoxication, habitually or otherwise, of any person, shall have a right of action against the person furnishing the liquor, is a civil damage law. Moran v. Goodwin, 130 Mass. 158, 159, 39 Am. Rep. 443. So, also, is a like statute in Laws N. Y. 1873, c. 646; Baker v. Pope (N. Y.) 2 Hun, 556.

CIVIL DAMAGES.

The term "civil damages" has a very well defined meaning when used in intoxicating liquor statutes, and has reference to the damages which may be collected by wife, child, parent, or guardian or employer injured in person, property, or means of support by reason of the sale of intoxicating liquors. An action to recover the sum of $100 under Code, § 2403, declaring that one selling liquor to minors shall pay such sum, is not an action for civil damages. Headington v. Smith, 84 N. W. 982, 983, 113 Iowa, 107.

CIVIL DAY.

"The 'civil day' is the solar day, and is measured by the diurnal revolution of the sun, denoting the interval of time which elapses between the successive transits of the sun over the same hour circle, so that the 'civil day' commences and terminates at midnight." Pederson v. Eugster (U. S.) 14 Fed. 422.

CIVIL DEATH.

The term "civil death," as used in the books, seems to involve, first, a total exinction of civil rights, and the passage of the party's estate to his heirs as though he were dead; second, an incapacity to hold property or to sue in the King's Court, attended with a forfeiture of estate and corruption of blood, and the King took the property to the exclusion of the heirs. Perpetual imprisonment, or perpetual banishment without forfeiture of the estate, did not produce civil death at the common law. Town of Baltimore v. Town of Chester, 53 Vt. 315, 319, 38 Am. Rep. 677.

There were three principal incidents consequent on an attainder for treason or felony, one of which was an extinction of civil rights, more or less complete, which was denominated "civil death." The incident of civil death attended every attainder of treason or felony, whereby, in the language of Lord Coke, the attainted person is disabled to bring any action, for he is extra legem positus, and is accounted in law civilliter mortuus, or, as stated by Chitty, he is then disqualified from being a witness, can bring no action, nor perform any legal function. It seems to be a necessary conclusion from the rules of the common law governing rights of property as affected by forfeiture for crime that "civil death," one of the consequences of conviction for treason or felony, did not of itself, as a general rule at least, operate to divest the offender of his title to his lands. Avery v. Everett, 18 N. E. 148, 150, 151, 110 N. Y. 317, 1 L. R. A. 264, 6 Am. St. Rep. 368.

If a person be convicted of treason or felony, and, saving his life, is banished forever, this is civil death; and so it is, also, if he receives sentence of death and afterwards leaves the kingdom for life on a conditional pardon. Troup v. Wood (N. Y.) 4 Johns. Ch. 228, 248.

"Civil death" imports a deprivation of all rights whose exercise or enjoyment depends upon some provision of positive law. It is the extinction of civil rights; the state of a person who, possessing natural life, has lost all his civil rights, and as to them is considered as dead. Thus, under Pen. Code, § 674, which provides that a person sentenced to imprisonment in the state prison for life is thereafter deemed civilly dead, a person who is serving a life sentence at the time of his father's death does not inherit from him. In re Donnelly's Estate, 58 Pac. 61, 125 Cal. 417, 73 Am. St. Rep. 62.

A person convicted of a felony and sentenced to imprisonment in the state prison for life is not civilliter mortuus, and, strictly speaking, civil death seems to have been confined to cases of persons professed, abjured, or banished from the realm. Platner v. Sherwood (N. Y.) 6 Johns. Ch. 118, 129.

Civil death is not identical in law with physical death, under the statutes of California which provide that a life convict may be a competent witness in criminal actions, and capable of making and acknowledging a sale or conveyance of property. Coffee v. Haynes, 57 Pac. 482, 483, 124 Cal. 561, 71 Am. St. Rep. 99.

The statute of Missouri which enacts that a sentence of imprisonment in the penitentiary for a term less than life suspends all civil rights of persons so sentenced for the period thereof applies only to sentences of the state court, and, there being no similar act as to sentences of the federal court, a sentence for life in such court would not have the effect of making the convict civilly dead. Fresbury v. Hull, 34 Mo. 29, 30, 34.

CIVIL DISABILITIES.

"Civil disabilities," as used in an act relating to married women, declaring that the civil disabilities of the wife are abolished, and that "for any usurpation of her natural or property rights she may appeal to the courts," should be construed simply as meaning a removal of such disabilities as were incident to the marriage relations, so far as the married woman's natural or property rights were concerned, and could not be construed so as to confer on her civil political rights, such as the right to vote, etc. Harland v. Territory, 13 Pac. 453, 465, 3 Wash. T. 131.

"Civil disabilities," as used in Hill's Code, § 2998, providing that all laws which impose or recognize civil disabilities on a wife which are not imposed or recognized as existing on the husband are repealed, means disqualification created by law. It means some disqualification created by or the result of law, which renders her incapable of doing certain acts or things. Section 2885 of the Code, permitting every father by his last will in writing to appoint a guardian or guardians for any of his children, whether born at the time of making the will or afterward, to continue during the minority of the child, does not create a civil disability in the wife, she having no right at common law to make a testamentary disposition of the guardianship of children. Ingalls v. Campbell, 24 Pac. 904, 905, 18 Or. 461.

CIVIL EFFECTS.

As used in Civ. Code, art. 118, providing that if only one of the parties to an invalid marriage acted in good faith the marriage produces its civil effects only in his or her favor and in favor of the children of the marriage, the term "civil effects" is employed without restriction, and necessarily imports all civil effects given to marriage by the law. Smith v. Smith, 10 South. 248, 250, 43 La. 1140.

CIVIL ENGINEER.

As laborer, see "Laborer."

As mechanic, see "Mechanic."

CIVIL FRUITS.

Civil fruits are rents of real property, the interest of money, and annuities. Civ. Code La. 1900, art. 545.

CIVIL IMPOSITION.

"Civil imposition," as used in the charter of Harvard College, exempting from all civil impositions lands of the college not exceeding a certain value, means "all burdens and duties, to be rendered in money or otherwise, imposed by the civil authority specifically on the lands, or on the owner or occupant in respect thereof." Harvard College v. Aldermen of Boston, 104 Mass. 470, 482.

CIVIL INJURIES.

Wrongs are divided into two sorts of wrongs, "private wrongs" and "public wrongs." The former are an infringement or privation of the private or civil rights belonging to the individuals, considered as individuals, and are thereupon frequently termed "civil injuries." The latter are a breach and violation of public rights and duties which affect the whole community, considered as a community, and are distinguished by the harsher appellation of "crimes and misdemeanors." Cullinan v. Burkhard, 84 N. Y. Supp. 825, 827, 41 Misc. Rep. 321. See, also, Tomlin v. Hildreth, 47 Atl. 649, 651, 65 N. J. Law, 438.

CIVIL JURISDICTION.

"Civil jurisdiction simply means jurisdiction to hear and determine civil actions. Civil jurisdiction is that which exists when the subject-matter is not of a criminal nature." Landers v. Staten Island R. Co., 53 N. Y. 450, 456.

The term "civil," when applied to and used with reference to the jurisdiction of a court or a judicial proceeding generally, has respect to the nature and form of a remedy and cause of action, or occasion for instituting legal proceedings, and has respect to the object of the jurisdiction of the court, and not to the presence of suitors. In re City of Buffalo, 34 N. E. 1103, 1104, 139 N. Y. 422.

CIVIL LAW.

Common law distinguished, see "Common Law."

CIVIL LIBERTY.

"Civil liberty" is defined by Blackstone to be none other than natural liberty, so far restrained by human laws, and no farther, as is necessary and expedient for the general advantage of the public. Dennis v. Moses, 52 Pac. 333, 339, 18 Wash. 537, 40 L. R. A. 302 (citing Comm. book I, p. 125).

"Political or civil liberty, which is that of a member of society, is no other than natural liberty, so far restrained by human laws, and no further, as is necessary and expedient for the general advantage of the public." Hence we may collect that the law which restrains a man from doing mischief to his fellow citizens, though it diminishes the natural, increases the civil, liberty of mankind; but that every wanton and causeless restraint of the will of the subject, whether practiced by a monarch, a nobility, or a popular assembly, is a degree of tyranny. Nay, that even laws themselves, if they regulate and constrain our conduct in matters of mere indifference, without any good end in view, are regulations destructive of liberty; whereas if any public advantage can arise from observing such precepts, the control of our private inclinations in one or two particular points will conduce to preserve our general freedom in others of more importance, by supporting that state of society which alone can secure our independence. People v. Berberich, 20 Barb. 224, 231 (quoting Bl. Comm. 125).

Civil liberty is no other than natural liberty, so far restrained by human laws (and no farther) as is necessary and expedient for the general welfare. There are many restrictions imposed on personal liberty which spring from the helpless or dependent condition of individuals in the various relations of life, among them being those of parent and child, guardian and ward, teacher and scholar; and just and legal restraints on personal liberty, which are demanded by the welfare of society, when not abused, are entirely consistent with the constitutional guaranty of liberty. In re Ferrier, 103 Ill. 367, 372, 43 Am. Rep. 10 (citing Cooley's Const. Lim. 339, 342).

The conception of civil liberty has been variously phrased thus: "Every man may claim the fullest liberty to exercise his faculties, compatible with the possession of like liberty by every other." Spencer's Social Statistics, p. 94. Liberty consists in doing what we ought to will, and in not being constrained to do what we ought not to will. Montesquieu. Even liberty itself, the greatest of all rights, is not unrestricted license to act according to one's own will. It is only freedom from restraint under conditions essential to the equal enjoyment of the same rights by others. State v. Kreutzberg, 90 N. W. 1098, 1101, 114 Wis. 530, 58 L. R. A. 748, 91 Am. St. Rep. 934 (citing Feld, J., in Crowley v. Christensen, 137 U. S. 86, 11 Sup. Ct. 13, 34 L. Ed. 620).

"Civil liberty" is a natural liberty shorn of the excesses which invade and trench on the equal liberties of others; and no man can rightfully complain of any encroachment on his personal liberty which he himself, by his violence and lawlessness, has rendered necessary for the safety and protection of others. "Civil liberty" is liberty as defined by law, and not unbridled license. Hayes v. Mitchell, 69 Ala. 452, 454.

"Civil liberty," as an institution under our federal and state constitutions, implies more than mere freedom from physical restraint; it comprehends the right of every person living under our government to acquire and dispose of property by lawful means and for lawful purposes, and to pursue any lawful business, trade, or calling in such manner as to him shall seem meet, provided only he does not thereby offend against any superior social right or the equal rights of other persons. Bell v. Gaynor, 36 N. Y. Supp. 122, 123, 14 Misc. Rep. 334.

CIVIL MATTERS.

McClain's Code, § 769, provides that the Supreme Court shall have jurisdiction, in all civil matters, concurrent with the district court, etc. It was held that the term "civil matters" as used in the act was evidently intended to include all matters other than criminal, for of the two it is a more comprehensive term than "civil actions," and, as "civil cases" is defined in the Code to include actions and special proceedings, the term "civil matters" will be held to be as broad in meaning as "civil cases," and thus includes actions and special proceedings. Certiorari to compel the state board of medical examiners to recognize petitioner as a medical school in good standing, which it had declared to be otherwise, is a "civil matter." College of Physicians & Surgeons of Keokuk v. Guilbert, 69 N. W. 453, 455, 100 Iowa, 218.

There has always been a well-recognized distinction under the various statutes and laws of Mississippi between "matters civil" and "matters in equity." The Constitution of 1869 gave the circuit court jurisdiction in all matters civil, and provided for the establishment of the chancery court with full jurisdiction of all matters of equity. Simrall, in Bell v. City of West Point, 51 Miss. 270, in reference to the language used in conferring jurisdiction on the circuit court, says: "Dwelling a moment on the language used, it is broad enough to embrace suits at common law as well as in equity—all matters civil. But that language had the purpose of creating a common-law cognizance, and we therefore give that import to the words." The framers of the Constitution evidently intended by all "matters civil" to mean "matters of common-law cognizance." Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Le Blanc (Miss.) 21 South. 760, 761.

CIVIL OBLIGATION.

A civil obligation is a legal title which gives the person in whose favor it is contracted a right of judicially enforcing it. A natural obligation is that which obliges the person in honor and conscience. Obligations are commonly both natural and civil. There are some, however, which are merely civil, and which the debtor may be judicially compelled to perform without being under any obligation to do so in point of conscience. Blair v. Williams, 14 Ky. (4 Litt.) 34, 39.

A civil obligation is a legal tie which gives the party with whom it is contracted the right of enforcing its performance by law. Civ. Code La. 1900, art. 1757.

CIVIL OFFICE.

A civil office is a grant and possession of the sovereign power, and the exercise of such power within the limits prescribed by the law which creates the office constitutes the discharge of the duties of the office. State v. Spaulding, 102 Iowa, 639, 644, 72 N. W. 288, 289 (citing State v. Valle, 41 Mo. 29).

In a certain popular acceptance, the words "civil office under this state" might possibly be interpreted to mean state officers, in the sense of participating directly in the administration of the state government as such; but they are none the less civil officers under this state because their functions are confined to the local administration. The offices are created, and the officers are appointed, and their powers given and their duties defined, and their salaries fixed, directly by act of the legislature. They exercise a share of the powers of civil government, and their authority comes directly from the state. They are to be considered as much civil officers under this state, as the judge of a court or the mayor of the city. The mode of appointment is not material. Montgomery v. State (Ala.) 18 South. 157, 159 (quoting and approving State v. Valle; 41 Mo. 31).

Employment distinguished.

A civil office is a grant and possession of sovereign power, and the exercise of such power within the limits prescribed by the law which creates the office constitutes the discharge of the duties of the office, and is distinguished in this respect from a mere employment, as a contractor or agent under some public office. Attorney General v. Detroit Common Council, 70 N. W. 450, 455, 112 Mich. 145, 37 L. R. A. 211; State ex rel. Wingate v. Valle, 41 Mo. 29, 31.

Military office distinguished.

Const. art. 4, § 9, providing that no person holding office under the United States government shall be eligible to any "civil office" in this state, means any office not a military office, including all offices connected with the civil administration of the country, in contradistinction to "military." Therefore all who hold appointments under the national government, whether their duties are executive or judicial, in the highest or lowest department of the government, with the exception of officers in the army and navy, are properly "civil officers." State v. Clarke, 31 Pac. 545, 546, 21 Nev. 333, 18 L. R. A. 313, 37 Am. St. Rep. 517.

CIVIL OFFICER.

Civil officers are either political, judicial, or ministerial. Ex parte Faulkner, 1 W. Va. 269, 297 (citing 7 Bacon's Abr. 279, 280, tit. "Office and Officers").

"Civil officers," within the meaning of the constitutional provision that all civil officers shall be liable to impeachment for any misdemeanor in office, must be understood to mean public officers holding civil offices of any grade of honor, trust, or profit under the state. State v. O'Driscoll (S. C.) 3 Brev. 526, 527.

Civil officers are government agents. They are natural persons in whom a part of the sovereignty is vested or imposed, to be exercised by the individuals so entrusted with it for the public good. The power to act for the state is confided to the person appointed to act. It belongs to him upon assuming the office. He is clothed with the authority which he exerts, and the official acts done by him are done as his acts, and not as the acts of a body corporate. Board of County School Com'rs of Worcester County v. Goldsborough, 44 Atl. 1055, 1058, 90 Md. 193.

In United States v. Hatch (Wis.) 1 Pin. 182, the term "civil officers" was said to embrace only those in whom a portion of the sovereignty is vested, or to whom the enforcement of municipal regulations for the control of the general interest of society is confided. State v. Crawford, 21 Atl. 546, 17 R. I. 292.

Attorney at law.

An attorney at law is not a "civil officer" within Const. art. 7, § 6, providing that no one save a qualified elector shall be appointed to any civil office in the state, and, in the absence of statutory restrictions, women will be admitted to the bar. In re Thomas, 27 Pac. 707, 708, 16 Colo. 441, 13 L. R. A. 538.

Act June 26, 1863, prescribing a certain oath to be taken by every person elected or appointed to any office of trust, civil or military, is not to be construed to include an attorney at law. Ex parte Faulkner, 1 W. Va. 269, 291.

Canal commissioners.

The term "civil officers," as used in Act Cong. April 20, 1836 (organic act creating the territory of Wisconsin), means only those officers in whom a portion of the sovereignty is vested, or to whom the enforcement of municipal regulations or the control of the general interests of society is confided, and does not include such officers as canal commissioners. United States v. Hatch (Wis.) 1 Pin. 182, 188.

Employé distinguished.

An "officer" is distinguished from an "employé" by the greater importance, dignity, and independence of his position, in being required to take an official oath, and perhaps to give an official bond, in the liability for misfeasance in office, and usually, though not necessarily, in the tenure of his office. City of Baltimore v. Lyman, 48 Atl. 145, 146, 92 Md. 591.

Notary public.

All officers of the United States who hold their appointments under the national government, whether their duties are executive or judicial, in the highest or lowest departments of the government, with the exception of officers in the army or navy, are properly "civil officers" within the meaning of the Constitution. A notary public is a civil officer within such definition. In re House Bill No. 166, 21 Pac. 473, 9 Colo. 628 (citing 1 Story Const. § 789).

The term "civil office of profit" in Const. art. 4, § 20, providing that no person holding any lucrative office under the United States shall be eligible to any civil office of profit under this state, etc., refers only to offices under the state, regardless of amount of compensation. People v. Leonard, 14 Pac. 853, 855, 73 Cal. 230.

Police officer.

14 Stat. U. S. p. 569, which provides that there shall be allowed and paid to certain officers in Washington, including civil officers, and all other clerks and employes, etc., an additional compensation of a certain amount on their respective salaries, should be construed to include the police of the capitol. Mallory v. United States, 3 Ct. Cl. 257, 258.

The term "civil officers," as used in Mill. & V. Code, § 5526, providing that such civil officers who shall arrest and prosecute to conviction any person guilty of carrying a bowie knife shall be entitled to $50, means policemen or other officers charged with the duty of preserving the public peace, preventing crime, and detecting and arresting offenders, and to enforce all law relating to the suppression of crime. Porterfield v. State, 21 S. W. 519, 92 Tenn. 289.

Police officers are civil officers. Their principal duty is to assist in the preservation of the public peace, a matter of public concern. They are state or public officers, not town or private officers. Gooch v. Town of Exeter, 48 Atl. 1100, 70 N. H. 413, 85 Am. St. Rep. 637.

Quasi municipal officer.

The term "civil officers," as used in the Constitution of Rhode Island, defining qualifications of voters who shall have a right to vote in all elections of "civil officers," primarily if not solely has reference to municipal and state officers, and will not include officers of a quasi municipal corporation. Wood v. Quimby, 40 Atl. 161, 164, 20 R. I. 482.

Sergeant at penitentiary.

The term "civil officer," as used in Pen. Code, art. 319, exempting from amenability for carrying a pistol civil officers engaged in the discharge of official duty, includes a sergeant in the penitentiary service, while in charge of a convict camp and engaged in the duties incidental thereto. Carmichael v. State, 11 Tex. App. 27, 28.

CIVIL POSSESSION.

Civil possession is the detention of the thing, accompanied with the design of possessing in quality of proprietor. Sunol v. Hepburn, 1 Cal. 254, 265.

Possession is civil when a person ceases to reside in the house or on the land which he occupied, or ceases to detain the movable which he possessed, but without intending to abandon the possession. "Civil possession" is also defined to be the detention of a thing by virtue of a just title, and under the conviction of possessing as owner. Civ. Code La. 1900, arts. 3429, 3431.

CIVIL PROCEEDINGS.

See "Civil Action—Case—Suit—etc."
Other civil proceeding, see "Other."

CIVIL PROCESS.

The term "civil process" in Act April 18, 1861, providing that no civil process shall issue or be enforced against any person in the military service of the state or of the United States, includes a writ of scire facias upon a mortgage, unless expressly prohibited by the act of the contracting parties. Coxe's Ex'r v. Martin, 44 Pa. (8 Wright) 322-326.

CIVIL RIGHTS.

A "civil right" is said by Anderson to be a right accorded to every member of a distinct community or nation, and Bouvier says: "Civil rights are those which have no relation to the establishment or management of the government. These consist in the power to acquire and enjoy property, and of exercising the paternal and marital powers, and the like." People v. Barrett, 67 N. E. 742, 743, 203 Ill. 99, 96 Am. St. Rep. 296.

A civil right is the right of a citizen; the right of an individual as an individual; the enforcement or prosecution of a right or the redress or prevention of a wrong, the old suit in equity for the partition of lands is now merged in the civil action, and may be prosecuted by summons and complaint, since it is a regular proceeding prosecuted according to the same forms of proceeding and rules of practice as other actions under the Code. Myers v. Rasback (N. Y.) 4 How. Prac. 83, 85; Backus v. Stillwell (N. Y.) 3 How. Prac. 318.

"Civil cases at law," as used in Act March 23, 1852, providing that an appeal may be had from all final judgments in civil cases at law, decrees in chancery, and interlocutory decrees rendered by the court of common pleas in which that court had original jurisdiction, means all civil cases at law, whether the action be given by statute or existed at common law, and includes a petition for partition, as well as the various other suits or actions authorized by statute. It would not embrace mere motions or summary proceedings, based upon other matters before the court, which do not belong to the class of remedies by original suit or action destined to be comprehended by the expression "civil cases at law." The expression "civil cases at law" distinguishes a class of remedies from suits in equity and the criminal modes of procedure. Mack v. Bonner, 3 Ohio St. 366, 367.

Since by Code, § 3, the term "civil action" embraces only such cases as were, before the enactment of the Code, known "as actions at law" and "suits in equity," a petition for partition under the statute is not a civil action. Barger v. Cochran, 15 Ohio St. 460, 461.

Petition for writ of review.

Rev. St. c. 100, § 22, provides "that the court in which a 'civil action' is pending may allow amendments of any process, pleading, or proceeding in the same." Though, in the strict technical sense, "civil actions" might not include petitions yet considering that the statute is remedial, that the term "civil action" is used in immediate connection with the more general word "proceeding" in the immediately preceding section, and that the statute from which the revision was taken did in terms extend to all legal proceedings, the term "civil action" will be held to include petitions for writ of review. Davenport v. Holland, 56 Mass. (2 Cush.) 1, 13.

Probate proceedings.

Where petitions have been filed to compel an administrator to pay claims which have been allowed against insolvent estates, and the only question is whether the administrator has a right to settle the estate without paying them, it is not a "civil action" within Rev. St. 1881, § 412, Rev. St. 1894, § 416, granting a change in such an action on the application of the other party. Everroad v. Lewis, 43 N. E. 1010, 1011, 16 Ind. App. 65.

"Civil suits," as used in Const. art. 7, § 18, authorizing the Legislature to impose a tax on civil suits, does not include the settlement of estates in probate. State v. Mann, 45 N. W. 526, 528, 76 Wis. 469.

"Civil case," in Acts 1871-72, p. 188, relating to payment of jury fees in a civil case by a party, as a condition to bringing other proceedings, embraces a trial arising on an application made to revoke the probate of a will through a special proceeding, since it is a civil case, though not a civil action. Carpenter v. Jones, 121 Cal. 362, 53 Pac. 842.

Proceedings for assignment of dower.

The phrase "civil action," in Rev. St. § 5226, giving an appeal from a judgment or final order in a civil action rendered by the court of common pleas, includes a proceeding by a widow for the assignment of dower in the lands of her deceased husband. Corry v. Lamb, 2 N. E. 851, 852, 43 Ohio St. 390.

Proceedings in rem.

Proceedings on an information in rem are civil, and not criminal, proceedings. Anonymous (U. S.) 1 Fed. Cas. 996, 997.

Proceedings to assess damages for diversion of water.

A proceeding in a Massachusetts court under St. Mass. 1881, c. 268, for the appointment of commissioners for the assessment of damages suffered by plaintiffs, millowners in Rhode Island, by reason of the diversion of the water of a stream in Massachusetts by the defendant, is a "suit of a civil nature either at law or in equity," within the statute as to removal of causes, where it does not appear that there is no reason why the federal court may not administer relief by the appointment of commissioners, as well as the state court. Banigan v. City of Worcester (U. S.) 30 Fed. 392, 393.

Proceedings to assess damages for establishment of highway.

A civil case is an ordinary contention between parties, in which the courts are always open to the party feeling himself aggrieved; but where a case cannot be litigated in the ordinary mode, but requires the interposition of the lawmaking power in order to decide the manner of fixing damages, or some other material point, the proceeding is not a civil one, within a constitutional provision giving certain courts jurisdiction of civil cases. In the general acceptance of the term, chancery causes, proceedings to assess damages caused by the laying out of highways, and contested election cases, are not "civil cases." Norristown, H. & St. L. Turnpike Co. v. Burket, 26 Ind. 53, 62.

A rule of court, requiring the appellant to docket appeals in "civil cases" from justice courts or other inferior tribunals, includes a proceeding before the board of supervisors to determine a claim for damages caused by the establishment of a highway through the claimant's lands. Scott v. Laseil, 32 N. W. 322, 324, 71 Iowa, 180.

Proceedings to vacate judgments.

A petition to vacate a judgment is entered as a separate suit, like a petition for a writ of review, and is in a broad sense a civil action, and as such is appealable from the justice court to the superior court, under Pub. St. c. 154, § 3943, allowing appeals to the superior court. Clarke v. Bacall, 50 N. E. 614, 171 Mass. 292.

A statute providing that an appeal may be taken from all "civil actions" does not include a statutory proceeding to modify or vacate a judgment by the court rendering such judgment, since they are merely special proceedings in an action. Coates v. Chillicothe Branch State Bank of Ohio, 23 Ohio St. 415, 431.

Quo warranto proceedings.

A proceeding for dissolution of a corporation under Code, § 3167, by filing a petition setting forth the facts and praying a writ of quo warranto, is not a civil action within the meaning of section 2651, requiring all civil actions in courts of record to be commenced by service of summons. Capital City Water Co. v. State (Ala.) 18 South. 62; 66, 29 L. R. A. 743.

An action in the nature of a quo warranto, filed by a district court attorney of Mississippi in one of the circuit courts thereof, under the provisions of the act of 1843 making it the duty of any district attorney who shall have reason to believe that any party in the state has been guilty of a violation of its charter, or upon the affidavit of one or more credible persons to that fact, forthwith to file such information, is a civil, and not a criminal, proceeding. Commercial Bank v. State, 12 Miss. (4 Smedes & M.) 439, 503.

The remedy by information in the nature of quo warranto in Kansas is a civil proceeding. Foster v. State of Kansas, 5 Sup. Ct. 97, 98, 112 U. S. 201, 28 L. Ed. 629.

Scire facias.

The term "civil action," in that section of the practice act providing that there shall be in this state but one form of civil action for the enforcements of rights, etc., includes remedies of scire facias, provided for the enforcement of judgments. Humiston v. Smith, 21 Cal. 129, 134.

The term "civil action," as used in St. 1866, c. 279, § 9, providing for the removal from the municipal court of Boston to the superior court of a civil action wherein the debt or damage demanded exceeds a certain amount, must be construed as meaning a proceeding before the court in which a debt or damage is demanded, and hence a writ of scire facias returnable before the municipal court of Boston, in which no debt or damage is demanded, is not a civil action, and cannot be removed to the superior court. Gray v. Thrasher, 104 Mass. 373, 375. See, also, State v. Murmann (Mo.) 28 S. W. 2, 3.

A scire facias brought to recover the forfeiture on a recognizance conditioned on the appearance of the principal therein to answer a criminal charge is a civil action, and must be prosecuted in a court having civil jurisdiction. No crime attaches to the sureties for permitting a forfeiture, any more than in failing to perform any other civil contract, and a court of criminal jurisdiction, alone, has therefore, in the absence of statutory provisions, no power to issue any process for the collection of the sums forfeited. State v. Kinne, 39 N. H. 129, 135.

Seizures for violation of law.

Under a complaint and search warrant under St. 1855, c. 215, § 25, for intoxicating liquors unlawfully kept for sale, liquors were seized, and subsequently the proceedings were quashed for informality, and the liquors ordered to be returned to the claimant, who moved for costs. The court were of the opinion that this was not a civil suit or proceeding in which the claimant could recover costs of the commonwealth. The process on which the liquors were seized was a criminal process, and the proceedings after the seizure were proceedings in a criminal prosecution. Commonwealth v. Certain Intoxicating Liquors, 80 Mass. (14 Gray) 375, 376.

As used in 13 Stat. 351, providing that no witness shall be excluded in the courts of the United States in any civil action because he is a party to or interested in the issue tried, the term "civil action" "includes actions at law, suits in chancery, proceedings in admiralty, and all other judicial controversies in which the rights of property are involved, whether between private parties, or such parties and the government. It is used here in contradistinction to prosecutions for crime." A seizure of property for a violation of the internal revenue law is a civil action within the meaning of the act. United States v. Ten Thousand Cigars (U. S.) 28 Fed. Cas. 39.

Special proceedings distinguished.

"Civil cases" is defined by Code, § 2504, to include actions and special proceedings.

College of Physicians & Surgeons of Keokuk v. Guilbert, 69 N. W. 453, 455, 100 Iowa, 213.

"Civil cases," as used in Code, § 351, providing for the review of justices' judgments, is synonymous with "actions," in contradistinction to the term "special proceedings." People v. Bigelow (N. Y.) 11 How. Prac. 83, 86.

"Civil cases," as used in the Bill of Rights, § 20, providing that in civil cases the right of trial by jury shall remain inviolate, "does not include cases in equity nor special statutory proceedings, and therefore in such cases the Legislature may provide for the trial by the court without jury." Powell v. Powell, 3 N. E. 639, 641, 104 Ind. 18.

The term "civil action," as used in Code 1851, includes not only actions on the law side of the court, but actions formerly denominated "suits in equity." The term is used to distinguish civil proceedings from proceedings in other actions, and to distinguish actions from special proceedings or particular relief. Kramer v. Rebman, 9 Iowa, 114, 118.

A "civil action" is defined to be an ordinary proceeding in a court of justice by which one side prosecutes another for the enforcement or protection of a right or for the redress or prevention of a wrong. Every other civil remedy is defined to be a "special proceeding." A proceeding on a petition for the sale of estrays is a special proceeding, and not an action. In re Rafferty, 43 N. Y. Supp. 760, 761, 14 App. Div. 55.

Submission of controversy.

"Civil action," as used in Rev. St. c. 121, § 21, providing that costs may be allowed to the prevailing party in a civil action, cannot be construed to include a submission entered into before a magistrate, for neither party can be said to be the plaintiff or defendant. It is true that each stands in that relation toward the other so far as their respective claims and demands are submitted to the determination of the arbitrators, but the proceeding derives all its force and effect from the mutual assent of the parties, and in this respect essentially differs from an action at law or in equity, in which one party compels the other to appear and litigate his rights. It is therefore a civil proceeding rather than a civil action. Bond v. Fay, 83 Mass. (1 Allen) 212.

Suit.

See "Suit."

Suits in equity.

A civil case is one which involves disputes or contests between man and man, and which only terminates in the adjustment of the rights of plaintiffs and defendants, and means all cases, whatever technical appellation they may assume, in the shape of an action or chancery bill, which cannot legally be denominated "criminal cases"; and hence equity proceedings must be denominated a "civil case." Grimball v. Ross (Ga.) 1 T. U. P. Charit. 175, 181.

"Civil cases," as used in Const. art. 3, § 1, declaring that the inferior courts shall have jurisdiction of all other civil cases save those of which the superior court has jurisdiction, does not embrace equity cases. Gilbert v. Thomas, 3 Ga. (3 Kelly) 575, 578.

The term "civil action" is used in Kansas as the name of the one form of proceedings authorized by the Kansas Statutes, which abolished the distinction between law and equity. Broadway Nat. Bank v. Baker, 57 N. E. 603, 605, 176 Mass. 294.

The expression "civil action," as used in Act 1859, § 34, providing that in all civil actions, in any court of law or equity of this state, any party thereto may be sworn and examined as a witness, includes all proceedings which are not criminal, and suits in equity as well as actions at law. Smith v. Burnet, 35 N. J. Eq. (8 Stew.) 314, 320.

Civil actions include all judicial controversies in which the rights of parties are involved, whether between private parties or such parties and the government, and the term is used in contradistinction to "prosecutions for crime," and hence includes actions in equity. Fenstermacher v. State, 25 Pac. 142, 143, 19 Or. 504.

Act Cong. July 2, 1864 (13 Stat. 351), provides that in courts of the United States there shall be no exclusion of any witness on account of color, nor in any "civil actions" because he is a party to or interested in the issue tried. Held, that the phrase "civil actions" as there used was undoubtedly used as opposed to "criminal actions," and therefore includes suits in chancery as well as actions at law. Green v. United States, 76 U. S. (9 Wall.) 655, 658, 19 L. Ed. 806; Rison v. Cribbs (U. S.) 20 Fed. Cas. 833, 834.

As the term "civil cases" is used in Bill of Rights, § 20, providing that in all civil cases the right of trial by jury shall remain inviolate, it means only such cases as were known as "civil cases" before and at the time the Constitution was adopted, and does not include cases which are termed "civil cases" after the adoption of the Code abolishing the distinction between actions at law and suits in equity. Powell v. Powell, 3 N. E. 639, 641, 104 Ind. 18.

The term "civil actions," as used in the statute giving probate courts in civil cases concurrent jurisdiction with district courts where the sum involved does not exceed

$1,000, is used as opposed to "criminal cases," and includes any action in which a litigant may be entitled to a civil remedy; that is, to a remedy which is legal in its character, or to a remedy which is equitable in its character. Rogers v. Bonnett, 37 Pac. 1078, 1079, 2 Okl. 553.

Whether a proceeding is deemed civil or criminal depends upon the form permitted, not upon the question whether the penalty described is denominated a "fine" or "forfeiture." State v. McConnell (N. H.) 48 Atl. 458, 459.

Code, § 5091, enacts that the court shall render judgment without the verdict of a jury in all "civil cases founded on contract" where an issuable defense is not filed on oath. Held, that the phrase "civil cases founded on contract" means cases at law and not in equity, the words "civil cases" referring to actions at law, as also does the word "judgment." Isaacs v. Tinley, 58 Ga. 457, 459.

Suits to recover possession of land.

A suit to recover the possession of land is a civil action, and not a special proceeding. Woodley v. Gilliam, 64 N. C. 649.

Supplementary proceedings.

"Civil action," as used in Rev. St. 1881, § 412, relating to the change of venue of any civil action, includes proceedings supplementary to execution. Burkett v. Holman, 3 N. E. 406, 408, 104 Ind. 6.

Trespass quare clausum fregit.

As used in the Constitution, providing that all civil cases shall be tried in the county wherein the defendant resides, the term "civil cases" includes an action of trespass quare clausum fregit. Osmond v. Flournoy, 34 Ga. 509, 510.

CIVIL BUSINESS.

"Civil and criminal business," as used in Const. art. 8, § 5, providing that all civil and criminal business arising in any county must be tried in such county, etc., will not be held to mean simply business of the court, but as a general term to include all causes of action, and all other business which might arise in any county. Konold v. Rio Grande W. R. Co., 51 Pac. 256, 257, 16 Utah, 151.

The phrase "civil business," in Const. art. 8, § 5, providing that all civil and criminal business arising in any county must be tried in such county, unless a change of venue be taken in such cases as may be provided by law, means the fact or facts that constitute the cause of action. Condon v. Leipsiger, 55 Pac. 82, 17 Utah, 498.

The phrase "civil business," as used in Const. art. 8, § 5, providing that all civil and criminal business arising in any county must be tried in such county unless a change of venue be taken, means such civil business as amounts to a cause of action as the law defines a cause of action, so that where defendant's false and fraudulent testimony and concealment of material facts misled the court sitting in Salt Lake county, and he obtained a decree declaring plaintiff's deed to be a mortgage, an action to set the decree aside and to decree plaintiff's title to be absolute was properly brought in that county, notwithstanding the land was situated in Tooele county. Mosby v. Gisborn, 54 Pac. 121, 126, 17 Utah, 257.

CIVIL CASE.

See "Civil Action—Case—Suit—etc."

CIVIL CAUSE.

See "Civil Action—Case—Suit—etc."

CIVIL CODE.

The term "Civil Code" means the Code of Civil Procedure. Laws 1892 N. Y. c. 677, § 29.

CIVIL COMMOTION.

"Riot, insurrection, and civil commotion" were held to import occasional local or temporary outbreaks of unlawful violence, which, though temporarily destructive in their effects, did not rise to the proportions of organized rebellion against the government. Boon v. Aetna Ins. Company, 40 Conn. 575, 584.

A civil commotion must necessarily arise where there is a civil war. It is true that there may be a civil commotion without civil war, but, within an exception in an insurance policy of risks from civil commotion, it cannot be said that there was no civil commotion in Virginia between 1861 and 1865. Grame v. Mutual Assur. Soc., 5 Sup. Ct. 150, 112 U. S. 273, 28 L. Ed. 716.

The expression "civil commotion," as used in a life policy wherein it is provided that the same shall be void if the insured die by means of any civil commotion, means the wild or irregular action or tumultuous conduct on the part of any persons assembled together. Spruill v. North Carolina Mut. Life Ins. Co., 46 N. C. 126, 127.

CIVIL CONSPIRACY.

The term "civil" is used to designate a conspiracy which will furnish ground for a civil action, as where, in carrying out the design of the conspirators, overt acts were done causing legal damage, the person damaged has a right of action. It is said that the gist of civil conspiracy is the injury or damage. While criminal conspiracy does not right due from one citizen to another, the privation of which is a civil injury for which redress may be sought by a civil action. State of Iowa v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. (U. S.) 37 Fed. 497, 498, 3 L. R. A. 554 (citing Burr. L. Dict. 296).

By "civil rights which are protected by the federal Constitution" is meant those rights which the municipal law will enforce, at the instance of private individuals, for the purpose of securing to them the enjoyment of their means of happiness. They are distinguished from "natural rights," which would exist if there was no municipal law, some of which are abrogated by municipal law, while others lie outside of its scope, and still others are enforceable under it as "civil rights." "Civil rights" are also distinguishable from "political rights," which are directly concerned with the institution and administration of government. "Civil rights" include the right of every citizen to seek redress of wrongs and the enforcement of rights in the courts, and, as an incident to this, include the right of a party to testify in a criminal case in his own behalf. State v. Powers, 17 Atl. 969, 970, 51 N. J. Law (22 Vroom) 432.

The term "civil rights" ordinarily "means all those rights which the laws give a person, which depend upon the laws of the community in which he lives and of which he is a member." Bowles v. Habermann, 95 N. Y. 246, 247.

As defined by Bouvier, "civil rights are those which have no relation to the establishment, support, or management of government. These consist in the power of acquiring and enjoying property, of exercising the parental and marital power, and the like." They are the absolute rights of persons, the right of personal security, the right of personal liberty, and the right to acquire and enjoy property as regulated and protected by law. They are the rights which, according to the fundamental principles of American government, are inalienable. People v. Washington, 36 Cal. 658-662.

"A civil right is a right accorded to every member of a district or community, while a political right is a right exercisable in the administration of government. Bouvier in his Law Dictionary says: 'Political rights consist in the power to participate directly or indirectly in the establishment of government or management thereof. These political rights are fixed by the Constitution. Every citizen has the right to vote for public officers and to be elected to office. Civil rights are those which have no relation to the establishment, support, or management of the government. They consist in the power of acquiring and enjoying power to exercise the paternal or marriage relation, or the like.' It will be observed that every one, unless deprived of them by sentence of civil death, is in the enjoyment of civil rights, which is not the case with political rights. An alien, for an example, has no political rights, although in full enjoyment of the civil rights." Fletcher v. Tuttle, 37 N. E. 683, 686, 151 Ill. 41, 25 L. R. A. 143, 42 Am. St. Rep. 220.

Const. art. 2, § 3, which declares that no person shall be denied any "civil or political right, privilege or capacity" on account of his religious opinions, means that whatever civil rights, privileges, or capacities belong to or are enjoyed by citizens of the state generally, shall not be taken from or denied any person on account of any religious views that he may entertain. Hroneck v. People, 24 N. E. 861, 865, 134 Ill. 139, 8 L. R. A. 837, 23 Am. St. Rep. 652.

CIVIL SERVICE.

"Civil service" means all service rendered to and paid for by the state or nation, or by political subdivisions thereof, other than that pertaining to naval or military affairs. Hope v. City of New Orleans (La.) 30 South. 842, 843.

"Civil service," within the meaning of Laws 1899, c. 270, entitled "An act in reference to the civil service of the state of New York and the city and civil divisions thereof," includes all offices and positions of trust or employment in the service of the state, or of such civil division or city, except such offices and positions in the militia and the military departments as are or may be created under the provisions of article 11 of the Constitution." People v. Cram, 61 N. Y. Supp. 858, 861, 29 Misc. Rep. 359.

CIVIL STATUS.

Lord Westbury, in Udny v. Udny, L. R. 1 H. L. Sc. 441, said: "The law of England and of almost all civilized countries ascribes to each individual at his birth two distinct legal states or conditions; one by virtue of which he becomes the subject of some particular country, binding him by the tie of natural allegiance, and which may be called his 'political status'; another by virtue of which he has ascribed to him the character of a citizen of some particular country, and as such is possessed of certain municipal rights and subject to certain obligations, which latter character is the 'civil status' or condition of the individual, and may be quite different from his political status." United States v. Wong Kim Ark, 18 Sup. Ct. 456, 459, 169 U. S. 649, 42 L. Ed. 890.

CIVIL SUIT.

See "Civil Action—Case—Suit—etc."

CIVIL WAR.

"Custom appropriates the term 'civil war' to every war between the members of one and the same political society. If it be between part of the citizens on one side, and the sovereign, with those who continue in obedience to him, on the other—provided those in rebellion have any reason for taking up arms—nothing further is required to entitle such disturbance to the name of 'civil war' instead of 'rebellion.'" Hubbard v. Harnden Exp. Co., 10 R. I. 244, 246 (quoting Vattel, Law of Nations [Chitty's Ed.] book 3, c. 18, p. 421).

"A civil war," Vattel says, "is when a party arises in a state which no longer obeys the sovereign, and is sufficiently strong to make head against him, or when, in a republic, the nation is divided into two opposite factions, and both sides take up arms. Civil war breaks the bonds of society and of the government; it gives rise in a nation to two independent parties, who acknowledge no common judge. They are in the position of two nations who engage in disputes, and, not being able to reconcile them, have recourse to arms. The common laws of war are in civil wars to be observed on both sides. The same reasons which make them obligatory between foreign states render them more necessary in the unhappy circumstance where two exasperated parties are destroying their common country." Riquelme says: "When a faction is formed in a state which takes up arms against the sovereign in order to wrest from him the supreme power, or impose conditions on him, or when a republic is divided into two parties which mutually treat each other as enemies, this war is called 'civil war.' Civil wars frequently commence by popular tumults which in no wise concern foreign nations; but when one faction or party obtains dominion over an extensive territory, gives laws to it, administers justice, and, in a word, exercises acts of sovereignty, it is a person in the law of nations; and, however so much one of the two parties gives to the other the title of rebel or tyrant, the foreign powers which desire to maintain their neutrality ought to consider both as two states, independent as respects one another and other states, who recognize no judge of their differences." Bello Principios de Derecho Internacional, c. 10, 267; Brown v. Hiatt (U. S.) 4 Fed. Cas. 884, 887.

A civil war is a war de facto, existing within the borders of a state. "The true test of its existence, as found in the writing of the sages of the common law, may be summarily stated: When the regular course of justice is interrupted by revolt, rebellion, or insurrection, so that courts of justice cannot be kept open, civil war exists, and hostilities may be prosecuted on the same footing as if those opposing the government were foreign enemies invading the land." Prize Cases, 67 U. S. (2 Black) 635, 667, 17 L. Ed. 459.

"Civil war is what Grotius calls a 'mixed war.' It is, according to him, public on the side of the government, and private on the part of the people resisting its authority. But the general custom of nations regards such a war as entitling both the contending parties to all the rights of war as against each other, and even as respects neutral nations." Wheat. Int. Law, pt. 4, c. 1, § 7 (quoted and approved in the Prize Cases, 67 U. S. [2 Black] 635, 17 L. Ed. 459).

"A civil war exists when a party is formed in a state which no longer obeys the sovereign, and is of strength sufficient to make head against him. A civil war breaks the bands of society and government, or, at least, it suspends their force and effect." Juando v. Taylor (U. S.) 13 Fed. Cas. 1179, 1183.

War is either international or civil, foreign or domestic. Civil war is preceded by insurrection, which becomes magnified and matured into war in the legitimate sense. The American Revolution of 1776 commenced in insurrection. But the insurgent colonies soon became belligerent states. And by the Declaration of Independence civil war was inaugurated, as often and authoritatively recognized and adjudged. After the transforming event, the American resistance was no longer rebellion, but war. Bland v. Adams Exp. Co., 62 Ky. (1 Duv.) 232, 233, 234, 85 Am. Dec. 623.

Rebellion distinguished.

Civil war "includes every war between members of one and the same political society. If it is between part of the citizens on one side, and the sovereign, with those who continue in obedience to him, on the other, provided the malcontents have any reason for taking up arms, nothing further is required to entitle such disturbance to the name of 'civil war,' and not that of 'rebellion.' The term 'civil war' was anciently more commonly used to denote a contest in arms between two great parties in the state for the control of the state, but without any design of separation, but the distinction has been more extended in modern times so as to include every contest, for whatever purpose, between citizens of the same country. The term 'rebellion' is applied only to such an insurrection against lawful authority as is void of all appearance of justice. The sovereign never fails to bestow the appellation of 'rebels' on all such of his subjects as openly resist him, but when the latter have acquired sufficient strength to oblige him to carry on war according to the rules, he must necessarily submit to the terms of 'civil war.'" Hubbard v. Harnden Exp. Co., 10 R. I. 244, 247.

According to some writers upon international law, the distinction between a "civil war and rebellion is where the malcontents for any cause have taken up arms against the sovereign authority. If they have, it is termed a 'civil war.' If they have not, it is termed a 'rebellion.'" "A civil war," says Vattel, "breaks the bonds of society and government, or at least suspends their force and effect. It produces in the nation two independent parties, who consider each other as enemies, and acknowledge no common judge. These two parties, therefore, must necessarily be construed as thenceforward constituting, at least for a time, two separate, distinct societies. Though one of the parties may have been to blame in breaking the unity of the state and resisting the lawful authority, they are not the less divided in fact." It was held that the Confederate States, by seceding from the Union, did not become foreign states or have the power to confiscate the property of loyal citizens. Central Railroad & Banking Co. v. Ward, 37 Ga. 515, 526.

CIVILITER MORTUUS.

See "Civil Death."

CIVILIZATION.

"'Civilization' is a term which covers several states of society. It is relative, and has not a fixed sense, but in all its applications it is limited to a state of society above that existing among the Miami Indians. It implies an improved and progressive condition of the people, living under a recognized government, with systematized labor, individual ownership of the soil, individual accumulation of property, humane and somewhat cultivated manners and customs, the institution of the family, with well-defined and respected domestic and social relations, institutions of learning, intellectual activity, etc. We know historically that the North American Indians are classed as savage, and not as civilized people, and that in fact it is problematical whether they are susceptible of civilization. The Miami Indians are not educated above the condition of nomadic pastoral tribes, if up to it. They cannot be regarded as civilized." Roche v. Washington, 19 Ind. 53, 56, 81 Am. Dec. 376.

CIVIS.

"The word 'civis,' taken in its strictest sense, extends only to him that is entitled to the privileges of a city of which he is a member, and in that sense there is a distinction between a citizen and an inhabitant in the same city, for every inhabitant there is not a citizen." United States v. Rhodes (U. S.) 27 Fed. Cas. 785, 788 (quoting Scot v. Schwartz, Comyn, 677).

Stale claim, see "Stale."

The legal definition of the word "claim," as given by Jacobs, is: "A challenge of interest in anything that is in the possession of another, or at least out of a man's own possession;" or, as quoted by Jacobs from Clowden, giving the definition of Chief Justice Dyer, "a challenge of the ownership of property that one hath not in his possession, but which is detained from him by wrong" is a legal claim in favor of one person on the estate of another. Robinson v. Wiley, 15 N. Y. 489, 491; Saddlesvene v. Arms (N. Y.) 32 How. Prac. 280, 285; Fordyce v. Godman, 20 Ohio St. 1, 14; Jackson v. Losee, 4 Sandf. Ch. 381, 383.

To "claim," as used in a complaint alleging that the plaintiff claims of the defendant a certain sum due by promissory note, means, according to Webster, "to ask or seek to obtain by virtue of authority, right, or supposed right to demand as due; to be entitled to anything as a matter of right; the right to claim or demand; a title to any debt or privilege or other thing in possession of another." Bouvier defines it as follows: "A challenge of the ownership of a thing which a man has not in possession, and is wrongfully withheld by another." Burrill gives the following definition: "A challenge or demand by any man of the property or ownership of a thing or some interest in it which he has not in possession, but which is withholden from him wrongfully;" and as "a demand of some matter as of right to do, or to forbear to do, some act or thing as a matter of duty." It means that thereby the plaintiff asserts in himself the ownership of or the right to the money due on the promissory note, which money he has not in possession, and which is wrongfully withheld by the defendant. Douglas v. Beasley, 40 Ala. 142, 147.

A claim is, "in a just juridical sense, a demand of some matter of right made by one person upon another to do, or to forbear to do, some act or thing as a matter of duty." Prigg v. Pennsylvania, 41 U. S. (16 Pet.) 539, 615, 10 L. Ed. 1060; United States v. Spauld- ing, 13 N. W. 357, 360, 3 Dak. 85; Buhl v. Fort St. Union Depot Co., 57 N. W. 829, 832, 98 Mich. 596, 23 L. R. A. 392 (citing Coster v. City of New York, 43 N. Y. 399); Vulcan Iron Works v. Edwards, 36 Pac. 22, 23, 27 Or. 563; Fretwell v. McLemore, 52 Ala. 124, 140. It is used in this sense in Const. art. 4, § 2, providing that no person held for service or labor in one state under the laws thereof, and escaping into another, shall, in consequence of any law therein, be discharged from such service or labor, but shall be delivered up on claim to the party to whom such service or labor may be due. Prigg v. Pennsylvania, 41 U. S. (16 Pet.) 539, 615, 10 L. Ed. 1060.

"Claim," as used in Rev. St. § 5438 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3674], providing that every person making or presenting for payment any claim against the government of the United States, knowing such claim to be false, shall be imprisoned, etc., means "a demand then existing and known to be wrongful, and not a demand heretofore presented." United States v. Rhodes (U. S.) 30 Fed. 431, 433.

The word "claim" is defined to mean "a demand of anything that is in the possession of another; to demand; to require"; and such is its meaning in the compound "counterclaim." Silliman v. Eddy (N. Y.) 8 How. Prac. 122, 123.

As the term "claim" imports, it is the assertion of a demand, or the challenge of something as a matter of right. Thus, where a person notified a sheriff in writing that he owns property seized in execution, and demands possession, it is a claim for the property. Vulcan Iron Works v. Edwards, 36 Pac. 22, 23, 27 Or. 563.

The right to recover against a plaintiff in replevin the value of the property delivered to him under the right, together with damages, is a claim against plaintiff, so as to pass under a general assignment of all dues and "claims." Jackson v. Losee (N. Y.) 4 Sandf. Ch. 381, 383.

The word "claim," as used in the statute relating to the allowance of claims against a county, generally imports a matter of charge which is based on some statute, or grows out of the performance of some authorized contract, wherein the inquiry of the commissioners as to the auditor is confined to whether or not the service was rendered, and, as to other claims, to determine the amount due, as contrasted with a mere demand unsupported by law. Jones v. Lucas County Com'rs, 48 N. E. 882, 886, 57 Ohio St. 189, 63 Am. St. Rep. 710.

Code 1882, § 2537, authorizing administrators, executors, and guardians to compromise all contested or doubtful "claims of the estate" or wards, that they represent, etc., means that "which is claimed to belong or to be owing to the estate." Maynard v. Cleveland, 70 Ga. 52, 70.

The words "claims and demand," as used in Rev. St. § 1216, providing that "all claims and demands against a county shall be presented for audit and allowance to the county commissioners before any action shall be maintained thereon," embraces all claims and demands based on a money demand. Houtz v. Uinta County Com'rs (Wyo.) 70 Pac. 840, 842.

Account distinguished.

The word "claim," used in reference to the subject of judicial proceedings, with nothing in the context expressive of a contrary sense, seems to have acquired a technical meaning of "claim on contract." It is a word of more general signification than the word "account," as every account is a claim, but every claim is not an account. Cavan v. City of Brooklyn, 5 N. Y. Supp. 758, 760.

All causes of action included.

Laws 1895, p. 188, § 1, provides that any person or corporation having a claim against the state of Washington shall have a right to bring an action against the superior court of Thurston county. It was contended that the word "claim," as here used, meant a claim for money; that the statute is one in derogation of common law, and should be strictly construed. But as the statute was passed in pursuance of the state Constitution requiring the Legislature to direct by law in what manner and in what courts suits may be brought against the state, the word "claim" will be held to include all causes of action. Northwestern & Pacific Hypotheek Bank v. State, 50 Pac. 586, 587, 18 Wash. 73, 42 L. R. A. 33.

Within Const. art. 2, § 29, providing that no money shall be paid on any claim the subject-matter of which shall not have been provided by a pre-existing law, means any demand for money, legal or equitable. Fordyce v. Godman, 20 Ohio St. 1, 14.

"Claim or demand," as used in Prac. Act, § 17, providing that any claim or demand may be set off, embraces all cases arising out of contracts or agreements, expressed or implied. Nichols v. Ruckells, 4 Ill. (3 Scam.) 298, 300.

"Claim," as used in Rev. St. § 5464, providing that, when the personal and real property of a judgment debtor subject to levy and execution is not sufficient to satisfy the judgment, his interest in any money, contract, claim, or chose in action shall be subject to the payment of the judgment by action, includes demands "for money in varied forms, whether on contract, express or implied, or for damages growing out of injury to person or property." City of Cin- cinnati v. Hafer, 30 N. E. 197, 198, 49 Ohio St. 60.

As amount demanded or recoverable.

In an action on a life policy containing a provision for a deduction from the sum named in the policy of all unpaid premium notes, it appeared that by a subsequent agreement between the company, the insured, and the beneficiary it was agreed that the sum so named should be scaled down two-fifths, and a stipulation was made abandoning all "defense to the merits of the claim." Held, that the word "claim" meant all that she could recover in the action. Leonard v. Charter Oak Life Ins. Co., 33 Atl. 511, 513, 65 Conn. 529.

Within the meaning of the statute giving a justice of the peace jurisdiction of civil cases, provided the amount of money or damages or the value of the property claimed does not exceed $300, inclusive of interest and costs, the word "claimed" does not refer to the amount claimant might be entitled to demand from the defendant, but to the amount he actually does demand, and for which he claims judgment, so that a person with a claim in excess of such sum may release the portion in excess so as to give the justice jurisdiction. Junkins v. Hamilton Lumber Co., 29 S. E. 1017, 1018, 44 W. Va. 641.

Amount included.

The term "claim" is defined by Webster as "a demand made of a right, or supposed right; a calling on another for something due, or supposed to be due, as a claim for wages or services." It must state the amount claimed. Marsh v. Benton County, 39 N. W. 713, 714, 75 Iowa, 469.

"Claim for damages," within the meaning of a statute requiring a person receiving injuries caused by a defective highway to give notice to the town liable therefor, stating his claim for damages, includes the amount of such claim. Lord v. City of Saco, 32 Atl. 887, 87 Me. 231.

As assertion or pretension.

"Claim," in its primary meaning, is used to indicate the assertion of an existing right. In its secondary meaning it may be used to indicate the right itself. Appeal of Beach, 55 Atl. 596, 599, 76 Conn. 118.

"Claim" has "generally been defined as a demand for a thing, the ownership of which or an interest in which is in the claimant, but the possession of which is wrongfully withheld by another. In common parlance, a 'claim' means an assertion; a pretension. When 'claim' is used as a verb, many respectable writers seem to regard it as a synonym for state, urge, insist, or assert." Ovirs v. Jennings (N. Y.) 6 Daly, 434, 446.

A contract whereby the purchaser agrees to keep a certain machine "if it is satisfactory or does what is claimed for it" would be construed so as to bind the purchaser if the machine met the conditions of the warranty, whether the purchaser was satisfied with it or not. Clark v. Rice, 9 N. W. 427, 428, 46 Mich. 308.

"Claim," as used in Civ. Code, § 672, providing that if a nonresident alien takes by succession he must "appear and claim" the property within five years, relates to an appearance and claim to be proved by acts within the state indicating that the alien asserts a right to the property. State v. Smith, 12 Pac. 121, 123, 70 Cal. 153.

As belief in ownership.

"The term 'claim' implies an active assertion of right, the demand for its recognition. This assertion and demand need not be made in words. The party may specify by acts in their support, as by the payment of taxes, the erection of improvements, etc. The expression of a belief as to the ownership of a thing is not equivalent to a claim of ownership." Grube v. Wells, 34 Iowa, 148, 151.

Bounty.

A "claim against the United States" is a right to demand money from the United States. Hobbs v. McLean, 117 U. S. 567, 6 Sup. Ct. 870, 29 L. Ed. 940. Under such provision a claim for bounties for growing sugar not yet earned is not a claim against the United States. Milliken v. Barrow (U. S.) 65 Fed. 888, 894.

A claim is a demand of some matter as of right, made by one person upon another, to do or forbear to do some act or thing as a matter of duty. The right of a person to bounty from the state for killing coyotes is a "claim," within the provision that the contractor must not draw his warrant for any claim until it is approved by the board of examiners. Ingram v. Colgan, 38 Pac. 315, 316, 106 Cal. 113, 28 L. R. A. 187, 46 Am. St. Rep. 221.

As cause of action or defense.

The word "claim," as used in Code, § 139, providing for the amendment of pleadings to conform to the facts proven when such amendment does not change substantially the claim or defense, is synonymous with "cause of action." Ellis v. Flaherty, 70 Pac. 586, 587, 65 Kan. 621.

As used in Code Civ. Proc. § 531, providing that the court may in any case direct a bill of the particulars of the claim of either party to be delivered to the adverse party, the word "claim" cannot be construed as synonymous with "demand" and "cause of action," and as intended to express only the ground, or cause of action, on which some affirmative relief is asked of the court, and in cases only in which affirmative relief is asked, but as applied to a defendant means whatever is set up by him as a reason why the action may not be maintained against him. "The claim of the defendant is that ground of fact which he alleges in his answer as the reason why judgment should not go against him. His claim in the case is the position he takes in his pleading, based upon the facts he sets up, and the law applied thereto, why he should go without day." Dwight v. Germania Life Ins. Co., 84 N. Y. 493, 503; Tilton v. Beecher, 59 N. Y. 176, 183, 17 Am. Rep. 337; Marco v. Bird, 53 N. Y. Supp. 411, 412, 24 Misc. Rep. 377; Cunningham v. Massena Springs & F. C. R. Co., 3 N. Y. Supp. 98, 99, 50 Hun, 605, 16 Civ. Proc. R. 244.

The word "claim," as used in a statute authorizing a bill of particulars where an account is pleaded, or where the claim of a party is lacking in definiteness, is co-extensive with "case," and embraces all causes of action and all grounds of defense, the pleas of both parties and pleas of confession and avoidance, no less than complaints and counterclaims. It warrants the court to require a defendant who justifies in a libel suit to furnish particulars of the facts relied on in justification. Orvis v. Jennings (N. Y.) 6 Daly, 434, 446.

The word "claim," as used in Code, § 147, providing that the court may amend any pleading by striking out the name of any party, etc., when the amendment does not change substantially the claim or defense, means the plaintiff's right of action appearing by the pleadings. Irwin v. Paulett, 1 Kan. 418, 426.

The word "claim," as used in 2 Rev. St. p. 541, § 2, prohibiting a submission to an arbitrator respecting the claim of any person to any estate in fee or for life to real estate, must be construed to mean the allegation on which issue is taken, the fact or matter put in issue to be tried, and which must be determined before an award can be made. The claim to an estate in any particular description in lands is a claim that such estate is in the claimant, and a decision on it would necessarily determine whether the estate was in the claimant or not. Olcott v. Wood, 14 N. Y. (4 Kern.) 32, 39.

Nat. Bankr. Law, 13 Stat. 108, provides that, if a greater rate of interest has been paid than is lawful, the person paying the same may recover back in an action of debt twice the amount of interest thus paid. Held, that the right of action given by the statute is a claim of debt, which passes to the assignee in bankruptcy under the provisions of the bankrupt law. Wright v. First Nat. Bank (U. S.) 30 Fed. Cas. 673, 674.

Claims ex delicto.

The word "claim" is sufficiently comprehensive to embrace actions founded on tort as well as actions founded on contract. In its popular sense the word "claim" is usually applied to a demand founded in agreement or contract, and is seldom used when referring to a demand for damages a party may sustain in consequence of a wrong or injury done to his person or property. It is used in the latter sense in Rev. St. c. 102, § 102, which provides that in all trials of actions before a justice of the peace, or in the county court, if the claim of the plaintiff or any part thereof be denied by the defendant, it shall be lawful for the plaintiff to require of the defendant to answer on oath to such claims, etc. Carna v. Litchfield, 2 Mich. 340, 342.

The words "account or claim," as used in the Michigan statute providing that no account or claim or contract shall be received by a city for audit or allowance unless it shall be accompanied by an affidavit of the person rendering it, are not enough to cover unliquidated claims for personal injuries in an action ex delicto. Griswold v. City of Ludington, 74 N. W. 663, 667, 116 Mich. 401 (citing Lay v. City of Adrian, 75 Mich. 438, 42 N. W. 959). The word "claim," when used in some relations, may be broad enough to include a claim for damages in an action ex delicto, but, as used in a charter providing that no suit shall be maintained against the city on any account or claim unless the same be presented to the council, does not apply to actions ex delicto. Snyder v. City of Albion, 71 N. W. 475, 113 Mich. 275.

The judicial construction given to the words "claim or demand," as used in Wisconsin laws, providing that no action on any claim or demand shall be maintained against a city until such person shall have presented his claim or demand to the common council for allowance, etc., is that they include only claims arising on contract. Mason v. City of Ashland, 74 N. W. 357, 358, 98 Wis. 540. See, also, Nance v. Falls City, 20 N. W. 109, 16 Neb. 85; Bradley v. City of Eau Claire, 14 N. W. 10, 11, 56 Wis. 168; Van Frachen v. City of Ft. Howard, 60 N. W. 1062, 1063, 88 Wis. 570; Jung v. City of Stevens Point, 43 N. W. 513, 514, 74 Wis. 547; Vogel v. City of Antigo, 51 N. W. 1008, 81 Wis. 642; Sommers v. City of Marshfield, 62 N. W. 937, 90 Wis. 59. See, also, Flieth v. City of Wausau, 67 N. W. 731, 93 Wis. 446; Kelley v. City of Madison, 48 Wis. 638, 645, 28 Am. Rep. 576.

The word "claim," as used in section 87 of chapter 18, Comp. St. 1897, requiring a claimant to verify his claim by affidavit before it shall be allowed against a county, refers to demands arising ex contractu and not to those founded on torts, and, taken in connection with section 23, conferring on the board the power to examine and settle all claims against the county, is limited to accounts. Perkins County v. Keith County, 78 N. W. 630, 631, 58 Neb. 323.

The word "claim," as used in the charter of a city providing that no claim against the city shall be sued on until a statement thereof shall have been filed for consideration by the general council, and either rejected or held for a certain period without action, is comprehensive enough to include charges against the city arising in tort as well as ex contractu. The legislative intention was to protect the city from expenses of unnecessary litigation by affording it opportunity to settle and discharge its liabilities without suit, and the same necessity exists for such protection in respect to torts as in other claims. Barrett v. City of Mobile, 30 South. 36, 38, 129 Ala. 179, 87 Am. St. Rep. 54.

A claim for damages against a municipal corporation on account of negligence is not covered by the provisions of section 3245, Code Civ. Proc., providing that costs cannot be awarded to the plaintiff in an action against a municipal corporation in which the plaintiff demands a judgment for a sum of money only, unless the claim upon which the action is founded was presented for payment to the chief fiscal officer of the corporation. Hunt v. City of Oswego, 14 N. E. 97, 107 N. Y. 629; Gage v. Village of Hornellsville, 12 N. E. 817, 106 N. Y. 667.

The words "claim or account," used in speaking of the statutory requirement that claims or accounts be presented to a city before suit is brought thereon, were said, in Harrigan v. City of Brooklyn, 23 N. E. 741, 119 N. Y. 630, to naturally indicate claims on contract which can in ordinary course be adjusted by the comptroller or chief financial officers or officer of the city. In Cavan v. City of Brooklyn, 23 N. E. 741, 119 N. Y. 630, the court, in passing on the same question, stated that the construction adopted was controlled by the fact that the word "account" was used as well as "claim," and it was said that when they are associated together the latter is restricted to the genus of demands to which the former belongs—those on contracts. Pulitzer v. City of New York, 62 N. Y. Supp. 587, 588, 48 App. Div. 6; Cavan v. City of Brooklyn, 5 N. Y. Supp. 758, 760; Cavan v. City of Brooklyn, 2 N. Y. Supp. 21, 22. The term "account or claim," as used in Laws 1888, c. 5583, tit. 22, § 30, declaring that the comptroller may require any person presenting for settlement an account or claim against a city to be examined regarding it, is construed to mean accounts or claims arising ex contractu. Harrigan v. City of Brooklyn, 5 N. Y. Supp. 673, 674, 52 Hun, 615.

"Claim," as used in Consolidation Act, c. 410, § 123, providing that the controller may require any person presenting for settlement an account or claim against the corporation to be sworn as to any facts relative to its justness, includes claims for damages for personal injuries. In re Dasent, 2 N. Y. Supp. 609.

"Claim or demand," in Greater New York Charter, § 262, providing that no action for any cause whatsoever shall be maintained against the city unless the complaint shows that 30 days have elapsed since the demand or claim upon which such action was founded was presented to the city, includes claims or demands arising in tort, as well as claims arising in contract. Pulitzer v. City of New York, 62 N. Y. Supp. 587, 588, 48 App. Div. 6.

Buffalo City Charter, Act April 13, 1853, tit. 5, § 1, provides that no liquidated account or claim shall be received for audit unless accompanied by an affidavit to the effect that the person presenting the claim verily believes the services or property therein charged for have been actually performed or delivered. Held that, since the word "claim" was used in connection with the word "account," whatever signification might be given to it under other circumstances, it was qualified and limited by the language with which it was connected, and meant claims for services performed or property furnished under contract, and that the prices, quantity of the property, and the extent of the services, should be set forth in the affidavit. Howell v. City of Buffalo, 15 N. Y. 512, 517.

An action on the case against a common carrier to recover damages for goods lost in transit is founded on a contract or engagement, and is technically a "claim." Campbell v. Perkins, 8 N. Y. (4 Seld.) 430, 439.

Code, §§ 227, 229, declares that an attachment may be issued whenever it shall appear by affidavit that a cause of action exists against the defendant, specifying the amount of the claim and the grounds thereof, etc. Held, that the word "claim" is used as equivalent to "debt" or "demand" which defendant is bound to pay or discharge by contract, and hence no attachment for a tort is authorized. Saddlesvene v. Arms (N. Y.) 32 How. Prac. 280, 285.

Confession implied.

"Claimed and demanded," as used in a plea by the defendant referring to the amount by the plaintiff claimed and demanded to be due to him from the defendant for work done, etc., are equivalent to the word "supposed," and constitute a sufficient confession. Scadding v. Eyles, 9 Adol. & E. 858, 860, 862.

Contingent claims.

Dower interest on the part of the wife is an inchoate or contingent right, which may be released, but cannot be the subject of grant or assignment. And so, where one agreed with the husband to indemnify him against any "claim of dower" by his wife, no breach could happen until the contingency arose which would legally vest in the wife a substantial claim. The agreement would not enable the husband to maintain an action on account of money which he had been obliged to pay his wife to secure her signature to a deed to land which he had sold. Durrett v. Piper, 58 Mo. 551, 554.

2 Wag. St. p. 1022, § 53, relating to actions to quiet title, and providing that any person having a claim adverse to the estate of the petitioner may be summoned into court to show cause, etc., means every right, title, and claim in conflict with petitioner's title, whether the right or claim amounts to a technical title or not; and hence an unassigned dower interest is a claim adverse to the estate of the petitioner within the statute. Benoist v. Murrin, 47 Mo. 537, 539.

Debt synonymous.

See "Debt."

Demand distinguished.

The word "claim" means "a challenge of ownership," says Plowden. A challenge of interest in a thing which another hath in possession, or at least out of the possession of the claimant. The word implies that the right is in dispute or in doubt; therefore "claim" may be made by two or more at the same time. It differs from "demand," in that the latter presupposes that the person making the demand is the sole owner of the property demanded. Demand is peremptory, while claim supposes debate, litigation, and decision of the right. Prigg v. Pennsylvania, 41 U. S. (16 Pet.) 539, 573, 575, 10 L. Ed. 1060.

Forfeiture.

The word "claim," as used in Rev. St. § 829 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 636], which declares that, when a debt or claim in admiralty is settled by the parties without the sale of the property, the marshal shall be entitled to a commission of 1 per cent. on the first $500 by the claim or decree, and ½ of 1 per cent. on the excess of the sum thereafter from $500, is not employed to mean a personal demand alone, but embraces a case where the government is seeking to enforce a forfeiture against a vessel for a violation of the custom laws. United States v. The Captain John (U. S.) 41 Fed. 147, 150.

Gratuities.

The legal meaning of the word "claim," without other qualifying language, is a demand for something as a right, something that could be in law the subject of a demand; and hence, as used in the statute providing that any person who shall speculate or purchase for a less sum than that to which each may be entitled the claim of any pensioner shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, the word "claim" refers alone to the warrant issued for a pension, and until the warrant has been issued the legislative provision for a pension is not a contract between the state and the pensioner, pension legislation being largely founded on charitable considerations, on an idea of a gift to the pensioner for his future support. Gill v. Dixon, 42 S. E. 538, 539, 131 N. C. 87.

"Claim" is defined to be a demand of a right or alleged right, a calling on another for something due or asserted to be due, as a claim of wages for services, and does not include a mere request or petition for gratuities or appropriations based on sentimental or moral grounds. Allen v. Board of State Auditors, 81 N. W. 113, 114, 122 Mich. 324, 47 L. R. A. 117, 80 Am. St. Rep. 573. See, also, Gill v. Dixon, 42 S. E. 538, 539, 131 N. C. 87.

Const. art. 9, § 9, declares that the Legislature shall provide by law that all claims on the treasury shall be examined and adjusted by the Auditor, and approved by the Secretary of State, before any warrant for the amount allowed shall be drawn. Held, that the term "claims on the treasury" should be construed to mean claims which the state is or may be under legal obligation to pay, such as the salaries of the officers and employes, the costs of erecting buildings, and the expense attendant on the maintenance of its prisons, asylums, schools, and other institutions, and does not include the appropriation of a specific sum by the Legislature to a particularly named person as a donation, gift, or reward for which the state was under no legal obligation. State v. Moore, 59 N. W. 755, 757, 40 Neb. 854, 25 L. R. A. 774.

Incumbrances on land.

"Claims," as used in a deed conveying real property, and warranting the same against all claims whatsoever, includes incumbrances. "Claims" is a broad term, and to the common understanding would embrace incumbrances, at least where they are in the nature of money charges." Hollingsworth v. Johnson, 11 N. W. 843, 844, 48 Mich. 140.

Judgment distinguished.

See "Judgment."

As liability.

"Claim," as used in a deed declaring that the grantor agrees to indemnify the grantee against the claim or demand of a third person, did not mean, and could not be construed to import, an agreement to indemnify against a liability, but only imported an agreement to indemnify after the grantee had been damaged or suffered damage from such claim, which was a necessary element of an action to recover on such agreement. Aberdeen v. Blackmar (N. Y.) 6 Hill, 324, 326.

As offer to vote.

The word "claims," as used in Const. art. 2, § 1, providing that every white male citizen of the United States of the age of 21 years who shall have been a resident of the state six months next preceding the election, and of the county in which he claims his vote 60 days, shall be entitled to vote at all elections authorized by law, means to demand a right or a supposed right. When the right is asserted it is "claimed," though it may not be granted. It may be asserted by words or other means. Etymologically, it by no means implies that place or presence are essential to its potency or completeness. On the other hand, to offer to do is to bring to or before; to present for acceptance or rejection; to exhibit something that may be taken or received or not. While it may be true that to offer to vote by ballot is to present one's self with proper qualifications at the time and place appointed and make manual delivery of the ballot to the officers appointed by law to receive it, it by no means necessarily follows that the same would be the meaning of the word "claims" as used in the Constitution. The one does not imply so conclusively as the other the idea of a personal presence in order to assert the right. In substance the word "claims" means that the person cannot claim to be an elector in any other county than where he has a 60 days' residence. Morrison v. Springer, 15 Iowa, 304, 346.

Order of restitution.

The word "claim," as used in the bankruptcy law of July 1, 1898, c. 541, 30 Stat. 544 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3418], authorizing appeals from a judgment of the District Court allowing or rejecting a debt or claim of $500 or over, is used in the sense of a moneyed demand or debt, and not to enlarge the statute so that an order of restitution made in favor of an intervener claiming property in the hands of an assignee is not a claim. In re Whitener (U. S.) 105 Fed. 180, 187, 44 C. C. A. 434.

As owns or claims to own.

Rev. St. § 2767, provides that, when the answer of a garnishee discloses that any other person than defendant claims the indebtedness or property in his hands, the court may order such person to be interpleaded as a defendant to the garnishee action. Held, that the word "claim," as used in such statute, was used in its ordinary meaning and with its ordinary force. "It is the active transitive verb, and has the force of 'asks for' or 'demands as his due,' and is not equivalent to the phrase 'has a right to' or 'owns.'" John R. Davis Lumber Co. v. First Nat. Bank, 58 N. W. 743, 744, 87 Wis. 435.

The disclosure of a garnishee declaring that the property in his hands "was the property of" certain persons was not synonymous with the word "claims," as used in Rev. St. § 2767, providing that, when the answer of a garnishee discloses that any other person than defendant claims the indebtedness or property in his hands, the court may order such claimant interpleaded, the term "claims" in the statute being used in the sense of "asks for" or "demands as his due," and not being equivalent to the phrase "has a right to" or "owns." John R. Davis Lumber Co. v. First Nat. Bank, 58 N. W. 743, 744, 87 Wis. 435.

Wag. St. p. 192, § 52, providing that in attachment proceedings "any person claiming property, etc., may interplead," means only such persons as claim to own the property by a title in their own right, and does not include a garnisher of a debt of the attachment debtor. Abernathy v. Whitehead, 69 Mo. 28, 31.

As personalty.

See "Personal Property."

A power of attorney to sell "claims and effects" means personal property, and cannot be construed to embrace real estate. De Cordova v. Knowles, 37 Tex. 19, 20.

Security included.

In a writing that in consideration of having and receiving three notes (describing them), all said notes to be fully paid in accordance with their terms, "I hereby discharge and relinquish all claims I have upon you and upon the estate," the word "claim" should probably be interpreted as referring to indebtedness merely, and not to the collaterals securing the notes. Shipman v. Lord, 44 Atl. 215, 217, 58 N. J. Eq. 380.

"Claims of the state," as used in the Constitution of New York of 1846 forbidding the release or compromise of claims of the state against any incorporated company, means, with reference to a railroad company, a lien on the road, as well as the mere liability of the corporation, the security for its payment, as well as the debt itself. Darby v. Wright (U. S.) 6 Fed. Cas. 1187, 1189.

Stockholder's liability.

Whenever the words "claim," "demand," and "liability" have been the subject of judicial construction, it has always been agreed that they have a broader signification than the word "debt," and hence an assessment on a stockholder made after an assignment for creditors is provable as a claim or demand against the assigned estate. Hill v. Graham, 53 Pac. 1060, 1063, 11 Colo. App. 536.

The word "claim" in its ordinary use has a broad meaning, and has been construed as synonymous with "cause of action," and, as used in a statute relating to the presentation of claims against an estate, it will be held to include every species of liability which the executor or administrator can be called on to pay or to provide for the payment of out of the general fund belonging to the estate, and thus includes a claim on account of the liability of decedent as a stockholder, though the amount, if any, which will have to be paid, is not known as a claim. Barto v. Stewart, 59 Pac. 480, 481, 21 Wash. 605.

Taxes.

Within a contract providing for the purchase of a mechanic's lien if it was a first claim on the property, the term "claim" was broad and comprehensive enough to include taxes. Dodson v. Crocker (S. D.) 94 N. W. 391, 393.

A tax bill which the taxpayer has promised the sheriff to pay, being a cause of action, is a claim within Code, c. 50, § 148, making a constable's bond liable for any claim intrusted to him to sue upon or collect. State v. Barnes, 43 S. E. 131, 132, 52 W. Va. 85.

As valid claim.

By the word "claim" in a bond a valid claim for an actual indebtedness is meant, where, to extinguish a debt to the assignee, claims are assigned, and a bond given conditioned "that the said claims are not less than the amounts so set forth as aforesaid," the claims being severally described in the assignment and bond as "a claim . . . for money due and to become due shortly for sprinkler equipments and appliances, said claim being not less than" a certain amount. Mallers v. Crane Co., 60 N. E. 804, 805, 191 Ill. 181.

In an action on an indemnity bond which indemnified an insurance company against the claims of a certain person upon certain insurance moneys, it was said it will be seen that the question is whether the word "claims" as used in the bond was intended to include only such as were valid and which were in fact enforced by legal proceedings, or was intended to embrace such as were asserted by legal proceedings, causing the necessary expenditure to the conveyance, although ultimately adjudged invalid. It was held that the word "claims" embraced not only valid claims, but any claims, whether valid or otherwise, that might subject the party indemnified to costs, delay, or expense. Home Ins. Co. v. Watson, 59 N. Y. 390, 394.

Witness' certificate against county.

The term "claim," in Cr. Code, § 3931, providing that any public officer who deals in claims against the county shall be fined, includes a witness' certificate, commonly known as "a grand jury ticket," issued under the statute, by the foreman of the grand jury, which recites the amount due such grand juror. Scruggs v. State, 20 South. 642, 643, 111 Ala. 60.

Wrongful acts of revenue officers.

Comp. St. c. 18, § 37, requiring the presentation of claims to a county for audit and allowance before bringing suit thereon, includes a cause of action against the county under Revenue Act 1869, § 71, providing that when, by the mistake or wrongful act of the treasurer or other officer, land has been sold on which no tax is due at the time, the county shall hold the purchaser harmless by paying him the amount of the principal and interest. Richardson County v. Hull, 45 N. W. 53, 28 Neb. 810; Fuller v. Colfax County, 50 N. W. 1044, 1047, 33 Neb. 716.

The word "claim," as used in Rev. St. c. 13, §§ 40, 42, providing that an appeal may be taken from any disallowance of a claim against the county board of supervisors, means only those claims which arise in some matter of debt and credit on the score of contract or some fiduciary relation, and does not embrace a claim for taxes paid through the wrongful or illegal conduct of the assessor. Stringham v. Winnebago County Sup'rs, 24 Wis. 594, 602.

Judgments against collectors for an excess of duty collected are not claims against the United States, within the meaning of Rev. St. § 3477 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 2320], which makes void transfers and assignments of any "claim" upon the United States unless executed in a certain manner. Burke v. Davis (U. S.) 63 Fed. 456, 458.

The cause of action against a city to recover money paid on a wrongful assessment of property for local improvements is based upon tort, and is not a "claim or demand" within the meaning of a provision of the charter declaring that "it shall be a sufficient bar and answer to any action or proceeding in any court for the collection of any demand or claim that it has not been presented to the common council for audit or allowance, or if on contract, that it was presented without a proper affidavit and rejected for that reason." Howell v. City of Buffalo, 15 N. Y. 512, 516.

For patent to public land.

Act Cong. March 3, 1887, c. 359, § 1, 24 Stat. 505 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 752], gives the Court of Claims jurisdiction over all claims founded on the Constitution of the United States, on any contract, express or implied, with the government of the United States, in respect to which claims the party would be entitled to redress against the United States, either in a court of law, equity, or admiralty, if the United States were suable. Held, that the word "claim" is broad and comprehensive in its signification, as comprehensive as any of its synonyms—demand, pretension, right, privilege, or title—and does not mean merely money demand. It embraces a claim to a patent to lands earned by a land-grant railroad company. Southern Pac. R. Co. v. United States (U. S.) 38 Fed. 55, 56.

The word "claim" in Rev. St. § 5421 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3667], includes a claim to exercise the right of pre-emption, or a claim of right to bounty lands, and the claim to thereby acquire from the United States title to the public lands. United States v. Spaulding, 13 N. W. 357, 360, 3 Dak. 85.

"Claim," as used in Act March 3, 1887, c. 359, 24 Stat. 505 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 752], giving the United States Circuit Court jurisdiction over all claims founded on the Constitution or any law of Congress, except for pensions or on a contract with the United States, means a demand made of right by one on another, and is not limited to claims which are a money demand. It includes a claim by a purchaser or his assignee of timber land, under the act of 1878, to have a patent issue for the same. Jones v. United States (U. S.) 35 Fed. 561, 565.

"Claim," as used in 3 Stat. 771, making it criminal to transmit or present, or cause to be transmitted or presented, to any office or officer of the government of the United States any account or claim with intent to defraud the United States, "is not limited to a demand for money, but extends to a claim for bounty land." United States v. Wilcox (U. S.) 28 Fed. Cas. 597, 598.

Of exemption.

A claim or right to claim an exemption of property from execution is not a claim within a representation that the property is free from claims or incumbrances. Robinson v. Wiley, 15 N. Y. 489, 491.

To public land.

"Claim," as used in Act Cong. July 2, 1864, § 19, granting lands to a railroad company, was intended to include all claims to pre-emption or homestead formerly entered and recognized by the land department, without regard to their continuance or final protection as against the government, and did not mean merely that such an interest must have attached as should afterwards ripen into a perfect title or right to a patent. Burlington & M. R. R. Co. v. Abink, 15 N. W. 317, 14 Neb. 95.

"Claim," as used in a written instrument for the sale of a claim on a certain section of government land, being used in connection with public lands, has a known and definite signification, and refers and relates to a settler's right on a tract of land the fee of which is in the government. Bowman v. Torr, 3 Iowa (3 Clarke) 571, 573.

In various uses.

The term "claims," as used in Cherokee Treaty, providing for the payment of money to the Cherokees, and declaring that they should receive their due proportion of all personal benefits accruing under the treaty for their claims, improvements, and per capita, had reference to demands for spoiliations of their property, which existed prior to the treaty. Eastern Band of Cherokee Indians v. United States, 6 Sup. Ct. 718, 728, 117 U. S. 288, 29 L. Ed. 880.

Act Cong. July 4, 1864, § 13, prohibiting any agent or attorney from withholding any part of the pension recovered from a "claim," means a person who under the act has a claim pending before the Pension Office. United States v. Benecke, 98 U. S. 447, 449, 25 L. Ed. 192.

Plaintiff and defendant agreed to terminate a lease, and defendant agreed to pay plaintiff a balance of rent then due. Subsequently they both signed an agreement terminating the lease, which contained the words "in full of all claims, rents or demands or amount of either party against the other." Held, that since the business in hand was the termination of the lease, and the damages sustained by reason of it, the words "claims, rents or demands" should be construed as meaning only those growing out of the termination of the lease, and not the rent due prior to its termination. "Any other construction," says the court, "would include the settlement of claims not contemplated by the parties." Schork v. Moritz, 6 N. Y. Supp. 554, 555.

"Claims," as used in Code, § 188, providing that when a claim shall be placed in the hands of any sheriff for collection he shall be liable for not using due diligence, means such claims as are within the jurisdiction of a justice of the peace and may be collected by judgment and process of execution granted by that magistrate, and does not apply to execution issuing from a superior or other court of record. Brunhild v. Potter, 12 S. E. 55, 56, 107 N. C. 415.

"Claims," as used in a contract of a stock exchange, authorizing an arbitration and decision of all "claims" and matters of difference between members of the exchange which may be brought before them, and arising from transactions in bonds, bullion, stocks, or other securities, or from any transaction in money, means such claims only as involve stock-exchange transactions, and not transactions having no reference thereto. Bernheim v. Keppler, 69 N. Y. Supp. 803, 805, 34 Misc. Rep. 321.

Gen. St. (Rev. 1875, tit. 18, c. 11, pt. 2) provides that commencement of proceedings in insolvency shall dissolve attachments of the debtor's property, and the attaching creditors shall be allowed the amount of their legal costs accruing before the appointment of a trustee, which shall be paid before any other claims. Held, that the word "claims" meant not only debts contracted by the debtor personally before the appointment of the trustee, but expenses incurred by the trustee in the protection and care of the property, his compensation for services, and the fees of the court. Appeal of Emerson, 14 Atl. 295, 297, 56 Conn. 98.

CLAIM (In Patent Law).

"Claim," as used in patent law, is the specification, by the applicant for a patent, of the particular things in which he insists his invention is novel and patentable. The claim in the application is required and designed to make the patentee define precisely what his invention is, and the specifications of the patent outside of the claim cannot be resorted to to alter or enlarge it, though they are admissible to explain it. White v. Dunbar, 7 Sup. Ct. 72, 73, 119 U. S. 47, 30 L. Ed. 303.

The purpose of a claim to a patent is to designate the limits of the machinery or combination which the patentee has invented, or discovered. A claim for a machine or for a combination of mechanical devices is insufficient or invalid because it does not include mechanical devices for uniting and operating the elements of a machine or combination which would readily suggest themselves to mechanics skilled in the art, or which are described in the specifications and drawings. Brammer v. Schroeder (U. S.) 106 Fed. 918, 930, 46 C. C. A. 41.

CLAIM AGAINST ESTATE.

"Claim," as used in Code 1871, § 758, making a person incompetent as a witness to establish his own claim against the estate of a deceased person which originated during the lifetime of such deceased, includes any demand or right asserted and relied on in the action against the estate. Jacks v. Bridewell, 51 Miss. 881, 887. As used in Code 1871, § 758, providing that no person shall testify as a witness to establish his "claim" against the estate of a deceased person which originated during the lifetime of the deceased, it includes any demand or right asserted and relied on as against the estate of a deceased person. Rothschild v. Hatch, 54 Miss. 554, 560 (citing Lamar v. Williams, 39 Miss. 342).

As used in Code 1876, § 2597, providing that all claims against the estate of a deceased person must be presented within a certain time after they have accrued, or after the granting of letters testamentary or of administration, or be barred, the word "claim" is almost the synonym of "money demands," for it is required to be presented only when money is claimed to be due. It has no reference to property alleged to be withheld. It must be payable in money, although it is not necessary that it should be due and payable presently. A debt not yet due is a "claim" within the meaning of the statute. It is the asserted liability of decedent and his estate to pay a sum of money (Bouv. Law. Dict.); "a demand as of right" (Worcester Dict.); "a demand of a right or supposed right" (Webster's Dict.); "a calling on another for something due or supposed to be due" (Imperial Dict.). McDowell v. Brantley, 80 Ala. 173, 177.

The term "claim," as used in Probate Act, § 138, declaring that any claim against a decedent's estate must be presented to the administrator before an action may be brought thereon, has reference only to such duties or demands against the decedent as might have been enforced in his lifetime by personal actions for the recovery of money, and of which only a money judgment could have been rendered. Fallon v. Butler, 21 Cal. 24, 29, 81 Am. Dec. 140; Toulouse v. Burkett, 10 Pac. 26, 28, 2 Idaho (Hasb.) 184. And such is its use in Comp. Laws, p. 1647, which is a like statute. O'Doherty v. Toole (Ariz.) 15 Pac. 28, 32. Such also is its use in Code Civ. Proc. § 1880, providing that parties to an action or proceeding against an executor or administrator on a "claim or demand" against the estate of the deceased cannot be witnesses. In re McCausland's Estate, 52 Cal. 568, 577. See, also, In re Swain's Estate, 8 Pac. 497, 500, 67 Cal. 637.

"Claims," as used in Code, §§ 147, 151, requiring that creditors shall present their claims for allowance to the administrator of a decedent, etc., means and applies only to such claims and demands as were debts against a decedent during his life which might have been enforced against the deceased by an action during his life, and does not include nor apply to expenses incurred nor disbursements made by the administrator in his management of the estate, which latter claims are conclusive only after having been allowed by the probate court on settlement of the accounts of the administrator after notice to the parties interested. Dobson v. Nevitt, 6 Pac. 358, 360, 5 Mont. 518, 520.

A statute requiring an administrator to file an itemized account of claims "against the estate" does not include his expense in conducting an unauthorized business with the estate funds. In re Rose's Estate, 22 Pac. 86, 87, 80 Cal. 166.

"The term 'claims' in Rev. Code, § 2239, providing that all claims against the estate of a deceased person must be presented within 18 months after the grant of letters testamentary or of administration, and if not presented within that time are forever after barred, includes every demand to which a personal representative can or ought to respond." Fretwell v. McLemore, 52 Ala. 124, 145.

Balance on account.

A balance struck on an account between parties is such a demand as would constitute a cause of action or claim against deceased; so a suit brought on such a cause of action against a deceased in his lifetime would have been maintainable, and a statement of such a cause of action in the complaint would have been sufficient to support a judgment against him, and be sufficient for that purpose. It would also be sufficient after his death, if presented to his administrator properly verified, to constitute a valid claim against his estate. In re Swain's Estate, 8 Pac. 497, 500, 67 Cal. 637.

Contingent claims.

The "claims" referred to in a statute requiring probate and registration of "claims" against the estates of decedents are those arising out of matter of private contract—debts contracted by the decedent; and a contingent liability, though springing from a contract, such as that of a surety upon the bond of a guardian, is not required to be propounded for probate; nor does the claim of the creditor of a corporation against the estate of a stockholder, under the statute, to recover the balance unpaid on the stocks owned by him. Robinett v. Starling, 18 South. 421, 422, 72 Miss. 652.

Within the meaning of an act providing that no action shall be maintained against an estate unless commenced within one year from the time the claim is allowed or established, the word "claim" will not include a claim allowed and established against a guardian on whose bond the decedent was surety, but means a claim allowed and established against the decedent's estate itself. Holden v. Turrell, 90 N. W. 395, 396, 86 Minn. 214.

Establishment of conveyance or trust.

The term "claim or demand," as used in Rev. St. § 5957, providing that parties to an action against an executor or administrator upon a claim or demand against the estate of deceased persons are incompetent to testify as to any matter or fact occurring before the death of such person, embraces all rights of action for the establishment of a trust in land, as well as claims or demands for debts or damages against the estate of the deceased person. Rice v. Rigley, 61 Pac. 290, 296, 7 Idaho, 115.

An action by a wife against the administrator of her husband's estate to establish a conveyance of certain land from her husband to her, and to quiet the title, is not an action to enforce a "claim," within Code Civ. Proc. § 1880, making incompetent as witnesses parties or assignors of parties or persons in whose behalf an action or proceeding is prosecuted upon a claim against the estate of a decedent as to any matter occurring before his death. Poulson v. Stanley, 55 Pac. 605, 606, 122 Cal. 655, 68 Am. St. Rep. 73.

Partnership matters.

St. 361, § 55, relating to the settlement of estates, and providing that the creditors shall exhibit their "claims" to the commissioners for allowance within a certain time, should be construed to include a debt due from a company or partnership, though a member of the partnership is surviving. It is a debt or claim against the estate of the deceased partner, because, first, it is within the fair and just construction of the language and the object of the statute; secondly, because a partnership debt is several as well as joint. Camp v. Grant, 21 Conn. 41, 53, 54 Am. Dec. 321.

"Claim," as used in a statute to regulate the settlement of estates of deceased persons, prescribing the manner in which a claim against the estate shall be presented and disposed of, means a legal demand for money to be paid out of the estate. "The word 'claim' is certainly a very broad term when used in certain connections and in reference to certain matters. Lord Coke truly says that the word 'demand' is the largest word known to the law, save only 'claim'; and a release of all demands discharges all right of action." Chief Justice Nelson says: "The word 'claim' is of much broader import than the word 'debt,' and embraces rights of action belonging to the debtor beyond those which may appropriately be called 'debts.'" "But, however broad may be the general meaning of this term, we must look to the statute to ascertain the sense in which it is there used." A suit in equity for dissolution of a partnership, partition of the partnership property, and adjustment and payment of the debts of the concern, is not a suit on claims against the estate of a deceased partner. Gray v. Palmer, 9 Cal. 616, 636.

Secured claims.

The word "claim," as used in Probate Act, § 136, providing that no action shall be maintained upon any claim against an estate unless it has been presented to the executor or administrator, or is rejected by him or by the probate court, means only such a demand or liability as might by action be reduced to a simple money judgment, and does not embrace a mortgage lien. Fallon v. Butler, 21 Cal. 24, 29, 81 Am. Dec. 140. Such, also, is its use in Code Civ. Proc. § 1880, declaring that a party cannot be a witness in an action against an executor or administrator on a "claim" against the estate of a deceased person. Booth v. Pendola, 23 Pac. 200, 201, 88 Cal. 36. But as used in Code Civ. Proc. § 1493, providing that "claims" must be presented to an administrator within the time limited in the notice, it is not limited to demands or liabilities such as might be reduced to simple money judgments, but is broad enough to embrace a mortgage or other lien. Verdier v. Roach, 31 Pac. 554, 556, 96 Cal. 467. The mortgage, as distinct from the note secured by it is within the scope of the word "claim" as used in that section. Pitte v. Shipley, 46 Cal. 154, 160. So, also, as used in the act concerning the estate of deceased persons (section 131), providing that in case an estate is insolvent no "claim" contracted after the passage of the act shall bear greater interest than 10 per cent. Ellis v. Polhemus, 27 Cal. 350, 354.

Under Comp. Laws S. D. § 5790, requiring "claims" against the estate of deceased to be presented to the administrator, a claim secured by a mechanic's lien is not included. Fish v. De Laray, 66 N. W. 465, 466, 8 S. D. 320, 59 Am. St. Rep. 764.

CLAIM AGAINST LAND.

Claims against the land "are liens which bind the realty. They are described as 'claims against the land' because the land is the debtor, and may be sold to discharge the debt without regard to the personal liability of the owner. Such a claim fastens upon the land, and follows it into the hands of all purchasers who take it with notice of their existence." Gordon v. McCulloh, 7 Atl. 457, 458, 66 Md. 245.

CLAIM AGAINST THE STOCK.

A contract to convey a general stock of goods "subject to claims against the stock" means debts contracted for the purchase of stock. Whiting v. Root, 3 N. W. 134, 141, 52 Iowa, 292.

CLAIM AND DELIVERY.

See, also, "Replevin."

Claim and delivery is an action at law for the recovery of specific personal chattels wrongfully taken and detained, or wrongfully detained, with damages which the wrongful taking or detention has occasioned. It is what is usually termed a "mixed action," being partly in rem and partly in personam—in rem so far as the specific recovery of the chattels is concerned, and in personam as to the damages. Fredericks v. Tracy, 33 Pac. 750, 751, 98 Cal. 658.

An action of claim and delivery has been held to be only a modification of the common-law remedy of replevin. Gila Valley, G. & N. R. Co. v. Gila County (Ariz.) 71 Pac. 913, 914 (citing Carroll v. Byers (Ariz.) 36 Pac. 499).

CLAIM AS LOCATOR.

"The phrase 'claim as locator' has been uniformly understood by the people of Kentucky to signify the compensation of a portion of the land located agreed to be given by the owner of the warrant to the locator of it for his services." "In early times many contracts were made between warrant holders and others by which those others agreed to locate the warrants for the portion of the land secured by the location, and in many other cases one man located the warrants of another, without any special agreement as to compensation, but with an expectation of receiving as compensation the portion of land usually given for such services." Hollingsworth v. Barbour, 29 U. S. (4 Pet.) 466, 473, 7 L. Ed. 922.

CLAIM CASES.

"Claim cases," as used in Act 1870, providing that in all cases where claimants are unable to give bond and security as now required by law in claim cases it shall be the privilege of such claimant to file, in addition to the oath required, an affidavit, cannot be construed to include claim cases which arise from levies by tax executions. Lingo v. Harris, 73 Ga. 28, 30.

CLAIM FOR MONEY.

An absolute guaranty for the payment of a note is a "claim for money," within the purview of the statute requiring claims for money to be presented to the administrator of the estate for allowance. National Guarantee Loan & Trust Co. v. Fly, 69 S. W. 231, 232, 29 Tex. Civ. App. 533.

CLAIM OF OWNERSHIP.

To constitute adverse possession the possession must be with claim of ownership. The expression "claim of ownership" means nothing more than the intention of the dispossessor to prepare and use the land as his own, to the exclusion of all others. It is not necessary that the dispossessor should enter under color of title, or should either believe or assert that he had right to enter. Carpenter v. Coles, 77 N. W. 424, 75 Minn. 9.

"Claim of ownership," as used in a definition of "adverse possession," was not erroneous, since it was synonymous with "actual, continued, visible, and notorious possession," which makes up such adverse possession claimed by the party in his own right as can amount to a claim of ownership. Shearer v. Middletown, 50 N. W. 737, 88 Mich. 621.

CLAIM OF RIGHT.

To constitute adverse possession, the possession must be with claim of right. The expression "claim of right" means nothing more than the intention of the dispossessor to prepare and use the land as his own, to the exclusion of all others. It is not necessary that the disselector should enter under color of title, or should either believe or assert that he had right to enter. Carpenter v. Coles, 77 N. W. 424, 75 Minn. 9.

Continuous and uninterrupted possession will not alone establish a "claim of right" which is required to make possession adverse, nor will payment of taxes, but when, with these circumstances, it also appears that the party has set out trees, erected a house and outbuildings, inclosed the premises by a fence, cultivated the land, and in all respects treated it precisely as his own, a claim of right may be inferred and treated as fully established as though shown by oral declarations of such claim. Wilbur v. Cedar Rapids & M. R. R. Co., 89 N. W. 101, 102, 116 Iowa, 65.

CLAIM OF TITLE.

The phrase "claim of title," as used in Rev. St. Wis. § 4213, relating to adverse possession, and providing that entry and occupation must be under a claim of title exclusive of any other right, means only a claim of right—a claim to the right of possession. Mere possession is a degree of title, although the lowest and most imperfect. City of La-crosse v. Cameron (U. S.) 80 Fed. 264, 271, 25 C. C. A. 399.

"Claim of title," as used in Sand. & H. Dig. § 3443, making any person detaining realty without claim of title guilty of forcible detainer, means a claim having some appearance of legality, not a bare mere claim without the appearance or pretense of anything to base it upon. Where an accretion which was not expressly included in a conveyance of realty had attained a sufficient elevation above the water to be susceptible of private ownership, and was occupied by another, the vendee, by taking possession of the accretion with the realty, had no claim of title thereto. Towell v. Etter, 59 S. W. 1096, 1097, 69 Ark. 34.

"Claim of title," as used in a statute defining "adverse possession" as being a possession commenced under claim of title, does not require that the disselector should think that the land belonged to him before entry, but it is sufficient if the entry be hostile to all the world and he intends to hold the land as his own. Chicago & N. W. Ry. Co. v. Groh, 55 N. W. 714, 715, 85 Wis. 641.

It is not essential to the jurisdiction of equity, in a suit brought under Code, § 550, to determine an adverse claim to real property, that such claim should constitute a technical "cloud on title," as the term is understood in general equity jurisprudence, it being enough if the claim is such as is calculated to create doubt and uncertainty in respect to the title of the true owner, or if operating injuriously in any way to his enjoyment of or beneficial domain over the property. Any attempt persisted in to have such property sold on execution against a third person amounts to an adverse claim "or cloud on the title" within the meaning of such section. Murphy v. Sears, 4 Pac. 471, 472, 11 Or. 127.

As color of title.

In a finding that certain improvements were made upon the premises by defendants in good faith and while claiming title there-to adverse to the plaintiff, the term "claiming title" is not equivalent to "color of title," as used in Comp. Laws, § 5455, providing that in an action for the recovery of real property upon which permanent improvements have been made by the defendant, or those under whom he claims, holding under color of title adverse to the claim of plaintiff, the value of such improvements must be allowed as a counterclaim by such defendant. Parker v. Vinson, 77 N. W. 1023, 1024, 11 S. D. 381.

To constitute adverse possession, the possession must be with claim of title. The expression "claim of title" means nothing more than the intention of the disselector to prepare and use the land as his own, to the exclusion of all others. It is not necessary that the disselector should enter under color of title, or should either believe or assert that he had right to enter. Carpenter v. Coles, 77 N. W. 424, 75 Minn. 9.

The term "claim of title" is not synonymous with "color of title." The former may exist wholly by parol, while "color of title" has reference to a paper title. Hamilton v. Wright, 30 Iowa, 480.

In Act Cong. Feb. 25, 1885, c. 149, 23 Stat. 321 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1524], entitled "An act to prevent unlawful occupancy of the public lands and prohibiting all enclosures of such lands by any person who has no 'claim or color of title,'" these words mean the same as "color of title." The possession must be under a deed purporting to convey the lands claimed. United States v. Cameron (Ariz.) 21 Pac. 177, 179.

"Claim and color of title made in good faith," as used in Rev. St. c. 24, § 8, providing that hereafter every person in the actual possession of land or tenements under claim and color of title made in good faith, continuing in possession for seven successive years, paying the taxes, shall be adjudged the legal owner to the extent and according to the purport of his paper title, means such title as tested by itself would appear to be good; not a paramount title capable of resisting all others, but such a one as would authorize the recovery of land when unattacked, as no better title was shown; that is, a prima facie title. Such a title, connected with seven years' actual possession and payment of taxes, becomes invincible, the Legislature intending to protect those who had been in possession of land and paying taxes upon it under the belief that they had a good title. Irving v. Brownell, 11 Ill. (1 Peck) 402, 411.

Claim or color of title may be shown by any paper purporting to convey the land or the right of its possession into the party asserting adverse possession, however and for whatever reason such paper might be lacking in the essentials of a muniment of title, provided the party claims under it in good faith. Goodson v. Brothers, 20 South. 443, 445, 111 Ala. 589.

CLAIM TO REAL ESTATE.

The word "claim," as used in Revenue Act 1861 (St. 1861, § 5, p. 421), providing that the term "real estate" whenever used in the act shall be deemed and taken to mean and include the ownership of or claim to, or possession or right of possession to, land, "means something more than mere assertion by the party asserted that he owns or is entitled to possess the lands described in the list. While the word carries with it the idea of such assertion, it involves also the idea of an actual possession of the land claimed." People v. Frisbie, 31 Cal. 146, 148.

"Setting up a claim," as used in Rev. St. c. 141, § 29, providing that any person having the possession and legal title to land may institute an action against any other person setting up a claim thereto, means some assertion of rights or interest in real estate, the effect of which is necessarily to throw a cloud over the title, and which claim is liable to be used by the party asserting it for an improper purpose, to the injury of the real estate owner. Walker, Ch., in Stockton v. Williams, Walk. Ch. 120, 126, says: "The manifest object of the statute seems to be to enable a person having the legal title to possession of real estate to remove all doubts and uncertainty in regard to his title arising from the claims of third persons who are taking no steps to test the validity of their claims either at law or equity, and who by their refusal and neglect to institute proceedings for that purpose keep the party in possession in a state of suspense. One holding a certificate of sale of land on execution is 'setting up a claim' to the real estate of the plaintiff within the meaning and intent of the statute. While that certificate of sale exists it necessarily tends to throw some doubt upon the plaintiff's title, while the mere fact that a deed may be issued upon the certificate which is capable of being used as a means of vexatious litigation will prevent the sale of the property for its full value." Maxon v. Ayers, 28 Wis. 612, 613.

A contingent remainder may be conveyed under Code, § 2418, as an interest or claim to real estate. Young v. Young, 17 S. E. 470, 471, 89 Va. 675, 23 L. R. A. 642.

In a deed of mortgage purporting to convey all the creditor's right and claim to land which he had in certain towns, the words "right and claim" did not include, by their fair and natural import, land to which, at the time of the conveyance, he had no right or claim, and it not being certain at that time that he ever would have any. "They have a more limited meaning than the usual phrase which is adopted for the purpose of conveying all rights of every description, namely, 'all might, right, title, and interest in and to,' etc." Richardson v. City of Cambridge, 84 Mass. (2 Allen) 118, 121, 79 Am. Dec. 767.

CLAIMANT.

See "Bona Fide Claimant."
All claimants, see "All."

The word "claimant," as used in an affidavit verifying a claim against an estate, stating that no payments have been made thereon which are not credited, and that there are no offsets of the same to the knowledge of said claimant, will be held to have been used in the sense of "affiant," used in the statute, though the person making the affidavit was the executrix of an estate; but, the affiant and claimant both being the same person, it was sufficient. Davis v. Brown, 27 Pac. 937, 91 Cal. 603.

The use of the word "claimant" in an affidavit on presentation of a claim against an estate, in place of the word "affiant," used in the statute relating thereto, is an immaterial error where it appears that the claimant and affiant are the same person. Warren v. McGill, 37 Pac. 144, 145, 103 Cal. 153.

"Claimant," as used in a statute to regulate the settlement of the estate of deceased persons (section 131), providing that every claim presented to the administrator should be supported by the affidavit of the claimant that the amount is justly due, and that no payments have been made thereon, and that there are no set-offs, is synonymous with "creditor." Gray v. Palmer, 9 Cal. 616, 636.

The word "claimant," in P. L. 1896, p. 301, providing that all creditors and claimants of an insolvent corporation failing to make proof of their claims within a time fixed by the court shall be barred, includes one having a claim sounding in tort, as well as a claim arising from contract. Lehigh & W. Coal Co. v. Stevens & Condit Transp. Co., 51 Atl. 446, 63 N. J. Eq. 107.

The word "claimant," as used in the mechanic's lien laws, means the person who has filed or may file the claim as a lien against the property. P. & L. Dig. Laws Pa. 1897, vol. 4, col. 1150, § 5.

The word "claimant," as used in an act relating to municipal liens, means the plaintiff or use plaintiff in whose favor the claim is filed as a lien. P. & L. Dig. Laws Pa. 1897, vol. 4, col. 1269, § 55.

In admiralty.

The word "claimant" in all admiralty proceedings in rem is used to denote the person who makes claim to the property seized as the owner thereof, and, by virtue of such ownership or other interest therein, is admitted to defend the suit. In a broader sense, however, it might be used to designate the owner of property, whether prosecuting or defending his right to such property, though this does not agree with the ordinary legal meaning of the term "claimant." The Conqueror, 17 Sup. Ct. 510, 514, 166 U. S. 110, 41 L. Ed. 937.

Of attached property.

"Claimant," as used in Act Oct. 13, 1870, authorizing the claimant of attached property to file a counter affidavit and put in a claim for the property in the attachment proceeding, means a person who has filed a claim to the property as authorized by the section, and not merely one who has alleged a claim to the property but done nothing to support or enforce it. Adams v. Worrell, 46 Ga. 295, 296.

Of land sold for taxes.

"Successful claimant," as used in Rev. Laws 1872, § 220, providing that if the holder of a tax deed, or the party claiming under him by virtue of a tax deed, be defeated in an action by or against him for the recovery of the land sold, the successful claimant shall be adjudged to pay such party under the tax deed the full amount of all taxes paid by the tax purchaser on such land at the time of sale, means one who claims adversely to the government, which undertakes to subject the land to the demands of the revenue, and not the claimant under a subsequent tax title. Smith v. Laumeier, 12 Mo. App. 546, 549.

Of public land.

The word "claimant," as used in 13 Stat. 356, § 3, providing that in case the owner or claimant of lands through which the right of way of a railroad shall extend and the company cannot agree as to the damages, etc., means one having some interest in the land which is recognized by the law of the United States, and hence a pre-emptor who has entered on public land and improved it, without having taken any step toward the acquisition of the title, cannot be regarded as a "claimant" within the meaning of the statute. Western Pac. R. Co. v. Tevis, 41 Cal. 489, 494.

Under insurance policy.

The term "claimant," in an accident policy providing that unless the claimant gives written notice within seven days, stating the date and cause of injury, all claims shall be forfeited, applies to the injured, and not to his legal representatives; and, where the injured person dies on the seventh day after an injury, the policy is not forfeited by failure of his legal representatives, who do not take out letters of administration for several months thereafter, to give the required notice, as there is no claimant within seven days of the date of the injury. Globe Acc. Ins. Co. v. Gerisch, 45 N. E. 563, 565, 163 Ill. 625, 54 Am. St. Rep. 486.

CLANDESTINE.

The words "clandestinely introduce" are synonymous in the common-law with "smuggling." In the English statutes the words "smuggling," "clandestine importation," and "clandestinely running and landing" were constantly made use of, one for the other, as convertible terms relating to the actual passing of goods across the line, where the obligation to pay duty existed, and which passing could not be accomplished except in defiance of the duty which the law imposed. Keck v. United States, 19 Sup. Ct. 254, 261, 172 U. S. 434, 43 L. Ed. 505.

CLASH.

Articles of trade and personal clothing given to native Africans by the master of a ship for their services on shipboard are called "clash." Sunday v. Gordon (U. S.) 23 Fed. Cas. 408, 410.

CLASS.

As used in Bankr. Act, § 60, par. "a" (Act July 1, 1898, c. 541, 30 Stat. 562 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3445]), providing that a person shall be deemed to have given a preference if, being insolvent, he has made a transfer of any of his property the effect of which will be to enable any one of his creditors to obtain a greater percentage of his debt than any other of his creditors of the same class, the word "class" will not be construed as indicating a line running between secured and unsecured creditors, for to do so would put workmen, clerks, and servants and others entitled by the laws of the state to priority in the same class with general creditors. The word "class" is defined as a number of persons or things ranked together for some common purpose or possessing some attribute in common, so that a claim of a bank indorsed by a third person has an attribute not possessed by a claim against the bankrupt alone. Hence the payment of an indorsed claim by a bankrupt does not constitute a preference as to general creditors. In re Harpke (U. S.) 116 Fed. 295, 297, 54 C. C. A. 97.

While it is true that the bankrupt act does not define the word "class," nor in terms state what creditors are in the same class, it creates some classes and specifies others, and it seems that the meaning of the word "class" in the act should, if possible, be derived from the statute itself. Section 64, Act July 1, 1898, c. 541, 30 Stat. 563 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3447], after directing the payment of certain expenses of administration, creates three classes of creditors, parties to whom taxes are owing, employes holding claims for certain wages, and those who by the laws of the states or of the United States are entitled to priority. Sections 56b, 57e, and 57h (30 Stat. 560 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3443]) provide for the treatment and disposition of claims secured by property, and of claims which have priority. The creditors who hold these claims, and the general creditors of the estate, constitute the classes of creditors of which the bankrupt act treats, and the test of classification of creditors is the percentage of their claims they are entitled to draw out of the estate of the bankrupt, and not the relations of the creditors to parties other than the bankrupt. If they are entitled to receive the same percentage, they are in the same class; if different percentages, in different classes. Swarts v. Fourth Nat. Bank of St. Louis (U. S.) 117 Fed. 1, 6, 54 C. C. A. 387.

A "class," as used in the law of wills, is where several persons answering the same description sustain the same relation to the legacy, so that one word describes them all. Each takes an equal share in the property, and each takes originally, and not by way of substitution or derivatively, and each takes absolutely. Farnam v. Farnam, 2 Atl. 325, 333, 53 Conn. 261.

A number of persons are said to form a class when they can be designated by the same general name, as children, grandchildren, nephews, etc., but in legal language the question of whether a gift is to a class depends not on these considerations, but on the mode of gift itself, namely, that it is a gift of an aggregate sum to a body of persons, uncertain in number at the time of the gift, to be ascertained at a future time, and who are all to take equally, or in some other definite proportion, the share of each being dependent for its amount on the ultimate number of persons. Dulany v. Middleton, 19 Atl. 146, 149, 72 Md. 67.

An immediate gift to a class, only to take effect at the death of the testator, comprehends only those in being at the time. A number of persons are properly said to form a class when they can be designated by some general name, as "children," "grandchildren," "nephews"; but in legal language the question whether a gift is one to a class is dependent, not upon these constructions, but upon the mode of the gift itself, namely, that it is a gift of an aggregate sum to a body of persons, uncertain in number at the time of the gift, to be ascertained at a future time, and who are all to take in equal or in some other definite proportions, the share of each being dependent for its amount on the ultimate number of persons. Martin v. Martin, 44 S. E. 198, 203, 52 W. Va. 381 (citing 1 Jarm. Wills [6th Ed.] 262).

A gift to a "class," as the term is used in the law relevant to wills, has been defined by a recent decision of this court to be a gift of an aggregate sum to a body of persons uncertain in number at the time of the gift, to be ascertained at a future time, who are all to take in equal or in some other definite proportion, the share of each being dependent for its amount upon the actual number. But where there is a bequest to a widow or children of the testator, expressed in general terms, and there is no intention shown that they shall take as a class, they shall take distributively. In re Russel, 61 N. E. 166, 167, 168 N. Y. 169.

"A bequest to a number of persons not named, but answering a general description, is a gift to them as a class." In re Harrison's Estate, 51 Atl. 976, 977, 202 Pa. 331.

CLASS LEGISLATION.

Class legislation is of two kinds, namely, that in which the classification is natural and reasonable, and that in which the classification is arbitrary and capricious. Enactments of the former kind are uniformly recognized by the Supreme Court of the United States and by the Supreme Court of Tennessee as constitutional and valid, while those of the latter kind are by the same courts, and with equal uniformity, condemned as unconstitutional and invalid. In the case of Magoun v. Illinois Trust & Savings Bank, 170 U. S. 283, 294, 18 Sup. Ct. 594, 42 L. Ed. 1037, the court said that the state may distinguish, select, and classify objects of legislation, and necessarily the power must have a wide range of discretion. After quoting these words with approval in Orient Ins. Co. v. Daggs, 172 U. S. 557, 562, 19 Sup. Ct. 281, 43 L. Ed. 552, the court remarked: "And this because of the function of legislation, and the purposes to which it is addressed. Classification for such purposes is not invalid because not depending on scientific or marked differences in things or persons, or in their relations. It suffices if it is practical, and is not reviewable unless palpably arbitrary." An act of the Legislature condemning and punishing all arrangements, contracts, agreements, trusts, or combinations between persons or corporations, made with a view to lessen or which tend to lessen full and free competition in the importation or sale of articles imported into the state, or in the manufacture or sale of articles of domestic growth or of domestic raw material, and all arrangements, contracts, agreements, trusts, or combinations between persons or corporations designed or which tend to advance, reduce, or control the price or cost to the producer or to the consumer of any such product or article, except such as may be entered into by the owners in reference to agricultural products or live stock while in the possession of the producer or raiser, while class legislation, is valid, for the classification which excepts farmers and stock-raisers is not arbitrary and capricious, but natural and reasonable. State v. Schlitz Brewing Co., 59 S. W. 1033, 1036, 104 Tenn. 715, 78 Am. St. Rep. 941.

It is not required that all general laws shall be equally general. A law legislating for a class is a general law, when it is for a class requiring legislation peculiar to itself in the matter covered by the law. A law relating to particular persons or things as a class is said to be general, while a law relating to particular persons or things of a class is deemed special and private. Whether such laws are to be deemed general laws or special laws depends very much upon whether the classification is appropriate. All classifications must be based upon substantial distinctions which make one class really different from another. The classification adopted must be germane to the purpose of the law. The classification must not be based upon existing circumstances only. It must not be so constituted as to preclude addition to the number included within a class. To whatever class a law may apply, it must apply equally to each member thereof. Wagner v. Milwaukee County, 88 N. W. 577, 578, 112 Wis. 601 (citing Johnson v. City of Milwaukee, 88 Wis. 383, 390, 392, 60 N. W. 270-272).

"Class legislation" prohibited by the federal Constitution is legislation which discriminates against some in favor of others. It does not relate to and include legislation which affects with equal force all persons of the same class to which the subject of legislation applies, though it may be a detriment or benefit only to that class included, and not granted to all persons generally not within the class. In re Hang Kie, 10 Pac. 327, 329, note, 69 Cal. 149.

Where, for the purposes of legislation, the subjects upon which the law is to operate are divided into different classes, if the division is arbitrary, and not based on differences which are apparent and reasonable, the laws relating to the classes thus made is called "class legislation." State v. Garbroski, 82 N. W. 959, 111 Iowa, 496, 56 L. R. A. 570, 82 Am. St. Rep. 524.

The term "class legislation" is properly applied to the discriminating against some and favoring others. Class legislation is in violation of the constitutional guaranty of equal protection of the laws, but legislation which, in carrying out a public purpose, is limited in its application, if within the sphere of its operations it affects all persons similarly situated, is not within the amendment. Hawkins v. Roberts, 27 South. 327, 332, 122 Ala. 130.

"Class legislation" is legislation which selects particular individuals from a class, and imposes upon them special burdens from which others of the same class are exempt, and thus denies them the equal protection of the laws. State v. Cooley, 56 Minn. 540, 58 N. W. 150. But a statute relating to commission merchants who are engaged in the business of receiving agricultural products and farm produce for sale is not class legislation, since the particular characteristics of the agricultural products and farm produce, and the liability to peculiar abuses resulting from the sale thereof on commission, are such as to suggest the practical necessity for distinctive legislation on the subject. State v. Wagener, 80 N. W. 633, 636, 77 Minn. 483, 46 L. R. A. 442, 77 Am. St. Rep. 681.

CLASS LOTTERY.

The American Encyclopædia says that "lottery" may be distinguished into the Genoese or numerical, and the Dutch or class lottery. The former is described as a scheme by which, out of 90 consecutive numbers, 5 are to be selected or drawn by lot. The players have fixed on certain numbers, wagering that 1, 2, or more of them would be drawn among the 5, or that they would appear in a certain order. In the Dutch or class lottery, the number and value of the prizes are regularly estimated. All the ticket holders are interested at once in the play, and chance determines whether a prize or a blank shall fall to a given number. Fleming v. Bills, 3 Or. 286, 291.

CLASSIFICATION.

With reference to the classification of cities for school purposes, "classification" means the grouping together for purposes of legislation of communities or public bodies, which by reason of similarity of situation, circumstances, requirements, and convenience will have their public interests best subserved by similar regulations. Commonwealth v. Gilligan, 46 Atl. 124, 195 Pa. 504.

CLAUSE.

A "clause" is one of those distinct and generally numbered subdivisions into which wills are frequently aperted, or an entire unconnected provision making disposition of property. Appeal of Miles, 36 Atl. 39, 41, 68 Conn. 237, 36 L. R. A. 176.

"Clause," as used in Code, art. 93, § 302, providing that no devise, in writing, of lands, tenements, or hereditaments, or any clause thereof, shall be revocable except in the manner designated, means one of the subdivisions of the instrument, and hence the names of one or two devisees did not constitute a clause of the will. Eschbach v. Collins, 61 Md. 478, 499, 48 Am. Rep. 123.

CLEAN BILL OF LADING.

It is settled law in the federal courts that a "clean bill of lading" imports that the goods are to be safely and properly stowed under deck. The Delaware, 81 U. S. (14 Wall.) 596, 20 L. Ed. 783; The Kirkhill (U. S.) 99 Fed. 575, 578, 39 C. C. A. 658; The Wellington (U. S.) 29 Fed. Cas. 626, 627. So that, where a cargo was to be stowed in places called "alleyways," which, though covered over, could not be permanently closed in, as the doors and the end had to be opened by the crew in passing in and out, and the spaces could not be made watertight, the master of the ship was justified in refusing to give a clean bill of lading for the cotton stored in the alleyways. The Kirkhill (U. S.) 99 Fed. 575, 578, 39 C. C. A. 658.

CLEAN HANDS.

The maxim that one who comes into equity must come with "clean hands" is based on conscience and good faith. The maxim is confined to misconduct in regard to, or at all events connected with, the matter in litigation, so that it in some measure affects the equitable relation subsisting between the parties and arising out of the transaction. "Clean hands" means a clean record with respect to the transaction with defendant, and not with respect to any third person. American Ass'n v. Innis, 60 S. W. 388, 391, 109 Ky. 595.

CLEAR.

The phrase "to clear from obscurity" is synonymous with the word "liquidated." Parris v. Hightower 76 Ga. 631, 634.

In the conditions for an auction sale providing that all small remnants must be cleared at the measure stated in the catalogue, "cleared" meant "taken away." Pettitt v. Mitchell, 4 Man. & G. 819, 838.

In relation to land.

"Clear," as used in a contract providing that a party should clear, grub, and pile the brush on all of a described piece of land, is not synonymous with the word "grub," but applies to the underbrush too small to be grubbed. Holmes v. Stummel, 15 Ill. (5 Peck) 412.

In a contract by which land was rented to a person who was to clear out a certain field, and also to clear and fence certain other fields, and to take no timber off of the land except where he was to clear, "clear" means to take off all the timber of every size, but does not include taking out the stumps. Harper v. Pound, 10 Ind. 32, 33.

The term "clearing land," in the absence of words of limitation, means removing therefrom all the timber of every size, but does not include taking out the stumps. Seavey v. Shurick, 11 N. E. 597, 598, 110 Ind. 494.

In the description of seated lands, "cleared" and "unimproved" express opposite conditions in the same tract. The former conveys the idea of cultivation, while the latter the absence of it. Hathaway v. Elsbree, 54 Pa. (4 P. F. Smith) 498, 505.

CLEAR ANNUAL OR YEARLY VALUE.

In a statute declaring that a settlement may be gained in a town by one having an estate of inheritance therein of the "clear yearly value" of $10 for a period of three consecutive years, the term "clear yearly value" means a yearly value clear to the possessor, and where he mortgages a freehold, and, after paying the interest on the mortgage out of the income, less than $10 remains, the estate is not of sufficient clear yearly value. Inhabitants of Groton v. Inhabitants of Boxborough, 6 Mass. 50, 56.

Gen. St. c. 134, § 15, relating to the taxation of land in the possession of tenants, provides that the rents and profits for which the tenant shall be liable to be taxed shall be "the clear annual value of the premises for the time during which he is in possession." Held, that the term "clear annual value" meant "annual value" free from charges and deduction, but did not make the tenant liable for the gross rentable value of the premises. In determining this value, reference must be had to the nature and extent of the estate of the tenant and the character of his possession. If the estate is an absolute one, free from charge or incumbrance, the gross rentable value is a fair test of the clear annual value, but if it is a qualified or limited one such rule could not apply. Marsh v. Hammond, 103 Mass. 146, 149.

CLEAR ANNUITY.

A devise of an annuity "clear" means an annuity free from taxes. Hodgworth v. Crawley, 2 Atk. 376.

A gift of a "clear sum or annuity" is a gift clear of legacy duty, but a gift of a fund to produce a clear annual sum, and to pay the dividends of the stock, and not the exact sum to the legatee, is not a gift free from legacy duty, the term "clear" having reference to the costs of investment. In re Bispham's Estate, 24 Wkly. Notes Cas. 79, 80.

CLEAR DAYS.

"Clear days," as used in a statute requiring the court to allow three clear days in a criminal case to intervene between the verdict and the rendition of the judgment, "mean days exclusive of the day the verdict was rendered and the day upon which judgment should be pronounced." State v. Marvin, 12 Iowa, 499, 502.

In 49 Geo. III, c. 68, § 5, requiring ten clear days' notice of the intention to appeal, "clear days" means 10 days exclusive both of the day of the service of the notice and of the day of holding the session. Rex v. Justices of Herefordshire, 3 Barn. & Ald. 581.

In Practice Rule of Hil. Term 4, Will. IV, § 7, providing that, four clear days before the day appointed for argument, plaintiff shall deliver copies of the demurrer book, etc., to the Lord Chief Justice of the King's Bench, "four clear days" include Sunday, unless it is the last day. Hodgins v. Hancock, 14 Mees. & W. 120, 121.

A charter party which requires "three clear working days" notice to be given by the master to the shipper before lay days commence means that the days do not begin to run until such notice reaches the shipper. The India (U. S.) 49 Fed. 76, 78, 1 C. C. A. 174.

CLEAR DEED.

A contract by which a party bound herself to give a clear deed cannot be construed to mean that she was to give a deed in fee, but only to convey such title as she had, though it may be but a life estate, the title being equally well known to both the vendor and vendee. Rohr v. Klndt (Pa.) 3 Watts & S. 563, 565, 39 Am. Dec. 53.

CLEAR EVIDENCE OR PROOF.

In speaking of the meaning of the words "clear and decisive proof," "clear and satisfactory evidence," "clear and convincing evidence," "clear and conclusive proof," and "conclusive proof," the court quotes with approval the statement of Ballinger in his work on Community Property, where it is said that it is not believed that these terms should be considered as going to the length that their general meaning might import, and that it is certainly not required that the proof should be any more than sufficient to satisfy the mind of court or jury that its weight is enough to cause a reasonable person, under all the circumstances, to believe in its sufficiency. Freeze v. Hibernia Sav. & Loan Soc., 73 Pac. 172, 173, 139 Cal. 392.

"Clear and convincing," as used in the statement that the party alleging fraud or mistake is bound to prove his allegation by clear and convincing evidence, means that the evidence which tends to prove the alleged fraud or mistake, if standing alone and uncontradicted, would establish a prima facie case of fraud or mistake. Ward v. Waterman, 24 Pac. 930, 934, 85 Cal. 488.

"Clear," as used in a statement that evidence that an instrument purporting to be a deed was intended as a mortgage only must be clear, means a clear preponderance of the evidence. Winston v. Burnell, 24 Pac. 477, 478, 44 Kan. 367, 21 Am. St. Rep. 289.

Clear, precise, and indubitable evidence, within the meaning of the rule that a parcel exchange of land must be established by clear, precise, and indubitable evidence, means no more than that there must be precision in the terms of the agreement set up, and that the evidence to support it must be of a high order, carrying conviction, to a moral certainty, of its truth. Jermyn v. McClure, 45 Atl. 938, 942, 195 Pa. 245.

A higher and more satisfactory character of proof is required to establish that an instrument or conveyance is not what it purports to be than is necessary in ordinary civil cases; some of the courts declaring that in some cases the proof must be "clear," some that it must be "convincing," some that it must be "satisfactory," and still some that it must be "clear of all reasonable doubt." These substantially convey the same idea, and require the same degree of proof. And a general rule that facts must be established "by a fair preponderance of the proof" means that the proof must be clear of all reasonable doubt. Winston v. Burnell, 24 Pac. 477, 478, 44 Kan. 367, 21 Am. St. Rep. 289.

"Clear, precise, and indubitable," as used in a charge that in considering an alleged contemporaneous agreement concerning certain bonds the bonds are primarily regarded as the voluntary and lawful contract of the parties, and before this presumption could be overthrown it was incumbent on the defendants to prove the alleged contemporaneous parcel agreement or stipulation by evidence that was clear, precise, and indubitable, means that a conviction should be fastened in the minds of the jurors as strong as verbal testimony was able to convey. "It is meant that witnesses shall be found to be credible, that the facts to which they testify are distinctly remembered, that details are narrated exactly and in due order, and that their statements are true. Absolute certainty is of course out of the question. Terms are used with relation to their subject-matter. The apparently distinct testimony of the most intelligent witness may possibly be fabricated; the clear statement of the most upright witness may possibly be mistaken. It has been in view of considerations like these that in certain classes of cases proof is required that is clear, distinct, and entirely satisfactory." Spencer v. Colt, 89 Pa. 314, 318.

The law that an oral agreement to vary a written instrument must be established by "clear, precise and indubitable proof" means that it must be found that the witnesses are credible, that they distinctly remember the facts to which they testify, and that they narrate the details exactly, and that their statements are true. Ferguson v. Rafferty, 18 Atl. 484, 485, 128 Pa. 337, 6 L. R. A. 33.

The expression "clear and satisfactory," in the rule that, if the testimony is clear and satisfactory that a mistake was committed, a written instrument ought to be reformed so as to express the real intention of the parties, does not mean that the mistake should be established beyond a reasonable doubt, and such a test as to certainty of proof is not required in such a case. The expression "clear and satisfactory," in the sense in which it is here used, should be taken to mean that it should be "clear" in the sense that the evidence upon which reformation is based is not ambiguous, equivocal, or contradictory, and should be perspicuous and pointed to the issue under investigation, and "satisfactory" in the sense that the source from which it comes is of such a credible nature that the court and jury, as men of ordinary intelligence, discretion, and caution, may repose confidence in it. American Freehold Land Mortg. Co. v. Pace, 56 S. W. 377, 391, 23 Tex. Civ. App. 222.

CLEAR INCOME.

The words "clear yearly income," within St. 1793, c. 34, § 2, cl. 4, giving a settlement to any citizen having a freehold of the clear yearly income of three pounds and taking the rents and profits thereof three years successively, does not require that the income shall be the sum of three pounds over and above all charges. Inhabitants of Pelham v. Inhabitants of Middleborough, 70 Mass. (4 Gray) 57, 58.

CLEAR OF REASONABLE DOUBT.

that it must be "satisfactory," and some that it must be "clear of all reasonable doubt." These substantially convey the same idea, and require the same degree of proof. And a general rule that facts must be established "by a fair preponderance of the proof" means that the proof must be clear of all reasonable doubt. Winston v. Burnell, 24 Pac. 477, 478, 44 Kan. 367, 21 Am. St. Rep. 289.

CLEAR OUT.

"Clear out," as used in Rev. St. 521, § 21, making it the duty of the overseers to open, clear out, etc., the highways within their respective districts, means nothing more than to clear it out for all the purposes to which it is dedicated. Winter v. Peterson, 24 N. J. Law (4 Zab.) 524, 528, 61 Am. Dec. 678.

CLEAR PREPONDERANCE.

See, also, "Clearly Preponderating Evidence."

"Preponderate" means to outweigh; to weigh more. A "clear preponderance" may mean that which may be seen, is discernible, and may be appreciated and understood. In this sense the expression in an instruction in trespass de bonis, where the defendant justified the asportation, "that it is incumbent upon the defendant to show, by a 'clear preponderance' of the evidence and by convincing proof, their right to do so," might be unobjectionable, but it may convey the idea under emphasis of certainty, beyond a doubt, and very likely would do so to the common mind. At any rate, the expression is equivocal and mischievous. French v. Day, 36 Atl. 909, 89 Me. 441.

CLEAR PROCEEDS.

Const. art. 10, § 2, providing that the clear proceeds of all fines collected for the breach of any penal laws shall go into the school funds, does not mean entire proceeds. "Clear" implies that something is to be or may be deducted, so that the balance is clear from all charges or demands, and hence in this place "clear proceeds" means the amount left of such fines after making authorized deductions. State v. De Lano, 49 N. W. 808, 809, 80 Wis. 259.

CLEAR PROFITS.

The term "clear profits" in a complaint in an action between partners for a balance due, which contains an allegation that at the time of dissolution of said partnership there was in the hands of defendant clear profits from said business in a certain sum, was construed not to have the meaning of the words "ascertained balance." "The language of the complaint, by a reasonable construction, rather excludes the idea of intention to aver a settlement. The averment that there were clear profits to a certain amount in the hands of defendant is not such as the most inexperienced pleader would be likely to use in stating that a settlement had been made by the parties and an ascertained balance agreed upon." Bean v. Gregg, 4 Pac. 903, 904, 7 Colo. 499.

CLEAR TITLE.

See "Good and Clear Title."

"Clear title," as used in a contract to convey by a deed conveying a clear title to certain land, means that there are no incumbrances on the land. Roberts v. Bassett, 105 Mass. 409.

CLEAR VALUE.

The "clear value" for which an estate is liable for an inheritance tax means net value after the payment of all debts and expenses of administration or execution of the will in case of testacy, and in cases where the will is contested, and expenses for attorney's fees, etc., are incurred by the executor in attempting to sustain the will, these fees must be treated as expenses of administration, and deducted from the amount of the estate to reach its "clear value." Shelton v. Campbell, 72 S. W. 112, 113, 109 Tenn. 690.

CLEARANCE CARD.

A "clearance" is a card given by the master to a servant, showing the place of employment, kind of employment, the time, and whether the service was satisfactory or not. A master is under no legal obligation to give to his discharged servant a clearance, and the servant cannot maintain an action for damages against him for his failure to do so, although he may be unable to obtain employment elsewhere by reason of such refusal. N. Y. C. & St. L. R. v. Schaffer, 62 N. E. 1036, 1038, 65 Ohio St. 414, 62 L. R. A. 931, 87 Am. St. Rep. 628.

Recommendation distinguished.

A distinction is to be made between what is known in terms as a "clearance card" and a "letter of recommendation," the former being merely a letter, be it good, bad, or indifferent, given to an employé at the time of his discharge or end of service, showing the cause of such discharge or voluntary quittance, the length of time of service, his capacity, and such other facts as would give to those concerned information of his former employment. A "letter of recommendation," on the contrary, is, as the term implies, a letter commending the former services of the holder, and speaking of him in such terms as would tend to bring such services to the favorable notice of those to whom he might apply for employment. Cleveland, C., C. & St. L. Ry. Co. v. Jenkins, 51 N. E. 811, 812, 174 Ill. 398, 62 L. R. A. 922, 66 Am. St. Rep. 296; McDonald v. Illinois Cent. R. Co., 58 N. E. 463, 466, 187 Ill. 529.

CLEARING HOUSE.

A "clearing house" is an ingenious device to simplify and facilitate the work of banking, and reaching an adjustment and payment of the daily balance due to and from banks at one time and place on each day. In practical operation it is a place where the representatives of all the national banks of a city meet, and, under the supervision of a competent committee or officer selected by the associated bankers, settle their accounts with each other and make and receive payments of balances, and so clear the transactions of the day for which the settlement is made. Crane v. Fourth St. Nat. Bank, 34 Atl. 296, 297, 173 Pa. 566, 38 Wkly. Notes Cas. 113.

A "clearing house" is an association, the object of which is to effect at one time and place the daily exchanges between the several banks which are members, and the payment of the balances resulting from such exchanges. National Exch. Bank v. National Bank of North America, 132 Mass. 147, 149.

A "clearing house association" is nothing more nor less than an agreement among banks to make their daily settlements at a fixed time and place each day. Where a suitable room is secured fitted up with desks and other necessary appliances at the expense of the associated banks, and a manager chosen to preside over it and direct the actions of the clerks and runners when in session, it is a clearing place. It is the place where the representatives of the several banks meet, and where all balances are struck and settled daily between the banks composing the association. At the close of each meeting the amount due to and from each bank is definitely ascertained. The debtor banks then pay over to the manager the gross balances due from them to settle their account with all the members of the association, and he makes distribution of the sums so received among the creditor banks entitled to receive them. Philler v. Patterson, 32 Atl. 26, 163 Pa. 468, 47 Am. St. Rep. 896.

Duebill.

A clearing house duebill differs from an ordinary promissory note in many particulars. This instrument is not payable to order or bearer, but to banks, and disregarding the superadded words, "This duebill is only good when signed by one and countersigned by another authorized person," in giving a fair construction to the instrument, it may be read for our present purpose thus: "Due by the M. Nat. Bank to Banks, $1900.00, payable only in exchange through the clearing house the day after issue." This is not, therefore, a mere certificate of deposit on special terms, but an agreement to pay so much money on demand. The place of payment is named. The amount is fixed and the time at which the paper is payable is also certain, and it is also payable in dollars—that is, legal currency—and is negotiable as a check payable to bearer. Dutton v. Merchants' Nat. Bank (Pa.) 16 Phila. 94, 40 Leg. Int. 110.

CLEARLY.

"Clearly," according to Webster's definition of it, means "in a clear manner; without obscurity; without obstruction; without entanglement or confusion; without uncertainty"; and that is doubtless the sense in which it is popularly understood. People v. Wreden, 59 Cal. 392, 395.

CLEARLY ESTABLISH.

An instruction that the insanity of a defendant must be "clearly established by satisfactory proof" is not saying that the evidence must more than preponderate, but only that the preponderance must be plainly apparent. Such must be the case in every instance where the affirmative of an issue is sought to be established, and a peculiar presumption be overcome. Such instruction is not erroneous when coupled with another instruction stating that the burden of proving insanity is on the defendant, but that he is not obliged to prove his insanity beyond a reasonable doubt. People v. Hamilton, 62 Cal. 377, 384.

Where the court instructs the jury that the good faith of certain transactions must be clearly established, the word "clearly" means without uncertainty. McEvony v. Rowland, 61 N. W. 124, 125, 43 Neb. 97.

The phrase "clearly established by satisfactory proof" is equivalent to the phrase "established by satisfactory proof beyond a reasonable doubt." People v. Wreden, 59 Cal. 392, 395.

CLEARLY EXPRESSED.

"Clearly," as used in Const. art. 5, § 21, providing that the subject of every legislative enactment shall be clearly expressed in the title, means not dubiously or obscurely, but in such a manner that its relation to the subject shall not rest upon a merely possible or doubtful inference. "The connection must be so obvious that ingenious reasoning will not be necessary to reveal it. The connection should be such as to be within the comprehension of the ordinary intellect as well as the trained legal mind. Nothing unreasonable in this respect is required, however, and a matter is clearly indicated by the title when it is clearly germane to the subject mentioned therein." In re Breene, 24 Pac. 3, 4, 14 Colo. 401.

Const. art. 4, § 28, providing that no bill shall contain more than one subject, which shall be clearly expressed in its title, cannot be construed to mean that the title shall not be broader than the act itself, unless the title is comprehensive enough to admit of disconnected and incongruous subjects. The Legislature may select its own language and may use few or many words. It is sufficient that the title fairly embraces the subject-matter covered by the act. Mere matters of detail need not be stated in the title. State ex rel. Wolfe v. Bronson, 21 S. W. 1125, 1126, 115 Mo. 271.

CLEARLY PREPONDERATING EVIDENCE.

An instruction in a homicide case declaring that, to establish the defense of insanity, it must be proved by clearly preponderating evidence, is practically saying it must be proved beyond all doubt and uncertainty. Such instruction is erroneous, as "it is not necessary that the evidence be so conclusive as to remove all doubt." Coyle v. Commonwealth, 100 Pa. 573, 580, 45 Am. Rep. 397.

CLEARLY PROVEN.

The term "clearly and fairly proven" requires a higher degree of evidence than a mere preponderance of proof, and hence it is error to use it in an instruction to express the meaning of the latter phrase. Hall v. Wolff, 16 N. W. 710, 711, 61 Iowa, 559.

"Clearly proven" does not mean "beyond reasonable doubt." State v. Stewart, 3 N. W. 99, 101, 52 Iowa, 284.

"Clearly proven," as used with reference to the amount of evidence required to establish the guilt of a defendant in a criminal case, is synonymous with, and has been held to mean, "beyond a reasonable doubt." Leonard v. Washington Territory, 7 Pac. 872, 882, note, 2 Wash. T. 381.

An instruction in a criminal case that the existence of a certain condition, upon which the guilt of the accused depended, was sufficiently established if it was fully and clearly proven, was not equivalent to saying that it must be established beyond a reasonable doubt, and was error. State v. Stewart, 3 N. W. 99, 101, 52 Iowa, 284.

CLEARNESS.

It has been held that by the term "clearness," as applied to the degree of proof required, is meant generally that there must be sufficient positive facts proved to take the matter out of the realm of conjecture and presumption. Reynolds v. Blaisdell, 49 Atl. 42, 43, 23 R. I. 16 (citing 15 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law [2d Ed.] 1174); Marshall v. Fleming, 53 Pac. 620, 621, 11 Colo. App. 515.

CLEPSYDRA.

The clepsydra was an instrument used by the Greeks "by which they measured time by means of a flowing of water through it, and so frequent and common was the practice of limiting the time to the speakers by water flowing through these instruments that the word 'water' was used metaphorically for 'time.' When a speaker was allowed to speak so long, they said he was allowed so much water." It was used in the Grecian courts of justice, where the time for argument was limited, and from whence the custom of limiting the time was carried to Rome. State v. Page, 21 Mo. 257, 259, 64 Am. Dec. 229.

CLERGYMAN.

See "Minister."

As laborer, see "Laborer."

CLERICAL.

"Clerical service" means strictly a service that involves writing. Post v. United States, 27 Ct. Cl. 244, 254.

CLERICAL ASSISTANCE.

A statute authorizing the Secretary of State to expend certain money for clerical assistance does not mean official assistance, "but such as aids in the execution of official authority by the secretary himself, such as writing letters, making entries of record and like services." "The word 'clerical,' as employed in the statute to designate the kind of help, has no definite meaning. It is not very apt for the meaning intended, but it is obvious that the Legislature did not intend to extend its meaning so as to imply official aid." Beam v. Jennings, 2 S. E. 245, 246, 96 N. C. 82.

CLERICAL ERROR.

A clerical error, as its designation imports, is an error of a clerk or subordinate officer in transcribing or entering an official proceeding ordered by another. Marsh v. Nichols, Shepherd & Co., 9 Sup. Ct. 168, 171, 128 U. S. 605, 32 L. Ed. 538.

A clerical error is an error made by a clerk or a transcriber; a mistake in copying or writing. In re Stewart, 48 N. Y. Supp. 957, 966, 24 App. Div. 201.

Brooklyn City Charter, tit. 10, § 10, making it the duty of a board to rectify any errors committed in the laying of any tax and assessment where the error was clerical, meant an insertion by mistake. An admission that a lot was put in by mistake naturally excludes any idea that it was inserted in the exercise of any judgment or discretion, in pursuance of any determination that the lot was included within the district of assessment. People v. Wilson, 23 N. E. 1064, 119 N. Y. 515.

In both Burrill's and Black's Law Dictionaries "clerical error" is defined as "a mistake in copying or writing; the mistake of a clerk in writing." In Rapalje, the definition is "a mistake in copying or transcribing a written instrument." In Horton, "a mistake in copying." The act of a clerk in erroneously entering a judgment for cost against an administrator personally instead of against the estate is not a mere clerical error. Leonis v. Leffingwell, 58 Pac. 940, 941, 126 Cal. 369.

As error of form.

"Clerical errors" in making and entering a tax assessment is used in contradistinction to errors of substance, of judgment, or of law, which are described as errors affecting the merits of the assessment, and not mere errors of form. People v. Forrest, 96 N. Y. 544, 548; Hermance v. Ulster County Sup'rs, 71 N. Y. 481, 485.

A statute providing that proof of authority of town commissioners to sign for stock of a railroad and issue bonds in payment—that is, the consent of the taxpayers thereto—shall not be invalidated by "clerical or other defects," means clerical or formal, or defects of like description, and will not cure material deficiencies in the affidavits which are filed in proof of such authority. Town of Duaneburgh v. Jenkins (N. Y.) 40 Barb. 574, 584.

CLERICAL MISTAKE.

A clerical mistake is a mere omission to preserve of record, correctly in all respects, the actual decision of the court, which in itself was free from error. Bostwick v. Van Vleck, 82 N. W. 302, 303, 106 Wis. 387.

CLERK.

See "Articled Clerk"; "Competent Clerk"; "Proper Clerk"; "Regular Clerk"; "Town Clerk"; "Ward Clerks."

Code, art. 47, § 15, providing that when any person or body corporate shall make an assignment, or be adjudicated insolvent, or have his or its property taken possession of

by a receiver, in the distribution of the property or estate, all moneys due for wages or salaries to clerks, servants, or employes shall be first paid in full, the term "clerks" means persons rendering mere clerical services. Boston & A. R. Co. v. Mercantile Trust & Deposit Co., 34 Atl. 778, 782, 82 Md. 535, 38 L. R. A. 97.

The term "clerk, servant, or agent," in Gen. St. c. 257, § 8, providing a punishment for embezzlement of any officer, agent, or servant of any corporation, public or private, or the clerk, servant, or agent of any person, is not to be restricted in meaning by authorities relating to statutes of a narrower purpose. The phraseology of this statute shows that the Legislature intended not to exempt from its operation agents who receive no compensation for their services, or agents not employed in a general, continuous, or prolonged service, or agents over whose actions their principals do not exercise an extensive control. State v. Barter, 58 N. H. 604, 605.

The officers, agents, or clerks mentioned in article 3, § 42, of the act concerning crimes and punishments, which provides a punishment for any officer, agent, clerk, or servant of any incorporated company for embezzlement, etc., means officers, agents, or clerks of corporations, and the statute only authorizes a conviction in cases where the embezzlement is committed by such officers, agents, or clerks while exercising their corporate employment. Hamuel v. State, 5 Mo. 260, 264.

Agent.

As an agent, see "Agent."

In indictments relating to embezzlement, the terms "clerk," "agent," and "servant" may be used interchangeably, meaning, as they do, a person having custody of the goods or funds of another, which he was thereby enabled to convert to his own use without authority. State v. Roubles, 9 South. 435, 436, 43 La. Ann. 200, 26 Am. St. Rep. 179.

Mr. Wharton, in speaking of the introduction of the word "agent" in the embezzlement statute in reference to embezzlement by agents, servants, or clerks, says: "As used in the Massachusetts statute, the term 'agents' is much wider in its significations than 'servants' or 'clerks.' The latter are restricted to the performance of specific acts in a specific way. The former may or may not be restricted, and may in fact be clothed with full power to represent their principal, with the same discretion as he might exercise himself." Territory v. Maxwell, 2 N. M. 250, 262 (citing 1 Wharton's Cr. Law, § 1022).

The term "clerk," "servant," or "employé," within the meaning of a statute making it criminal for any clerk, servant, or other person in the employ of another to embezzle moneys received by virtue of such employment, does not include an independent agent for the solicitation of newspaper subscriptions and job work, who is charged on the books of the newspaper company at a definite price with the papers and bills of job work sent him, and therefore his collection and appropriation of the moneys paid him for the same only renders him liable as a debtor. Commonwealth v. Behle (Pa.) 1 Lack. Leg. N. 303.

Assistant, deputy, or stenographer.

"Clerk," as used in Rev. St. 181, § 14, providing that, in the service of writs on corporations, the copy shall be left with the "clerk" unless absent from the state cannot be construed in the case of town clerk to include also the assistant clerk which each town clerk is authorized to appoint. The assistant town clerk is not an officer of the town in any sense. He is appointed, not by the town, but by the town clerk, removable at his pleasure, and the town clerk is responsible for all his acts. He is, in fact, the mere clerk or servant of the town clerk. Town of Charleston v. Town of Lunenburg, 21 Vt. 488, 490.

"Clerk," as used in Const. art. 5, § 24, providing that there shall be no allowance for clerk hire in the office of the Attorney General, means one who is to register in proper form the transactions of the tribunal or body to which he belongs, and does not include a deputy, or assistant, or a stenographer. "The word 'clerk' is defined by Bouvier as a person employed in an office, public or private, for keeping records or accounts. His business is to write or register in proper form the transactions of the tribunal or body to which he belongs." In re Appropriations for Deputy State Officers, 41 N. W. 643, 645, 25 Neb. 662.

In the construction of statutes, the terms "sheriff," "coroner," "constable," "clerk," or other words used for an executive or ministerial officer, may include any deputy or other person performing the duties of such officer, either generally or in special cases. Hurd's Rev. St. Ill. 1901, p. 1719, c. 131, § 1, subd. 8.

The words "sheriff," "county attorney," "clerk," or other words used to denote an executive or ministerial officer, may include any deputy or other person performing the duties of such officer, either generally or in special cases. Rev. St. Utah 1898, § 2498.

Attorney.

"Clerk," as used in Code, art. 47, § 15, providing that the wages or salaries to clerks, servants, or employes of a person or corporation making an assignment for the benefit of creditors shall be first paid, cannot be construed to include an attorney at law.

Lewis v. Fisher, 30 Atl. 608, 609, 80 Md. 139, 26 L. R. A. 278, 45 Am. St. Rep. 327.

Bank teller.

In a bond reciting that if the principal, who had been appointed clerk of said bank, shall faithfully and honestly discharge his duties as such clerk, then the obligation should be void, it was intended by the use of the word "clerk" to apply to all the positions which employes of the bank occupy, and would include the position of teller. Union Dime Sav. Inst. v. Neppert, 3 N. Y. Supp. 797, 799, 51 Hun. 640.

The term "clerk" is of such varied import that it cannot be held that clerk, and especially clerk of the individual ledger in a bank, is equivalent to an officer, agent, or servant of the bank, within a statute authorizing the punishment of such persons on embezzlement of its funds. Budd v. State, 22 Tenn. (3 Humph.) 483, 489, 39 Am. Dec. 189.

Bookkeeper.

The clerk referred to in the rule excluding books of account kept by a party who keeps a clerk is one who had something to do with and had general knowledge of the business of his employer in reference to goods sold or work done, so that he could testify on that subject. "It means an employe whose duty it is to attend to the details of business, and thus is able to prove an account, and not one who from his isolated position as a bookkeeper can have but little means of personal knowledge as to the transactions done, or information relating thereto, except what is mainly derived from others." McGoldrick v. Traphagen, 88 N. Y. 334, 338.

"Clerk," as used in Civ. Code, § 68, authorizing the service of process of a corporation by service on its clerk, means "the person who holds the office of clerk or secretary, as the case may be. It is true a bookkeeper is in one sense a clerk. A person who performs clerical duties is in one sense a clerk. But the service of a summons on a corporation cannot be made on every person who may in some remote sense be styled a 'clerk' of the corporation. It could not be made on a deputy or under clerk. It must be made on the clerk, the principal clerk of the corporation, if made on a clerk at all." Chambers v. King Wrought-Iron Bridge Manufactory, 16 Kan. 270, 276.

Broker distinguished.

See "Broker."

As clerk of court.

In a statement for a mechanic's lien, verified before the clerk of the court, who signed his name to the jurat, adding the word "Clerk," the word designated him as the clerk of the court in whose office the claim for the lien was filed. Wetmore v. Marsh, 47 N. W. 1021, 1022, 81 Iowa, 677.

The word "clerk," when attached to an official certificate or document, executed and signed by the clerk of the county court, will be construed to mean clerk of the county court. Keith v. Freeman, 43 Ark. 296, 305.

"Clerk," as used in the bankruptcy act, shall mean the clerk of a court of bankruptcy. U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3419.

The word "clerk," as used in the Code of Procedure, signifies the clerk of the court where the action is pending, and, in the Supreme Court, the clerk of the county mentioned in the title of the complaint, or in another county to which the court may have changed the place of trial, unless otherwise specified. Code Civ. Proc. S. C. 1902, § 447.

The word "clerk," when used in statutes, means clerk of the court in which the action or proceeding is brought or is pending; and the words "clerk's office" mean his office. Code Iowa 1897, § 48, subd. 25.

The word "clerk" means the clerk of the court in which the action is brought or is pending, or in which the proceeding is had; and the words "clerk's office" mean his office. Sand. & H. Dig. Ark. 1893, § 7210.

The word "clerk," as used in the civil procedure act, means the clerk of the court, or any person authorized to perform his duties in any case. Horner's Rev. St. Ind. 1901, § 1285.

The word "clerk" signifies the clerk of the court wherein the action or special proceeding is brought, or wherein or by whose authority the act is to be done, which is referred to in the provision in which it is used. If the action or special proceeding is brought, or the act is to be done, in or by the authority of the Supreme Court, it signifies the clerk of the county wherein the action or special proceeding is triable, or the act is to be done. Code Civ. Proc. N. Y. 1899, § 3343, subd. 4.

The word "clerk," as used in the Probate Code, is to be understood as referring only to the exercise of the jurisdiction and powers conferred by the Code. Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 6166.

City officers.

A "clerk" is an assistant, a subordinate, and includes a health warden, who is an official in the health department. Demarest v. City of New York (N. Y.) 42 Barb. 186, 192.

The term "clerk," or "employe," in New York Charter 1873, c. 755, § 2, giving the police board power to fix the salaries and compensation of all clerks appointed by the board, and of all employes whom they may be authorized to appoint, does not include a police surgeon, as he is an officer, within the meaning of the charter. Certainly such surgeons are not clerks, and as employes are usually considered as embracing laborers and servants and those occupying inferior positions, they can scarcely be included in that class of persons. People v. Board of Police, 75 N. Y. 38, 41.

The terms "officers," "clerks," "subordinate officers," and "employes," in Act June 1, 1885, relating to cities of the first class, in reference to the appointment of officers, clerks, subordinate officers, and employes, does not include the medical staff or the board of visiting physicians of the Philadelphia Hospital, consisting of specialists or experts in the various departments of medical science, who perform gratuitous services. Commonwealth v. Fidler, 23 Atl. 568, 571, 147 Pa. 288, 15 L. R. A. 205.

New York Charter, § 28, declares that the number and duties of all officers, clerks, employes, and subordinates shall be such as the heads of the respective departments shall designate and approve. In its popular sense "clerks" denotes those whose duties are clerical, and they may be very various. The term does not include every employe and subordinate of the department. A clerk in an office is defined to be a person employed in an office, public or private, for keeping records or accounts, whose business is to write or register in proper form the transactions of the tribunal or body to which he belongs. Persons employed to assist as a surveyor in the execution of the laws regulating the storage, sale and use of combustible materials, and assist the fire marshal in the investigation of the cause of fires, are not clerks within the meaning of the charter. Their duties are not clerical in any sense. People v. Fire Com'rs of City of New York, 73 N. Y. 437, 442.

Deliveryman.

An employe who attends to sales no further than merely delivering goods manufactured and keeping a memorandum of the delivery for temporary purposes is not a clerk, within the rule requiring proof of original entries. Sickles v. Mather (N. Y.) 20 Wend. 72, 73, 32 Am. Dec. 521.

As laborer or servant.

See "Laborer"; "Servant."

Merchant appraiser.

Act Cong. Jan. 16, 1883, c. 27, § 6, declares that all clerks, agents, or persons employed in the customs department of the government shall undergo a competitive examination before appointment, and shall be selected by the collector as prescribed by Rev. St. § 2930. Held, that the words, "clerks, agents, or persons employed," as so used, meant persons having a regular employment in the customs department, and hence did not include a merchant appraiser who is appointed as an expert in particular instances to reappraise particular goods. Auffmordt v. Hedden, 11 Sup. Ct. 103, 107, 137 U. S. 310, 34 L. Ed. 674.

Salesman.

One employed as a salesman in a store or shop is a clerk, within the meaning of Bankr. Act 1898, § 64b, subd. 4, giving priority to claims for wages due to workmen, clerks, or servants, which have been earned within three months before the date of commencing the proceedings. In re Flick (U. S.) 105 Fed. 503.

Secretary.

The terms "clerk" and "secretary," as applied to subordinate ministerial functionaries, are by popular usage synonymous terms, and are frequently used interchangeably. "Secretary" is defined as "a person employed to write orders, letters, dispatches, public or private papers, records, and the like; an official scribe, amanuensis, or writer." A clerk is defined as "one who is employed to keep records and accounts, a scribe, a penman, an accountant; as the clerk of the court." State v. Currie, 3 N. D. 310, 315, 55 N. W. 858.

In an action against a railroad company, the secretary, as provided by Gen. St. Conn. § 3455, and not the president, is the one to whom notice should be given, under section 2673, making the right to maintain an action against a corporation conditional on notice to its clerk. Mack v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co., 51 N. E. 1076, 1077, 172 Mass. 185.

"Clerk," as used in Rev. St. 1874, c. 77, § 52, declaring that, in order to effect a levy upon the shares of a stockholder in a corporation, the sheriff shall leave a copy of the execution with the clerk, treasurer, or cashier of the corporation, means that officer who usually has the custody of the books and records of the corporation; and hence such service on the secretary of a corporation was sufficient. People v. Goss & Phillips Mfg. Co., 99 Ill. 355, 361.

A clerk is defined as "one who is employed to keep records and accounts; a scribe, penman, or accountant," and is practically synonymous with "secretary," so that a town authorized to employ a clerk may under such authority employ a secretary. Griffin v. Town of Corydon, 44 S. W. 629, 19 Ky. Law Rep. 1872.

The term "clerk," within the meaning of Act Pa. April 20, 1858, relating to boats navigating certain rivers, does not include the secretary of a corporation who has charge of the fitting and building of a boat for such corporation. The Short Cut (U. S.) 6 Fed. 630, 631.

School teacher.

A school teacher is neither a laborer, clerk, servant, nurse, or other person, within the meaning of the statute providing that in all cases within the jurisdiction of a justice of the peace, where any action is brought by any laborer, clerk, servant, nurse, or other person for compensation claimed due for personal services performed, the plaintiff, if successful, shall be entitled to recover as part of the costs a judgment against the defendant for an attorney's fee. School Dist. No. 94, Grant County, v. Gautier, 73 Pac. 954, 957, 13 Okl. 194.

Superintendent.

The superintendent of a mine is not a laborer, servant, clerk, or operative of a company, within the meaning of a provision of its charter making its stockholders individually liable for the wages of such persons in case the company becomes insolvent. Cocking v. Ward (Tenn.) 48 S. W. 287, 289.

One who was secretary and superintendent of a corporation, and had charge of the building and fitting of a boat, was not a clerk, within the meaning of an act giving liens on boats navigating certain rivers. The Short Cut (U. S.) 6 Fed. 630, 631.

Telegraph operator.

The term "clerk," in Brooklyn city charter, providing that the fire commissioner may remove clerks under certain conditions, but that no person on the force for extinguishing fires shall be removed without cause, etc., does not include a telegraph operator of the fire department, but he is a member of the force for extinguishing fires. People v. Ennis, 7 N. Y. Supp. 630, 631.

Tradesman.

The term "servant or clerk," in the embezzlement statute, making any servant or clerk who embezzles property received in the course of his employment guilty, etc., does not include a tradesman to whom raw materials are given to be converted into manufactured articles, and who contracts and receives them in good faith. People v. Burr (N. Y.) 41 How. Prac. 293, 297.

Traveling salesman.

The term "clerk" has come to include, not only a subordinate who writes letters or keeps books, but also a salesman in a retail store. A traveling salesman is not a clerk of his employer, within the meaning of Bankr. Act 1898, § 64b, cl. 4, according to priority of payment out of bankrupts' estates to wages due to workmen, clerks, or servants. In re Greenwald (U. S.) 99 Fed. 705. A creditor of a bankrupt, who is employed as a traveling salesman by a bankrupt at an annual salary, is not a clerk, within the meaning of Bankr. Act 1898, § 64b, according to priority of payment out of bankrupt estates to clerks. In re Scanlan (U. S.) 97 Fed. 26, 27.

The original meaning of the word "clerk" has become so enlarged that in modern usage it may include a salesman in a retail store. It cannot, however, be extended to include one whose business is to travel and secure customers, and whose compensation is by commission on sales effected by or through him. Mulholland v. Wood, 31 Atl. 248, 249, 166 Pa. 486.

A traveling salesman, who spends about one-half of his time on the road selling goods and collecting, and the rest in shipping and selling goods and making collections in the city, is a clerk, within Act Tenn. 1875, § 11, making stockholders of a corporation liable for money due laborers, clerks, servants, etc. Hand v. Cole, 12 S. W. 922, 923, 88 Tenn. (4 Pickle) 400, 7 L. R. A. 96.

The term "clerk," as designating an occupation or business, must be understood in its ordinary acceptation, and that is, not a writer or one performing clerical functions only, but a salesman in a store or shop as well. The business of a traveling agent is quite distinct from that of a clerk, and the fact that the traveling agent receives a fixed salary, instead of a commission on sales or other varying compensation, does not make him a clerk. State v. Chapman, 35 La. Ann. 75, 76.

The term "clerk, laborer, or tradesman," in a statute giving a preference out of a fund raised by execution against his employer to a clerk, laborer, or tradesman, does not include a traveling salesman, who sells on commission for a furniture manufacturer. Witmer v. Miller, 12 Pa. Co. Ct. R. 363, 364.

The term "clerk" does not include a person engaged under a contract to make sales of goods dealt in by a firm in a particular state, with agreement that he shall receive half the profits and bear half the losses of the business done, so as to be entitled to a preference in the distribution of an insolvent's estate, under Rev. Civ. Code, art. 3191, authorizing the giving of a preference to clerks, secretaries, and other persons of that kind. Brierre v. His Creditors, 9 South. 640, 641, 43 La. Ann. 423.

The term "clerk," within the meaning of the law creating a privilege in favor of a clerk in respect to the payment of salaries, does not include an agent employed to solicit sales of the goods of a manufacturer at a monthly salary and commission. Weems v. Delta Moss Co., 33 La. Ann. 973, 975.

CLERK OF COUNTY.

See "County Clerks."

CLERK OF CORPORATION.

The term "clerk of a corporation," as used in the chapter relating to private corporations, shall mean the recording officer, whether he is styled "clerk," "secretary," "cashier," or however designated. V. S. 1894, 3676.

CLERK OF COURT.

See "Clerk."

A clerk of the court is included in the term "officer of the law." Gordon v. State, 2 Tex. App. 154, 158 (citing Pen. Code, art. 351).

A clerk of court "is an officer of the court, and a part of his duties consists in recording the will, direction, and judgment of the court. To that extent he is the amanuensis of the court." Ross v. Heathcock, 15 N. W. 9, 11, 57 Wis. 89.

The clerk is an officer of a court, who keeps its minutes, or records its proceedings, and has the custody of its record and seal. Peterson v. State, 45 Wis. 535, 540.

The clerk is not the court. He is simply the scribe and custodian of its records. He is not an agent of the court, nor has he any authority to act for or represent the court in its absence, so that a payment of money by a railroad company to the clerk, without the court's knowledge, by a clerk of the county, under a statute authorizing it to take possession of land condemned and pay into the circuit court the amount found due as compensation, confers no rights on the company. National Docks & N. J. J. Connecting Ry. Co. v. United New Jersey R. & Canal Co., 28 Atl. 673, 674, 52 N. J. Eq. 366.

The United States statutes relative to naturalization provides that the preliminary declaration for naturalization might be made before the supreme, superior, district, or circuit court of some one of the states, and further provides that, as doubts have arisen whether certain courts of record are included within the description of district or circuit court, any court having common-law jurisdiction and a seal and a clerk shall be considered as a district court, within the meaning of the act. Under this statute it is held that a police court, in which the justice was the recording officer and acted as clerk, was not a "court having a clerk" within the act. State v. Whittemore, 50 N. H. 245, 251, 252, 9 Am. Rep. 196.

Rev. St. U. S. § 2165, providing that an alien who desires to become a citizen of the United States shall declare on oath before a circuit or district judge or a district or Supreme Court of the territories, or a court of record of any of the states, having a clerk, means a clerk distinct from the judge of such court. "Judge Curtis, in his opinion in the case of Michael Cregg, 2 Curt. 98, says that 'a court in which the justice was the recording officer was not a court having a clerk within the meaning of the act of Congress.'" State v. Webster, 7 Neb. 469, 471.

Under Code, § 795, cl. 6, authorizing the judge of probate to employ at his own expense a clerk, for whose official acts he shall be responsible, it is held that the clerk of a probate judge is not an independent officer, clothed with distinct official power and duty, to be exercised on his own responsibility, but is a mere agent or deputy, acting for and in the name of a principal, and hence all his official acts must be performed in the name of the judge, so that a certificate of the acknowledgment of the mortgage before one as clerk of the probate court is not a sufficient certificate. Pioneer Savings & Loan Co. v. Barclay, 19 South. 308, 309, 108 Ala. 155.

The term "clerk," as used in a rule of court providing that all process shall be served by the marshal, and that the clerk shall at the time of issuing every process make as many copies of the same as there are persons to be served, will be construed to include a commissioner, since, when he issues process, his duties are exactly analogous to those of the clerk. McGourin v. United States (U. S.) 102 Fed. 553, 557.

The clerk of the district court is an officer authorized by Congress, appointed by a federal officer, recognized as an officer of the United States, his duties prescribed, and his compensation fixed by congressional enactment. He is required to attend upon the sessions of the court. He constitutes a component part of the court, and must attend it daily and record its proceedings. He gives his bond to the United States, takes the oath required by the United States, and is entitled to the emoluments provided by the United States. United States v. Warren, 71 Pac. 685, 687, 12 Okl. 350.

In the construction of statutes the words "county clerk" shall be held to include clerk of the county court, and the words "clerk of the county court" to include "county clerk." Hurd's Rev. St. Ill. 1901, p. 1719, c. 131, § 1, subd. 8.

As city or municipal officer.

See "City Officer"; "Municipal Officer."

CLERKSHIP.

"A clerkship to an attorney imports the office of assistant to an attorney, an actual occupation in and about the attorney's business and under his control. The services are to be rendered, not solely or mainly by the study of law books, but chiefly by attending to the work of the attorney under his direction." The purpose of the rule that every applicant for an examination for an attorney's license must first serve a regular clerkship with some practicing attorney for four years "is that the clerk shall be actually engaged in the practice of law under the guidance of his master for the stated period, so that by direct contact with the attorney's duties he may acquire the skill and facility in the profession which are necessary for enabling him to protect and promote independently the interest that clients may afterwards commit to him." In re Dunn, 43 N. J. Law (14 Vroom) 359, 361, 39 Am. Rep. 600.

CLIENT.

"A client is one who applies to a lawyer or counselor for advice and direction in a question of law, or commits his cause to his management in prosecuting a claim or defending against a suit in a court of justice." McCreary v. Hoopes, 25 Miss. (3 Cushman) 428, 429.

"A client is one who applies to an advocate for counsel and defense; one who retains the attorney, is responsible to him for his fees, and to whom the attorney is responsible for the management of the suit." McFarland v. Crary (N. Y.) 6 Wend. 297, 312.

The term "client," as used in Wag. St. p. 1374, § 8, disqualifying an attorney to testify concerning any communication made by his "client" to the attorney in a professional capacity, will be construed in its most enlarged sense, as including all who communicate facts to attorneys expecting professional advice. The prohibition "should close the mouths of all who have listened to disclosure looking to professional aid." Cross v. Riggs, 50 Mo. 335, 337.

CLIMATE.

In a bill of lading exempting from liability a steamer on which perishable goods were shipped from loss occasioned by the effect of climate, the word "climate" did not include the effect of a temporary frost. The Aline (U. S.) 19 Fed. 875, 876.

CLOCK.

See "Stock Clock."

CLOSE.

Ky. St. c. 21, § 26, providing that, when the law requires any writing to be signed by a party thereto, he shall not be deemed to be a party thereto, unless the signature be subscribed at the end or close of such writing, does not require that no words whatever shall follow the signature; but, where a date and the name of the place of making a will follow testator's signature, the statute was complied with, since neither the date nor place of making are a part of the will. Flood v. Pragoff, 79 Ky. 607, 614.

As inclosure.

Inclosure distinguished, see "Inclosure."

The word "close," as used in a complaint alleging the breaking of plaintiff's close, means, as defined by Blackstone, "a portion of lands, as a field, inclosed, as by a hedge, fence, or other sensible inclosure." This definition is approved in Burrill's Law Dictionary, and it is added that in common acceptance "close" means an inclosed field. Locklin v. Casler (N. Y.) 50 How. Prac. 43, 44.

The word "close," as it was used at common law, is purely technical, and relates to the interest in the soil and to its invisible boundaries, which the owner has, and not to those artificial barriers often erected around land. The whole duty of erecting boundary or division fences, in the absence of agreement or prescription, is regulated by statute, in the absence of which there is no duty on the part of the owner of the close to erect division fences. Meade v. Watson, 8 Pac. 311, 312, 67 Cal. 591.

As interest in soil.

"Close" is purely technical, and relates to the interest in the soil and to its invisible boundaries, and not to those artificial barriers often erected around land. Meade v. Watson, 67 Cal. 591, 593, 8 Pac. 311; Peck v. Smith, 1 Conn. 103, 139, 6 Am. Dec. 216; Richardson v. Brewer, 81 Ind. 107, 108.

A close is a weir of certain defined limits, or a particular defined area of land to which a certain person claims title. The term is generally used with reference to trespass, by which is described in common-law pleading a trespass on land, as an allegation that a defendant with force and arms broke and entered the plaintiff's close, which is an allegation of trespass to a particular lot of land belonging to the plaintiff. Matthews v. Treat, 75 Me. 594, 600.

"The term 'close,' in its common acceptance, means an inclosed field; but in law it rather denotes the interest of the party in the land, whether inclosed or not. It signifies any interest which will enable the party to maintain trespass for an injury to the real property or to the mere possession. In such actions, which may be brought as well by a person having a possessory right as by a person having a legal estate, the declaration alleges an injury to the plaintiff's close." Wright v. Bennett, 4 Ill. (3 Scam.) 258, 259.

The word "close," in an action of trespass, has a technical meaning, signifying the interest in the soil, and is a sufficient description of the plaintiff's interest, however temporary that interest may be. If it be a term for years, or even a less estate, it is sufficiently described by calling it a "close." Blakeney v. Blakeney (Ala.) 6 Port. 109, 115, 30 Am. Dec. 574.

The term "close" means the land owned or rightfully possessed by a party, although it may be inclosed only by the imaginary boundary line that defines its territorial limits. Dudley v. McKenzie, 54 Vt. 685, 687.

CLOSE (verb).

An account.

"Close," as used in a letter acknowledging an unsettled account and stating that the writer would write again and give information as to when he would return to the city and put a "close" to this affair, means "pay the account," if any balance should be found against him, and is sufficient to authorize the jury to presume a new promise within the period of limitation. Patton's Adm'rs v. Ash (Pa.) 7 Serg. & R. 116, 128.

A bargain.

"A bargain is closed when nothing mutual between the parties remains to be done to give either a right to have it carried into effect, but when either can enforce it against the other, or recover damages for the non-fulfillment of it." Mactier's Adm'rs v. Frith (N. Y.) 6 Wend 103, 114, 21 Am. Dec. 262.

Authority to a real estate broker to close a bargain for the sale of property did not authorize him to sign a contract for the sale in the name of his principal and agree to give a warranty deed, with full covenants and a perfect title, on demand, within 30 days from the date of the contract, but only authorized him to bring the parties together. Coleman v. Garrigues (N. Y.) 18 Barb. 60, 67.

Books of assessment.

The closing of books of assessment is not a physical act, but is a simple limitation of the time during which those interested can apply to have mistakes in the assessments of property for taxes corrected. Putting the book away in the safe at 4 o'clock on April 30th was not a closing of the book, nor was the opening of the book on the 1st day of May an opening of the book; and when the statute says that on the 1st day of May the books shall be closed, it means that on the 1st day of May applications for correction of assessments will not be received. Clarke v. City of New York, 13 N. Y. St. Rep. 290, 292.

The business of a bank.

The changing of a state bank into a national bank is not "a closing of its business," within the meaning of St. N. Y. 1859, providing for the redemption of a state bank's circulation and releasing it from liability on such notes as are not presented within six years after the giving of prescribed notice. Metropolitan Nat. Bank v. Claggett, 12 Sup. Ct. 60, 62, 141 U. S. 520, 35 L. Ed. 841.

Estate.

The word "closed," as used in Bankr. Act July 1, 1898, c. 541, § 11, cl. "d," 30 Stat. 549 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3426], providing that suits shall not be brought by or against a trustee in bankruptcy two years after the estate has been closed, means properly and finally closed; and if it appears that the order closing the estate was made under a mistake, and that an order should be entered reopening the estate for further administration, it should be held that the estate is open for the purpose of bringing suits, though more than two years have elapsed since the entry of the erroneous order. Blafsky v. Abraham, 67 N. E. 318, 319, 183 Mass. 401.

In reference to saloons.

"Closed," as applied to saloons on Sundays, requires the proprietor to see that they are not open for any purpose. People v. Blake, 18 N. W. 360, 361, 52 Mich. 566.

"Closed," as used in Act No. 259 of 1881, requiring saloons to be closed on Sunday, is employed in a strict sense, and the law is violated if the place used as a saloon is open for any purpose whatever on Sunday. People v. Waldvogel, 13 N. W. 620, 49 Mich. 337. The law is violated if the saloon be open, even for the purpose of cleaning it out. People v. Higgins, 22 N. W. 309, 311, 56 Mich. 159.

A saloon is not closed, within the meaning of the law, when, after locking up, there remains in the saloon with the saloon keeper and his barkeeper a third person not in his employ, and where these three, after scrubbing out and cleaning up, take a "night-cap" before leaving. People v. James, 59 N. W. 236, 100 Mich. 522.

A statute requiring the doors of a saloon to be "closed" at and after a certain hour meant that no one should be inside or get inside thereafter before lawful hours, at least with the consent of the proprietor or his agents, and a saloon is not closed when people can go in and purchase liquor, no matter if the front door is closed, or by what means they gain admittance. People v. Cummerford, 25 N. W. 203, 205, 58 Mich. 328.

"Closed," as used in a statute requiring saloons to be closed on Sunday, means "absolutely closed; the front, sides, and rear of that part or room which is used for tipping purposes. It makes no difference as to whether any liquors be sold or not. The offense consists in its being open, not in selling or offering to sell, or giving away. The law is in force as well at the back as at the front door. It surrounds such a house if the whole be used for such a purpose, and if only one room then that room, and commands that all its doors be closed." Harvey v. State, 65 Ga. 568, 570.

A saloon is not closed, within the meaning of the law, where the public, or any part of it, are allowed to stay in the saloon. If the doors are closed, and drinking takes place, it cannot be said that such a saloon is closed. People v. James, 59 N. W. 236, 100 Mich. 522.

The term "closed," in the statute of 1875, providing that all saloons and places of public resort where intoxicating liquors are sold shall be closed on Sunday and between 11 and 6 in the nighttime, means that the sale shall be entirely stopped and the traffic effectually shut off during such hours, so that drinking and the conveniences for drinking shall be no longer accessible, and that those who frequent the places for that purpose shall be dispersed. Kurtz v. People, 33 Mich. 279, 282.

Under a statute which requires the closing of saloons at 11 o'clock at night, where a billiard room, connected with a saloon by an open arch, was without doors, though it is provided with a canvas curtain, with buttons on the sides and at the floor, is kept open after the prescribed hour, the saloon is not closed. People v. Hughes, 56 N. W. 942, 97 Mich. 543.

A trust.

"Closed," as used with reference to a trust under which a mine held by trustees was to be operated, did not mean when the trustees ceased working by reason of lack of money to pay the expenses. The trust cannot be "closed" until the work is accomplished. To say that the trust has run its course and is completed, because there are no rents, issues, and profits, is simply to say that the trust is accomplished because it could not be accomplished. Charter Oak Life Ins. Co. v. Gisborne, 15 Pac. 253, 254, 260, 5 Utah, 319.

CLOSE CONFINEMENT.

A verdict finding a person guilty of murder in the first degree and assessing his punishment at "close confinement in the penitentiary" is equivalent to "imprisonment to hard labor for life," as used in Const. 1869, art. 5, § 8, empowering juries to assess imprisonment to hard labor for life as punishment for murder in the first degree. One of the definitions of "close" given by Mr. Webster is "pent up, which we take as tantamount to imprisonment." Gladden v. State, 2 Tex. App. 508, 509.

Where one surrendered himself to the control of the jailer at the jail house, he must be regarded as having gone into close confinement, within the meaning of a bond given to procure his release from arrest on execution, conditioned that he should deliver himself into the custody of the keeper of the jail and go into close confinement. Rollins v. Dow, 24 Me. (11 Shep.) 123, 124.

The words "close confinement," in chapter 99, Laws 1903, mean that the convict shall be safely and securely kept in confinement pending the execution of the judgment of death. They add nothing to the rigor of the former statute (section 8320, Rev. Codes 1899), which permitted the officer having in charge one under judgment of death, when he deemed the jail insecure or unsafe, to confine such person in any other jail of the state where he could be safely and securely confined; safety and security through confinement being the unchanged purpose of both statutes. These words are not used in this context as synonymous with solitary confinement. State v. Rooney (N. D.) 95 N. W. 513, 515.

CLOSE CORPORATION.

A "close corporation" is one in which the major part of the persons to whom the powers have been granted, on the happening of vacancies among them, have the right of themselves to appoint others to fill such vacancies, without allowing to the corporators in general any vote or choice in the selection of such new officers. McKim v. Odom (Md.) 3 Bland, 407, 416, note.

CLOSEHAULED.

Closehauled, as used in Merchants' Shipping Act 1854, § 296, providing that whenever any ship proceeding in one direction meets another ship proceeding in another direction, so that, if both ships were to continue their respective courses, they would pass so near as to involve any risk of a collision, the helms of both ships shall be put to port so as to pass on the port side of each other, and this rule shall be obeyed by all ships, whether on the port or starboard tack, and whether closehauled or not, does not necessarily mean literally as close as possible to the wind, but in the sense that a vessel may be more or less closehauled—may be closehauled, though a little off the wind. Chadwick v. City of Dublin Steam Packet Co., 6 El. & Bl. 771, 773.

A vessel hove to, and making headway and leeway, is a vessel "closehauled," within the meaning of the rule of navigation that, where two vessels are approaching each other, one being closehauled on the port tack, and the other closehauled on the starboard tack, it is the duty of the former to keep out of the way. The Ada A. Kennedy (U. S.) 33 Fed. 623, 624.

CLOSE OUT.

As the term is used in reference to dealing in futures on margins in boards of trade, bucket shops, etc., "closed out" means the selling of the goods for the want of sufficient margins. Fortenbury v. State, 1 S. W. 58, 59, 47 Ark. 188.

"Closing out" a contract on the Cotton Exchange for the sale of cotton on the failure of the purchaser to comply therewith is done by going into the market and buying the cotton at the lowest price at the time that it can be bought, and using that in settlement of the contract with the buyer on the principal contract. Kingsbury v. Kirwin, 43 N. Y. Super. Ct. (11 Jones & S.) 451, 454.

CLOSE PROXIMITY.

"Close proximity" is an equivalent term with "in the immediate vicinity," and both are indefinite terms, either of which, in an instruction regarding a railroad's negligence in allowing weeds to grow near the track, might have been understood as a declaration that it was negligence to leave weeds or bushes anywhere on the right of way. Ward v. Wilmington & W. R. Co., 13 S. E. 926, 928, 109 N. C. 358.

CLOSE SEASON.

The "close season" for hunting and fishing is a time in the year when all persons are prohibited from hunting and fishing. State v. Theriault, 41 Atl. 1030, 1031, 70 Vt. 617, 43 L. R. A. 290, 67 Am. St. Rep. 695.

"Closed season," as used in the game and fish act, means the season wherein the killing of game is prohibited. Rev. St. Okl. 1903, § 3076.

The term "close season," as used in the chapter relating to the preservation of fish, game, birds, etc., means that period of time during which an act is prohibited. V. S. 1894, 4562.

CLOSELY GOVERNED.

An instruction that the jury were to be closely governed by the charge was no more than telling them that they were to take the law of the case from the court and be governed by it. First Congregational Meeting House Soc. v. Town of Rochester, 29 Atl. 810, 811, 66 Vt. 501.

CLOTH.

"Fleeces, yarn, and cloth," within the meaning of a statute exempting from execution 10 sheep, their fleeces, and the yarn or cloth manufactured from the same, is to be construed as including fleeces, yarn, and cloth equal in amount to that grown on 10 sheep, even though the debtor never owned the sheep on which the wool was grown. Hall v. Penney (N. Y.) 11 Wend. 44, 45, 25 Am. Dec. 601; Brackett v. Watkins (N. Y.) 21 Wend. 68, 69.

CLOTHING AND FURNISHING GOODS.

Under a chattel mortgage upon "all the stock of clothing and furnishing goods" in a certain store building, no goods will pass which do not come within the description of clothing or furnishing goods, as a description of the stock in a mortgage is restrictive. Clement v. Hartzell, 46 Pac. 961, 964, 57 Kan. 482.

CLOUD ON TITLE.

"A cloud upon title" is a title or incumbrance apparently valid, but in fact invalid. Bissell v. Kellogg (N. Y.) 60 Barb. 617, 629; Teal v. Collins, 9 Or. 89, 92; Goodkind v. Bartlett, 26 N. E. 387, 136 Ill. 18, 21.

"A cloud upon one's title is something which shows prima facie some right of a third person to it." Waterbury Sav. Bank v. Lawler, 46 Conn. 243, 245; Gilman v. Van Brunt, 13 N. W. 125, 29 Minn. 271.

A cloud on a title is but an apparent defect, for the title sole and absolute in fee is really in the person moving against the cloud. The density of the cloud can make no difference in the right to have it removed. Anything of this kind that has a tendency, even in a slight degree, to cast doubt on the owner's title and to stand in the way of a full and free exercise of his ownership, is a cloud on his title which the law will recognize and remove. Whitney v. City of Port Huron, 50 N. W. 316, 317, 88 Mich. 268, 26 Am. St. Rep. 291.

A cloud on title is an outstanding claim or incumbrance which, if valid, would affect or impair the title of the owner of a particular estate, and which apparently and on its face has that effect, but which can be shown by extrinsic proof to be invalid or inapplicable to the estate in question. It may be a conveyance, a mortgage, a judgment, tax levy, etc. Scofield v. City of Lansing, 17 Mich. 437, 446.

"It has never been held that to constitute a cloud upon title there must be a title upon record apparently valid. It is sufficient if there be a deed valid upon its face, accompanied with a claim of title based upon facts showing an apparent title under such circumstances that a court of equity can see that the deed is likely to work mischief to the real owner of the property. Where defendant claims that a deed was executed in such form and so delivered as to vest some interest in the land in the grantee, which interest defendant claims to have purchased at a sheriff's sale, under execution, against the grantee, and he threatens to perfect and enforce his title, his claim constitutes a cloud upon the title." Fonda v. Sage, 48 N. Y. 173, 181.

"Cloud on title" may be said to be the semblance of title, either legal or equitable, or a claim of an interest in lands appearing in some legal form, but which is in fact unfounded, or which it would be inequitable to enforce. If the claim sought to be removed is valid and may be enforced either at law or in equity, it cannot be said to be a cloud. Rigdon v. Shirk, 19 N. E. 698, 699, 127 Ill. 411.

"Cloud upon the title," as used in Rev. St. Miss. 1871, p. 191, § 975, authorizing the owner of real estate to file a bill in equity to remove a cloud from the title, will be construed to mean a pretended title or right which is clearly invalid or inequitable, but which may embarrass the real owner in controverting it either at the present or future time. Phelps v. Harris, 101 U. S. 370, 374, 25 L. Ed. 855.

As requiring evidence to avoid.

To Mr. Justice Field of the supreme bench of the United States is probably due the credit of first defining accurately and precisely the correct test of "cloud on title" which should govern in all cases. Discussing at length this question in Pixley v. Huggins, 15 Cal. 127, 133, he said: "The true test, as we conceive, by which the question whether a deed would cast a cloud on the title of the plaintiff may be determined, is this: Would the owner of the property in an action of ejectment brought by the adverse party, founded on the deed, be required to offer evidence to defeat a recovery? If such proof would be necessary, the cloud would exist. If the proof would be unnecessary, no shade would be cast by the presence of the deed. If the action would fall of its own weight without proof in rebuttal, no occasion could arise for the equitable interposition of the court, as in the case of a deed void on its face, or which was the result of proceedings void on their face, requiring no extrinsic evidence to disclose their illegality. All actions resting on instruments of that character must necessarily fail." Thompson v. Etowah Iron Co., 17 S. E. 663, 664, 91 Ga. 538.

A cloud on title is something, such as a mortgage, deed, or judgment, etc., which shows prima facie some interest in a third person in or to the property adverse to the person vested with the real title to the same, or to one having an interest therein. Where an instrument upon its face shows prima facie such an adverse interest in a third party and is of such character as that, if put in evidence in an action by the real owner, or by one having such an interest to quiet his title, he would be compelled in defense to prove his own title, it constitutes a cloud which a court of equity, if appealed to, will remove. Thus where, after giving a contract to a purchaser of land by which a deed is to be given after payment, the owner executes a trust deed to secure a note, such trust deed is a cloud on title. Schenck v. Wicks, 65 Pac. 732, 734, 23 Utah, 578.

In order that there may be a cloud upon the title, there must at least be something which can be pointed out, and which has some appearance of furnishing a valid objection to the petitioner's title. For examples, see Parker v. Shannon, 13 N. E. 155, 156, 121 Ill. 452; Rea v. Longstreet, 54 Ala. 291, 294; Lytle v. Sandefur, 9 South. 260, 261, 93 Ala. 396. And so, where a petition of one who had purchased under execution sale merely alleged that the former owner's whereabouts were unknown to the petitioner, who had reason to believe that he would not return, and that petitioner's title was clouded by the possibility that said former owner might maintain a claim adverse to him, based upon some alleged defect in the deed, no sufficient foundation was laid for the action. Gilman v. Gilman, 50 N. E. 452, 171 Mass. 46.

Instrument defective on face.

A cloud upon title is a title of such a character as that, if asserted by action and put in evidence, it would drive the other party to the production of his own title in order to establish a defense. If, on the other hand, the title be void on its face, if it be a nullity, a mere felo de se when produced, so that an action based upon it would fall of its own weight, it does not necessarily constitute a cloud upon the title. Lick v. Ray, 43 Cal. 83, 87.

"To constitute a cloud upon title of lands, there must be some color of title shown in the defendant. The conveyance of land by the grantor who sets up no title whatever does not cast any cloud over the title of the true owner." Dunklin County v. Clark, 51 Mo. 60, 62.

A "cloud upon title" is said to exist when a claim of title, which is made to land, appears to be valid upon the face of the record, and the defect therein can only be made to appear by extrinsic evidence, particularly if that evidence depends upon oral testimony to establish it. When a defect appears on the face of the record, through which the opposite party can alone claim the title, there is not a cloud upon the title. Ward v. Dewey, 16 N. Y. 519, 522.

As applicable to personality.

In legal parlance, "cloud upon title" arises with reference to real estate only. A circular letter of the state beer inspector, notifying merchants that they must submit their product for inspection, and his pretended right to enforce the act, will not constitute a cloud upon the title to their property and business. State ex rel. Kenamore v. Wood, 56 S. W. 474, 477, 155 Mo. 425, 48 L. R. A. 596.

Tax proceedings.

A tax roll which was delivered to the treasurer for collection, the tax being then declared to be a lien on the premises, was a cloud on the title, though the time when the tax was due had not yet arrived. Scofield v. Lansing, 17 Mich. 437, 446.

Cooley, Tax'n, 542, says: "A cloud upon one's title is something which constitutes an apparent incumbrance upon it, or an apparent defect in it; something that shows prima facie some right of a third party either to the whole or some interest in it. An illegal tax may or may not constitute such a cloud. If the alleged tax has no semblance of legality, if upon the face of the proceedings it is wholly unwarranted by law, or for any reason totally void, so that any person inspecting the record and comparing it with the law is at once apprised of the illegality, the tax, it would seem, could neither constitute an incumbrance nor an apparent defect of title, and therefore in law could constitute no cloud." City of Detroit v. Martin, 34 Mich. 170, 173, 22 Am. Rep. 512; Frost v. Leatherman, 20 N. W. 705, 707, 55 Mich. 33. When the illegality or defect does not appear on the face of the record, but must be shown by evidence aliunde, it will constitute a cloud. Montgomery v. Cowlitz County, 44 Pac. 259, 260, 14 Wash. 230.

Cloud on title consists of any instrument purporting by its terms to convey land from the original source of title, however invalid it may be. It nevertheless creates a cloud on the title if it is valid on its face and requires extrinsic evidence to show its invalidity. Thus a tax deed emanating from the Auditor General, if it did not confer an absolute title, would cast a cloud on the title of the owner of the property, and would materially affect the market value and salability of the land. Stoddard v. Prescott, 25 N. W. 508, 510, 58 Mich. 542.

CLUB.

As association, see "Association."

As voluntary association.

"A club is a definite association organized for indefinite existence, not an ephemeral meeting for a particular occasion, to be lost in the crowd at its dissolution." Eichbaum v. Irons, 6 Watts & S. 67, 69, 40 Am. Dec. 540.

A club is an association of individuals for pleasure or profit. Martin v. State, 59 Ala. 34.

In relation to liquor selling.

The word "club" has no very definite meaning. Clubs are formed for all sorts of purposes, and there is no uniformity in their constitutions and rules. It is well known that clubs exist which limit the number of members and select them with great care, which own considerable property in common, and in which the food and drink furnished to the members for money is but one of many conveniences which the members enjoy. If a club were really formed solely or mainly for the purpose of furnishing intoxicating liquors to its members, and any person could become a member by purchasing tickets which would entitle the holder to receive such intoxicating liquors as he called for, upon a valuation determined by the club, the organization itself might show that it was the intention to sell intoxicating liquors to any person who offered to buy, and the sale of what might be called a "temporary membership" in the club, with a sale of the liquors, would not substantially change the character of the transaction. One inquiry always is, whether the organization is bona fide a club with limited membership, into which admission cannot be obtained by any person at his pleasure, and in which the property is actually owned in common, with the mutual rights and obligations which belong to such common ownership under the constitution and rules of the club, or whether either the form of the club has been adopted for other purposes, with the intention and understanding that the mutual rights and obligations of the members shall not be such as the organization purports to create, or a mere name has been assumed without any real organization behind it. Commonwealth v. Pomphret, 137 Mass. 564, 567, 50 Am. Rep. 340.

As a weapon.

"Club," in an indictment charging a felonious assault with a club, is not a term sufficiently generic in its nature to include a pistol. State v. Braxton, 16 South. 745, 47 La. Ann. 158.

A club is a heavy staff or stick fit to be used in the hand as a weapon. State v. Phillips, 10 S. E. 463, 464, 104 N. C. 786.

CLUB CATERER.

One may be an innkeeper without being a club caterer, or he may be a club caterer without being an innkeeper, or he may be both; but if he is, the two employments are so far separate and distinct in respect of duties and liabilities as not to make him responsible in the one capacity for liabilities incurred in the other. Amey v. Win- chester, 39 Atl. 487, 488, 68 N. H. 447, 39 L. R. A. 760, 73 Am. St. Rep. 614.

CO.

As company.

"Co." is a well understood abbreviation of the word "company." West Chicago St. R. Co. v. People, 40 N. E. 599, 600, 155 Ill. 299 (citing Keith v. Sturges, 51 Ill. 142).

The abbreviation "& Co." added to a name does not necessarily give rise to the presumption of the existence of a partnership. Schroeder v. Turner, 13 Atl. 331, 332, 68 Md. 506.

As county.

The fact that depositions were taken pursuant to a commission addressed "to any notary public within and for Dauphin Co., Pa." was held not ground for suppressing such depositions. It is a matter of common knowledge that "Co." is used as an abbreviation of "county," and "Pa." is an abbreviation of "Pennsylvania," and proof of such facts was not required. The abbreviations were so used in the commission, but they could have had no other meanings than those names; hence there was no ambiguity, and no sufficient ground for objecting thereto. Gilman v. Sheets, 43 N. W. 299, 300, 78 Iowa, 499.

COACH.

See "Hackney Coach"; "Mail Coach"; "Separate Coach"; "Stage Coach."
As wagon, see "Wagon."

"Coach" is a generic term. It is a kind of carriage, and is distinguished from other vehicles chiefly as being a covered box hung on leathers, with four wheels. 3 Enc. Amer. 271, tit. "Coach." As used in the charter of a toll road fixing a rate of toll for every "coach," etc., the term includes mail coaches and stage coaches. Cincinnati, L. & S. Turnpike Co. v. Neil, 9 Ohio (9 Ham.) 11, 12.

"Coach or other four wheel spring carriage," as used in St. 1804, c. 125, § 4, providing that a certain toll should be paid for each "coach or other four wheel spring carriage" passing over turnpikes, should be construed to include a stage carriage, the body of which was suspended on thorough-braces attached to four-braced iron jacks. The words "other four wheel spring carriage" do not by necessary implication qualify the preceding word "coach," so that no coach would be chargeable with the toll unless it was also a spring carriage. A species of carriage which was and is well known by the name of "coach" is chargeable with toll, whether known to the trade or coachmakers as a "spring carriage" or not. Housatonic River Turnpike Corp. v. Frink, 32 Mass. (15 Pick.) 443, 444.

A city ordinance required the defendant to pay the annual license fees for each "car" now allowed by law, and the only license fees at the time allowed were those for "coaches." Held, that the term "car" was a sufficient synonym of the term "coach," so that defendant was liable for the tax previously required of coaches. City of New York v. Third Ave. R. Co., 1 N. Y. Supp. 397, 400, 48 Hun, 621; City of New York v. Third Ave. Ry. Co., 22 N. E. 755, 117 N. Y. 404.

COADJUTOR BISHOP.

A "coadjutor bishop" is a bishop who is appointed to perform the functions of a regular bishop who is old or infirm. Olcott v. Gabert, 23 S. W. 985, 987, 86 Tex. 121.

COAL.

As a mineral, see "Mineral."

The term "coal," in an order to a miner for coal, is to be construed to mean coal of a merchantable character. Edwards v. Hathaway (Pa.) 12 Leg. Int. 58.

"Coals," as used in St. 1 & 2 Wm. IV, c. 76, §§ 23, 60, imposing a duty upon coals imported into London, does not include an article composed of coal dust mixed with 13 per cent. of pitch and lime, though there was no purpose to which the ordinary pit coal could be applied to which coal dust, without the admixture of pitch and lime, could not also be applied. City of London v. Parkinson, 10 C. B. 228.

On an issue as to whether the term "coal" in a marine policy included a substance called "patent fuel," it was held that a witness acquainted with the composition and mode of preparation of the fuel was competent to testify whether it was included in the term "coal," though he had never dealt in patent fuel or in coal, either as a merchant or an underwriter. The court say that "if coal were broken by a patented machine, and thereby had a peculiar shape, it might well be called 'patent fuel.'" Howard v. Great Western Ins. Co., 109 Mass. 384, 388.

COAL BARGE.

A "coal barge" is a rough square-cornered box from 156 to 180 feet long, about 26 feet wide and 8 to 10 feet deep, specially made for the transportation of coal down the Mississippi river and its tributaries. It is usually sold with the coal, and when the coal is unloaded is broken up for old lumber and firewood, but sometimes when in good condition, and if such boats are in demand, is towed back up the river and used once more. It is not a "ship" or "vessel" within the admiralty laws. Wood v. Two Barges (U. S.) 46 Fed. 202, 204.

COAL LEASE.

A coal lease is an instrument conveying coal, with the right to mine the same. Monetooth v. Gamble, 16 Atl. 594, 595, 123 Pa. 240.

COAL MINE.

"A 'going coal mine' is not merely a hole in the ground. It is made up of shafts, drifts, slopes, engines, machinery, platforms, cars, tracks, scales, etc." Central Trust Co. v. Sheffield & B. Coal, Iron & Ry. Co. (U. S.) 42 Fed. 106, 110, 9 L. R. A. 67.

The term "coal mine," in a statute making it the duty of the owners or operators of coal mines to fence the top of each and every shaft of the mine by gates, does not include a pit intended to be used, when completed, as a shaft of a coal mine which it is intended to open and work. In Appeal of Westmoreland Coal Co., 85 Pa. 344, it was ruled that the term "mine," when applied to coal, is equivalent to a worked vein, for it is there said that by working a vein it becomes a mine. In Astry v. Ballard, 2 Mining Rep. 291, it was held that a seam of coal unmined was not a "coal mine" in the natural, obvious, or popular meaning of those words. Springside Coal Min. Co. v. Grogan, 53 Ill. App. 60, 65.

The term "coal mine," as used in the acts relating to mines and mining, includes the shafts, slopes, drifts, or inclined planes connected with the excavations penetrating coal stratum or strata, which excavations are ventilated by one general air current or division thereof, and connected by one general system of mine railroads over which coal may be delivered to one or more parts outside the mine. P. & L. Dig. Laws Pa. 1897, vol. 4, col. 1249, § 33.

The term "coal mine or colliery," as used in an act relating to mines and mining, includes every operation and work, both underground and aboveground, used or to be used for the purpose of mining and preparing coal. P. & L. Dig. Laws Pa. 1894, vol. 2, col. 3110, § 193.

COAL OIL.

"Kerosene" is a term originally employed as a trade-mark for a mixture of certain liquid hydrocarbons used for purposes of illumination. It has been prepared from bituminous coal, bituminous shales, asphaltum, malthus, wood, resin, fish oil, and coal tar, but it is doubtless true that at the present time its practical business source is petroleum, from which it is obtained by a process of distillation and refinement. It is therefore, in a commercial sense, a refined coal or earth oil. Bennett v. North British & Mercantile Ins. Co., 81 N. Y. 273, 275, 37 Am. Rep. 501.

Naphtha, benzine or benzol, and kerosene are all refined coal or earth oils, not differing in their nature, but only in the degree of inflammability, kerosene being much less inflammable than either of the others. Morse v. Buffalo Fire & Marine Ins. Co., 30 Wis. 534, 536, 11 Am. Rep. 587.

COAL PRIVILEGE.

A "coal privilege" is a grant by the owner of coal lands of the right "of mining and taking out of the coal lying under a certain piece of ground, or a given number of acres, either at a specified rate per bushel or so much per acre." In such case the grantee has a right to mine and remove to the pit's mouth, if necessary, all minerals or other substances found in his way, no matter how valuable they may be. Peterson v. Kier (Pa.) 2 Pittsb. R. 191, 199.

COAL-TAR PREPARATIONS.

"Coal-tar preparations," as used in Tariff Act Oct. 1, 1890, par. 19, does not include antipyrine, a patented medicine, ready for administration in the condition as imported, made of the aniline from coal tar, alcohol being chemically used and broken up in the manufacture. Schulze-Berge v. United States (U. S.) 66 Fed. 748, 749.

"Coal-tar preparations," as used in Act Oct. 1, 1890, par. 19, include sulphotoluic acid, a remote derivative of coal tar by a combination with sulphuric acid, its dominant element being derived from coal tar, and the chief use of the article being in the construction of coal tar dyes by combining with a base. William J. Matheson & Co. v. United States (U. S.) 65 Fed. 422.

COAST.

The "coast" is the shore. United States v. Pope (U. S.) 28 Fed. Cas. 629, 630.

The definition of the term "coast" or "seashore" as "the contact of the mainland with the main sea, where no bay intervenes, and with the latter wherever it exists," is substantially correct. The term "coast" undoubtedly suggests to the mind the place of meeting between the mainland and the water of the sea, where no bay intervenes, but it does not so readily suggest also the shores of the bay. It is rather by a process of reasoning than suggestion that it is made to comprehend the shores of the ocean and of the bays as one broken line. Hamilton v. Manifee, 11 Tex. 718, 751.

COAST-TRADE LICENSE.

A coasting trade license is a warrant to traverse the water washing or bounding the coasts of the United States. Such a license conveys no privilege to use, free of tolls or of any condition whatsoever, the canals constructed by a state, or the water courses partaking of the character of canals, exclusively within the interior of a state, and made practicable for navigation by the funds of the state. Veazie v. Moor, 55 U. S. (14 How.) 568, 574, 14 L. Ed. 545.

COAST WATERS.

Within the navigation act "coast waters" are tide waters navigable from the ocean by ocean craft, and the term embraces all waters opening directly or indirectly into the ocean, and navigable by ships, foreign or domestic, coming in from the ocean, of draft as great as is drawn by the larger ships which traverse the open seas. The Victory (U. S.) 63 Fed. 631, 636; Id., 68 Fed. 395, 397, 15 C. A. 490 (citing The Britannia, 153 U. S. 130, 14 Sup. Ct. 795, 38 L. Ed. 660; The John King [U. S.] 49 Fed. 469, 1 C. C. A. 319).

"Coast waters," as used in Act March 3, 1885, c. 354 (23 Stat. 438), providing that the international regulations shall apply to navigation on the high seas in all "coast waters" of the United States, manifestly embrace not merely the waters that face the open sea, but the bays, the passages, the inlets, and sounds formed by the islands that skirt the coast. The Garden City (U. S.) 26 Fed. 766, 773.

COASTER.

"Coaster" is a term applied to vessels plying exclusively between domestic ports, and usually to those engaged in domestic trade, as distinguished from vessels engaged in the foreign trade, or plying between a port of the United States and a port of a foreign country. The mere fact that an ocean-going steamer may touch at some other port of the United States after leaving her port of departure would not make her a "coaster." Pleasure yachts, designed as models of naval architecture, are not coasters, for they are not allowed to transport merchandise or carry passengers for pay. Belden v. Chase, 14 Sup. Ct. 264, 271, 150 U. S. 674, 37 L. Ed. 1218.

COASTING.

By "coasting," as used by a motorman who testified that his car was coasting when the accident occurred, was meant that the current of electricity was turned off and no power applied to the car other than the force of gravity on the downgrade. Peterson v. Minneapolis St. Ry. Co., 95 N. W. 751, 752, 90 Minn. 52.

COASTING TRADE.

"Coasting trade" means a commercial intercourse carried on between different districts in different states, between different districts in the same state, and between different places in the same district, on the sea coast or on a navigable river." North River Steamboat Co. v. Livingston (N. Y.) 3 Cow. 713, 747.

The phrase "vessel in coasting trade" indicates "vessels engaged in the domestic trade or plying between port and port in the United States, as contradistinguished from those vessels engaged in the foreign trade or plying between a port of the United States and a port of a foreign country." City and County of San Francisco v. California Steam Nav. Co., 10 Cal. 504, 507.

Coastwise trade synonymous.

The term "coasting trade" as used in the United States statutes relating to commerce, navigation, and revenue, is synonymous with the term "coastwise trade" as used in such statutes. Ravesies v. United States (U. S.) 37 Fed. 447.

Use of rivers or canals.

"Coasting trade," as used in Act Cong. 1838, requiring a license to carry on the coasting trade, means the trade along the shore. The coast is the shore. To coast is to navigate along the shore. A license to carry on the coasting trade is not required for a ferryboat which merely crosses a river, for it cannot in any proper sense be said to be engaged in any trade, nor can it be said to "coast" or be "employed in coasting trade." United States v. Pope (U. S.) 28 Fed. Cas. 629, 630; United States v. Morrison (U. S.) 26 Fed. Cas. 579, 584.

COASTING VESSEL.

"Coasting vessel" is a term applied to vessels plying exclusively between domestic ports, and usually to those engaged in domestic trade, as distinguished from vessels engaged in the foreign trade or plying between a port of the United States and a port of a foreign country. The mere fact that an ocean-going steamer may touch at some other port of the United States after leaving her port of departure would not make her a coasting vessel. Pleasure yachts, designed as models of naval architecture, are not coasting vessels, for they are not allowed to transport merchandise or carry passengers for pay. Belden v. Chase, 14 Sup. Ct. 264, 271, 150 U. S. 674, 37 L. Ed. 1218.

(reversing Chase v. Belden, 9 N. E. 852, 854, 104 N. Y. 86, 22 N. E. 963, 117 N. Y. 637).

COASTWISE TRADE.

"Vessels plying coastwise," as used in St. 1852, p. 104, § 6, providing certain pilotage duties on vessels plying coastwise, "indicate vessels engaged in the domestic trade, or plying between port and port in the United States, as contradistinguished from those vessels engaged in the foreign trade, or plying between a port in the United States and a port of a foreign country." City and County of San Francisco v. California Steam Nav. Co., 10 Cal. 504, 507.

The term "coastwise trade" in Act June 1, 1872, 17 Stat. 238, authorizing the importation in bond of certain materials which may be necessary for the construction and equipment of vessels built in the United States for the purpose of being employed in the foreign trade, including the trade between the Atlantic and Pacific ports of the United States, and the use thereof for such purposes, free of duty, but providing that the vessels receiving the benefits of the section shall not be allowed to engage in the coastwise trade of the United States more than two months in any one year except upon the payment of such duties, does not include trade between the Atlantic and Pacific ports of the United States, but such trade, according to the definition of the statute, is "foreign trade." United States v. Patten (U. S.) 27 Fed. Cas. 460, 461.

To be "engaged in the coastwise trade" means to be employed, to be occupied. The coast is the seashore, coastwise by way of the coast, alongshore. "Coastwise trade" means trade or intercourse carried on by sea between two ports or countries belonging to the same country. Coastwise trade may be a part of the commerce among the several states, but commerce among the several states is not necessarily coastwise trade. Ravesies v. The United States (U. S.) 35 Fed. 917, 919.

A vessel engaged in the carrying trade on a navigable river is engaged in the "coastwise trade" within the meaning of Act June 19, 1886, c. 421, 24 Stat. 79 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 2991], entitling the shipping commissioner to fees for shipping seamen on vessels engaged in the coastwise trade. Ravesies v. United States (U. S.) 37 Fed. 447.

COBBLESTONE.

"Cobblestone" is defined in the Century Dictionary as a cobble or rounded stone, especially such a stone as used in paving; and a "cobble" is defined as a stone rounded by the action of water, and of the size suitable for use in paving. Doyle v. City of New York, 69 N. Y. Supp. 120, 122, 58 App. Div. 588.

COCOA.

"Cocoa manufactured," as used in the Tariff Act 1890, providing for the taxation of cocoa manufactured, "is not a commercial term, and is broad enough to include the preparations of chocolate which are not more specifically mentioned in the act." In re Schilling (U. S.) 53 Fed. 81, 84, 3 C. C. A. 440.

CODE.

See "Black Code"; "Probate Code."

A code is "a system of law; a systematic and complete body of law." Johnson v. Harrison, 50 N. W. 923, 924, 47 Minn. 575, 28 Am. St. Rep. 382.

"There is quite a difference between a code of laws for a state and a compilation in revised form of its statutes. The code is broader in its scope, and more comprehensive in its purposes. Its general object is to embody, as near as practicable, all the law of the state, from whatever source derived. When properly adopted by the law-making power of the state, it has the same effect as one general act of the Legislature containing all the provisions embraced in the volume that is thus adopted. It is more than evidentiary of the law; it is the law itself. Whenever the Legislature, therefore, employs such words as 'adopting a code,' no other legitimate or reasonable construction can be given the language itself than an intention to enact and make of force as a statute every provision in the entire work which it has under consideration. In 6 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) p. 173, it is declared that the word 'code' is used frequently in the United States to signify a concise, comprehensive, systematic re-enactment of the law, deduced from both its principal sources—the pre-existing statutes and the adjudication of courts—as distinguished from compilations of statute law only. We quote the following from Black on Interpretation of Laws, p. 363: 'Although a code or revision may be made up of many provisions drawn from various sources, though it may include the whole or parts of many previous laws and reject many others in whole or in part, though it may change or modify the existing law, or though it may add to the body of law previously in force many new provisions, yet it is to be considered as one homogenous whole, established 'uno flatu.' All its various parts or sections are to be considered and interpreted as if they were parts of a single statute. And hence, according to a well-known rule, the various provisions, if apparently conflicting, must, if possible, be brought into harmony and agreement. In order to bring about this harmony and agreement, the court which is called upon to interpret the code will look through the entire work, and gather such assistance as may be afforded by a complete survey of it." Central of Georgia Ry. Co. v. State, 31 S. E. 531, 534, 104 Ga. 831, 42 L. R. A. 518.

A "code" is defined by lexicographers to be a general collection or compilation of laws by public authority. In its more restricted sense, as intended by the act of June 9, 1870, authorizing the compilation of a revised code, "it means a collection and compilation of the general statutes. Manifestly the intent was that the body of the statute of law upon all general subjects should be embraced in the revision." Mobile & O. R. Co. v. Welner, 49 Miss. 725, 739.

CODE OF CIVIL PROCEDURE.

"The 'Code of Civil Procedure' is a name given to a large part of the general laws of the state. The part of the great body of our laws which is to be found under that name is not confined to any particular subject or subjects, but includes substantive law, criminal law, and legislation that might properly be classed under any category as well as under civil procedure." Lewis v. Dunne, 66 Pac. 478, 480, 134 Cal. 291, 55 L. R. A. 833, 86 Am. St. Rep. 257.

CODICIL.

As included in will, see "Will."

"A codicil is a part of the will. It is executed with the same formalities, and the testamentary disposition sought by it to be made is treated and is the same as though the provisions were actually incorporated in the body of the will itself." A codicil, in fact, is a will, and is to be carried out by the executors named in the will, and therefore the same rules apply as would apply to the rights of the parties acquired under a will. In re Stapelton's Will, 75 N. Y. Supp. 657, 659, 71 App. Div. 1.

A codicil is a part of a will, and the two are to be construed together as one instrument. If the codicil expressly revoked any part of the will, then the part revoked must be treated as stricken out. If any part or clause of the codicil be irreconcilably repugnant to the clause or clauses of the will, then to that extent the codicil supplants the will, and the latter becomes inoperative. But it supplants a will only to the extent that the repugnancy is irreconcilable. Grimball v. Patton, 70 Ala. 626, 631.

A codicil "is some addition to or qualification of a last will and testament. A codicil is part of the will to which it is attached or refers, and both must be taken and construed together as one instrument. The codicil recognizes the existence of the original, changing it in part and affirming it in those parts in which it is not altered, and hence it has been well established that a codicil, executed with the solemnities required by the statute for passing lands, is a republication of the will, and both taken together make but one will." Proctor v. Clarke (N. Y.) 3 Redf. Sur. 445, 448.

When a codicil is executed with those formalities of execution prescribed by the statute, it is a final testamentary disposition, and the will to which it is shown to be the codicil, if itself an existent and a completed instrument according to the statute, is taken up and incorporated, so that the two taken together are deemed to, and necessarily do, express the final testamentary intention. In such a case it must logically and manifestly follow that any other will or codicil prior in date to the codicil in probate is revoked, and the presence of express words to that effect in the codicil is unnecessary. In re Campbell's Will, 62 N. E. 1070, 1071, 170 N. Y. 84.

A codicil is a supplement to a will, or an addition made by the testator and annexed to, and to be taken as a part of, a testament—being for its explanation or alteration, or to make some addition to or subtraction from the former disposition of the testator. Green v. Lane, 45 N. C. 102, 113 (citing 2 Bl. Comm. 500; Wms. Ex'rs, 8).

A codicil is an addition or supplement to a will, either to add to, take from, or alter the provisions of the will. Civ. Code Ga. 1895, § 3263.

"A codicil is a clause added to the will after its execution, the purpose of which usually is to alter, enlarge, or restrain the provisions of the will, or to explain, confirm, and republish it. It does not supersede the will as an after-made will would do, but it is a part of it, to be construed with it as one entire instrument." Lamb v. Lamb, 28 Mass. (11 Pick.) 371, 376.

"A 'codicil' is defined to be some addition to or qualification of one's last will and testament. For certain purposes it brings the will to its own date. It is to be regarded as a part thereof. Both are to be construed as one instrument, and they are alike subject to the rules of law governing the admission of parol evidence for the purpose of adding to, varying, or explaining their respective contents. The authority of both rests upon the execution of a right in accordance to statutory requirements." Dunham v. Averill, 45 Conn. 61, 79, 29 Am. Rep. 642.

If a second will is not complete, but is only a variation or subtraction from a former will, it is in the nature of a codicil. The very meaning of the word "codicil," as now used, is something annexed, or added. In re Purdy's Will, 20 N. Y. Supp. 307, 309.

A codicil duly executed is said in Tilden v. Tilden, 79 Mass. (13 Gray) 103, to be an addition or supplement to a will, and not to constitute a revocation thereof, except in the precise degree in which it is inconsistent therewith, unless there be words of revocation. Pendergast v. Tibbetts, 41 N. E. 294, 295, 164 Mass. 270.

A "codicil," within the meaning of the statute prohibiting witnesses to any will or codicil from taking, etc., cannot be limited to codicils devising real property only, but includes all codicils. Lees v. Summersgill, 17 Ves. 508, 511.

A codicil is at once amalgamated in the will and becomes a part of it. Austin v. Oakes, 1 N. Y. Supp. 307, 310, 48 Hun, 492.

CO-EMPLOYEE.

See, also, "Fellow Servant."

The essential element of common employment is a common employer and payment from a common fund. The weight of authority is to the effect that all who work for a common master, or who are subject to a common control, or derive their compensation from a common source and are engaged in the same general employment, working to accomplish the same general end, though it may be in different departments or grades of it, are co-employees. Snyder v. Viola Mining & Smelting Co., 26 Pac. 127, 129, 8 Idaho, 28.

Co-employees are persons engaged in the same general service of the same master; that is, engaged at work which may reasonably be regarded as the same; but if they are in different departments of the work they cannot be regarded as co-employees, though the work of all the departments may be said to be in a general sense conducive to the finishing and completion of the entire business. Thus, train dispatchers and trainmasters cannot be said to be co-employees of locomotive firemen. Crew v. St. Louis, K. & N. W. Ry. Co. (U. S.) 20 Fed. 87.

Co-employees are persons or servants employed by the same master, assisting each other in the same line of work. There are two classes of cases in which the employees of the same master are not co-employees. The first class is where the negligent employee is one who has the general management of and control over some portion or line of the master's business, and has control over the injured employee, and the employees engaged in that portion or line of business. The other class of cases is where two or more sets of employees are engaged in different lines of employment, as where one set of railroad employees has charge of a railroad train and its operation, while the other set keep the road in proper condition and repair. At common law, whenever a master delegates to any officer, servant, or employee, high or low, the performance of any of the duties of the master, such as the duty to provide the servant with a reasonably safe place in which to work, with reasonably safe machinery, tools, and implements, and reasonably safe materials to work with, and with suitable and competent fellow servants, then such officer, servant, or agent stands in the place of the master, and becomes what is known in the law as a "vice principal," for whose acts the master is liable to the same extent as though the master had performed the acts or was guilty of negligence. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Weaver, 11 Pac. 408, 416, 35 Kan. 412, 57 Am. Rep. 176.

COERCE—COERCION.

See, also, "Duress."

The word "coerce" means to restrain by force, especially by law or authority; to repress. The word "coerce" had at first only the negative sense of checking or restraining by force, as to coerce a bad man by punishments, or a prisoner with fetters; but it has now gained a positive sense, namely, that of driving a person into the performance of some act which is required of him by another, as to coerce a man to sign a contract, etc. In the latter sense, which is now a prevailing one, "coerce" differs but little from the word "compel," yet there is a distinction between them, "coercion" being usually accomplished by indirect means, as threats or intimidation, physical force being more rarely employed in coercing. State v. Darlington, 53 N. E. 925, 926, 153 Ind. 1; Chappell v. Trent, 19 S. E. 314, 342, 90 Va. 849.

To constitute coercion or duress which will be regarded as sufficient to make a payment involuntary, there must be some actual or threatened exercise of power, possessed or believed to be possessed by the party exacting or receiving the payment, over the person and property of another, from which the latter has no other means of immediate relief than by making the payment. Radich v. Hutchins, 95 U. S. 210, 213, 24 L. Ed. 409; Buford v. Lonergan, 22 Pac. 164, 166, 6 Utah, 301; Union Ins. Co. v. City of Alleghany, 101 Pa. 250, 252; Shuch v. Interstate Building & Loan Ass'n, 41 S. E. 28, 31, 63 S. C. 134; Garrison v. Tillinghast, 18 Cal. 404, 407. Money paid under protest does not make the payment a compulsory one, even though the party be under no legal obligation to pay. Union Ins. Co. v. City of Alleghany, 101 Pa. 250, 252.

"Compulsion" or "coercion" within the rule that a payment of money not owing was voluntary and cannot be recovered, unless its payment was procured by compulsion or coercion, is to be understood as importing some actual or threatened exercise of power possessed or supposed to be possessed by the party receiving the payment over the person or property of the party making it, through which the latter has no other means of immediate relief than by advancing the money. Brumagin v. Tillinghast, 18 Cal. 265, 272, 79 Am. Dec. 176; Garrison v. Tillinghast, 18 Cal. 404, 407.

In Peyser v. City of New York, 70 N. Y. 497, 26 Am. Rep. 624, Folger, J., speaking for the court, said: "I have spoken of coercion in fact and coercion by law; by the first I mean that duress of person or goods where present liberty of person or immediate possession of goods is so needful and desirable as that an action or proceeding at law will not at all answer the pressing purpose. Hence an instruction that if plaintiffs, in order to obtain possession of property mentioned in the contract, were compelled when making the final payment, to pay for any property to which they were entitled but which was not delivered to them, such payment was in law a payment under duress and might be recovered, was correct." Buford v. Lonergan, 22 Pac. 164, 166, 6 Utah, 301.

Of jury.

An attempt to influence the jury by referring to the time they are to be kept together or the inconvenience to which they are to be subjected in case they are so pertinacious as to adhere to their individual opinions, or an attempt to force a verdict by threats or intimidations, amounts to coercion sufficient as a ground for setting aside the verdict. People v. Sheldon, 50 N. E. 840, 843, 156 N. Y. 268, 41 L. R. A. 644, 66 Am. St. Rep. 564.

Of wife.

Coercion means "compulsion, force, and may be either actual, where physical force is used to compel a person to do an act against his will, or where the relation of the parties is such that one is under subjection to the other, and is thereby constrained to do what his free will would refuse. The common law presumes, for instance, that when husband and wife are together they have virtually but one will between them, which is the will of the husband, and consequently, if she commits an offense in his presence, it holds him prima facie responsible for it." State v. Boyle, 13 R. I. 537, 538.

COERCION BY LAW.

"Coercion by law" is where a court, having jurisdiction of the persons and the subject-matter, has rendered a judgment which is collectible in due course. There the party cast in judgment may not resist the execution of it. His only remedy is to obtain a reversal, if he may, for error in it. As he cannot resist the execution of it when execution is attempted, he may as well pay the amount at one time as another, and save the expense of delay. Peyser v. City of New York, 70 N. Y. 497, 501, 26 Am. Rep. 624 (quoted in Cowell v. Gregory, 40 S. E. 849, 130 N. C. 80, and Chapman v. Sutton, 32 N. W. 683, 685, 68 Wis. 557); Harrington v. City of New York, 81 N. Y. Supp. 667, 670, 40 Misc. Rep. 165 (citing Peyser v. City of New York, 70 N. Y. 497, 501, 26 Am. Rep. 624).

COERULINE.

"Coeruleine" is a dye made by boiling gallein in sulphuric acid, and produces green shades. It is used for dyeing wool, cotton, and silks, as woods were formerly used, and is imported in petroleum barrels, in the form of paste suspended in water, and containing as much as 20 per cent. of the dyeing property. Pickhardt v. United States (U. S.) 67 Fed. 111, 112, 14 C. C. A. 341.

COFFEEHOUSE.

A keeper of a coffeehouse merely furnishes tea and coffee, and a person who furnishes beds and provisions to such persons as apply therefor is an innkeeper. Thompson v. Lacy, 3 Barn. & Ald. 283.

A coffeehouse is not an inn within the meaning of a policy of insurance against fire enumerating the trade of an innkeeper as doubly hazardous. New York Equitable Ins. Co. v. Langdon (N. Y.) 6 Wend. 623, 627; Doe ex dem. Pitt v. Laming, 4 Camp. 73, 77.

"Coffeehouse" is defined by Worcester to be a house of entertainment where coffee is sold. It is sometimes used to denote a hotel or tavern, but a license to keep a coffeehouse, whatever that term may mean, does not give a privilege to sell intoxicating liquors. Commonwealth v. Woods, 4 Ky. Law Rep. 262, 27 Albany Law J. 64.

COFFEE ROASTER.

In a case in which it was held that one who merely roasts coffee was not a manufacturer of coffee within the meaning of a statute exempting such manufacturer from certain taxes, there was evidence that a "coffee roaster" was simply a person who takes a sack of coffee and puts it in a roaster and turns the coffee out after it is roasted. City of New Orleans v. New Orleans Coffee Co., 14 South. 502, 503, 46 La. Ann. 86.

COGNIZANCE.

"Cognizance," as used in St. 1844, c. 44, § 4, providing that the Supreme Judicial Court shall have full cognizance and jurisdiction over any crime punishable by death, "is a word of the greatest import, embracing all power, authority, and jurisdiction." Web- ster v. Commonwealth, 59 Mass. (5 Cush.) 386, 400.

As used in a statute declaring that application for relief of any person to a hospital for the insane may be made to the court hereinafter named, or any judge thereof—that is, “to any judge learned in the law of any court within this commonwealth having immediate cognizance of the crime”—the word “cognizance,” as shown by the context, is used in the sense of “the right to take notice of and determine a cause.” That right exists only where the crime was committed, or in a county where the prisoner may be legally tried. Clarion County v. Western Hospital for Insane, 3 Atl. 97, 98, 111 Pa. 339.

Avowry distinguished.

See “Avowry.”

As recognizance.

The word “cognizance,” as used in Code, § 4385, authorizing changing of venue in criminal cases, and providing that, when any prosecution has been transferred, the court or judge may require all material witnesses in behalf of the prosecution to enter into cognizance for their appearance at the court to which the prosecution is transferred, should be held to mean “recognizance,” which is defined to be an obligation of record entered into before some court of record or magistrate, duly authorized, with condition to do some particular act, while “cognizance” means, in law, knowledge or notice, judicial knowledge or jurisdiction, an acknowledgment or confession, as an acknowledgment of a fine. Comfort v. Kittle, 46 N. W. 988, 989, 81 Iowa, 179.

COGNOVIT.

A plea in an action which acknowledges that the defendant did undertake and promise as the plaintiff in its declaration has alleged, and that it cannot deny that it owes and unjustly detains from the plaintiff the sum claimed by him in his declaration, and consents that judgment be entered against the defendant for a certain sum, is called a “cognovit.” It is a judgment by confession. Mallory v. Kirkpatrick, 33 Atl. 205, 207, 54 N. J. Eq. 50.

COHABIT—COHABITATION.

See “Bigamous Cohabitation”; “Illicit Cohabitation”; “Matrimonial Cohabitation.”

“Cohabit” means, according to Webster, first, to dwell with another in the same place; second, to live together as husband and wife. United States v. Griego (N. M.) 72 Pac. 20, 22.

“To cohabit is to live or dwell together, to have the same habitation, so that where one lives and dwells, there does the other live and dwell always with him. The Scotch expression conveys the true idea, perhaps better than our own—‘the habit and repute of marriage.’” In re Yardley’s Estate, 75 Pa. (25 P. F. Smith) 207, 211.

“Cohabitation” means to live together in the same house, claiming to be married, or, when used with reference to the relation of parties as husband and wife, merely to live together in the same house. Cox v. State, 23 South. 806, 117 Ala. 103, 41 L. R. A. 760, 67 Am. St. Rep. 166 (citing Bouv. Law Dict.); State v. Chandler, 33 S. W. 797, 798, 132 Mo. 155, 53 Am. St. Rep. 483; Jones v. Commonwealth, 80 Va. 18, 20; Van Dolsen v. State, 27 N. E. 440, 441, 1 Ind. App. 108.

Bishop, in his work on Marriage, Divorce, and Separation, § 1669, says to “cohabit” is to dwell together, so that matrimonial cohabitation is the living together of a man and woman ostensibly as husband and wife. Turney v. State, 29 S. W. 893, 60 Ark. 259.

The word “cohabit” is said to mean to dwell or live together as husband and wife. State v. Sekrit, 32 S. W. 977, 978, 130 Mo. 401; State v. Chandler, 33 S. W. 797, 798, 132 Mo. 155, 53 Am. St. Rep. 483; Turney v. State, 29 S. W. 893, 60 Ark. 259. Such is its meaning as used in Code 1891, c. 149, § 7, providing punishment for persons who “lewdly and lasciviously live and cohabit together.” State v. Miller, 24 S. E. 882, 42 W. Va. 215. And as used in Pub. St. c. 207, § 4, providing that whoever, having a former wife living, marries another or continues to cohabit with such second wife, is guilty of bigamy, etc. Commonwealth v. Lucas, 32 N. E. 1033, 158 Mass. 81.

The word “cohabiting,” as used in Code Civ. Proc. § 1962, providing that the issue of a wife cohabiting with her husband is presumed to be legitimate, means the living together of man and woman ostensibly as husband and wife. In re Mills’ Estate, 70 Pac. 91, 92, 137 Cal. 298, 92 Am. St. Rep. 175.

“Obviously the legal sense of the term, as used in Acts 1877-78, p. 302, c. 7, § 7, making it criminal for persons not married to cohabit together, is to live together in the same house as married persons living together or in the manner of husband and wife.” Jones v. Commonwealth, 80 Va. 18, 20.

To warrant a conviction under Rev. St. 1889, § 3798, punishing a man and woman who lasciviously abide and “cohabit” with each other, the evidence must show that they live together as man and wife. State v. Chandler, 33 S. W. 797, 798, 132 Mo. 155, 53 Am. St. Rep. 483.

The word “cohabit,” in Cr. Code, § 208, making it unlawful for any unmarried man to cohabit with a married woman in a state of adultery, means dwelling together as husband or wife, or in sexual intercourse. Sweeney v. State, 80 N. W. 815, 816, 59 Neb. 269.

Cohabitation does not mean merely living together, but is used in the law as relating to the living together of a man and woman as husband and wife. A presumption of marriage may arise from matrimonial cohabitation, where the parties not only live together as husband and wife, but hold themselves out to the world as sustaining that honorable relation to each other. Brinckle v. Brinckle (Pa.) 12 Phila. 232, 234.

"Matrimonial cohabitation must certainly comprehend a living together as husband and wife, embracing relative duties as such, and does not mean merely living together in the same house." Stein v. Stein, 5 Colo. 55, 56.

Cohabitation means a living together in one house, a boarding or tabling together, and carries with it the idea of a fixed residence, and does not include persons who are merely traveling together through the country. Ohio v. Connoway (Ohio) Tappan, 90, 91.

Cohabitation may be lawful or illicit. It is lawful if preceded by consent, by words in the present, however such consent may be proved. When cohabitation follows consent, it is evidence that the parties have mutually assumed marital rights and duties, as it is evidence that the marriage has been completed by consummation. Sharon v. Sharon, 16 Pac. 345, 360, 75 Cal. 1.

As continuous and public.

"Cohabitation, in its usual sense, implies publicity, since two persons cannot secretly live together." Granberry v. State, 61 Miss. 440, 444.

To "cohabit," according to the sense in which the word is used in a penal statute, means dwelling together as husband and wife, or in sexual intercourse, and comprises a continued period of time. Hence the offense is not the single act of adultery; it is cohabiting in a state of adultery; and it may be a week, a month, a year, or longer, but still it is one offense only. "The defendant is charged with the crime from August 10, 1874, until July 15, 1875. According to the import of the words used in the statute, this is a continued offense, and, if it should be proved that he wantonly cohabited with the woman in a state of adultery during any portion of this time, such proof would be sufficient to establish the crime and fix the guilt of the party." State v. Way, 5 Neb. 283, 290.

In relation to polygamous marriages.

The term "cohabit," as found in the criminal codes of many of the states, is coupled with and qualified by the adverbs "lewdly,"

"lasciviously," "adulterously," or some other equivalent expression. No such word or expression, however, is found in Act Cong. March 22, 1882, c. 47, 22 Stat. 31 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3633], providing that if any male person in a territory, or other place over which the United States has exclusive jurisdiction, therein cohabits with more than one woman, he shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and therefore cannot be construed as necessarily meaning the same offenses as are intended to be defined by the state statutes. As defined by lexicographers, "cohabit" means to dwell with or reside together. It may mean residing in the same country, city, or neighborhood, or in the same family, or the dwelling together in lawful wedlock. This would be lawful cohabitation. Or it may mean the dwelling of a man and woman together ostensibly and apparently in wedlock, when in fact or in law no marriage exists; and without proof of adultery or fornication this would be merely unlawful cohabitation. Or it may mean the living together of a man and woman without lawful marriage in the practice of fornication or adultery, which would be lascivious, lewd, or adulterous cohabitation. "Cohabitation," as used in a matrimonial sense, means to dwell together as husband and wife. United States v. Musser, 7 Pac. 389, 4 Utah, 153.

Act Cong. March 22, 1882, c. 47, 22 Stat. 31 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3633], declaring that if a male person cohabits with more than one woman he shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, etc., should be given a broad meaning. It was the practice of unlawful cohabitation, or living together with more than one woman, that was aimed at by the act—a cohabitation classed with polygamy, and having its outward semblance. It is not, on the one hand, meretricious unmarital intercourse with more than one woman; nor, on the other hand, does the statute pry into the intimacies of the marriage relation. But it seeks not only to punish bigamy and polygamy, when direct proof of the existence of those relations can be had, but to prevent a man from flaunting in the face of the world the ostentation and opportunities of a bigamous household, with all the outward appearances of the continuance of the same relations which existed before the act was passed, and without reference to what might occur in the privacy of those relations. United States v. Snow, 9 Pac. 501, 505, 4 Utah, 280; United States v. Clark, 21 Pac. 463, 464, 6 Utah, 120.

"Cohabit," as used in the act of Congress making it a misdemeanor for a man to cohabit with more than one woman, means to dwell or live together as husband and wife. United States v. Langford, 21 Pac. 409, 2 Idaho (Hasb.) 561; United States v. Kuntze, 21 Pac. 407, 2 Idaho (Hasb.) 480; Ex parte Nielson, 9 Sup. Ct. 672, 675, 131 U. S. 176, 33 L. Ed. 118.

Act March 22, 1882, c. 47, 22 Stat. 31 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3633], providing that if any male person hereafter cohabits with more than one woman he shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, etc., means "to hold out to the world two women as a man's wives by his language or conduct, or both, and he is guilty of cohabitation if he lives in the house with them and eats at the table of each a portion of his time, although he may not occupy the same bed or sleep in the same room with either of them, or actually have sexual intercourse with either." Cannon v. United States, 6 Sup. Ct. 278, 116 U. S. 55, 29 L. Ed. 561; United States v. Cannon, 7 Pac. 369, 375, 4 Utah, 122. Extreme case, see United States v. Harris, 17 Pac. 75, 76, 5 Utah, 436, holding that if the legal wife live in the same vicinity with the husband, bearing his name, in a household maintained in part by him, that is "cohabitation."

Sexual intercourse implied.

To "cohabit" means to dwell together, inhabit or reside in company, or in the same place or country. Specifically, "to dwell or live together as husband and wife," often with reference to persons not legally married, and usually, but not always, implying sexual intercourse. Cox v. State, 23 South. 806, 117 Ala. 103, 41 L. R. A. 760, 67 Am. St. Rep. 166 (quoting Cent. Dict.).

Cohabitation implies sexual intercourse, and will be inferred from the fact of the living together of husband and wife. Burns v. Burns, 60 Ind. 259, 260.

Cohabitation does not mean simply the gratification of sexual passion, but to live or dwell together, to have the same habitation, so that, where one lives and dwells, there does the other live and dwell also. People v. Lehmann, 38 Pac. 422, 423, 104 Cal. 631 (citing Kilburn v. Kilburn, 89 Cal. 46, 50, 26 Pac. 636, 23 Am. St. Rep. 447; Sharon v. Sharon, 79 Cal. 633, 670, 22 Pac. 26, 131; People v. Beevers, 99 Cal. 286, 33 Pac. 844).

"Cohabit does not mean mere sexual indulgence, but it means a dwelling together as husband and wife." Olson v. Peterson, 50 N. W. 155, 156, 33 Neb. 358; Taylor v. Taylor, 50 Pac. 1049, 10 Colo. App. 303.

As used in Pub. St. R. I. c. 244, § 1, providing that every person who shall be convicted of cohabiting with another as husband and wife, having at the time a former husband or wife living, shall be punished, etc., the words "cohabit with" must mean to continue to live or dwell together as husband and wife ordinarily do, but according to the weight of authority the words do not necessarily imply actual sexual intercourse. In re Watson, 33 Atl. 873, 874, 19 R. I. 342.

The word "cohabits," in the Indiana statute declaring that "whosoever cohabits with another in a state of adultery or fornication shall be fined," etc., is used in the sense of living together, but does not import that the parties are guilty of adultery or fornication. State v. Chandler, 96 Ind. 591, 593.

Merely visiting.

"Cohabit," as used in St. 1784, c. 40, § 6, providing that if any man and woman, either or both of them being then married, shall lewdly and lasciviously associate and cohabit together, means a dwelling or living together, and not a transient, single, and unlawful interview. Commonwealth v. Calef, 10 Mass. 153.

"Cohabit," as used in a statute relating to the offense of unmarried persons cohabiting together, means that the parties dwell together as if the conjugal relation existed between them—"a dwelling or living together, not a transient or single unlawful interview." Luster v. State, 2 South. 690, 691, 23 Fla. 339.

To cohabit is to live or dwell together, so that, where one lives and dwells, there does the other live and dwell with him. A common-law marriage is not shown by irregular cohabitation and partial reputation. Taylor v. Taylor, 50 Pac. 1049, 10 Colo. App. 303.

The "cohabitation" of a man and woman as husband and wife means dwelling together, and not a habit of visiting each other, however frequent. It is the living together in the usual manner resulting from marriage. Robinson v. Robinson, 58 N. E. 906, 908, 188 Ill. 371.

"The primary meaning of the word 'cohabit' is to dwell with some one, not merely to visit or see them. It includes more than that. Such, too, is the meaning as determined by its derivation, being compounded of 'con,' with, and 'habitare,' to dwell. The law presumes the husband to cohabit with his wife, even after a voluntary separation has taken place between them." Calef v. Calef, 54 Me. 365, 366, 92 Am. Dec. 549.

COHABIT AS HUSBAND AND WIFE.

"Cohabiting together as husband and wife" means living together publicly in the face of society as if the conjugal relation existed; living in the same house in like manner as marks the intercourse between husband and wife. Bush v. State, 37 Ark. 215, 218.

"Cohabitation as husband and wife," within a statute prohibiting persons not married from cohabiting together as husband and wife, means the living together in the same house and in a relation to each other as if they were married, and a deporting of themselves toward each other as though they were husband and wife; but it is not necessary that the parties themselves should claim to be husband and wife. Lyerly v. State, 36 Ark. 39, 40; Sullivan v. State, 32 Ark. 187, 190.

To constitute a "cohabiting together as man and wife," within the prohibition of the statute declaring that it shall be a crime for two persons not married to cohabit together as husband and wife, it is not necessary that the parties should sustain the relation of husband and wife toward each other. Intercourse, however, between them is not necessary, but the mere fact that they live in the same house without holding themselves out as husband and wife and having intercourse does not satisfy the statute. Taylor v. State, 36 Ark. 84.

The phrase "cohabit together as man and wife," in an indictment charging a married man and an unmarried woman with cohabiting together as man and wife, imports that the parties are cohabiting together in a state of fornication. State v. Chandler, 96 Ind. 591, 593.

COIN.

See "Counterfeit Coin."

The power "to coin money, regulate the value thereof and of foreign coin," has no reference to, and by no possibility can have any reference to, the rate of interest to be charged for money loaned. The power thus conferred upon Congress is the power to coin money, and regulate the value of the money so coined. It has been said that the power to coin money would doubtless include that of regulating its value, had the latter power not been expressly inserted. The power of regulating the value of money is a mere repetition of the words granting the power to coin money. 2 Story, Const. (4th Ed.) § 1117. By the power conferred, Congress may establish the value of domestic and of foreign coin. The object of the power thus conferred is to save the country from the embarrassments of a perpetually fluctuating and variable currency. The power to coin money is one of the ordinary prerogatives of sovereignty, and is almost universally exercised in order to preserve a proper circulation of good coin of a known value in the home market. 2 Story, Const. (4th Ed.) § 1118. The power to coin money and regulate the value thereof is the power to coin money and affix to it a public stamp and value. Beach v. Peabody, 58 N. E. 679, 680, 188 Ill. 75.

The words "one fifty cent piece in coin," in an indictment charging the taking thereof by defendant, will be construed to mean a 50-cent piece of the United States. Kirk v. State, 32 S. W. 1045, 35 Tex. Cr. R. 224.

As chattel.

See "Chattel."

As metallic money.

"When used as a noun, 'coin' means metallic money. 'Coin' is a collective word, including all manner of the several stamps and portraitures of money. A complaint for the larceny of 'copper coin of the value of $2.75' does not mean a copper coin or one copper coin, but more than one, and as many as are necessary to constitute the alleged value." Commonwealth v. Gallagher, 82 Mass. (16 Gray) 240, 241.

Coins are pieces of metal of definite weight and value, stamped by the authority of the government. Per Field, J., dissenting, in Legal Tender Cases, 4 Sup. Ct. 122, 137, 110 U. S. 421, 28 L. Ed. 204.

A coin is a piece of gold or silver or other metal stamped by authority of the government in order to fix its value, and is commonly called "money," and "to coin" is to stamp metal as money. Latham v. United States, 1 Ct. Cl. 149, 150.

Money distinguished.

The meaning of the noun "coin" is "the die used for stamping money" (Webster), and the meaning of the verb is "to stamp metal and convert it into coin." Strictly speaking, "coin" differs from "money" as the species differs from the genus. "Money" is any matter, whether metal, paper, beads, shell, etc., which has currency as a medium in commerce. "Coin" is a particular species, always made of metal, and struck according to a certain process, called "coining." Borle v. Trott (Pa.) 5 Phila. 366, 403 (quoting Whart. Law Lexicon).

As to make paper money.

To "coin money," as used in the Constitution of the United States, delegating to Congress power to coin money, does not include the right to make coined money out of paper. Thayer v. Hedges, 22 Ind. 282, 301.

The right to "make" money means to fabricate it out of metallic substances. To emit stamped paper is not to "coin" money as the word is generally understood, nor as it was used in the Constitution. Maynard v. Newman, 1 Nev. 271, 278.

"Coining money," as used in the Constitution of the United States, means metallic money, gold, silver, or copper, or other metals used for coin, and nothing more. The phrase "coining" cannot without violence be applied to the use of paper money. To "coin money" is to make, stamp and issue coins as money. Coins are pieces of metal of a particular weight and standing, to which a particular value is given in accounting and payment. Metropolitan Bank v. Van Dyck, 27 N. Y. 400, 490.

As stamping metal as money.

Instrument adapted for coining, see "Adapted."

"Coin," as a verb, means to stamp metal and convert it into coin. Borie v. Trott (Pa.) 5 Phila. 366, 403.

Taking the verb "to coin" in its general sense as meaning to stamp, to impress, to fabricate, and the word "money" to denote everything that is used in current exchanges, and we have a clause empowering Congress to stamp money, to impress money, to fabricate money, and to regulate and determine its value. Latham v. United States, 1 Ct. Cl. 149, 154.

To "coin" means not only to shape and stamp or mint metals, but to make or fabricate other things as well. It is not claimed that it was the design of the Constitution, in granting the power to coin money, to have any other species of metal than gold or silver created money by law; and, as neither gold nor silver is mentioned as the substance to be coined, it must be held that the power granted is simply to determine by law what the money of the country shall consist of, and to regulate its standard value. Hague v. Powers (N. Y.) 39 Barb. 427, 466.

The power to coin money given to Congress by the Constitution does not limit such power to money made from gold and silver. Shollenberger v. Brinton, 52 Pa. (2 P. F. Smith) 9, 50.

The power to "coin money" given to the federal government by the Constitution is the power to mold metallic substances into forms convenient for circulation, and to stamp them with the impress of the government authority, indicating their value with reference to the unit of value established by law. Per Field, J., dissenting, in Legal Tender Cases, 4 Sup. Ct. 122, 137, 110 U. S. 421, 28 L. Ed. 204.

In construing the constitutional provision authorizing the federal government to coin money, Chief Justice Chase in his dissenting opinion in the legal tender cases, says, that the words "coining money" must be understood as they were used at the time when the Constitution was adopted, and that there was no authority which at that time defined coining otherwise than as minting and stamping material for money. Legal Tender Cases, 79 U. S. (12 Wall.) 457-484, 20 L. Ed. 287.

To "coin money," as used in the United States Constitution, giving the federal government power to coin money, means "to mold into form a metallic substance of intrinsic value, and stamp on it its legal value, so as to encourage and facilitate its free circulation, and assure stability and currency." Griswold v. Hepburn, 63 Ky. (2 Duv.) 20, 29.

COINAGE.

"Coinage" means the stamping of metal in some way so as to give it currency, and is not applied to any other material. Meyer v. Roosevelt (N. Y.) 25 How. Prac. 97, 105.

The phrase "coinage of the United States" means "that which is coined at the mints of the United States." United States v. Otey (U. S.) 31 Fed. 68, 70.

CO-INSURER.

A clause in a fire policy provided that the assured should maintain insurance on the property to the extent of four-fifths of its cash value, and, in case of failure so to do, the assured should be a "co-insurer" to the extent of such deficit. Held, that the word "co-insurer" meant no more nor less than a fellow insurer, and was used to put the insured on the same footing with other insurers who issue policies and contribute ratably in case of loss. Chesbrough v. Home Ins. Co., 28 N. W. 110, 111, 61 Mich. 333.

COKE.

"Coke" consists of coal, with some gases expelled. Coke is the produce of a mine within the meaning of an inclosure act giving the lord of a manor right to grant a way for the purpose of carrying the produce of mines. Bowes v. Ravensworth, 15 C. B. 512, 522.

COKE OVEN.

As building, see "Building (In Lien Laws)."

COLABORER.

See "Fellow Servant."

A collaborer or fellow servant is one not employed to do any of the duties of the master. In reference to section masters and positions of similar character, a better opinion on the subject is that "a servant having exclusive control over other servants, under a common master, including the power to hire and discharge, is, in the exercise of those powers, the representative of the master, and not a mere fellow servant." Couch v. Charlotte, C. & A. R. Co., 22 S. C. 557, 564.

COLD-BLOODED MURDER.

The term "cold-blooded murder" is used in the common parlance to designate a willful, deliberate, and premeditated homicide. State v. Wieners, 66 Mo. 13, 25.

COLD CALCULATION.

In estimating the amount of damages in an action for personal injuries, the value of the life must be, in reasonable aspects, estimated, and in that connection there are some practical rules to be applied, which are sometimes called "cold calculations," because they require a dispassionate estimate of the real conditions and expectations of life at the time of the injury. By whatever term, however, they may be designated, they are just, and, so far as it is practicable to do so in so delicate and difficult a question, are intended to arrive at justice. Davidson Benedict Co. v. Severson, 72 S. W. 967, 973, 109 Tenn. 572 (citing Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Stacker, 86 Tenn. [2 Pickle] 343, 6 S. W. 737, 6 Am. St. Rep. 840).

COLD STORAGE.

The term "cold storage," as used in the trade, means a warehouse or storeroom ordinarily used for the preservation of butter and eggs, where the temperature is kept at a low degree, but above freezing point. Allen v. Somers, 47 Atl. 653, 654, 73 Conn. 355, 52 L. R. A. 106, 84 Am. St. Rep. 158.

COLD-STORAGE BUSINESS.

"Doing a cold-storage business" means carrying on the business of storing commodities in a cool place for hire or reward, and a packing house which used cold storage for preserving its own commodities alone, but did not receive and store for the public or any part thereof, is not "doing a cold-storage business" within Gen. Tax Act Dec. 26, 1890, § 22, imposing a tax "on all packing houses doing a cold-storage business." Stewart v. Atlanta Beef Co., 18 S. E. 981, 985, 93 Ga. 12, 44 Am. St. Rep. 119.

COLLAPSE.

A marine insurance policy insured against any loss occasioned by fire, except when caused by explosion of boiler, and except as limited by warranties therein contained, such as bursting of boilers, "collapsing" of flues, or the consequences of any character resulting from either of such exceptions; and the court, in construing the policy, said that the "bursting" of a boiler and the "explosion" of a boiler was one and the same thing, but the "collapsing" of a flue was not the explosion or the bursting of a boiler; that the flue was inside of and formed a part of the boiler, if a flue boiler, but that it was not the boiler proper, and might collapse and the boiler proper remain intact, and that the "collapsing" of a flue was not the "explosion" of a flue. Webster defines "collapse" thus: "To fall together suddenly, as the two sides of a hollow vessel; to close by falling or shrinking together; to shrink up, as a tube in a steam boiler collapses." He defines "explosion" as follows: "The act of exploding; bursting with a loud noise or detonating sound; a sudden inflaming with force and a loud report, as the explosion of gunpowder;" the shattering of a boiler by a sudden and immense pressure, in distinction from "rupture." The Century Dictionary defines "collapse" thus: "To fall together, or into an irregular mass or flattened form, through the loss of firm connection or rigidity and support of the parts or loss of the contents, as a building through the falling in of its sides, or an inflated bladder from escape of the air contained in it." It defines "explosion" as follows: "A sudden bursting or breaking up or in pieces from an internal or other force; a blowing up or tearing apart, as by explosion of a steam boiler." From these definitions it will be seen that the words "explosion" and "collapse" have almost an opposite meaning. Louisville Underwriters v. Durland, 24 N. E. 221, 223, 123 Ind. 544, 7 L. R. A. 399.

COLLATERAL.

See "As Collateral."

The use of the words "as collateral" on the stockbooks of a company, in registering the stock as belonging to a certain person as "collateral," implies that such person does not hold the stock as a shareholder. Beal v. Essex Sav. Bank (U. S.) 67 Fed. 816, 817, 15 C. C. A. 128.

"Collateral" is a separate obligation attached to any other contract to guaranty its performance. Thomson-Houston Electric Co. v. Capital Electric Co. (U. S.) 56 Fed. 849, 854 (citing Bouvier).

There is no technical legal definition of the word "collateral" distinct from its common signification. It is an additional security for the performance of the principal obligation, and on the discharge of the latter it is to be surrendered. Seanor v. McLaughlin, 30 Atl. 717, 718, 165 Pa. 150, 32 L. R. A. 467.

COLLATERAL AGREEMENT.

Whether an engagement is a "collateral agreement" or an original undertaking is sometimes a question of difficulty. But when the promise is to do a particular thing which another person is bound to do, in the event he does not do it, the obligation is regarded as an original undertaking, and not a strict or collateral guaranty. The position of a guarantor, however, even in an original undertaking, to do something that another is under obligation to do, is in the nature of a surety as between himself and the principal debtor, and must be dealt with as such. Frank v. Williams, 18 South. 351, 353, 36 Fla. 136.

COLLATERAL ANCESTORS.

The term "collateral ancestors" is sometimes used to designate uncles and aunts and other collateral antecessors of the person spoken of, who are not in fact his ancestors, but the word "ancestors," in its ordinary meaning, only includes those from whom the person spoken of is lineally descended, either on the father's or mother's side. And whenever this word is intended to be used in the sense which is different from its ordinary import of lineal ascendants, or any such an enlarged sense of antecessors so as to embrace all the blood relatives of the person referred to who have preceded him, it is qualified or enlarged by some other term to show that it is not used in its natural sense merely. Thus in the act of October, 1553, which restored to blood the son of Henry Courtney, the attainted Marquis of Exeter, he was restored in blood as well as son and heir to his father's (the marquis') as to all and every other collateral and lineal ancestor. Banks v. Walker (N. Y.) 3 Barb. Ch. 438, 446.

COLLATERAL ATTACK.

By a "collateral attack" is meant every proceeding in which the integrity of the judgment is challenged, except those made in the action wherein the judgment is rendered, or by appeals, and except suits brought to obtain decrees declaring judgment to be void ab initio. Burke v. Interstate Savings & Loan Ass'n, 64 Pac. 879, 881, 25 Mont. 315, 87 Am. St. Rep. 416.

"A collateral attack on a judgment is an attempt to avoid its binding force in a proceeding not instituted for one of the purposes aforesaid, as where, in an action of debt on a judgment, defendant attempts to deny the fact of indebtedness, or where, in a suit to try the title to property, a judgment is offered as a link in the chain of title, and the adverse party attempts to avoid its effect." An attack in trespass to try title by devisees against a purchaser at an executor's sale on the judgment of a probate court, having jurisdiction over plaintiff, which confirmed the sale, is a collateral attack. Crawford v. McDonald, 33 S. W. 325, 327, 88 Tex. 626.

If an action or proceeding has an independent purpose and contemplates some other relief or result, although the overturning of the judgment may be important or even necessary to its success, then the attack upon the judgment is collateral. Peyton v. Peyton, 68 Pac. 757, 764, 28 Wash. 278.

A "collateral attack" on a judicial proceeding is an attempt to avoid, defeat, or evade it, or to deny its force and effect in some manner not provided by law. When a judicial order, judgment, or proceeding is offered in evidence in another proceeding, an objection thereto on account of judicial error is a collateral attack. Van Fleet, Coll. Attack, § 3. Thus where a person sued for an interest in real property, and the answer set up a judgment in the former action in which it was decreed that plaintiff had no interest in the property, and plaintiff repeated that the judgment was void because no jurisdiction had been obtained of him in the former action, the attack on the judgment was collateral. Kalb v. German Savings & Loan Soc., 65 Pac. 559, 560, 25 Wash. 349, 87 Am. St. Rep. 757.

A collateral attack on a judgment is any proceeding to impeach a judgment which is not instituted for the express purpose of annulling, correcting, or modifying such judgment or enjoining its execution. Morrill v. Morrill, 25 Pac. 362, 364, 20 Or. 96, 11 L. R. A. 155, 23 Am. St. Rep. 95; Meinert v. Harter, 65 Pac. 1056, 1058, 39 Or. 609; Smith v. Morrill, 55 Pac. 824, 826, 12 Colo. App. 233; Cochrane v. Parker, 54 Pac. 1027, 1029, 12 Colo. App. 169; Harter v. Shull (Colo.) 67 Pac. 911, 912. Hence a proceeding to enjoin the enforcement of a judgment because of its invalidity or want of service of summons is not a collateral attack. Smith v. Morrill, 55 Pac. 824, 826, 12 Colo. App. 233.

A collateral attack is one, generally speaking, in which the invalidity of the judgment is predicated upon matters dehors the record. City of Greensburg v. Zoller, 60 N. E. 1007, 1008, 28 Ind. App. 126.

Where an attempt is made to avoid or correct a judgment in some manner not provided by law, the attack thereon is collateral. Spencer v. Spencer, 67 N. E. 1018, 1020, 31 Ind. App. 321 (citing Harman v. Moore, 112 Ind. 221, 13 N. E. 718).

The fact that the parties are the same, and that the defendants seek to attack the decree by allegations in their answer, cannot change the rule and make the attack any less a collateral one. Cochrane v. Parker, 54 Pac. 1027, 1029, 12 Colo. App. 169; Harter v. Shull (Colo.) 67 Pac. 911, 912. Thus, in an action to recover money paid under protest for taxes, it cannot be shown that the tax which was ordered to be levied for a certain purpose was in fact levied with intent to divert its general county purposes, thereby escaping the limitation of the general taxing power, as this would be a collateral attack on the record of the commissioners' court. Cresswell Ranch & Cattle Co. v. Roberts County (Tex.) 27 S. W. 737, 739.

When a complaint admits that a summons was served upon a party who seeks to set aside a judgment rendered in pursuance of the proof of a valid service thereof by showing dehors the record that the notice so given was insufficient, the attack upon the judgment is collateral. Melnert v. Harder, 65 Pac. 1056, 1058, 39 Or. 609.

A collateral attack is, generally speaking, one in which the invalidity of a judgment is predicated upon matters dehors the record. When the elements of fraud and mistake are involved, the attack is direct. Earle v. Earle, 91 Ind. 27; Thompson v. McCorkle, 136 Ind. 484, 34 N. E. 813, 36 N. E. 211, 43 Am. St. Rep. 334. Where no fraud was alleged, the collection of assessments on abutting property to defray local improvements will not be enjoined, unless the proceedings are void, as such would be a collateral attack. City of Greensburg v. Zoller, 60 N. E. 1007, 1008, 28 Ind. App. 126.

Direct attack distinguished.

When the validity of a record attacked is directly put in issue by the pleadings of the party attacking it by proper averment, the attack is direct, and not collateral; but when there are no proper averments attacking the record, although its validity is drawn in the issue of the case, the attack is collateral. Walker v. Goldsmith, 12 Pac. 537, 553, 14 Or. 125.

A direct attack upon a judgment is an attempt to amend, correct, reform, vacate, or enjoin the execution of the same, in a proceeding instituted for that purpose, such as a motion for a rehearing, an appeal, some form of writ of error, a bill of review, an injunction to restrain its execution, etc.; while a collateral attack is an attempt to avoid its binding force in a proceeding not instituted for one of the purposes aforesaid, as where, in an action of debt on a judgment, defendant attempts to deny the fact of indebtedness, or where in a suit to try title to property, but a judgment is offered as a link in the chain of title, and the adverse party attempts to avoid its effects, etc. Thus, where a plaintiff in an action to recover land sought to set aside, on the ground of fraud, judgments in partition affecting their title, all parties to the judgments were made parties to the action, and the tribunal in which the pending action was brought had rendered the judgments and had jurisdiction to set them aside, the attack on the judgments was not collateral, but direct, though third parties, defendants to the action claiming under the judgments, had become possessed of the land. Schneider v. Sellers, 61 S. W. 541, 543, 25 Tex. Civ. App. 226.

The prayer of a complaint asked that a guardian's release of certain mortgages on property belonging to a ward should be set aside and the mortgage foreclosed, and for general relief. The allegations of the complaint attacked the probate proceedings and acts of the guardian and a sale of the property made by him as fraudulent, which was denied by defendant. The defendant contended that, as the suit was for the foreclosure of the mortgage, the validity of the probate proceedings and the acts of the guardian could not be questioned, as it would be a collateral attack thereon; but it was held that as the complaint attacked directly the probate proceedings and the guardian's deeds thereunder, and prayed for general release in addition to the foreclosure of the mortgage, such attack was not a collateral attack. Dormitzer v. German Savings & Loan Soc., 62 Pac. 862, 881, 23 Wash. 132.

Res judicata distinguished.

The doctrine of collateral attack denies any validity whatever to the former adjudication, while that of res judicata admits its entire validity, and simply denies the scope claimed for it. There is little similarity between the two doctrines. Collateral attack involves the jurisdiction of the court, and denies its power to act at all, while res judicata merely involves the question concerning what was actually contested and decided in the trial. The doctrine of collateral attack has nothing to do with the issues or the matters contested on the trial. A judgment on default, without any issue joined or contest made, is just as invulnerable against a collateral attack as one rendered on an issue joined after a contest. Van Fleet on Collateral Attack, § 17 (cited with approval in Bitzer v. Mercke, 63 S. W. 771, 772, 111 Ky. 299).

COLLATERAL CONSANGUINITY.

Collateral consanguinity is the relation which subsists between persons who lineally descend from the same ancestor, who is the "stirps," or root, but who do not descend the one from the other. McDowell v. Addams, 45 Pa. (9 Wright) 430, 432.

The series of degrees between persons who do not descend from one another, but spring from a common ancestor, is called the "collateral line," or "collateral consanguinity." Civ. Code Cal. 1903, § 1390; Civ. Code Mont. 1895, § 1856; Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 3747.

COLLATERAL CONSIDERATION.

A collateral consideration may consist of anything which would be a burden or inconvenience to one party or a possible benefit to the other. Chicora Fertilizer Co. v. Dunan, 46 Atl. 347, 350, 91 Md. 144, 50 L. R. A. 401.

COLLATERAL DESCENT.

The term "collateral descents" is used to designate descents from brother to brother, cousin to cousin, and the like, in contradistinction from "lineal descents," as from father or grandfather to son or grandson. Levy v. McCartee, 31 U. S. (6 Pet.) 101, 112, 8 L. Ed. 334.

COLLATERAL FACTS.

Collateral facts are those which are not directly involved or connected with the principal issue or matter in dispute, so that Civ. Code, § 5066, providing that if a paper is only incidentally or collaterally material to the case the subscribing witness need not be produced, means where such facts, which yet have a sufficient bearing on the case to be admitted under the rules of evidence, are offered, or are in writing, then because they are collateral and incidental, and because they are not directly involved, the writing may go in without proof of execution by the subscribing witness. Summerour v. Felker, 29 S. E. 448, 450, 102 Ga. 254.

The test of whether a fact inquired of in cross-examination is collateral is this: Would the cross-examining party be entitled to prove it as a part of his case, tending to establish his plea? Garner v. State, 25 South. 363, 364, 76 Miss. 515.

COLLATERAL GUARANTY.

In a strict "collateral guaranty" a guarantor undertakes, in the event the principal fails to do what he has promised, to pay damages for such failure. A guarantor undertakes to pay such damages as a result of the principal's default. A surety undertakes to do the particular thing if the principal fails. Nading v. McGregor, 121 Ind. 465, 470, 23 N. E. 283, 6 L. R. A. 686; Newcomb Bros. Wall-Paper Co. v. Emerson, 17 Ind. App. 482, 46 N. E. 1018; Conduitt v. Ryan, 3 Ind. App. 1, 29 N. E. 160; Lane v. Mayer, 15 Ind. App. 382, 44 N. E. 73; Bryant v. Stout, 16 Ind. App. 380, 44 N. E. 68, 45 N. E. 343; Brandt, Sur. (2d Ed.) § 1. A salesman executed a bond to his employer with sureties, conditioned that whereas the salesman might receive or control moneys, securities, or personal property belonging to his employer, therefore, if he should account for and pay without loss or delay all such moneys, securities, or other personal property so coming into his possession or under his control, and not divert or detain any portion thereof on any pretext whatever, then the obligation to be void, and otherwise to remain in full force. Held, in accordance with the foregoing definition, that the bond was a contract of suretyship, and not of guaranty. Durand & Kasper Co. v. Rockwell, 54 N. E. 771, 772, 23 Ind. App. 11.

The terms "strict guaranty" and "collateral guaranty" do not include a promise of the guarantor to do what another is bound to do, if he shall not do it himself, but such an obligation is distinguished as an "original undertaking" in the nature of a suretyship.

Woody v. Haworth, 57 N. E. 272, 273, 24 Ind. App. 634

COLLATERAL IMPEACHMENT.

A collateral impeachment of a judgment or decree is an attempt made to destroy or evade its effect as an estoppel by reopening the merits of the case, or by showing reasons why the judgment should not be rendered or have a conclusive effect in a collateral proceeding; that is, in any action other than that in which the judgment was rendered, for, if this be done upon appeal, error, or certiorari, the impeachment is direct. Racey v. Racey, 73 Pac. 305, 306, 12 Okl. 650.

COLLATERAL INHERITANCE TAX.

What is called a "collateral inheritance tax" is a bonus exacted from the collateral kindred and others as a condition on which they may be admitted to take the estate left by a deceased relative or testator. The estate does not belong to them except as the right to it is conferred by the state. Independently of government, no such right exists. The right of the owner to transfer it to another after death, or of the kindred to succeed, is the result of municipal regulation, and must consequently be enjoyed subject to such conditions as the state sees fit to impose. Dixon v. Ricketts, 72 Pac. 947, 948, 26 Utah, 215 (citing Strode v. Commonwealth, 52 Pa. 181, 182).

A collateral inheritance tax is a tax on the property passing from the decedent, and not a mere succession duty imposed on the recipient (In re Bittinger's Estate, 129 Pa. 338, 18 Atl. 132), and hence is within the defect of power to impose it on land outside of the state. In re Handley's Estate, 37 Atl. 587, 181 Pa. 339.

COLLATERAL ISSUE.

Rule 26 of court, providing that no appeal will be allowed on collateral issues, referred to such an issue as is presented by the following example: A fund is in the hands of the court for distribution among conflicting judgment liens. Upon the consideration of that matter a controversy springs up as to whether one of the judgments, constituting a claim upon the fund, has been extinguished. If this issue is submitted, it is a collateral issue. It is collateral to the matter pending, and must be determined before that matter can be adjusted. But where a debtor or a defendant in execution is called upon, by a summons in garnishment, to say on oath whether he owes anything to such debtor, and he answers negatively, and his answer is traversed, the issue thus presented is original and independent, and not collateral to any supposed issue raised by the summons alone, and consequently a judgment upon it may be appealed from by either party as a matter of right. Strickland v. Maddox, 4 Ga. 393, 394.

COLLATERAL LIMITATION.

If a conveyance gives an interest for a prescribed period, but makes the right to possess or enjoy the thing conveyed to depend upon some collateral event, then the limitation is said to be collateral. Templeman v. Gibbs, 24 S. W. 792, 793, 86 Tex. 358.

COLLATERAL LINE.

See "Collateral Consanguinity."

COLLATERAL MOTION.

A motion to docket a cross-complaint as a separate suit is a "collateral motion," requiring a bill of exceptions to bring it into the record. Thiebaud v. Tait (Ind.) 31 N. E. 1052, 1053.

COLLATERAL NEGLIGENCE.

A failure to safeguard an excavation or opening in a public highway or bridge by those who have assumed that duty from the state makes the party liable to an action. But where a company has assumed the obligation, there is nothing to prevent it from employing a contractor to do the work for him. But by employing a contractor it cannot get rid of its own duty to other people, whatever that duty may be. If the contractor performs the company's duty for it, it is performed by the company through him, and it is not responsible for anything more. It is not responsible for his negligence in other respects, as it would be if he were the company's servant. Such negligence is sometimes called casual or "collateral" negligence. Weber v. Buffalo Ry. Co., 47 N. Y. Supp. 7, 11, 20 App. Div. 292.

COLLATERAL PROCEEDING.

A "collateral proceeding" is defined as being any proceeding which is not instituted for the express purpose of annulling, correcting, or modifying the judgment or enjoining its execution. Peyton v. Peyton, 68 Pac. 757, 764, 28 Wash. 278.

A proceeding for the condemnation of the right of way for a railroad is a collateral proceeding, so far as concerns the question of the corporate existence of the company seeking the condemnation. Peoria & P. Union R. Co. v. Peoria & F. R. Co., 105 Ill. 110, 116.

COLLATERAL PROMISE.

A collateral promise is one whose primary object is to make the promisor the surety or grantor of another's debt. Such a promise is within the statute of frauds, requiring a promise to answer for the debt, default, or miscarriage of another to be in writing. Clay v. Walton, 9 Cal. 328, 334.

A collateral promise is a promise to answer for the pre-existing debt or liability of a third person, which is founded upon such original liability, without any new consideration. Such promise is required by the statute of frauds to be in writing. Elder v. Warfield (Md.) 7 Har. & J. 391, 395.

"In Nelson v. Boynton, 44 Mass. (3 Metc.) 396, 37 Am. Dec. 148, Shaw, C. J., says the terms 'original' and 'collateral' promise are convenient enough to distinguish between the cases where the direct and leading object of the promise is to become the surety or guarantor of another's debt, and those where, although the effect of the promise is to pay the debt of another, yet the leading object of the undertaker is to subserve or promote some interest or purpose of his own. The former, though made before or after or at the same time with the promise, is not valid unless manifested by evidence in writing. The latter, if made on good consideration, is unaffected by the statute, because, although the effect of it is to release or suspend the debt of another, yet that is not the leading object on the part of the promisor." Patton v. Mills, 21 Kan. 163, 169; Almond v. Hart, 61 N. Y. Supp. 849, 852, 46 App. Div. 431.

"Whenever the main purpose and object of the promisor is not to answer for another, but to subserve some pecuniary or business purpose of his own, involving either benefit to himself or damage to the other contracting party, his promise is not within the statute, although it may be in form a promise to pay the debt of another, and although the performance of it may have the effect of extinguishing that liability." An oral promise by the owner of a building, in the process of construction, to pay laboring men, for the purpose of procuring the early completion of the building, is not a collateral promise to answer for the debt of a contractor within the statute of fraud, but is an original undertaking which may be enforced against the owner. Almond v. Hart, 61 N. Y. Supp. 849, 852, 46 App. Div. 431.

COLLATERAL PROOF.

"Collateral proof" of a deed is such an account as may reasonably be subjected under all the circumstances of the case, and as will afford a presumption that the deed is genuine. Havens v. Seashore Land Co., 20 Atl. 497, 501, 47 N. J. Eq. (2 Dick.) 365

COLLATERAL SECURITY.

Collateral security "is a separate obligation attached to any contract to guaranty its performance" (Bouvier); "is security for the performance of covenants, or the payment of money, besides principal security" (Webster); "is security for the fulfillment of a contract or pecuniary obligation, in addition to the principal security" (Worcester). "There are three kinds of security. The first is simple lien; the second, a mortgage passing a property out and out; the third, the security intermediate between a lien and a mortgage, namely, a pledge where, by contract, a deposit of goods is made a security for a debt, and the right to the property vests in the pledgee so far as is necessary to secure the debt. In all cases of a pledge as collateral security, the general property remains in the debtor. The creditor has only a special property, a lien, a right to retain his security until payment of the debt. When the debt is paid, the security reverts. If default is made, the assignee can proceed to dispose of the security and discharge his debt, and the balance, if any, goes to the assignor or debtor. Butler v. Rockwell, 23 Pac. 462, 466, 14 Colo. 125.

"Collateral security," in the phraseology of banks, means some security additional to the personal obligation of the borrower. Schoemaker v. National Mechanics' Bank (U. S.) 21 Fed. Cas. 1331, 1334; D. M. Osborne & Co. v. Stringham, 57 N. W. 776, 778, 4 S. D. 593; Edward P. Allis Co. v. Madison Electric Light, Heat & Power Co., 70 N. W. 650, 652, 9 S. D. 459.

"Collateral security" means either a separate obligation attached to a contract to guaranty its performance, or it may mean a transfer of property or other contracts to insure the performance of the principal agreement. Hale v. Burlington, C. R. & N. R. Co. (U. S.) 13 Fed. 203, 205; Gilcrest v. Gottschalk, 39 Iowa, 311, 313; Lochrane v. Solomon, 38 Ga. 286, 292.

Collateral, "in its common use, means additional, subsidiary security given to secure the principal obligation. It is a separate obligation. Such 'collateral security' stands by the side of the principal promise as an additional or cumulative means for securing the payment of the debt. The etymology of 'collateral' security indicates that it is something running along with, and, as it were, parallel to, something else of a similar character. It is collateral to the original indebtedness." Moffatt v. Corning, 24 Pac. 7, 13, 14 Colo. 104.

Collateral security "is an article of value or evidence of debt delivered by a debtor to a creditor, not in payment of the debt, but as a concurrent security for another debt, whether antecedent or newly created, and is designed to increase the facilities of the creditor to procure the principal debt which it is given to secure." McCormick v. Falls City Bank (U. S.) 57 Fed. 107, 110.

The term "collateral," applied to the security of a third person, does not ex vi termini confer a right in equity to substitution. Crump v. McMurtry, 8 Mo. 408, 414.

The use of the term "collateral security," when a debtor transfers to his creditor an article of value or the evidence of a debt, is intended to express that it is not received in payment of the principal debt, and that it is not an additional right to which the creditor is absolutely entitled. It is merely a concurrent security for another debt, subsidiary to the principal debt, and, if the principal debt be paid off, the debtor is entitled to a restoration of the collateral security. Munn v. McDonald (Pa.) 10 Watts, 270, 273.

"Collateral security" necessarily implies the transfer to the creditor of an interest in some property, or lien on property, or obligation, which furnishes a security in addition to the responsibility of the debtor. The law regulating this subject rests on the assumption of such transfer to the creditor of property in some form, on which property he relies for security, and which he is entitled to apply, instead of resorting to the debtor's own property, towards the satisfaction of his debt, by virtue of a contract, implied or express, as the case may be, but collateral to the contract of indebtedness. A debtor's additional promises to pay cannot, from the very nature of the case, be treated as collateral security for his debt, unless such additional promises are themselves secured by a lien on property, or by the obligations of third persons. In re Wadell-Entz Co., 35 Atl. 257, 258, 67 Conn. 324.

Notes of third persons are "collateral security," within Comp. Laws S. D. § 5468, providing that no person is entitled to a mechanic's lien who takes a collateral security in the same contract. Edward P. Allis Co. v. Madison Electric Light, Heat & Power Co., 70 N. W. 650, 652, 9 S. D. 459.

No person will be regarded as holding stock as a trustee or by way of "collateral security," within the meaning of section 9, Wagner's St. p. 301, and therefore exempt from liability as a stockholder, unless it has come into his possession by original subscription as trustee for some person other than the corporation, or by derivative title as trustee, or by way of collateral security after it has already been issued by the corporation in the ordinary course of business. Fisher v. Seligman, 75 Mo. 13, 24.

COLLATERAL UNDERTAKING.

Where there is a pre-existing debt or other liability, a promise by a third person having immediate respect to and founded on the original liability, without any new consideration moving to him to pay or answer for such debt or liability, is a collateral undertaking within the statute of frauds, as in the case of Fish v. Hutchinson, 2 Wils. 94, which was an action founded upon a promise by the defendant to pay a debt due from a third person to the plaintiff in consideration that the latter would stay his action against such third person. But where, distinct from the original liability, there is a new and superadded consideration for the promise, moving between the party promising and him to whom the promise is made,—in such case it is an original undertaking, as in Williams v. Leper, 3 Burr. 1886, where the defendant, having got possession of goods which were subject to distress for rent in arrear, promised the landlord (the plaintiff) to pay him the rent if he would desist from distraining. Elder v. Warfield (Md.) 7 Har. & J. 391-395.

COLLATERAL WARRANTY.

"A warranty is collateral where he on whom the warranty descends does not claim the land as heir of him by whom the warranty was made." Micheau v. Crawford, 8 N. J. Law (3 Halst.) 90, 106 (quoting Co. Lit. 375b, 376a, and notes 320, 328; 2 Bl. Comm. 302).

COLLATERALS.

Rev. Civ. Code, art. 917, permitting natural "collaterals" to inherit, refers to the legal or lawful collaterals. Montegut v. Bacas, 7 South. 449, 450, 42 La. Ann. 158.

COLLATION.

The "collation" of goods is the supposed or real return to the mass of the succession which an heir makes of property which he receives, in advance of his share or otherwise, in order that such property may be divided together with the other effects of the succession. Civ. Code La. 1900, art. 1227.

"Collation" is the bringing the mass of property of an estate together, and so dividing it that each may have, considering what he has already received, his proper share. Moore v. Freeman, 35 N. E. 502, 50 Ohio St. 592.

The word "collation," in strictness, is applied only to donations inter vivos, and the obligation of collation is founded on equality, which should be natural between children and other lawful descendants. And as applied to the legitim, the word "impute" should be used rather than "collate." Miller v. Miller, 29 South. 802, 805, 105 La. 257.

COLLECT—COLLECTION.

See "Actually Collected"; "For Collection"; "For Collection and Credit"; "Guaranty of Collection."
All sums collected, see "All."

Wag. St. p. 1259, § 79, providing that the county clerk should "collect" or cause to be collected fines, penalties, and all other moneys for school purposes, means that the county clerk is charged with the duty of seeing that the collections mentioned are enforced, but does not authorize the clerk to receive the money. State v. Moeller, 48 Mo. 331, 334.

In Rev. St. c. 208, §§ 15, 16, relating to trustee process, and providing that the trustee shall "collect" and apply the proceeds of certain varieties of property to the payment of the debt and costs, the word "collect" means "to do whatever is necessary to be done to convert the notes, bonds, and other property referred to in the section into money, so that he may apply the same to the payment of the claim." Fling v. Goodall, 40 N. H. 208, 219.

Means of collection included.

"Authority to collect" implies and includes authority to use the means ordinarily employed for the purpose of accomplishing a collection, and among these are the retaining of counsel and the institution of suit. Indeed, that is generally the only way in which collection can be compelled, and an agent whose duty it is to collect has certainly the implied power to resort to the ordinary and generally the only means of compelling collection. "Authority to collect" is broader and more comprehensive than "authority to receive payment." Ryan v. Tudor, 2 Pac. 797, 798, 31 Kan. 366.

To "collect" is to gather; to assemble. "When used with reference to the collection of money, it often implies much more than the mere act of receiving the money. An attorney brings suit to enforce the payment of a demand, and the amount recovered is made by the sale of defendant's property on judicial process. The term as applied to such a proceeding would describe not only the act of receiving the money, but all the means by which the payment was enforced." Purdy v. City of Independence, 39 N. W. 641, 643, 75 Iowa, 356.

A city charter which confers on the city the power to levy and "collect" a certain tax is construed so that the city should have power to use all the usual and ordinary means necessary for the collection of the tax. McInerney v. Reed, 23 Iowa, 410, 414.

Code Iowa, § 3370, provides that fines and forfeitures not otherwise disposed of shall go into the treasury of the county where the same are collected for the benefit of the school fund. Held, that the word "collected," as there used, meant more than simply the receiving of the money, but included all the acts by which the penalty is imposed and enforced, including the judgment of the court, which is the means by which the penalty is imposed, together with whatever, either by way of imposing or enforcing the penalty, may be or is done in the course of collecting the fine. Pottawattamie County v. Carroll County, 25 N. W. 703, 67 Iowa, 456.

The words "collect taxes," in a statute making it the duty of the county treasurer to collect taxes, means to obtain payment of the same from taxpayers. In most cases such payments will be made voluntarily, but the power to collect carries with it the authority to use force in the manner pointed out by law to obtain payment. Taylor v. Kearney County, 53 N. W. 211, 213, 35 Neb. 381.

As used in a notice by a surety on a note after it became due, directing that the payee should at once proceed and collect the note, etc., the term "collect" implies the adoption of the commonly known and most effective means of enforcing collection, if necessary, namely, the commencement of suit. Iliff v. Weymouth, 40 Ohio St. 101, 103.

"Collect," as used in Pol. Code Cal., relating to fines, forfeitures, and penalties, is used in its ordinary sense, and when so used, and no other meaning is manifested, the word "collect," and its cognates or derivatives, signify the obtaining of money without suit. People v. Reis, 18 Pac. 309, 313, 76 Cal. 269.

"Collection," as used in a note which provides that 10 per cent. attorney's fees shall be paid if the note is placed in the hands of an attorney for collection, means that which may lawfully be done by the holder of the obligation to secure its payment or liquidation after its maturity. Shenandoah Nat. Bank v. Marsh, 56 N. W. 458, 459, 89 Iowa, 273, 48 Am. St. Rep. 381.

Where the caption of an act was "to provide for the collection of the special taxes imposed by law on dealers in spirituous or malt liquors and intoxicating liquors, and for other purposes," and in the body of the act it was provided that upon failure to pay such tax the dealer might be indicted and punished for a misdemeanor, the provision for an indictment and punishment was not objectionable as an insertion of matter different from the title. Code, § 809 (g, h); Brown v. State, 73 Ga. 38, 39.

The term "collection," as applied to the guaranty of a note, may undoubtedly imply a legal proceeding against the maker. If it is impracticable to use the ordinary means of coercing payment in consequence of the maker having gone to parts unknown or beyond the reach of legal proceedings, a reasonable construction of the word would control the implied obligation, which on the face of the guaranty was prima facie impossible. The term "collection" alone is equivocal. A reasonable construction would seem to be a warranty that the note could be collected by suit, and an implication not only of ability on the part of the maker to pay, but that he would be in a situation to be sued within the state in which the contract was made. White v. Case (N. Y.) 13 Wend. 543, 544.

Note or mortgage.

"Collection," as used in a stipulation in a note providing for the payment of attorney's fees in case the note should be collected by an attorney, refers only to the money payment, and, where the note when sued upon was paid by giving a new note, such satisfaction was not a collection. Davis v. Cochran, 24 South. 168, 169, 76 Miss. 439.

Gantt's Dig. § 2103, providing that no appeal shall be taken from a justice's judgment after it has been "paid or collected," does not include giving a mortgage for a fine adjudged to the state. Floyd v. State, 32 Ark. 200, 202.

As equivalent to recovery.

"Collection," as used in a petition for the foreclosure of a mortgage, alleging that no proceeding had been had for the collection of the debt secured, is equivalent to recovery, and hence the petition complies with Code Civ. Proc. § 850, requiring complainant to state whether any proceedings have been had at law for the recovery of the debt secured. Durland v. Durland, 87 N. W. 1048, 1049, 62 Neb. 813.

Not applicable to realty.

In a will where a testator directed his executor to "collect all the above last-named specified property" collect can only apply to personalty, or can only apply to the proceeds of the sale of realty, and not the realty itself. Going v. Emery, 33 Mass. (19 Tick.) 107, 112, 26 Am. Dec. 645.

COLLECT ON DELIVERY.

See "C. O. D."

COLLECTED BY HIM.

The phrase "moneys collected by him," in a will appointing three executors, and directing that one of them should receive as compensation 6 per cent. upon all moneys collected by him, does not include the entire proceeds of the estate, or upon all sums received by the executor, but only on "collections," giving the word its ordinary meaning. Ireland v. Corse, 67 N. Y. 343, 345.

COLLECTIBLE.

See "Good and Collectible Note."

An agreement by an outgoing partner, on dissolution, to pay the continuing partner half of the outstanding accounts which are not "collected or collectible," does not require a suit to establish the collectibility of a claim uncollected after a reasonable length of time. Fellerman v. Goldberg, 58 N. Y. Supp. 1113, 1114, 28 Misc. Rep. 235.

To warrant that a debt is "collectible" is to warrant that it is legally demandable, and that the debtor is of competent ability to answer it, not that he will pay it when demanded by execution. McDoal v. Yeomans (Pa.) 8 Watts, 361, 362.

A guaranty of a note which is to be void "if said note is collectible" will be construed to require the exercise of diligence by the holder of the note to collect the same by action commenced within a reasonable time after its maturity, and the mere fact that the maker is insolvent is not sufficient to authorize a recovery on the guaranty. French v. Marsh, 29 Wis. 649, 652.

COLLECTION OF ANTIQUITIES.

The mere purchase of articles of antiquity singly, at separate times, is insufficient to constitute them a "collection," if they have not been brought together anywhere, within the meaning of Tariff Act 1890, par. 524, relating to the duty on collections of antiquities. Davis v. United States (U. S.) 77 Fed. 172, 173, 23 C. C. A. 113.

"Collections of antiquities," which are made free of duty by Act Oct. 1, 1890, par. 524, include only collections of such antique articles as are commonly recognized to be suitable for cabinet collections, according to the taste and usage of collectors of antiquarian and artistic curiosities; that is, suitable to be assembled together in boxes, drawers, or like receptacles, or in any small apartment where articles of virtu, coins, and other bric-a-brac are usually deposited for exhibition, study, the gratification of personal taste, or other like purposes. In re Glaenzer (U. S.) 67 Fed. 532, 533.

Single articles.

"Collection of antiquities," within the tariff act, embraces a collection of articles where both the antiquity of the individual articles and the circumstance that they are assembled together into a collection unite to make them attractive or useful or valuable, or otherwise desirable. The phrase does not correctly describe two rugs, or cover one-half dozen of bedspreads and two lace curtains. Baumgarten v. Magone (U. S.) 41 Fed. 770, 771.

"Collection of antiquities," as used in Tariff Act Oct. 1, 1890, par. 524, does not include a single antique opal. There must be a collection of which the importation is a part, in order to come within such provision. Tiffany v. United States (U. S.) 66 Fed. 729, 730.

Tariff Act 1890, providing that collections of antiquities should be admitted free of duty, "was apparently intended to refer to an importation of a collection or group, and not to the importation of a single article."

In re Glaenzer (U. S.) 55 Fed. 642, 645, 5 C. C. A. 225.

COLLECTION DISTRICTS.

In the case of Cross v. Harrison, 57 U. S. (16 How.) 164, 14 L. Ed. 889, it was said "that collection districts and ports of entry are no more than designated localities, within and at which Congress had extended the liberty of commerce in the United States, and that so much of its territory as is not within a collection district must be considered as having been withheld from that liberty. It is very well understood to be a part of the laws of nations that each nation may designate upon its own terms the ports and places within its territory for foreign commerce, and that any attempt to introduce foreign goods elsewhere within its jurisdiction is a violation of its sovereignty." De Lima v. Bidwell, 21 Sup. Ct. 743, 749, 182 U. S. 1, 45 L. Ed. 1041.

COLLECTION OFFICER.

"Collection officer," as used in Act Cong. May 31, 1870, 16 Stat. 145, making it criminal for any collection officer to fraudulently make any false certificate of the result of any congressional election, includes local judges and clerks of election at which a representative in Congress is voted for, but does not embrace the Governor of the state. United States v. Clayton (U. S.) 25 Fed. Cas. 458, 459.

COLLECTIVE NATURALIZATION.

"'Collective naturalization' is where the government, by treaty or session, acquires the whole or a part of the territory of another nation, and takes to itself the inhabitants thereof." State v. Boyd, 48 N. W. 739, 748, 31 Neb. 682; People v. Board of Inspectors, 67 N. Y. Supp. 236, 239, 32 Misc. Rep. 584.

The inhabitants of Porto Rico did not become citizens of the United States by collective naturalization resulting from the treaty by which the United States acquired the island, as the whole subject of collective naturalization was by the express terms of the treaty relegated to the Congress of the United States. People v. Board of Inspectors, 67 N. Y. Supp. 236, 239, 32 Misc. Rep. 584.

COLLECTOR.

As employé, see "Employé."

Rev. St. Ind. 1881, § 1945, defining embezzlement by attorneys at law and collectors, means collectors who, as a profession, for fee or percentage, collect generally for the public. State v. Sarlls, 34 N. E. 1129, 1130, 135 Ind. 195.

The term "bookkeeper and collector," in the bond of a person employed as "bookkeeper and collector," conditioned for the faithful performance of his duties and to pay over all moneys received in that capacity, did not of themselves indicate an employment which would give control of the entire cash in a job-printing business, the volume of which amounted to from eighty to one hundred thousand dollars a year, so as to make the sureties liable for moneys lost by reason of their principal acting as cashier of the business. Kellogg v. Scott, 44 Atl. 190, 192, 58 N. J. Eq. 344.

Of taxes.

See "Tax Collector."

Of town.

"Collector," as used in St. p. 391, providing that whenever a writ of execution shall issue against the inhabitants of any township or borough of this state, and there shall be no property belonging to said township or borough sufficient to satisfy the sum whereon to levy, then the officer authorized to execute said process shall serve a copy of the same on the collector of said township or borough, etc., means "the officer in either of the municipalities named having the legal custody of, and power to dispose of, funds of such corporation." Gabler v. Treasurer of City of Elizabeth, 42 N. J. Law (13 Vroom) 79, 80.

COLLEGE.

See "Medical College."

Building exclusively used as a college, see "Exclusively Used."

The word "college" is applied to institutions which are confined to some special grades of instruction. This word "college" has become a common dictionary word, which may be appropriated by any person. Commonwealth v. Banks, 48 Atl. 277, 278, 198 Pa. 397.

"College," as used in 1 Rev. St. 388, § 4, exempting from taxation every building erected for the use of a college or incorporated academy, means a corporation organized for the purpose of disseminating learning. Chegaray v. City of New York, 13 N. Y. (3 Kern.) 220, 229.

The word "college" is employed in this country to indicate an institution of learning having corporate powers and possessing the right to confer degrees. Looked at with reference to its educational work, a "college" consists of the trustees, teachers, and scholars, they making up the membership of the college and representing its active work. Northampton County v. Lafayette College, 18 Atl. 516, 128 Pa. 132.

A college is a school of a higher grade than a high school, in which instruction in the high school branches is carried beyond the scope of the high school, and other advanced studies are pursued, or a school in which special, technical, or professional studies are pursued, and which may, when legally organized, have the right to confer degrees in agreement with the terms of the law regulating its practices, or its charter, or, in the want of legislative direction, in agreement with the practices of the better institutions of learning of their respective kinds in the United States. Bates' Ann. St. Ohio 1904, § 4007-3.

As buildings and grounds.

"College" means a place where a collection of students is contemplated, and not the hall or other buildings intended for their accommodation. Stanwood v. Peirce, 7 Mass. 458, 460.

"College," as used in Gen. St. Conn. § 3820, providing that the buildings or portions of buildings exclusively occupied as colleges shall be exempt from taxation, should be construed to include a building or group of buildings in which scholars are housed, fed, instructed, and governed under college discipline, while qualifying for their university degree, whether the university included a number of colleges or a single college. The word "college," as used to denote a constituent of or the equivalent of "university," has a clear and definite meaning. As first used, "college" indicated a place of residence for students, and occasionally a "universitas," or "studium generale." Newman says "the university, to enforce discipline, developed itself into colleges, and so the term 'college' was taken to mean a place of residence for the university student, who would there find himself under the guidance and instructions of superiors and tutors, bound to attend to his personal interest, moral and intellectual." A college is none the less a college because its beneficiaries share the cost of maintenance, and it is immaterial whether such contribution is lumped in one sum, or apportioned to sources of expenses, as tuition, room rent, lecture fee, dining hall, etc. Yale University v. Town of New Haven, 42 Atl. 87, 88, 71 Conn. 316, 43 L. R. A. 490.

Viewed with reference to its taxability, the college edifice, with the dormitories and other buildings in the same general inclosure used for the purposes of the school, constitute the "college." Northampton County v. Lafayette College, 18 Atl. 516, 128 Pa. 132.

"College," as used in Act 1851, exempting all "colleges," academies, or seminaries of learning from taxation, "is not to be taken in its general sense as signifying an assemblage of persons for any political or ecclesiastical purpose, but in its more usual acceptance, a 'college' of learning, nor in that sense does it mean an assemblage of professors and students, nor yet the trustees in their corporate capacity, but certain property belonging to them, edifices and lands whereon the same are erected." State v. Ross, 24 N. J. Law (4 Zab.) 497, 498.

High school.

"College," as used in Act 1891, § 3, providing that no person shall be eligible to the office of county commissioner of schools who shall not be a graduate in the literary department of some recordable college, university, or state normal school, etc., does not include a high school. People v. Howlett, 53 N. W. 1100, 1101, 94 Mich. 165.

Medical college.

"College," as used in a Statute (1 Rev. St. [Edmund's Ed.] p. 406; 2 Rev. St. [6th Ed.] p. 12) providing that the trustees of every college to which a charter should be granted by the state shall be a corporation, is not confined to literary colleges, but applies as well to a medical college. People v. Albany Medical College (N. Y.) 62 How. Prac. 220, 222.

As public charity.

See "Public Charity."

As school.

See "Public School"; "School."

Common school distinguished, see "Common School."

COLLEGE ESTATE.

"College estate," within the meaning of the charter of a university, which, after empowering the corporation to take and hold property both personal and real by way of endowment, further provides that, in order that the college may be amply endowed, the college estate shall be freed and exempted from all taxes, includes not only the grounds and buildings of the university, but also all property held by it by way of endowment. It was argued that the meaning of the phrase differed widely from the meaning of "the estate of the college." Perhaps there might be some force in this argument if this phrase stood alone, but taken, as it must be, in connection with the entire exemption clause in question, there can be no doubt whatever that it was intended to include property held by the plaintiff by way of endowment, as well as the college estate proper; and to place any different construction thereon would be to do violence to the manifest intention of the Legislature. Brown University v. Granger, 36 Atl. 720, 721, 19 R. I. 704, 36 L. R. A. 847.

COLLEGE SQUARE.

The designation "college square," in a plat of land in a town, was evidently intended to mean that it was set apart for a use or purpose not private in its character, and in which the public would have an interest; that its use would make the adjacent property more valuable; and that the square was a donation or dedication. Village of Weeping Water v. Reed, 31 N. W. 797, 801, 21 Neb. 261.

COLLEGIATE EDUCATION.

"Collegiate and theological education," in a will by which testatrix provided for the payment of the expenses of a collegiate and theological education for certain of her relatives in case they chose to take advantage of such provisions, means "such an academic and theological training as is practicable and suitable to prepare a person to be a minister of the Gospel; and it would be improper to construe the phrase disjunctively, so as to permit a collegiate education not followed by a theological course." Shepherd v. Shepherd, 17 Atl. 173, 174, 57 Conn. 24.

COLLIER—COLLIERY.

The term "collier" is defined to be "digging of coal; one who works in a coal mine; a coal merchant or dealer in coal." Commonwealth v. Brookwood Coal Co., 25 Pa. Co. Ct. R. 55, 56.

A colliery is a place where coals are dug. Carey v. Bright, 58 Pa. (8 P. F. Smith) 70, 85; Commonwealth v. Brookwood Coal Co., 25 Pa. Co. Ct. R. 55, 56.

A "colliery" is defined by lexicographers to be a mine, pit, or place where coals are dug, together with machinery used in discharging and raising of coal. Springside Coal Min. Co. v. Grogan, 53 Ill. App. 60, 65.

COLLISION.

There are four possibilities under which a collision may occur: (1) It may happen without blame being imputable to either party, as where the loss is occasioned by a storm, or any other act of God. In that case the misfortune must be borne by the party on whom it happens to light, the other not being responsible to him in any degree. (2) When there has been a want of due diligence or lack of skill on both sides, in such case the rule of law is that the loss must be borne between them, as having been occasioned by the fault of both. (3) It may happen by the misconduct of the suffering party only, and then the rule is that the sufferer must bear his own burden. Lastly, it may be the fault of the ship which ran the other down, and in this case the injured party would be entitled to entire compensation from the other. Strout v. Foster, 42 U. S. (1 How.) 89, 92, 11 L. Ed. 58.

A "collision" between vessels, as between a steamboat and a flatboat, means the running upon the flatboat by the steamboat, or the forcing of some object upon or against it to produce injury; and hence, where a steamboat was running with great velocity, and out of the ordinary channel for boats, and produced waves which destroyed a flatboat moored along the shore of the river, there was a "collision." Wright v. Brown, 4 Ind. 95, 97, 58 Am. Dec. 622.

Collision while stationary.

It is impossible to give a certain and definite meaning to the word "collision," or to so limit its meaning as to plainly describe in advance that which shall and that which shall not amount to a collision within the meaning of a policy of marine insurance. The ordinary meaning of the word "collision," when applied to a vessel, does not require that the result of the impact shall be so far-reaching as to affect her seaworthiness. Very serious results in the matter of expense of repairing, at least, might follow from the impact, wherein the seaworthiness of the vessel would not be at all impaired, and yet no one would doubt that within the ordinary meaning of the words such a ship had been "in collision." It is not necessary that the vessel should be itself in motion at the time of the collision. If, while anchored in the harbor, the vessel is run into by another vessel; it would certainly be said that the two vessels had been in collision, although one was at anchor and the other was in motion. The London Assurance v. Companhia De Moagens Do Barreiro, 17 Sup. Ct. 785, 787, 167 U. S. 149, 42 L. Ed. 113.

Where a policy contained the words "free of particular average unless the vessel be sunk, burned, stranded, or in collision," it was held that there was a collision, within the meaning thereof, where the vessel was completely loaded, and, after casting off her moorings, was made fast again to the wharf because of a difficulty with her engines, and was there run into by a scow in tow of a tugboat, which made a substantial break in her bulwarks. The London Assurance v. Companhia De Moagens Do Barreiro (U. S.) 68 Fed. 247, 258, 15 C. C. A. 379.

Collision with stationary object.

Collision imports the act of colliding, a striking together, violent contact; but, as used in the admiralty, includes vessels coming in collision with any moving or stationary object, as piles, drawbridge, etc., as well as another vessel. Newtown Creek Towing Co. v. Aetna Ins. Co., 48 N. Y. Supp. 927, 930, 23 App. Div. 152.

"Collision" is nautically defined to be the impinging of vessels together while in the act of being navigated. Common usage, however, applies the term equally to cases where a vessel has run afoul of another when entirely stationary, or is brought in contact with another by swinging at her anchor; but that term as used in marine law cannot be construed to include an injury received by a vessel from being violently rubbed by another, or pressed by her with force against a pier or wharf. The Moxey (U. S.) 17 Fed. Cas. 940, 941.

As peril of the sea.

See "Perils of the Sea."

COLLISION WITH FOREIGN POWERS.

Where a policy of marine insurance warranted the property to be free from all claims through loss or damage arising from or growing out of a "collision with foreign powers or of our government with others," a burning of the vessel to prevent its falling into the hands of the enemy was the result of a collision with a foreign power. Marcy v. Merchants' Mut. Ins. Co., 19 La. Ann. 388, 392.

COLLODION.

"Collodion" is the name given to a substance obtained by dissolving gun cotton in alcohol or ether. It is used as a vehicle for medicines, and as a substitute for sticking plaster. Celluloid Mfg. Co. v. American Zylonite Co. (U. S.) 26 Fed. 692.

COLLOQUIUM.

The colloquium "is an allegation used in pleading in libel or slander cases to show that the words were spoken in reference to the matter of the averment." Van Vechten v. Hopkins, 5 Johns. 211, 220, 4 Am. Dec. 339; Cooper v. Greeley, 1 Denio, 347, 359; Bradley v. Cramer, 18 N. W. 268, 270, 59 Wis. 309, 48 Am. Rep. 511; State v. Grinstead, 61 Pac. 976, 979, 10 Kan. App. 78 (citing Carter v. Andrews, 33 Mass. [16 Pick.] 1, 6; State v. Elliott, 61 Pac. 981, 10 Kan. App. 69); Barnes v. State, 41 Atl. 781, 782, 88 Md. 347. For example, where the alleged libelous article consists in defendant's saying "B. burned my barn," it not being a felony to burn a barn unless it contained corn, and that was the averment that the defendant had a barn full of corn, the allegation that the words were uttered in a conversation in reference to that barn is a colloquium. Barnes v. State, 41 Atl. 781, 782, 88 Md. 347 (citing In re Barham's Case, 4 Coke, 20; Rex v. Horne, 2 Cowp. 672, 684); Sturtevant v. Root, 27 N. H. 69, 73.

The office of the colloquium in a complaint for slander is to allege that the words were spoken with reference to extrinsic facts because of which the words are actionable. Andrews v. Woodmansee (N. Y.) 15 Wend. 232, 235, 236. The "colloquium" is the name to designate the portion of the plaintiff's pleading, in an action for libel, which is used for the purpose of coupling the words published, which in themselves do not constitute a libel, with facts which show a libelous meaning. Lukehart v. Byerly, 53 Pa. (3 P. F. Smith) 418, 421. As the term is used in reference to the pleadings in libel and slander cases, it is defined as "an averment that the words in question are spoken of and concerning such usage or report or fact, whatever it is, which gives to the words, otherwise indifferent, the particular defamatory meaning imputed to them." Carter v. Andrews, 33 Mass. (16 Pick.) 1, 3, 6.

A colloquium, in a complaint for libel, is the statement of extraneous facts and circumstances necessary to fairly understand the defendant's words. Buckstaff v. Viall, 54 N. W. 111, 113, 84 Wis. 129.

The colloquium, in the law of pleading in libel and slander cases, applies to that portion of a complaint which is a direct allegation "that the language published was concerning the plaintiff or concerning the plaintiff and his affairs, or concerning the plaintiff and facts alleged as inducement." Squires v. State, 45 S. W. 147, 149, 39 Tex. Cr. R. 96, 73 Am. St. Rep. 904.

The colloquium is that part of a declaration in slander or libel which inserts other facts to give color to the words alleged, when the words do not of themselves involve the charge or express the meaning in the innuendo. Vanderlip v. Roe, 23 Pa. (11 Har.) 82, 84.

A colloquium, in libel, is the introductory averment as to what the word spoken referred to, the meaning of which may be explained but not added to by the innuendo. Cheetham v. Tillotson (N. Y.) 5 Johns. 430, 439.

An innuendo can only explain, but not enlarge, the meaning of the words, without the aid of a colloquium. Therefore the want of a colloquium is not cured by an innuendo. So, where a charge was that plaintiff "swore false before Squire Andrews," and there was no colloquium stated to show that it referred to the trial or other legal occasion, the charge was insufficient, though there was an innuendo for that purpose. McClaghry v. Wetmore (N. Y.) 6 Johns. 81, 83, 5 Am. Dec. 194.

COLLUSION.

Collusion or otherwise, see "Otherwise."

Collusion is defined by Webster, first, in law, as a "deceitful agreement or compact between two or more persons for the one party to bring an action against the other for some evil purpose, so as to defraud a third person of his right; it is a secret understanding between two parties who plead or proceed fraudulently against each other to the prejudice of a third person; and in general may be defined as a secret agreement and co-operation for a fraudulent purpose." Bouvier in his Law Dictionary defines "collusion" as an agreement between two or more persons to defraud a person of his rights by the forms of law, or to obtain an object forbidden by law. It is nearly allied to "covein." Baldwin v. City of New York (N. Y.) 45 Barb. 359, 369.

Collusion is where two persons, apparently in a hostile position or having conflicting interests, by arrangement do some act in order to injure a third person or deceive a court. Carey v. Houston & T. C. R. R. Co., (U. S.) 52 Fed. 671, 675 (quoting Rap. & L. Law Dict.).

"Collusion," as used in a phrase "collusion with administrator," implies, ex vi termini, the presence of some one with whom the administrator could collude. Collusion is a secret concert of action between two or more for the promotion of some fraudulent purpose. Belt v. Blackburn, 28 Md. 227, 235.

A suit is said to be "collusive" when brought by seemingly adverse parties under secret agreement and co-operation, with a view to have some legal question decided which is not involved in a real controversy between them; or, when so brought with intent to defraud other persons, there must be no real controversy between the parties on purpose to secure some relief, which, as between themselves, would not be conceded with their suit. Texas & P. R. Co. v. Gay, 26 S. W. 599, 612, 86 Tex. 571, 25 L. R. A. 52.

Collusion, to constitute 'relievable fraud' in an action to enjoin the collection of a judgment on the ground that it was recovered against a city by the collusion of its officers, does not require necessarily any express agreement between the officers and the claimant to aid the latter to obtain his judgment, or any specific intent to injure. Utter failure of duty on the part of such officers to defend against a known void claim, or one which they have good reason to believe is void, from a desire to co-operate with the plaintiff to enable him to obtain an advantage over the municipality, constitutes guilty collusion, within the meaning of the rule rendering a judgment open to attack in equity by the person whose interests would otherwise be sacrificed. Balch v. Beach (Wis.) 95 N. W. 132, 137.

"Collusion," as used in Prov. St. 1742-43, c. 27, § 4, declaring that if any person who shall lose money by playing at cards should not, without "covein or collusion," sue and with effect prosecute for the thing lost, it should be lawful for any person to sue and recover treble the value thereof, means covein or collusion between the person who lost and the person who won. Cole v. Applebury, 136 Mass. 525, 529.

Consent judgment.

Collusion cannot be predicated upon the fact that a debtor consented to a judgment for a debt which he honestly owed. Rice v. Adler-Goldman Commission Co. (U. S.) 71 Fed. 151, 152, 18 C. C. A. 15.

As a conspiracy.

While not, strictly speaking, a conspiracy, because "to conspire" may mean more than merely to collude, yet a collusion is included in, and often is termed synonymous with, "conspiracy." If the defendants collude for the purpose of cheating and defrauding the plaintiff, no right of action accrues to the plaintiffs unless by reason of such collusion they are cheated or defrauded. Anderson v. Oscamp (Ind.) 35 N. E. 707, 709.

"Collusion" is synonymous with "conspiracy." It is an agreement for a wrongful purpose. It is a secret agreement by two or more persons to obtain an unlawful object. Hence an allegation in a complaint which charges that defendants entered into collusion with defendant K. to cause a criminal operation to be performed upon the body of the plaintiff, and to have said K. perform an abortion upon her body, clearly charges the defendants with entering into an unlawful combination to injure plaintiff by performing the abortion. Miller v. Bayer, 68 N. W. 869, 870, 94 Wis. 123.

In divorce proceedings.

Collusion is an agreement between husband and wife that one of them shall commit, or appear to have committed, or to be represented in court as having committed, acts constituting a cause of divorce, for the purpose of enabling the other to obtain a divorce. Civ. Code Cal. 1903, § 114; Civ. Code Idaho 1901, § 2030; Civ. Code Mont. 1895, § 162; Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 2746; Civ. Code S. D. 1903, § 76; Burgess v. Burgess (S. D.) 95 N. W. 279, 280; Clopton v. Clopton, 91 N. W. 46, 49, 11 N. D. 212.

"Collusion," as the term is used with reference to divorce proceedings, means a secret agreement between husband and wife, and co-operation between them, for the fraudulent purpose of obtaining the divorce illegally. Beard v. Beard, 4 Pac. 229, 65 Cal. 354.

Collusion is a corrupt combining of married parties to procure a sentence or judicial order by some false practice, as for one of them to appear to or in fact do what would otherwise be ground for divorce, or in any way to deceive the court in a cause, thus seeking its interposition as for a real injury. Pohlman v. Pohlman (N. J.) 46 Atl. 658, 659, 60 N. J. Eq. 28.

Within the provisions of the Code providing that a divorce must be denied on the ground of desertion when there is an unreasonable lapse of time such as establishes a presumption of connivance or collusion or condonation of the offense, "collusion" implies consent to the act complained of, and does not exist where the plaintiff alleged that defendant deserted him and still continues such desertion, without cause and against his will, and without his consent, and such facts have been proven. Thomson v. Thomson, 53 Pac. 403, 121 Cal. 11.

Collusion does not exist without an agreement or understanding between the parties to the suit. Where a wife sued for divorce on the ground of desertion, without demanding the custody of her children, she expecting that her husband would charge her with adultery, as he had previously filed a petition for divorce on that ground, but his answer merely denied the desertion, and she testifying that there was no agreement between her and her husband respecting any of the proceedings connected with the suit, and that in the surrogate's court she expected to be appointed guardian of her two younger children, and that on advice of counsel she decided not to have the custody of the children determined until after the divorce case was decided, and that she had not agreed with the husband to have custody of any of the children, it will not be understood that the suit was collusive. Drayton v. Drayton, 38 Atl. 25, 28, 54 N. J. Eq. 298.

COLOGNE.

Cologne is not an intoxicating liquor, though containing sufficient alcohol to produce intoxication. Intoxicating Liquor Cases, 25 Kan. 751, 766, 37 Am. Rep. 234.

COLONEL MAZUMA.

In a newspaper article in reference to a criminal prosecution with headline stating, "A Hung Jury. Colonel Mazuma's Presence," etc., the term "Colonel Mazuma" does not indicate a gentleman with a military title at all, and does not even refer to a person. It is a modern provincialism, probably emanating from the daily press, and used when referring to the corrupt application of money in the accomplishment of certain ends; and hence, where jurors read such article before rendition of the verdict, the verdict will be set aside. People v. Stokes, 37 Pac. 207, 210, 103 Cal. 193, 42 Am. St. Rep. 102.

COLONY.

Rev. St. § 5283, forbidding the fitting out and arming of a vessel with intent that she shall be employed in the service of any foreign state, or of "any colony, district or people," refers to a body politic which has been recognized, by our government at least, as a belligerent; and the section does not apply to the case of a vessel fitted out and armed to be employed in the service of insurgents, or persons never recognized as a political body. The Three Friends (U. S.) 78 Fed. 175, 176.

COLOR.

See "Artist's Colors."

The term "color," in a federal statute establishing color as a standard to determine the duty upon sugar, "is the hue or degree of lightness which the sugar has attained in the ordinary course of its manufacture, and which indicates the degree of perfection to which process of clarification has been carried. Undoubtedly while the sugar, or the cane juice rather, remains in the manufacturer's hands, he may omit to take out the impurities, or may put in impurities if he so desires, for as yet it has not become sugar. The hue of the sugar—that is, the result of his operations—will be determined by the degree to which he has abstracted the impurities or foreign substances from it, or the amount of such foreign substances as he may have introduced into it. But when it has passed out of his hands and gone into the hands of the importer, or the proposed importer, or the merchant, then the hue it has acquired is the color that Congress had reference to when it established color as the standard of classification. If, then, by the mixture of some foreign or totally different substances, such as caramel, or, as in this case, charcoal, this color be changed, the color so acquired cannot be considered the color to which Congress referred as a standard for assessing duties." United States v. Cargo of Sugar (U. S.) 25 Fed. Cas. 288, 291.

The "impression, device, color, or thing," within the meaning of Pol. Code, §§ 1206, 1207, providing that when any ballot bears upon it any impression, device, color, or thing designed to distinguish such ballot from other ballots it shall be rejected, when construed with the phrase "designed to distinguish such ballots," is to be taken to mean an impression, device, color, or thing expressly designed as a means of designating the ballot, and does not include a mere discoloration appearing on ballots which are not designed, but resulting from the use of ink by the elector in scratching his ballot. Wyman v. Lemon, 51 Cal. 273, 274.

As apparent or prima facie right.

Within the rule that every pleading by way of confession and avoidance must give color, it is said that "color" is a term of the English rhetoricians, and was adopted at an early period into the language of pleading. As a term of pleading it signifies an apparent or prima facie right. And the meaning of the rule that every pleading in confession and avoidance must give color is that it must admit of an apparent right from the opposite party, and rely therefor on some new matter by which to defeat the apparent right. Merten v. San Angelo National Bank, 49 Pac. 913, 914, 5 Okl. 585; Mauldin v. Ball, 1 Pac. 409, 411, 5 Mont. 96.

The term "color" means semblance, show, pretense, appearance, and implies, in the language of the law, that the thing to which it is applied has not the real character imputed to it. Chicago, R. I. & P. Ry. Co. v. Allfree, 20 N. W. 779, 780, 64 Iowa, 500.

As authority.

"Under color of," as used in Act Pa. 1889, § 20, declaring that street railway companies incorporated under certain acts, and any such company existing "under color of" any charter or letters patent, upon accepting the provisions of this act should become a body corporate thereunder, should be read as equivalent to the words "under authority of." The words often mean that the authority under color of which a thing is done is assumed or defective. But their meaning, like that of all words not purely technical, must depend on the connection in which they stand, and the fixed character of the things to which they relate. Berks County v. Reading City Pass. Ry. Co., 31 Atl. 474, 475, 167 Pa. 102.

By virtue of, distinguished.

"Color," in law, means not the thing itself, but only an appearance thereof. "as color of title" means only the appearance of title. The expressions "by virtue of" and "under color of" mean very different things; for instance, the proper fees are received by "virtue of the office," extortion is under "color of the office." Any rightful act in office is by "virtue of the office"; a wrongful act in office may be under "color of the office." Broughton v. Haywood, 61 N. C. 380, 383.

COLOR BLINDNESS.

Color-blindness, by which is meant either an imperfect perception of colors or an inability to recognize them at all, or to distinguish between colors or between some of them, is a defect much more common than is generally supposed. Medical treatises of recognized merit on the subject represent, as the result of extended examinations, that a fraction over 4 per cent. of males are color-blind. With some the defect is congenital, with others brought on by occupations in which they have been engaged, or by vicious habits in the use of liquors or food in which they have indulged. It presents itself in a great variety of forms, from imperfect perception of colors to absolute inability to recognize them at all. Such being the proportion of males thus affected, it is a matter of the greatest importance to safe railroad transportation that strict examination be made as to the existence of this defect in persons seeking employment on railroads in the capacity of engineers and other railroad employes, and therefore Act Ala. June 1, 1887, requiring engineers and other railroad employes to be examined by a medical board to determine whether or not they are color-blind, imposing the expense thereof on the company employing them, and making their employment penal unless they have certificates of fitness, is not repugnant to the power vested in Congress to regulate commerce, as applied to a railway company having its lines, over which the engineer runs, in different states. Nashville, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Alabama, 9 Sup. Ct. 28, 29, 128 U. S. 96, 32 L. Ed. 352.

COLOR OF AUTHORITY.

Within the rule that a de facto officer is one who is in possession of an office and discharging its duties under color of authority, by "color of authority" is meant authority derived from an election or appointment, however irregular or informal, so that the incumbent be not a mere volunteer. State v. Oates, 57 N. W. 296, 297, 86 Wis. 634.

Where a party has been placed in possession of premises by the sheriff of the county by virtue of a writ of possession issued in his favor from the district court, such entry is under color of lawful authority, and an action of forcible entry and detainer will not lie therefor. Wyatt v. Monroe, 27 Tex. 268, 269. But in connection with this case see Laird v. Winters, 27 Tex. 440, 86 Am. Dec. 620, in which it is held that a claimant of land who has been turned out of possession by a writ issued by virtue of a decree, to which he was in no sense a party, can recover his possession by an action of forcible entry and detainer. Wyatt v. Monroe, 27 Tex. 268, 269.

COLOR OF LAW.

"Color of law" does not mean actual law. "Color," as a modifier in legal parlance, means appearance, as distinguished from reality. "Color of law" means mere semblance of legal right. McCain v. City of Des Moines, 19 Sup. Ct. 644, 646, 174 U. S. 168, 43 L. Ed. 936 (citing State v. City of Des Moines, 96 Iowa, 521, 65 N. W. 818, 823, 31 L. R. A. 186, 59 Am. St. Rep. 381).

COLOR OF OFFICE.

Color of office is the right, authority, or commission by which a public officer exercises the duties of his office, which was invalid for some reason, and validates all acts of such officer while his right to the office has not been judicially determined adversely to him. Mace v. Gaddis, 13 Pac. 545, 546, 3 Wash. T. 125.

An officer's acts done "colore officii" are where they are of such a nature that his office gives him no authority to do them (Feller v. Gates, 67 Pac. 416, 417, 40 Or. 543, 56 L. R. A. 630, 91 Am. St. Rep. 492; State v. Fowler, 42 Atl. 201, 204, 88 Md. 601, 42 L. R. A. 849, 71 Am. St. Rep. 452; Gerber v. Ackley, 37 Wis. 43, 44, 19 Am. Rep. 751; Bishop v. McGillis, 50 N. W. 779, 80 Wis. 575, 27 Am. St. Rep. 63), though they are done in a manner that purports they are done by virtue of the office (State v. Fowler, 42 Atl. 201, 204, 88 Md. 601, 42 L. R. A. 849, 71 Am. St. Rep. 452).

"Color of office" refers to an act wrongfully done by an officer under the pretended authority of his office, and grounded on corruption, to which the office is a mere shadow of color. Decker v. Judson, 16 N. Y. 439, 442; Kelly v. McCormick, 28 N. Y. 318, 321. "Color of office," says Tomlin, "is where an act is evilly done by the countenance of an office, and is always taken in the worst sense, being grounded upon corruption, to which the office is as a mere shadow or color." Kelly v. McCormick (N. Y.) 2 E. D. Smith, 503, 511; Winter v. Kinney, 1 N. Y. (1 Comst.) 365, 368; Burrall v. Acker (N. Y.) 23 Wend. 606, 35 Am. Dec. 582. "It is a technical expression. It implies bad faith, corruption, breach of duty." Chamberlain v. Beller, 18 N. Y. 115, 117; Mason v. Crabtree, 71 Ala. 479, 481; Richardson v. Crandall, 48 N. Y. 348, 361.

The phrase "color of his office," as used in 2 Rev. St. p. 286, § 66, providing that no sheriff or other officer shall take any bond, obligation, or other security by color of his office in any other case or manner than is provided by law, is always taken in the worst sense, and signifies an act evilly done by the countenance of an office. Morton v. Campbell (N. Y.) 14 Abb. Prac. 410, 413; Id., 37 Barb. 179, 181. It "necessarily imports an illegal claim of right or authority to take the security or to do the act in question by virtue of his office, which claim is a mere claim of pretense on the part of the officer." Any instrument or agreement contemplating an act contrary to the duty of an officer, tending either to official corruption or to the injury of a party interested in the process, is void. Morton v. Campbell (N. Y.) 37 Barb. 179, 181.

"Colorable" is defined as having the appearance, especially the false appearance, of right; and a person acting as a posseman, under appointment by a deputy United States marshal, is acting under a "color of office." Virginia v. De Hart (U. S.) 119 Fed. 626, 628.

Under Code, § 273, declaring official bonds obligatory on the principal and sureties "for the use of every person who is injured as well by any wrongful act committed under color of his office as by his failure to perform, or the improper or neglectful performance of those duties imposed by law," "under color of his office" means an abuse of the authority of an office, a pretended, not a real, exercise of the incumbent's jurisdiction, as where, under color of his office, he arrests and imprisons a party. Coleman v. Roberts, 21 South. 449, 451, 113 Ala. 323, 330, 36 L. R. A. 84, 59 Am. St. Rep. 111 (citing Kelly v. Moore, 51 Ala. 364).

Acts of particular officers.

To constitute "color of office" such as will render an officer's sureties liable for his wrongful acts, something else must be shown besides the fact that in doing the act complained of the officer claimed to be acting in an official capacity. If he is armed with no writ, or if the writ under which he acts is utterly void, and if there is at the time no statute which authorizes the act to be done without process, then there is no such color of office as will enable him to impose a liability on the sureties in his official bond. State v. Dierker, 74 S. W. 153, 156, 101 Mo. App. 636 (citing Hawkins v. Thomas, 3 Ind. App. 399, 29 N. E. 157). See, also, Chandler v. Rutherford (U. S.) 101 Fed. 774, 777, 43 C. C. A. 218.

Where a notary pretended he had rendered a judgment, thereby pretending he had authority to receive the money thereon, he committed a wrongful act under "color of office." Mason v. Crabtree, 71 Ala. 479, 481.

Where a bond given by an administrator under the provisions of the statute requires him to make a distribution of any moneys, effects, rents, etc., coming into his hands by color of his office, the phrase "color of his office" cannot operate to make the sureties on his bond liable for rents collected by him for lands belonging to his intestate leased by him as administrator, which land descended to the heirs of his intestate at his death. Wilson v. Unselt's Adm'r, 75 Ky. (12 Bush) 215, 222.

Code, § 72, provides that the bond of a clerk of a superior court shall be liable for all moneys which may come into his hands by "color of his office." It was held that where the commissioners in partition paid the proceeds to the clerk, who receipted it as clerk, the bond was liable. Smith v. Patton, 42 S. E. 849, 131 N. C. 396, 92 Am. St. Rep. 783.

"Color of office" is defined as a pretense of official right to do an act made by one who has no such right. Thus, the act of a clerk of court whose duties are to record mortgages, releases, etc., in recording a forged release of a mortgage given to him by the mortgagor, is not an act done under color of office. Luther v. Banks, 36 S. E. 826, 827, 111 Ga. 374.

As affected by consent.

By the term "colore officii" must be understood some illegal exertion of authority whereby an obligation is extorted which the statute does not require to be given. If all parties voluntarily consent to enter into the bond, and the departure from the precise requisition of the statute is made by mistake or accident, and without any design to compel the obligees to enter into an undertaking not required by law, the bond is not invalid simply because it contains something which the statute does not authorize. United States v. Humason (U. S.) 26 Fed. Cas. 428, 429.

Bonds made in substantial compliance with the statute, and voluntarily executed by the parties, and not executed by the sheriff, will not be declared void as taken "colore officii." Kelly v. McCormick, 28 N. Y. 318, 321; Griffiths v. Hardenbergh, 41 N. Y. 464, 469.

Virtute officii distinguished.

Acts done "virtute officii," within the meaning of the principle that the sureties of an officer can be held liable for such acts, are where they are within the authority of the officer, but in doing it he exercises that authority improperly; whilst acts done "colore officii," for which his sureties cannot be held liable, are where they are of such a nature that his office gives him no authority to do them. Hence, where a sheriff, acting under an attachment against the property of a debtor, seized the goods of another person, and detained the same on being indemnified, such acts were done "virtute officii," and the sheriff's sureties were liable for his trespass. People v. Schuyler, 4 N. Y. (4 Comst.) 173, 187; Gerber v. Ackley, 37 Wis. 43, 44, 19 Am. Rep. 751.

Taking a security by a public officer "virtute officii" implies that the act is lawful either by the common law or by the authority of some statute. To take it by "color of office" necessarily implies that the act is unlawful and unauthorized, and that the legal right to take it is as a mere color or pretense. Burrall v. Acker (N. Y.) 23 Wend. 606, 608, 35 Am. Dec. 582.

COLOR OF RIGHT.

It may be said that "color of right" which constitutes one an officer de facto may consist in an election or appointment, or in holding over after the expiration of one's term, or acquiescence by the public in the acts of such officer for such a length of time as to raise the presumption of colorable right by election or appointment. Hamlin v. Kassaf, 15 Pac. 778, 780, 15 Or. 456, 3 Am. St. Rep. 176.

COLOR OF TITLE.

"Color of title" is defined as "apparent right." Newlin v. Rogers, 51 Pac. 315, 316, 6 Kan. App. 910.

"Color of title" is defined to be that "which in appearance is title, but which in reality is no title." State v. Farrier, 1 Atl. 751, 752, 47 N. J. Law (18 Vroom) 383; Kenedy v. Jarvis (Tex.) 1 S. W. 191, 193; Miller v. Clark, 23 N. W. 35, 37, 56 Mich. 337; White v. Stokes, 53 S. W. 1060, 1061, 67 Ark. 184; Erdman v. Corse, 40 Atl. 107, 108, 87 Md. 506; Baker v. Swan's Lessee, 32 Md. 355, 358; Kopp v. Herrman, 82 Md. 339, 33 Atl. 646, 647; Cowley v. Monson (U. S.) 5 Fed. 779, 782; Latta v. Clifford (U. S.) 47 Fed. 614; Nashville, C. & St. L. Ry. Co. v. Mathis, 19 South. 384, 385, 109 Ala. 377; Black v. Tennessee, etc., Ry. Co., 9 South. 537, 538, 93 Ala. 109; Sharp v. Shenandoah Furnace Co., 40 S. E. 103, 106, 100 Va. 27; De Foresta v. Gast, 38 Pac. 244, 245, 20 Colo. 307; Lindt v. Uihlein, 89 N. W. 214, 216, 116 Iowa, 48; Bolden v. Sherman, 110 Ill. 418, 425; Dickens v. Barnes, 79 N. C. 490, 491.

"The courts have concurred, it is believed without an exception, in defining 'color of title' to be that which in appearance is title, but which in reality is no title. They have equally concurred in attaching no exclusive or peculiar character or importance to the ground of the invalidity of an apparent or colorable title; the rule with them has been whether there was an apparent or colorable title under which an entry or claim has been made in good faith." Wright v. Mattison, 59 U. S. (18 How.) 50, 56, 15 L. Ed. 280; Edgerton v. Bird, 6 Wis. 527, 536, 70 Am. Dec. 473; Swift v. Mulkey, 21 Pac. 871, 873, 17 Or. 532; Carter v. Woolfork, 17 Atl. 1041, 71 Md. 283; Bartlett v. Ambrose (U. S.) 78 Fed. 839, 843, 24 C. C. A. 397; Woodruff v. Wallace, 41 Pac. 357, 363, 3 Okl. 355; Lebanon Min. Co. v. Rogers, 5 Pac. 661, 662, 8 Colo. 34.

"When we say a person 'has color of title,' whatever may be the meaning of the phrase, we express the idea at least that some act has been done or some event transpired by which some title, good or bad, to a parcel of land, has been conveyed to him." City of St. Louis v. Gorman, 29 Mo. 593, 602, 77 Am. Dec. 586.

Color of title exists wherever there is a reasonable doubt regarding the validity of an apparent title, whether the title arises from the circumstances under which the land is held, the identity of the land conveyed, or the construction of the instrument under which the party in possession claims title. Cameron v. United States, 13 Sup. Ct. 595, 598, 148 U. S. 301, 37 L. Ed. 459.

The term "color of title" designates a claim of title that will support a defense based on the statute of limitations, and implies that the title thus described is not valid, but is claimed to be by the party holding under it. In criminal law the term "color of title" implies "a wrong committed by an officer under the pretended authority of his office." To give "color of title" in pleading is to allege a fictitious matter which gives the appearance of title, and is avoided by allegations setting up the real and valid title. Chicago, R. I. & P. Ry. Co. v. Allfree, 20 N. W. 779, 780, 64 Iowa, 500.

A "color of title" is that apparent right in the tenant which he has derived by his paper title which distinguishes him from the naked trespasser or intruder. He who holds under a paper title, therefore, which apparently gives him a right to the land which would lead an honest mind to the conclusion that the right to the land passed by the deed, and more especially when the delivery of the deed is accompanied by a livery of seisin or possession of the premises purporting to be conveyed, must be considered as holding under color of title. Saltmarsh v. Crommelin, 24 Ala. 347, 352.

By the term "color of title," as used in a provision requiring suits to recover real estate, as against a person in peaceable and adverse possession thereof under color of title, to be commenced within three years next after the cause of action shall have accrued, is meant a consecutive chain of such transfer down to such person in possession, without being regular, as if one or more of the memorials or muniments be not registered, or not duly registered, or be only in writing, or such like defect as may not extend to or include the want of intrinsic fairness and honesty, or when the party in possession shall hold the same by a certificate of head-right, land warrant, or land scrip, with a chain of transfer down to him in possession. Rev. St. Tex. 1895, art. 3341. See, also, Rice v. P. J. Willis & Bro. (U. S.) 87 Fed. 626, 628, 31 C. C. A. 154.

A purchaser in good faith at any judicial or tax sale made by the proper person or officer has "color of title" within the meaning of the chapter relating to occupying claimants, whether such person or officer has sufficient authority to sell or not, unless such want of authority was known to such purchaser at the time of the sale, and his rights shall pass to his assignees or representatives. Any person has also color of title who has occupied a tract of real estate by himself, or by those under whom he claims, for the term of five years, or who has thus occupied it for less time if he, or those under whom he claims, have at any time during such occupancy, with the knowledge or consent, express or implied, of the real owner, made any valuable improvements thereon, or if he or those under whom he claims have at any time during such occupancy paid the ordinary county taxes thereon for any one year, and two years have elapsed without a repayment of the same by the owner thereof, and such occupancy is continued up to the time at which the action is brought by which the recovery of the real estate is obtained. Rev. St. Utah 1898, § 2024.

What constitutes "color" is a question of law for the court, while occupancy and acts of ownership are facts for the jury. A deed of conveyance to land, describing it as "all that part of the west half of the north-west quarter of section 19, township 17, range 3 west, that lies south of Black creek," is sufficient to put any one on inquiry who has a claim to a tract with a corresponding description, and an adverse possession thereunder is under color of title. Black v. Tennessee Coal, Iron & R. Co., 9 South. 537, 538, 93 Ala. 109.

Administrator's or guardian's deed.

An administrator's deed for land sold under an order of a competent court for the payment of debts of the intestate is good color of title under the seven-year limitation law. Conner v. Goodman, 104 Ill. 365, 368.

A guardian's deed is inoperative unless the sale and conveyance has been reported to and approved by the circuit court. Such a deed does not constitute such a claim and color of title made in good faith as is required by the limitation act of 1839. Rawlings v. Bailey, 15 Ill. (5 Peck) 178.

Bona fides.

A deed relied upon to give color of title must have been obtained bona fide. If procured by fraud, or if the grantee who relies upon it to sustain his adverse possession is aware that his grantor had no title to convey, the deed is not available as color of title. Saxton v. Hunt, 20 N. J. Law (Spencer) 487.

An instrument possessing such characteristics as bring it within the definition of "color of title" as fixed by law is color of title without regard to the good or bad faith of the holder, or without reference to whether he knew in fact of the defect; but, though a paper may constitute color of title, no prescription can be based thereon unless the claimant entered a claim thereunder honestly and in good faith. Lee v. O'Quin, 30 S. E. 356, 360, 103 Ga. 355.

A deed purporting to convey title is color of title, without regard to the good or bad faith of the holder. What is color of title is a question of law, while good faith is one of fact. Hardin v. Gouveneur, 69 Ill. 140, 143.

Claim or color of title may be shown by any paper purporting to convey the land or the right to its possession into the party asserting adverse possession, however and for whatever reason such paper might be lacking in the essentials of a muniment of title, provided the party claims under it in good faith. Goodson v. Brothers, 20 South. 443, 445, 111 Ala. 589.

"Possession under color of title" means possession under a bona fide claim of title.

Whitney v. Backus, 149 Pa. 29, 33, 24 Atl. 51.

An entry on real estate is by "color of title" when it is made under a bona fide and not pretended claim of another. McCall v. Neely (Pa.) 3 Watts, 69, 72.

Bond or contract for title.

"Color of title" may be made through conveyance or bonds or contracts, or bare possession under parol agreements, nor is it at all important whether the title be weak or strong. Wright v. Mattison, 59 U. S. (18 How.) 50, 56, 15 L. Ed. 280.

"Color of title" is that which in appearance is title, but which in reality is not title. Thus, where defendants do not set up or claim under any other title than that of a contract for a deed, they do not claim under color of title, as such contract does not pretend to transfer title. Seymour v. Cleveland, 68 N. W. 171, 173, 9 S. D. 94.

An executory contract to convey land, the consideration of which has been paid, and which a court would therefore specifically enforce against the vendor, is sufficient color of title to make a possession adverse. La Frombois v. Jackson (N. Y.) 8 Cow. 589, 18 Am. Dec. 463.

One who holds possession of land under a contract of purchase made with the agent of the owners of the land, which contract was ratified by the execution of a deed by such owners, such possession having continued for several years, during which she has paid the taxes, is clearly in possession under claim and color of title. Darst v. Marshall, 20 Ill. (10 Peck) 227, 234.

"Color of title" is a title which is prima facie good. A purchaser of land holding possession under a bond for title, and having paid the purchase money, has color of title such as will enable him to defend under the statute of limitations, at least from the time when, according to the stipulation of the bond, the title is to be made; but it is a doubtful question whether he has such color of title as will vitiate a conveyance by the owner pending such possession. Farley v. Smith, 39 Ala. 38.

The statute of Limitations of Texas, § 15, provided that by the term "color of title" was meant a consecutive chain of transfer from the sovereign authority to the party in possession, which was not regular, but the defect in which did not extend to or include the want of intrinsic fairness or honesty. Held, that under this definition a mere declaration in writing by a vendor of land that the vendee had paid the money for it, and that the vendor intended to make the deeds when prepared to do so, did not constitute "color of title." Osterman v. Baldwin, 73 U. S. (6 Wall.) 116, 123, 18 L. Ed. 730. But under such definition "color of title" was construed to include a bond for title to land, though it does not recite a consideration, for, no matter how defective the title under which a party in possession claims, it is a possession under "color of title" within the statute. Downs v. Porter, 54 Tex. 59, 62.

As chain of transfers.

Section 15 of the statute of limitations of Texas, providing that every suit to be instituted to recover real estate, as against one in possession under color of title, shall be instituted within three years, etc., is not confined to cases in which the defendant was the first to enter under that title; but if he be in a regular chain of transfer from and under the sovereignty of the soil, or in a consecutive chain of such transfer, though not formal in its instruments, he is a defendant within the descriptive words of the statute, and it is wholly immaterial whether he was the first taker from the sovereign of the soil or not, and hence a possession under color of title may be in two or more holding any privity one under another, and need not necessarily be confined to the defendant who was first to enter under the title. Christy v. Alford, 58 U. S. (17 How.) 601, 602, 15 L. Ed. 256.

By "color of title" is meant a consecutive chain of transfer down to the person in possession without being regular, as if one or more of the memorials or muniments be not registered, or not duly registered, or be only in writing. Thompson v. Ferry (Ariz.) 56 Pac. 741, 743; Stanley v. Schwalby, 13 Sup. Ct. 418, 420, 147 U. S. 508, 37 L. Ed. 259; Buford v. Bostick, 58 Tex. 63, 70; Darnell v. State, 63 S. W. 631, 632, 43 Tex. Cr. R. 86; Black v. Garner (Tex.) 63 S. W. 918, 921; Horton v. Crawford, 10 Tex. 382, 386.

Claim of title distinguished.

The term "color of title" is not synonymous with the term "claim of title." To constitute the former, there must be a paper title; but the latter may be constituted wholly by parol. Hamilton v. Wright, 30 Iowa, 480, 486.

Color of title and claim of title held synonymous. United States v. Cameron (Ariz.) 21 Pac. 177, 179.

Decree of court.

A decree in chancery declaring that certain described lands, the title to which is in the defendant in the case, shall be held by the defendant in trust for the sole use and benefit of the plaintiff, constitutes color of title. Wardlaw v. McNeill, 31 S. E. 785, 786, 106 Ga. 29.

Where there is an attempt, unconnected with fraud, to foreclose, and a decree is rendered, and sale had, although the decree may be erroneous, or even void, still it shows a change in the relations between the parties from mortgagor and mortgagee to that of claiming separate and independent rights, and will constitute color of title in the purchaser. Chickering v. Failes, 26 Ill. (16 Peck) 507; Hinkley v. Greene, 52 Ill. 223; McCagg v. Heacock, 42 Ill. 153; Huls v. Buntin, 47 Ill. 396. Such color of title, obtained by foreclosure of a senior mortgage, is sufficient, with a possession of seven years to establish limitations, as against a junior mortgagee not made a party to the foreclosure proceedings. Mason v. Ayers, 73 Ill. 121, 124.

Deed or devise from life tenant.

A deed from a life tenant, purporting to convey an estate for the grantee's life, constitutes color of title, and, accompanied with sufficient adverse occupancy, will perfect such life estate. Staton v. Mullis, 92 N. C. 623, 627.

A devise in fee from a life tenant constitutes color of title, and seven years' possession under it bars the right of entry. Evans v. Satterfield, 5 N. C. 413, 414.

Deed of release.

A deed of release is claim and color of title, within the limitation law of 1839. Holloway v. Clark, 27 Ill. (17 Peck) 483, 486.

As extending possession beyond actual possession.

Color of title sufficient to extend actual possession of a portion of a tract of land to the whole tract, may be shown by the production of a plat made for or a deed made to the person so claiming the land, or one under whom he went into possession, covering the whole tract, and of the proper date for the purpose, or it may be shown by any other evidence tending to prove that during the requisite time the party in possession has claimed the whole tract. But where two plats covering a large territory were in the possession of one holding actual possession of a small tract included in one of the plats, the other plat, though it embraced territory adjacent to the first plat, would not be sufficient to extend the possession over the territory covered by it. Stanley v. Shoolbred, 25 S. C. 181, 190.

Formal requisites and description.

A color of title is anything in writing which serves to define the extent and character of the claim to the land with parties from whom it may come and to whom it may be made. Burdell v. Blain, 66 Ga. 169, 170; Tumlin v. Perry, 34 S. E. 171, 172, 108 Ga. 520; Wardlaw v. McNeill, 31 S. E. 785, 787, 106 Ga. 29.

"Color of title is anything in writing connected with the title which serves to define the extent of the claim. It is wholly immaterial how imperfect or defective the writing may be considered as a deed. If it is in writing and defines the extent of the claim, it is a sign, semblance, or claim of title." Field v. Boynton, 33 Ga. 239, 242; Veal v. Robinson, 70 Ga. 809, 816; Street v. Collier, 45 S. E. 294, 118 Ga. 470; Heavner v. Morgan, 23 S. E. 874, 878, 41 W. Va. 428; Mullan's Adm'r v. Carper, 16 S. E. 527, 532, 37 W. Va. 215; Randolph v. Casey, 27 S. E. 231, 233, 43 W. Va. 289.

Color of title involves the idea of some deed of conveyance or some paper or document upon which the holder may reasonably rely as vesting in him the real ownership of the property. Lindt v. Uihlein, 89 N. W. 214, 216, 116 Iowa, 48.

Any instrument having a grantor and grantee, and containing a description of lands intended to be conveyed and apt words for their conveyance, gives color of title to the lands described. Such an instrument purports to be a conveyance of the title, and by reason of the fact that it does not for some reason have that effect it operates only to pass color or semblance of title to the grantee, which will ripen into an absolute title by the completion of the time of adverse possession. Brooks v. Bruyn, 35 Ill. 392, 394; Crispen v. Hannavan, 50 Mo. 536, 546; Woodruff v. Wallace, 41 Pac. 357, 363, 3 Okl. 355.

Color of title is that which in appearance is title, but which in reality is no title. Whenever an instrument by apt words of transfer from grantor to grantee in form passes what purports to be the title, it gives color of title. Teaver v. Akin, 1 S. W. 772, 773, 47 Ark. 528; Field v. Columbet (U. S.) 9 Fed. Cas. 12; Bartlett v. Ambrose (U. S.) 78 Fed. 839, 843, 24 C. C. A. 397.

Color of title does not mean a good title, or even a defective conveyance from one having a good title, but means only the appearance of title; that is, a deed to the premises in form of law. In re Ah Lee (U. S.) 5 Fed. 899, 913.

A deed which on its face seems to convey title, but does not, is a good foundation for color of title. Latta v. Clifford (U. S.) 47 Fed. 614.

A deed, though fraudulent and void as to the creditor, is color of title in the grantee. Harper v. Tapley, 35 Miss. 506, 512.

"Color of title" is defined to be an apparent title founded on a written instrument, such as a deed, levy of execution, degree of care, or the like. To give color the conveyance must be good in form, contain a description of property professing to convey the title, and be duly executed. Containing these requirements, it will give color of title, though in fact invalid and insufficient to pass the title, or actually void or voidable. It will not do to say that the deed is for reasons not apparent on its face void, and therefore cannot give color of title, for color of title is not, and does not profess to be, title at all. Color of title is that which is title in appearance, but not in reality. Packard v. Moss, 8 Pac. 818, 820, 68 Cal. 123 (citing 3 Wait, Act. & Def. 17).

"To give color of title it is not necessary that the claim should be under an instrument containing the statutory requisites to convey land. It is enough that the claim of title be under an instrument in writing and defining the extent of the claim." Thus, a deed describing the land claimed by the grantee is sufficient to give him color of title, though not executed as required by statute and not recorded. Aldrich v. Griffith, 29 Atl. 376, 378, 66 Vt. 390.

Color of title to land is that which is an apparent title, but in reality is not one. It may be by deed or some instrument of writing operating as an equitable transfer, or it may originate in a parol agreement in a case where actual, and not constructive, occupancy is claimed. When it originates by a deed or instrument purporting to be a deed, there has been a difference in opinion in regard to the requisites which a deed must need, which will be allowed to be color of title. Some authorities insist the deed must be at least clothed with the requisite formalities. All agree that it must designate clearly the land conveyed, and all agree that any defect in the title of the grantor will not affect its admissibility as a color of title. Hamilton v. Boggess, 63 Mo. 233, 244.

The paper title, to give color, must be so far prima facie good in appearance as to be consistent with the idea of good faith on the part of the party entering under it; the inquiry being whether there existed such apparent or colorable title under which claim in entry could have been made in good faith, the party believing his title to be good and his claim well founded. Baker v. Swan's Lessee, 32 Md. 355, 358.

A bond for a title, which defines the extent and character of the claim, the parties from whom it came, and the parties to whom it was made, but which does not sufficiently describe the lands, located definitely and exactly, is sufficient to constitute color of title. Tumlin v. Perry, 34 S. E. 171, 172, 108 Ga. 520.

Colorable title is that which "in appearance is title, but in fact is not." A deed which is invalid because the description of the property sought to be conveyed is indefinite is not sufficient to constitute color of title in one in adverse possession of real estate under such deed. Dickens v. Barnes, 79 N. C. 490, 491.

Color of title must apparently transfer title to the holder, must profess to convey a title, must be so far prima facie good in appearance as to be consistent with the idea of good faith, and must purport to transfer, and apparently transfer, the title. A deed purporting to convey two lots of land in a subdivision by their numbers, where the plat and stakes show the precise location of the lots sold, was held color of title to the entire lots as shown by the plat and stakes, notwithstanding one of the lots, as shown by other testimony, extended six feet over and upon an adjoining tract, and the description in the deed showed distances to include the six feet on the adjoining lot. Bolden v. Sherman, 110 Ill. 418, 425.

A deed from S. to B., conveying six rights of land, containing 180 acres, and one from B. to J., purporting to convey one-half of said six rights of land, and one from J. to R. of a piece of land, giving the boundaries on the north, east, and south, and to extend west far enough for 90 acres, are sufficient to show color of title to the west line of the original 180 acres, and the extent of R.'s possession; R. claiming to hold to such west line and being in actual possession of a part of the land. Beach v. Sutton, 5 Vt. 209, 213.

Homestead entry or filing.

After citing Brooks v. Bruyn, 35 Ill. 392, and Wright v. Matteson, 59 U. S. (18 How.) 50, 56, 15 L. Ed. 280, the court held that a homestead filing does not give color of title. It is a certificate which upon its face does not purport to give title; is an instrument given to designate the person who has claimed, and who is granted, the right to the use and occupancy of a tract of public lands. The government merely parts with the possession of the land, and not the title. Woodruff v. Wallace, 41 Pac. 357, 363, 3 Okl. 355.

Color of title has generally been defined as that which in appearance is title, but which in reality is no title. Wright v. Matteson, 59 U. S. (18 How.) 50, 15 L. Ed. 280; Edgerton v. Bird, 6 Wis. 527, 70 Am. Dec. 473. So that a person holding under an invalid certificate of homestead entry does not hold under color of title; the homestead entry not conveying title. Whitcomb v. Provost, 78 N. W. 432, 433, 102 Wis. 278.

Land certificate.

Const. art. 14, § 2, provides that all land certificates shall be located only upon vacant and unappropriated domain, and not upon any land titled or equitably owned under color of title from the sovereignty of the state, etc. Held, that while a land certificate located prior to the adoption of the Constitution on land to which the title of others was not perfect, but which was covered by the phrase "land titled" in the Constitution, might constitute color of title, it would not so constitute color of title when made subsequent to the adoption of the Constitution. Texas-Mexican Ry. Co. v. Locke, 12 S. W. 80, 90, 74 Tex. 370.

A certificate of purchase of swamp lands constitutes color of title, under Code Civ. Proc. Cal. § 1925, declaring it evidence that the holder is the owner of the tract described therein. Goodwin v. McCabe, 17 Pac. 705, 706, 75 Cal. 584.

Limited by boundaries and exceptions.

Color of title cannot extend beyond the boundaries specified in the grant, so that, where land according to the United States survey was not embraced in a patent, the patent does not constitute color of title to such land. Goltermann v. Schliermeyer, 19 S. W. 484, 488, 111 Mo. 404.

A deed to A., describing the land as commencing at a certain point, thence running north a specified distance to the south boundary of the lands of B., thence along such south boundary of B.'s land, etc., does not include any part of the land lying north of the south boundary of B.'s land, although the distance specified for A.'s land to run north would carry it beyond such boundary, and such deed does not give color of title to any land lying north of such boundary line. Smith v. Headrick, 93 N. C. 210, 213.

Where certain lands had been sold out of a large tract, in a deed describing the boundaries of the large tract by courses and distances, and adding, "including all lands not heretofore sold," such words are descriptive only of all the lands included in the boundaries that were not included in the deeds and conveyances that were before made to other persons. The lands so previously conveyed were as much excluded from the operation of the deed as if they had not been embraced within the sweeping boundaries of that deed. Therefore such deed did not constitute color of title to any of the lands which had been conveyed to other persons. King v. Wells, 94 N. C. 344, 354.

The expressed description in a deed will not be extended beyond its terms because of the belief by the holder that it covered lands not embraced in that description, not because of any unexpressed intention in the mind of the grantor that it should cover such undescribed land. To constitute it color of title, it must actually cover the land claimed under it. Williamson v. Tison, 26 S. E. 766, 767, 99 Ga. 791.

One who enters into possession of land under a conveyance giving color of title is presumed to occupy according to the boundaries named in the conveyance. Sumner v. Blakslee, 59 N. H. 242, 247, 249, 47 Am. Rep. 196.

When one enters upon land under color of title by deed or other written document, he acquires actual possession to the extent of the boundary set forth in the writing, even though the title conveying to him should be good for nothing. Kopp v. Herrman, 82 Md. 339, 33 Atl. 646, 647.

Must be valid on its face.

The words "claim or color of title" made in good faith must be understood as importing such a title as, tested by itself, would appear to be good—not a paramount title, capable of resisting all others, but such a one as would authorize the recovery of the amount when attacked, if no better title were shown; that is, prima facie title. Rawlings v. Bailey, 15 Ill. (5 Peck) 178, 180; Irving v. Brownell, 11 Ill. (1 Peck) 402, 413; Converse v. Calumet River Co., 62 N. E. 887, 888, 195 Ill. 204.

"Color of title is that which in appearance is title, but which in reality is no title. It is that which is apparently good title, but which, by reason of some defect not appearing on its face, does not in fact amount to title. A person in possession under an instrument which upon its face does not appear to give him any right of title or possession cannot be said to be holding under color of title." McLellan v. Omodt, 33 N. W. 326, 37 Minn. 157.

Where a claim of title is founded upon a written instrument, which purports, however imperfectly, to grant the possession claimed, there is color of title sufficient to support the claim and possession thereunder. An instrument is sufficient to give color of title, however defective its execution or acknowledgment, and however insufficient upon its face to convey title, providing it purports to convey title and pretends conformity to the law. City of La Crosse v. Cameron (U. S.) 80 Fed. 264, 271, 25 C. C. A. 399.

To claim a writing as color of title which shows by its terms a title against plaintiff's right which, so far from passing title to one in possession, passes the title to one adverse to his possession, certainly would not aid a possession of seven years and establish a prescriptive right. White v. Rowland, 67 Ga. 546, 556, 44 Am. Rep. 731; Williamson v. Tison, 26 S. E. 766, 767, 99 Ga. 791.

To constitute color of title there must be some written document of title professing to pass the land which is not so obviously defective that it could not have misled a man of ordinary capacity. Dobson v. Murphy, 18 N. C. 586, 592.

Must purport to convey title.

Color of title may be defined to be a writing upon its face professing to pass title, but which does not do it, either from a want of title in the person making it, or from the defective conveyance that is used—a title that is imperfect, but not so obviously so that it would be apparent to one not skilled in the law. Beverly v. Burke, 9 Ga. 440, 443, 54 Am. Dec. 351; Williamson v. Tison, 26 S. E. 766, 767, 99 Ga. 791; Gitten's Lessee v. Lowry, 15 Ga. 336, 338; Wardlaw v. McNeill, 31 S. E. 785, 786, 106 Ga. 29; Tate's Heirs v. Southard, 10 N. C. 119, 121, 14 Am. Dec. 578; Bloom v. Strauss, 69 S. W. 548, 550, 70 Ark. 483.

Color of title is a written instrument, however defective or imperfect, no matter from what cause invalid, which purports to pass or convey title, and which defines the extent of the claim under it. Swann v. Thayer, 14 S. E. 423, 424, 36 W. Va. 46.

Color of title to land is defined to be a writing which on its face professes to pass title to land. Keener v. Goodson, 89 N. C. 273, 277.

One is said to have color of title to land when he has an apparent, though not real, title to the same, founded on a deed which purports to convey the land to him. Seigneur v. Fahey, 6 N. W. 403, 27 Minn. 60. Color of title signifies some written document which appears to be a title to land, but is not a good title. Oliver v. Pullam (U. S.) 24 Fed. 127, 130.

As used in Act 1839, § 9, providing that one claiming land under color of title made in good faith and paying taxes for seven successive years, while the land was vacant and unoccupied, acquired a good title to the extent of his paper title, means a paper title, whether originating in a wrong or a right. It is such a title as, tested by itself, would appear to be good; that is, a prima facie title. An instrument or writing, to be effectual as color, must purport on its face to convey the title. It must apparently transfer the title to the holder; not that the title, when traced back to its source, should prove to be an apparently legal and valid title, but the instrument under which claimant holds and upon which he relies must itself profess to convey a title to the grantee. Dickenson v. Breeden, 30 Ill. 279, 325.

Color of title is required, first, to show the extent of the possession; second, the estate claimed by the person in possession; and, thirdly, to give notoriety to others of the claim. "Color of title is not a good one; otherwise, seven years' possession under it would not be required to make it good. Any deed which on its face purports to be a conveyance from one man to another is color of title." A. constituted B. his attorney to levy, recover, and receive all debts due to him, to take and use all due means for the recovering of the same. B. sold to C. a tract of land belonging to A., and conveyed the same as attorney for A. C. entered and had seven years' possession. Held, that the deed of B., though he had no authority to sell, was color of title. Hill's Heirs v. Wilton's Heirs, 6 N. C. 14, 18.

"One who holds land under a paper title which apparently gives him the right to the land, and which would lead an honest man to the conclusion that the right to the land passed by the deed * * * must be considered as holding under color of title." Gist v. Beaumont, 16 South. 20, 21, 104 Ala. 347.

By the term "color of title" is meant that which appears to be title, but which in reality is no title. It involves, also, the idea of some deed of conveyance, or some paper or document, upon which the holder may reasonably rely as vesting in him the real ownership of the property. A deed given in payment for liquors intended to be sold in violation of law, and void under a statute providing that all conveyances made in whole or in part for or on account of the sale of intoxicating liquors sold in violation of the statute shall be void, is so far in violation of equity and good conscience as not to constitute color of title which will entitle the grantee, as against the grantor, to the value of improvements placed on the property while in possession under the deed. Lindt v. Uihlein, 89 N. W. 214, 215, 116 Iowa, 48.

Must show title in grantor.

A deed gives color of title, but is not even prima facie evidence of title against a stranger, without showing title in the grantor; and several successive transfers cannot alter the case, nor can lapse of time, until aided by the statute of limitations. Wilson v. Spring, 38 Ark. 181, 192.

Paper title required.

Color of title means any written evidence or document under which claim of title is made, and does not mean an instrument in fact effectual to pass title. La Frombois v. Jackson (N. Y.) 8 Cow. 589, 596, 18 Am. Dec. 463.

Color of title is not every pretense of claim of title asserted by a person holding realty, but consists in a writing or conveyance of some kind, on its face purporting to convey the land under which the claim of title is asserted. What constitutes color of title is a question of law, and not of fact. Armijo v. Armijo, 13 Pac. 92, 94, 4 N. M. (Johns.) 133. A person is properly said to have color of title to lands when he has an apparent, though not a real, title to the same, founded upon a paper writing which purports to convey them to him. What is color of title is purely a question of law, to be determined by the court from an inspection of the papers relied on as constituting color. Lee v. O'Quin, 30 S. E. 356, 360, 103 Ga. 355.

"Color of title," as used in Hurd's Rev. St. 1899, p. 1118, c. 83, § 6, providing that every person in actual possession of land under color of title shall be adjudged the legal owner to the extent of his paper title, means an instrument purporting on its face to transfer title, and cannot be aided by parol evidence. Converse v. Calumet River Co., 62 N. E. 887, 888, 195 Ill. 204.

The phrase "color of title," as used in Gen. St. § 2186, refers to a paper writing purporting to convey title, or to some writing whereby title is sought to be acquired. Knight v. Lawrence, 36 Pac. 242, 244, 19 Colo. 425.

As used in the limitation act of 1874, the phrase "color of title" means a paper title; but it does not mean a perfect paper title. De Foresta v. Gast, 38 Pac. 244, 245, 20 Colo. 307.

In many cases a writing is assumed or held to be necessary as a foundation for color of title. But it is now thought to be the better doctrine that both color and claim of title may exist without any instrument, provided that such claim or color be in good faith. Yet, if there be no writing purporting to convey, there must be some visible acts or signs or indications, which are apparent to all, showing the extent of the boundaries of the land claimed, to amount to color of title. One who has followed a vein which deflects from his own claim into the patented claim of another has not, as to the latter claim, color of title. Lebanon Min. Co. v. Rogers, 5 Pac. 661, 662, 8 Colo. 34.

Color of title is defined to be a writing upon its face professing to bear title, but which does not do it, either from a want of title in the person making it, or the defective mode of conveyance that is used. Avent v. Arrington, 105 N. C. 377, 10 S. E. 991. So that there is no such thing as color of title by descent. Williams v. Scott, 29 S. E. 877, 878, 122 N. C. 545.

The words "color of title" do not necessarily import the accompaniment of the usual documentary evidence; for, though one entering by title dependent on a void deed would certainly be in by color of title, it would be strange if another, entering under an erroneous belief that he is the legitimate heir of the person last seised, should be deemed otherwise, and it would be stranger still if his alienee were deemed to have more color of title than he had himself. To give color of title, therefore, would seem not to require the aid of a written conveyance, or a recovery by process and judgment, for the law would require it to be the better title." McCall v. Neely (Pa.) 3 Watts, 69, 72.

"Color may be given for title without a deed or writing at all, and commence in trespass; and, when founded upon a writing, it is not essential that it should show upon its face a prima facie title, but it may be good as a foundation for color, however defective." McClellan v. Kellogg, 17 Ill. (7 Peck) 498, 501.

"Color of title," within a statute declaring that possession under color of title of a portion of a tract of land in the name of the whole tract, and the claim and exercise during the time of such possession of the usual acts of ownership, shall be deemed a possession of the whole tract, cannot be acquired by one going into possession of the land without color of title, and then executing a conveyance thereof to another, and afterwards taking a reconveyance of the property. Such conveyance does not constitute color of title. Mylar v. Hughes, 60 Mo. 105, 111.

Color of title, it has often been hold, need not be a technical deed of the land, and is important to give constructive possession of land only, as being definite, not subject to variation from time to time, and something, also, which it is presumed any adverse claimant to the land may ascertain upon inquiry, and which, therefore, he is presumed to know. But where the manner of occupying a portion of the land clearly indicates to every observer the extent of one's claim of possession, every occasional entry of such possessor will be construed an act of possession, and not a bare trespass, which it would be in one making no claim of title; and this is all that is meant by constructive possession. Judgment affirmed. Buck v. Squiera, 23 Vt. 498, 504.

Quitclaim deed.

A quitclaim deed, taken in good faith, is sufficient color upon which to base title by prescription, when accompanied by seven years' possession thereunder. Johnson v. Girtman, 42 S. E. 96, 115 Ga. 794 (citing Castleberry v. Black, 58 Ga. 386).

Recording required.

Though an unregistered deed does not constitute a perfect title, and cannot be read without proof of its execution, yet it is color of title, under which possession for seven years bars the entry of the owner. Hunter v. Kelly, 92 N. C. 285, 287. See, also, Aldrich v. Griffith, 29 Atl. 376, 378, 66 Vt. 390.

The term "color of title" means a deed or survey of land placed on the public records of land titles, whereby notice is given to the true owner and all the world that the occupant claims the title. It is on the same principle that it is held that occasional entries on land, cutting timber, etc., which ordinarily would be mere acts of trespass in a stranger, when done by one having color of title, are considered as acts of possession, because the true owner of the land has notice on the public records that a person committing such acts claims title to the land. Hodges v. Eddy, 38 Vt. 327, 344.

Sheriff's deed.

A sheriff's deed, which purported to pass an estate in fee simple in the land, though the interest of the judgment debtor did not pass by virtue of it, is color of title sufficient to constitute a claim of adverse possession. Falls of Neuse Mfg. Co. v. Brooks, 11 S. E. 456, 460, 106 N. C. 107.

A person who holds a sheriff's deed to land in all respects in due form and regular upon its face, and by virtue of such a deed recovers in ejectment the land from one in possession, and is placed in possession by an order of court having jurisdiction of the persons and subject-matter, has color of title, and cannot be said to be a bare trespasser. Bernheim v. Horton, 15 South. 822, 823, 103 Ala. 380.

Where there was a purchase at sheriff's sale and the payment of the purchase money, evidenced by the memoranda and receipt of the purchase money by the sheriff who made the sale, there was a color of title sufficient to support limitations, if followed by seven years' possession. Field v. Boynton, 33 Ga. 239, 242.

A sheriff's deed gives color of title by relation from the sale. Rogers v. Mabe, 15 N. C. 180, 195.

Sheriff's return of sale.

A sheriff's return of a sale is not color of title, for that is not understood by any man of ordinary capacity as either passing or professing to pass a title. Dobson v. Murphy, 18 N. C. 586, 593.

Tax deed.

A tax deed, valid on its face, made by a public officer who had the right to sell the property for unpaid taxes, constitutes color of title. Carter v. Woolfork, 17 Atl. 1041, 71 Md. 283.

A tax deed, regularly executed, purporting to convey land to the grantee by virtue of the legal authority vested in the grantor, gives color of title, though in fact it may be fatally defective. De Foresta v. Gast, 38 Pac. 244, 245, 20 Colo. 307.

Void tax deeds are held to give color of title, so that a tax deed, though void, and based upon a void sale, if not showing invalidity upon its face, is a sufficient color of title to be a foundation for adverse possession. Bartlett v. Ambrose (U. S.) 78 Fed. 839, 843, 24 C. C. A. 397; Mullan's Adm'r v. Carper, 16 S. E. 527, 532, 37 W. Va. 215. By color of title is included a tax deed void upon its face; and a tax deed, the defect in which is anterior to the deed and not apparent on its face, constitutes color of title. Zwietusch v. Watkins, 21 N. W. 821, 823, 61 Wis. 615. Color of title may arise from a void deed, yet it will protect the party in possession under it from being treated as a mere trespasser. A sale for taxes confers color of title. Watkins v. Winings, 1 N. E. 638, 102 Ind. 330.

Although a tax deed under which the occupant claimed contained a recital showing that an assessment under which the tax sale was made was invalid, it contained all the other requisites of a good deed, including a sufficient description of the land claimed under it, and hence is sufficient as color of title. Wilson v. Atkinson, 20 Pac. 66, 67, 77 Cal. 485, 11 Am. St. Rep. 299.

A tax deed, though it may not be sufficient to pass a good title, owing to irregularities appearing on its face, constitutes color of title sufficient to extend a continuous occupancy of the land to the extent of the boundaries contained therein. Stovall v. Fowler, 72 Ala. 77, 78.

To constitute color of title a deed must purport to convey title to the land of which it is claimed to be color of title; and, though it be conceded that a tax deed for the undivided half of a tract of land may be color of title as to one of the undivided halves, the party holding such color of title must show that the sale of the land was for the half interest against which it is sought to be used. Perry v. Benton, 111 Ill. 138, 141.

An auditor's deed to the purchaser at a tax sale is color of title in the purchaser in the true intent and meaning of the statute relating to limitations, without regard to its intrinsic worth as a title, and without regard to the constitutionality of the laws under which it was derived. Woodward v. Blanchard, 16 Ill. (6 Peck) 424, 430, 431.

A sheriff's tax deed, though not evidence of title until the foundation is laid by the production of a judgment and precept regular and sufficient on their face, is color of title sufficient to establish limitations, if followed by continuous possession. Bally v. Doolittle, 24 Ill. (14 Peck) 577-579.

Void deeds.

Color of title is that which in appearance is title, but which in reality is no title. It is that which the law will consider prima facie a good title, but which, by reason of some defect not appearing on its face, does not in fact amount to a title. An absolute nullity, as a void deed or judgment, will not constitute color of title. Bernal v. Gleim, 33 Cal. 668, 669.

Color of title is that which in appearance is a title, but which in reality is not one. Even a void and worthless deed is a color of title. McIntyre v. Thompson (U. S.) 10 Fed. 531, 536.

Void will.

"Color of title" is defined to be "a writing upon its face professing to pass title, but which does not do it, either from want of title in the person making it, or from the defective conveyance used." Where a will did not pass any interest in land under it, it cannot be held to be color of title, to aid the possession of a beneficiary and ripen it into a prescription. White v. Rowland, 67 Ga. 546, 556, 44 Am. Rep. 731.

After quoting the definition of color of title in Beverly v. Burke, 9 Ga. 440, 54 Am. Dec. 351, it was held that, where a will was void because children were not mentioned, one who had made improvements under it will be held to have made improvements under color of title. Bloom v. Strauss, 69 S. W. 548, 550, 70 Ark. 483.

COLORABLE DEVIATION.

The term "colorable deviation," in a statement that a certain device, which was a plain equivalent, performing the same function in a combination as that covered by the patent, is a mere colorable deviation, is a smaller and more restricted term than "equivalent," as used in its technical patent law sense. Tecktonius v. Scott, 86 N. W. 672, 675, 110 Wis. 441.

COLORATION.

"Coloration," as used in Act Pa. May 5, 1889 (P. L. 241), making it unlawful to manufacture or sell oleomargarine which shall be an imitation of yellow butter, but providing that it shall not be considered to prohibit the manufacture or sale of an article free from coloration or ingredients that cause it to look like butter, means the act or practice of coloring, or the state of being colored. McCann v. Commonwealth, 48 Atl. 470, 471, 198 Pa. 509.

COLORE OFFICI.

See "Color of Office."

COLORED CHILD.

The term "colored child," in 13 Stat. 266, § 4, providing that every colored child heretofore born is declared to be the legitimate child of the mother, and also of his colored father, if he is acknowledged by such father, includes colored children born during slavery. Davenport v. Caldwell, 10 S. C. (10 Rich.) 317, 341.

The term "colored children," as used in the title relating to public education, include all persons of mixed blood descended from negro ancestry. Rev. St. Tex. 1895, art. 3908.

COLORED MAN.

An application for a new trial, stating as a ground that certain members of the jury were colored men, is not a sufficient allegation to show that such jurors were not qualified electors. "There are various shades of color among the human race in this country, and there is no legal technical signification to the phrase 'colored man,' which the courts are bound judicially to know. A man of pure Caucasian blood, in the freaks of nature and the idiosyncrasies of families, is sometimes impressed with the dye much deeper than falls to the common lot of his race." Pauska v. Daus, 31 Tex. 67, 73.

COLORED PERSON.

The term "colored person," as used in an act legitimating the marriage of colored persons, includes all colored persons, no matter how or when their freedom was acquired. Francis v. Francis (Va.) 31 Grat. 283, 286.

The question whether a person is a colored person, in cases involving the status of colored persons, partakes more of a political than of a legal character, and belongs almost entirely to the jury, and should be determined, not solely by the admixture of negro blood, but by reputation, by reception in society, and by the exercise of the privileges of a white man. White v. Tax Collector of Kershaw Dist. (S. C.) 3 Rich. Law, 136.

As the term "persons of color" has acquired quite as definite a meaning as "negro," "mulatto," etc., and is used in the statute prohibiting vessels sailing for the purpose of engaging in the slave trade, the use of the term in an indictment for the violation of the statute does not render the indictment invalid, as being too indefinite and unintelligible. United States v. La Coste (U. S.) 26 Fed. Cas. 826, 829.

The term "colored race," as used in the title relating to public education, includes all persons of mixed blood descended from negro ancestry. Rev. St. Tex. 1895, art. 3908.

Negro synonymous.

"Color," as used in P. L. 1881, p. 186, providing that no child between the age of 5 and 18 years shall be excluded from any public school on account of his or her religion, nationality, or color, being applied to persons, means persons of the negro race. Pierce v. Union Dist. School Trustees, 46 N. J. Law (17 Vroom) 76, 78.

"Colored person," as used in Code, c. 103, § 2, providing that every person having one-fourth or more of negro blood shall be deemed a colored person, is synonymous with the word "negro," as used in Acts 1877-78, c. 7, § 8, providing that any white person who shall intermarry with a negro, or any negro who shall intermarry with a white person, shall be punished, etc. Jones v. Commonwealth, 80 Va. 538, 542.

The expression "person of color" means negro or mulatto. United States v. La Coste (U. S.) 26 Fed. Cas. 826, 831.

A "free woman of color" is to be understood to be one of African descent, and synonymous with "free negro." Heirn v. Bridault, 37 Miss. 209, 222.

As persons of mixed blood.

"Colored persons," according to the usual signification of those words, means persons of mixed blood. Hopkins v. Bowers, 16 S. E. 1, 111 N. C. 175.

A colored person, or person of color, is a person having one-fourth or more of negro blood. Such a person, by Code 1860, c. 130, § 9, was declared to be a mulatto; but that section only applied to slaves, and not to free negroes. Scott v. Raub, 14 S. E. 178, 181, 88 Va. 721.

"Free person of color" does not mean only a free negro, but may mean persons colored by Indian blood or persons descended from negro ancestors beyond the fourth degree. State v. Chavers, 50 N. C. 11, 15.

The term "persons of color" was defined in 13 Stat. 245, to designate all free negroes, mulattoes, and mestizos, all freedmen and freedwomen, and all descendants through either sex of any of these persons. Davenport v. Caldwell, 10 S. C. (10 Rich.) 317, 333.

The expression "persons of color" includes all who are descended from negro ancestors of the fourth generation, inclusive, though one ancestor of each generation may have been a white person. State v. Watters, 25 N. C. 455, 457; State v. Dempsey, 31 N. C. 384, 388.

The term "person of color," as used in Acts 1838, c. 24, declaring void all marriages between white persons and free negroes and persons of color, includes only cases where such persons of color are within the third degree. State v. Melton, 44 N. C. 49, 50.

The term "person of color," as used in Rev. St. tit. 55, exempting from taxation the personal and real estate of "persons of color," includes a quadroon, or a person having one-fourth negro blood, and all other persons who have descended in part only from colored ancestors and have a distinct, visible admixture of African blood. Johnson v. Town of Norwich, 29 Conn. 407, 408.

The phrase "persons of color" means "Africans or their descendants, mixed or unmixed. A person who has any perceptible admixture of African blood is generally called a 'colored person.' In affixing the epithet 'colored,' we do not ordinarily stop to estimate the precise shade, whether light or dark, though, where precision is desired, they are sometimes called 'light-colored' or 'dark-colored.' There is no margin between white and colored, and all that are not white are colored." Van Camp v. Board of Education of Village of Logan, 9 Ohio St. 406, 411.

Every person having one-fourth or more of negro blood shall be deemed a colored person. Code Va. 1887, § 49.

In the construction of statutes, the term "colored person," or "person of color," or "colored," as applied to any person, has the same signification as is attached to "negro," which term includes every person having one-eighth or more of negro blood. Rev. St. Fla. 1892, §§ 1, 2611.

COLORED RACE.

The term "colored race" is but another designation, and in this country but a synonym, for "African." Clark v. Directors of City of Muscatine, 24 Iowa, 266, 275.

COLORING MATTER.

See "Artificial Coloring Matter."

COLPORTEUR.

The word "colporteur," as used in a will giving a sum in trust to the deacons of a church to aid in the support of a Baptist colporteur and missionary in the state of Wisconsin, means, according to the lexicographers, "one who travels for the sale and distribution of religious tracts and books." Webster's Dict. "A hawker and peddler; especially, in modern usage, a peddler of religious books." Worcester. Dict. In France, "a hawker of books and pamphlets; one who travels for vending small books." Imp. Dict. In England, "one who is engaged by a religious society or association to travel about and distribute or sell religious books or tracts of the society, in the latter case at reduced prices." Cyclop. Dict. "A person employed by a Bible or tract society, or the like, to distribute gratuitously or sell at low rates Bibles and various other religious publications." Cent. Dict. In re Fuller's Will, 44 N. W. 304, 305, 75 Wis. 431.

COLT.

The term "colt," as distinguished from "horse," means a horse not old enough to work. Mallory v. Berry, 16 Kan. 293, 295.

An indictment alleging that the defendant branded a colt is sufficient, without a further allegation that the colt was of the horse species. "Horse" is the generic name of the equine species. To name one of the species is sufficient. Pullen v. State, 11 Tex. App. 89, 91.

COM.

"Com." and "Co." are both well-understood abbreviations of the word "company," when used as a part of the name of a commercial firm; and where a complaint alleged that defendants made their note payable to "S. & Co.," and that "S. & Com." indorsed and delivered it to plaintiff, and the note, when introduced in evidence, was indorsed "S. & Co.," there was no variance. Keith v. Sturges, 51 Ill. 142, 143.

2 Wds. & P.—18

COMBAT.

See "Mutual Combat."

COMBINATION—COMBINE.

An agreement between two or more persons forms a combination between them. In re Grice (U. S.) 79 Fed. 627, 642.

Worcester defines "combine" thus: "To join together, to coalesce, to unite, to be united, to be joined in friendship or in design. Roget, in his Thesaurus, classifies the word "combine" as synonymous with or belonging to the same class as "unite; incorporate; amalgamate; embody; absorb; re-embody; blend; merge; fuse; melt into one; consolidate; coalesce; centralize; impregnate; to put together; to lump together." Considering such definitions in view of the familiar rule of statutory construction that the words of a statute are to be taken in their ordinary and familiar signification and import, the word "combine," as used in Act April 15, 1854, providing that no company formed to navigate the lakes and rivers shall combine with any other company formed under the act for any purpose, is not to be construed as only prohibiting combinations to prevent what is contrary to public policy or injurious to the public, but includes combinations for any purpose whatsoever. Watson v. Harlem & N. Y. Nav. Co. (N. Y.) 52 How. Prac. 348, 353.

COMBINATION IN RESTRAINT OF TRADE.

In order to constitute a trust, within the statute making contracts void where a combination of capital, skill, or acts is formed to create or carry out restrictions in trade or to prevent competition in the sale or purchase of commodities, there must be a combination of capital, skill, or acts by two or more. "Combination," as here used, means union or association. If there be no union or association by two or more of their capital, skill, or acts, there can be no combination; hence no trust. When we consider the purposes for which the combination must be formed, the essential meaning of the word "combination," and the fact that a punishment is prescribed for each day that the trust continues in existence, we are led to the conclusion that the union or association of capital, skill, or acts denounced is where the parties in the particular case designed the united co-operation of such agencies, which might have been otherwise independent and competing, for the accomplishment of one or more of such purposes. State ex inf. Crow v. Continental Tobacco Co., 75 S. W. 737, 747, 177 Mo. 1

(citing Gates v. Hooper, 39 S. W. 1079, 90 Tex. 563).

As used in Rev. St. 1895, art. 5313, making contracts void where a combination of capital, skill, or acts is formed to create or carry out restrictions in trade, means union or association. If there be no union or association by two or more of their capital or acts, there can be no combination, and hence no trust. Gates v. Hooper, 39 S. W. 1079, 1080, 90 Tex. 563; Texas & P. Coal Co. v. Lawson, 34 S. W. 919, 920, 89 Tex. 394. So that a lease by a coal company of its saloon, in which the lessor covenants not to permit the sale of liquor by any one else on its lands, is void. Texas & P. Coal Co. v. Lawson, 34 S. W. 919, 920, 89 Tex. 394.

The term "combination in restraint of commerce among the states," within the meaning of Anti-Trust Act July 2, 1890, c. 647, 26 Stat. 209 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3200], prohibiting combinations in restraint of commerce among the states, does not include a combination for the purchase of the stock of sugar refineries for the purpose of acquiring control over the business of refining sugar for sale in the United States. United States v. E. C. Knight Co., 15 Sup. Ct. 249, 252, 156 U. S. 1, 39 L. Ed. 325.

"Combination in restraint of trade," as prohibited by Act March 30, 1889, includes a contract of sale between a brewing company and a dealer, whereby the company grants exclusive territory to the dealer for the sale of its products, and the dealer agrees not to sell the product of any other company. Texas Brewing Co. v. Templeman, 38 S. W. 27, 28, 90 Tex. 277.

A combination or contract in restraint of trade may be not only not illegal, but praiseworthy, as where parties attempt to engross the market by furnishing the best goods, or the cheapest; so that ordinarily a case cannot be made under the statute, unless the means are shown to be illegal, and therefore it is ordinarily necessary to declare the means by which it is intended to engross or monopolize the market. United States v. Paterson (U. S.) 55 Fed. 605, 607, 638.

As applicable to laborers.

Act July 2, 1890, c. 647, 26 Stat. 209 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3200], providing that every contract or combination, in the form of trust or otherwise, "in restraint of trade or commerce," is illegal, applies to combinations of laborers, as well as of capitalists. United States v. Workingmen's Amalgamated Council of New Orleans (U. S.) 54 Fed. 994, 996, 26 L. R. A. 158.

A combination setting out to secure and compel the employment of none but union men in a given business, and as a means of effecting this compulsion to finally enforce the discontinuance of labor in all kinds of business, including the business of transportation of goods and merchandise which were in transit from state to state and to and from foreign countries, was a combination in restraint of trade. United States v. Workingmen's Amalgamated Council (U. S.) 54 Fed. 994, 999, 26 L. R. A. 158.

COMBINATION PATENT.

See "Patentable Combination."

A "combination" is an entirety. If one of its elements is omitted, the entire claim disappears. Every part of a combination claimed is conclusively presumed to be material to the combination, and no evidence to the contrary is admissible in any case of alleged infringement. The patentee makes all parts of the combination material when he claims them in combination, and not separately. A claim for a combination covers the exact combination claimed, and nothing more. It does not protect the elements of the combination, nor their mode of union, nor their co-operative law, separately considered. Engle Sanitary & Cremation Co. v. City of Elwood (U. S.) 73 Fed. 484, 485 (citing Walk. Pat. § 349; Rob. Pat. § 527; Richards v. Chase Elevator Co., 159 U. S. 477, 16 Sup. Ct. 53, 40 L. Ed. 225).

"Combination," as used with respect to patents, means a co-operative union of elementary parts, effecting one practical result. Thomas Roberts Stevenson Co. v. McFassell (U. S.) 90 Fed. 707, 708, 33 C. C. A. 249.

A claim for a patent cannot be treated as a combination claim, in the absence of the word "combination" and of a statement of a specific element of which it is composed. "Claims for devices cannot be changed to claims for combination by construction." Brown Mfg. Co. v. David Bradley Mfg. Co. (U. S.) 51 Fed. 226, 227.

A patent, made up of a combination of separate elements, all of which are old and well known, is a "combination patent," and is a patentable invention, providing a new and useful result is obtained. P. H. Murphy Mfg. Co. v. Excelsior Car Roof Co. (U. S.) 70 Fed. 491, 495.

A combination claim is one which takes various mechanical elements and joins them together in such a way as to make an operative mechanism, the action of which is produced by the joint action of all the mechanical elements in the combination. Moore v. Schaw (U. S.) 118 Fed. 602, 606.

COMBINATION POOLS.

The term "combination pools" is used to designate a method of gambling on horse races, which is somewhat similar to mutual pools, and is conducted in the following manner: "In the combination pools there must be three contests or races. The person speculating in combination pools must select his choice in the race, the same as done in the mutual; but, in order to win, he must have selected the winner in each of the three races. If any one of the horses chosen by him fails, he wins nothing. Any number of persons may select the same combination, and, if any particular combination wins, the persons having selected that combination are entitled to the whole amount, less the commission of the persons conducting the pool, to be equally divided, upon producing their cards or tickets. The sum deposited on each selection of a combination is uniform. Persons purchasing these combination tickets may decline to name any combination and purchase the field, and, should all the combinations fail, the pool, less the commission aforesaid, is divided among those holding tickets on the field." James v. State, 63 Md. 242, 250.

COMBINED OFFENSE.

Code, § 4300, providing that, in cases of combined offenses, both offenses may be charged in one indictment, means only cases where the same act constitutes in itself more crimes than one, and does not include cases in which two or more crimes are committed in succession. State v. Ridley, 48 Iowa, 370.

COMBUSTION CHAMBER.

In the description of a claim for a patent, the term "combustion chamber" necessarily implies an inclosed space in which the acts of combustion may be confined. It is a well-understood term in the vocabulary of industrial arts. Bryce Bros. Co. v. National Glass Co. (U. S.), 116 Fed. 186, 190, 53 C. C. A. 611.

COME.

Act April 19, 1794, § 7, provided that, if any person die seised or possessed of property, leaving neither widow, lawful issue, nor father, the whole of the real estate shall be enjoyed by the intestate's mother, unless the real and personal estate of either of them has come to the intestate from the part of his father, in which case so much as shall have so come shall descend as if such intestate had survived his mother. Held, that "come" does not mean come by descent only, but is also applicable to a devise. Shippen v. Izard (Pa.) 1 Serg. & R. 222, 224.

Rev. St. art. 4535, requiring a railway company doing business in the state to receive all freight and passengers "coming to it" on a connecting line, designates freight which has reached that line in the course of transportation, to be forwarded over the road of the receiving company. Gulf & I. Ry.

Co. v. Texas & N. O. Ry. Co., 56 S. W. 323, 329, 93 Tex. 482.

The expression, as used in the act relating to descents and distributions, "where the estate shall have come to the intestate on the part of the father," or "mother," as the case may be, shall be construed to include every case where the inheritance shall have come to the estate by gift, devise, or descent from the parent referred to, or from any relative of the blood of such parent. Ann. St. Ind. T. 1899, § 1841.

To market.

The words "coming to market," in the by-law of October 6, 1802, which makes it unlawful for any person to buy up any provision or article of food coming to market, means on his way to the market place with intent to buy goods there offered for sale in market hours, and does not require that there shall be a market actually holding at the time of the purchase in order to constitute the offense. Botelov v. Washington (U. S.) 3 Fed. Cas. 962.

To reside.

"Come to reside," as used in Code 1797, relating to the residence of a pauper who shall come to reside within the state, extends to a person residing within the state at the time of the passage of the act, but not having settlements therein, and is not limited to persons coming into the state literally, after the act took effect. Town of Starksborough v. Town of Hinesburgh, 13 Vt. 215, 222; Town of Burlington v. Town of Calais, 1 Vt. 385, 394.

In the several provincial statutes of 1692, 1701, and 1767, in reference to settlements for the purpose of the poor laws, the terms "coming to sojourn or dwell," "being an inhabitant," "residing and continuing one's residence," and "coming to reside and dwell," are frequently and variously used, and we think they are used indiscriminately to mean the same thing, namely, to designate the place of a person's domicile. This is defined in Const. c. 1, § 1, for another purpose, to be "the place where one dwelleth or hath his home." Inhabitants of Abington v. Inhabitants of North Bridgewater, 40 Mass. (23 Pick.) 170, 176.

Within or into the state.

Limitation statutes, declaring that, where the statute has been suspended during the debtor's absence from the state, the statute shall begin to run again on the debtor's coming into the state, mean a coming into the state which is so notorious that persons with whom the debtor associated knew of the same, or that the creditor might by the use of ordinary diligence have learned of the debtor's whereabouts. If the debtor came into the state secretly, his act in so doing would not be a "coming into the state" with-

In the statute. Frey v. Aultman, Miller & Co., 2 Pac. 168, 169, 30 Kan. 181.

If a debtor remove or return into the state publicly and with a view to dwell and permanently reside within its jurisdiction, although in an extreme part from the place of his former residence or that of the creditor, it is a "coming or returning within the state," within the meaning of the statute of limitations. Mazon v. Foot (Vt.) 1 Aikens, 282, 285, 15 Am. Dec. 679.

COME AT ONCE.

A telegram announcing the sickness of the wife of the sender, with the expression "Come at once," is sufficient to require of a telegraph company active diligence in an effort to promptly deliver the message. The expression is sufficient to justify or require an inference that the message was of importance. Western Union Tel. Co. v. Lavender (Tex.) 40 S. W. 1035, 1036.

COME BY THE FATHER.

The phrase "come by the father," relative to the descent of an estate, as used in a statute, embraces not only the father, but all of the ancestors of the father, both paternal and maternal. Kelly's Heirs v. McGuire, 15 Ark. 555, 586.

COME BY THE MOTHER.

The phrase "come by the mother," in a statute relative to descent of property, has a technical meaning, and embraces not only the mother, but all the ancestors of the mother. Kelly's Heirs v. McGuire, 15 Ark. 555, 586.

COME TO TIME.

A statement by one of the two signers of a promissory note, who claimed to be a surety to the holder of such note, that "you must make D. come to time this fall. You know it is the best time for making money with the farmers,"—cannot be construed as a direction to the holder to take legal proceedings against D., the other signer of the note. Lawson v. Buckley, 2 N. Y. Supp. 178, 179, 49 Hun, 329.

COME UP TO.

Pol. Code, § 1571, providing that the state chemist shall analyze the samples of fertilizers sent to him, and, if such analysis shows that the "fertilizer does not come up to the guaranteed analysis," then the sale made by such sample shall be null and void, does not necessarily require that the two analyses should agree exactly in all particulars; but, if they show results substantially the same, the reason and spirit of the law is complied with, and a sale will not be void. Spinks v.

Rome Guano Co., 33 S. E. 906, 907, 108 Ga. 614.

COMES NOT.

The term, in the entry of a judgment by default, that "defendant comes not," merely imports a failure of the defendant to come and answer the declaration, and not that he has never appeared to the suit. Horner v. O'Laughlin, 29 Md. 465, 472.

COMEDY.

A comedy is a dramatic representation of the lighter faults, passions, actions, and follies of mankind. Commonwealth v. Fox, 10 Phila. 204.

COMFITS.

Leghorn citron, in the sense that sugar is used to preserve it, may be said to fall within the classification of "comfits, sweetmeats, or fruits preserved in sugar," in Tariff Act 1883, par. 302; but such citron is not dutiable under such paragraph, but is entitled to free entry as a dried fruit. Nordlinger v. United States (U. S.) 69 Fed. 92.

"Comfits," as used in the customs duty act, includes candied citron. A comfit, according to the dictionary, is a dried sweetmeat, any kind of fruit or root preserved with sugar and dried. A sweetmeat is a fruit preserved with sugar, but not necessarily dried. What would be a sweetmeat becomes a comfit, if it is not only preserved with sugar, but also dried. Levy v. Robertson (U. S.) 38 Fed. 714, 715.

COMFORT.

See "Aid and Comfort"; "Good and Comfortable Support and Maintenance"; "Necessary Comforts."

The words "support and comfort," as used in a will giving all the testator's estate, both personal and real, to his wife for life, for her "support and comfort," merely express the purpose and motive of the gift, and do not make the gift conditional. They have little, if any, more significance than the words "to be for her benefit and enjoyment," and are not sufficient to cut down the clearly expressed absolute gift to a qualified or conditional one. Maynard v. Cleaves, 21 N. E. 376, 149 Mass. 307.

Priv. Acts 1835, c. 85, § 8, incorporating the town of Raleigh, and providing that such corporation shall have power and authority to pass such ordinances as should be necessary to preserve the health and comfort of the town, is not susceptible of a construction sufficiently broad to authorize an ordinance punishing criminal offenses, on the theory that a breach of the peace disturbs the comfort of the citizens; "but this would be a strained construction of the charter, and, if regarded as correct, would include the whole catalogue of criminal offenses, and authorize the corporation to inflict penalties for the commission of them." Corporation of Raleigh v. Dougherty, 22 Tenn. (3 Humph.) 11, 12, 39 Am. Dec. 149.

As maintenance or support.

In a statute exempting property from sale for the satisfaction of any and all debts, other than debts "for articles of comfort and support of the household," the words "comfort" and "support" have the same meaning, and are synonymous with "maintenance," and when the household are supplied with food, raiment, habitation, medical assistance, and medicines, the boundary prescribed by the statute is reached. Eskridge v. Ditmars, 51 Ala. 245, 255.

"The word embraces whatever is requisite to give security from want and furnish reasonable physical, mental, and spiritual enjoyment. 'It implies,' says Webster, 'some degree of positive animation of spirits, or some pleasurable sensations derived from happy and agreeable prospects.'" As used in a will requiring testator's executors to set aside so much of the income of testator's estate as is necessary for the comfort of testator's wife, it is not satisfied by setting aside a sufficient sum to provide her with sufficient food and wearing apparel. Forman v. Whitney, *41 N. Y. (2 Keyes) 165, 168.

"Comfort," as used in a will devising testator's property to certain persons for life, and providing that, should it be necessary for their personal comfort to use any portion of said property, they might sell it, means "support." Peckham v. Lego, 19 Atl. 392, 393, 57 Conn. 553, 7 L. R. A. 419, 14 Am. St. Rep. 130.

As physical comfort.

"Comfort," as used in a will devising property to testatrix's husband for life, with power to dispose and sell the same whenever in his judgment he might deem it conducive to his comfort, means the physical comfort to be derived from the actual or potential application of the proceeds of such a disposition to the present or prospective physical comfort or support of the husband. There may be also, to a limited extent, a mental element in the comfort, consisting of that peace of mind which comes from a knowledge or belief that, by reason of a change in the property resulting from a disposition by sale, it will be rendered more easily available for the physical comfort or support of the husband, and not to that peace of mind which arises from a knowledge that the property has been so disposed of as to contribute to the enjoyment and support of others. The comfort experienced by the philanthropist in giving away his property, whether to relatives, friends, or strangers, is not the kind of comfort which testatrix had in mind when she was engaged in making the will. Stocker v. Foster, 60 N. E. 407, 408, 178 Mass. 591.

COMFORTABLE HOME.

A provision in a will, bequeathing a homestead farm subject to the obligation to furnish a "comfortable home" for testator's sister, means something more than a shifting abode, with strange faces and strange surroundings, and requires a home for such sister on the ancestral estate amidst the scenes of her childhood. Emery v. Swasey, 53 Atl. 992, 994, 97 Me. 136.

COMITY.

Comity means general reciprocity. In re McCoskey, 1 N. Y. Supp. 782, 783, 6 Dem. Sur. 438.

The term "comity" is defined as "courtesy: a disposition to accommodate." Courts of justice in one state will, out of comity, enforce the law of another state, when by such enforcement they will not violate their own laws or inflict an injury on some one of their own citizens. This rule contributes largely to produce kindly intercourse between the states and individuals, permits them to sue in each other's courts, and to travel and transact all kinds of business in each other's territory, when they are not prevented by some positive law of the state. Franzen v. Zimmer, 35 N. Y. Supp. 612, 614, 90 Hun. 103.

Comity concedes and allows, but does not withhold or prohibit. It yields as a favor what cannot be claimed as a right. When it is the basis of judicial determination, the court extending the comity out of favor and good will extends to foreign laws an effect they would not otherwise have. It is not an exercise of comity to administer the local law, though it agrees with the foreign law. Stowe v. Belfast Sav. Bank (U. S.) 92 Fed. 90, 96.

Comity is not a rule of law, but one of practice, convenience, and expediency. It is something more than mere courtesy, which implies only deference to the opinion of others, since it has a substantial value in securing uniformity of decision and discouraging repeated litigation of the same question. But its obligation is not imperative. If it were, the indiscreet action of one court might become a precedent, increasing in weight with each successive adjudication, until the whole country was tied down to an unsound principle. Comity persuades, but it does not command. It declares, not how a case shall be decided, but how it may with propriety be decided. It recognizes the fact that the primary duty of every court is to dispose of cases according to the law and the facts; in a word, to decide them right. In doing so the judge is bound to determine them according to his own convictions. If he be clear in those convictions, he should follow them. It is only in cases where in his own mind there may be a doubt as to the soundness of his views that comity comes in play and suggests a uniformity of ruling to avoid confusion until a higher court has settled the law. It demands of no one that he shall abdicate his individual judgment, but only that deference shall be paid to the judgments of other co-ordinate tribunals. Clearly it applies only to questions which have been actually decided and which arose under the same facts. Mast, Foos & Co. v. Stover Mfg. Co., 20 Sup. Ct. 708, 710, 177 U. S. 485, 44 L. Ed. 856; Welsbach Light Co. v. Cosmopolitan Incandescent Light Co. (U. S.) 104 Fed. 83, 85, 43 C. C. A. 418. Thus the owner of a patent is not in any case entitled to a preliminary injunction against infringement as a matter of strict right, but the application therefor is addressed to the sound discretion of the court, which cannot be constrained by any rule of comity to follow the decisions of another jurisdiction against its own independent judgment. Hence it is not a ground for the reversal of an order refusing such an injunction that it is contrary to the decisions of the courts of another circuit. Welsbach Light Co. v. Cosmopolitan Incandescent Light Co. (U. S.) 104 Fed. 83, 85, 43 C. C. A. 418.

The term "comity" is open to the charge of implying that the judge, when he applies foreign law to a particular case, does so as a matter of caprice or favor. It is rather a scapegoat, an opportunity of escape for the court. Conklin v. United States Shipbuilding Co. (U. S.) 123 Fed. 913, 916.

COMITY OF NATIONS.

What is termed "comity of nations" is the formal expression and ultimate result of that mutual respect accorded throughout the civilized world by the representatives of each sovereign power to those of every other in considering the effect of their official acts. Its source is a sentiment of reciprocal regard, founded on identity of position and similarity of institutions. The effect to be given to a foreign judgment in personam for a money demand must be determined either by the comity of nations, the rule of absolute reciprocity, or the personal obligation resting upon the defendant. Fisher v. Fielding, 34 Atl. 714, 716, 67 Conn. 91, 32 L. R. A. 236, 52 Am. St. Rep. 270.

Comity, in the legal sense, is neither a matter of absolute obligation on the one hand, nor of mere courtesy and good will on the other, but it is the recognition which one nation allows within its territory to the legislative, executive, or judicial acts of another nation, having due regard both to international duty and convenience and to the rights of its own citizens, who are under the protection of its laws. Hilton v. Guyot, 16 Sup. Ct. 139, 143, 159 U. S. 113, 40 L. Ed. 95.

In Bank of Augusta v. Earle, 38 U. S. (13 Pet.) 519, 10 L. Ed. 274, it was said by Chief Justice Tenney: "Comity extended to other nations is no impeachment of sovereignty. It is a voluntary act of a nation by which it is offered, and it is inadmissible when contrary to its policy or prejudicial to its interests." Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Gardiner, 70 N. W. 508, 510, 51 Neb. 70.

The comity extended to other nations is no impeachment of sovereignty. It is the voluntary act of the nation by which it is offered, and is inadmissible when contrary to its policy or prejudicial to its interests. But it contributes so largely to promote justice between individuals and to produce a friendly intercourse between the sovereignties to which they belong that courts of justice have continually acted upon it as part of the voluntary law of nations. People v. Martin, 67 N. E. 589, 591, 175 N. Y. 315, 96 Am. St. Rep. 628 (citing Bank of Augusta v. Earle, 38 U. S. (13 Pet.) 519, 10 L. Ed. 274).

COMMA.

The comma and semicolon are both used for the same purpose in punctuation, namely, to divide sentences and parts of sentences; the only difference being that the semicolon makes the division a little more prolonged than the comma. Holmes v. Phenix Ins. Co. (U. S.) 98 Fed. 240, 242, 39 C. C. A. 45, 47 L. R. A. 308.

COMMAND.

See "At Command."

"The word 'command,' as applied to the case of principal and accessory, is where the person having control over another, as a master over his servant, orders a thing to be done." State v. Mann, 2 N. C. 4.

Either of the words "wish," "desire," "command," or "direct" are apt words to be used in a will to show testator's intent to make a will. Barney v. Hayes, 29 Pac. 282, 284, 11 Mont. 571, 28 Am. St. Rep. 495.

COMMANDING ON BOARD.

"In the merchant service, the master when present, and after him the mates pursuant to their grades, are the officers commanding on board, according to the order and discipline of the service." The Union (U. S.) 24 Fed. Cas. 537, 543.

COMMENCE.

See "Duly Commenced"; "To Be Commenced."

"Commence" is defined in the Century Dictionary as "to cause to begin to be, perform the first act of, enter upon, begin"; as defined by Webster, "to begin, to originate, to do the first act in anything, to take the first step." Thus a statute fixing a fee to be paid to the state by insurance companies before commencing business in the state does not apply to companies already doing business in the state. State v. Hartford Fire Ins. Co., 13 South. 362, 304, 99 Ala. 221.

"Commenced," as used in Railroad Law (Revision, p. 934) § 34, requiring a railroad company to "commence" construction within six months from the date of its organization, means the actual commencement of the work of constructing the road. Point Breeze Ferry & Improvement Co. v. Bergen Neck Ry. Co., 20 Atl. 762, 53 N. J. Law (24 Vroom) 108.

COMMENCED.

In Act Cong. Aug. 13, 1888, c. 866, 25 Stat. 433 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 508], giving district courts jurisdiction of all suits of common law brought by the United States, and declaring that for jurisdictional purposes national banks shall be deemed citizens of the state in which they are located, but providing that this shall not be held to affect the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States in cases "commenced" by the United States or by direction of any officer thereof, or cases for winding up the affairs of any such bank, the word "commenced" is to be given a prospective, as well as a present, operation, and the proviso is to be interpreted as if it read, "now pending or hereafter brought." Stephens v. Bernays (U. S.) 44 Fed. 642, 643.

Where, in one section of an act, it is provided that in suits commenced the plaintiff will not be allowed more costs than damages if he recover less than $6, and in another section the provisions were made applicable only to suits to be commenced, the ambiguity of the phraseology was such as to forbid a construction rendering the act applicable to actions commenced prior to its passage. White v. Hunt, 6 N. J. Law (1 Halst.) 415, 418.

Const. art. 6, § 5, declaring that all actions for the recovery of the possession of, quieting the title to, or the enforcement of liens upon, real estate shall be commenced in the county in which the land is situated, meant actions commenced subsequent to the Constitution. Gurnee v. Superior Court of City and County of San Francisco, 58 Cal. 88, 94.

Incompleteness implied.

Code N. C. § 895, providing that the county shall not be liable for costs in actions commenced in justices' courts, construed to only apply to cases where the justice acts as committing magistrate, and not the cases over which he has final jurisdiction. Merriman v. Henderson County Com'rs, 11 S. E. 267, 268, 106 N. O. 369.

Code, § 121, providing that no action or proceeding commenced before the adoption of the Code shall be affected thereby, does not include a judgment. "The use of the word 'commenced' shows very clearly that the section referred to was never intended to embrace a judgment, which is an entire act." Daily v. Burke, 28 Ala. 328, 331.

The word "commenced," in Code, § 895, providing that in no action or proceedings commenced or decided in justice court shall a county be liable to pay any costs, applies to cases of which the justice has final jurisdiction, but which are carried by appeal to the superior court; but when the defendant is bound over to court by the justice, the case becomes a proceeding of the superior court, and costs, including costs in the justice court for investigation, are governed by Code, § 743 et seq., relative to costs in the superior court. Merriman v. Henderson County Com'rs, 11 S. E. 267, 268, 106 N. O. 369.

COMMENCEMENT OF ACTION.

To "commence a suit" is to demand something by the institution of process in a court of justice. Cohens v. Virginia, 19 U. S. (6 Wheat.) 264, 408, 5 L. Ed. 257.

In the case of Goldenberg v. Murphy, 108 U. S. 162, 2 Sup. Ct. 388, 27 L. Ed. 686, it was held that there is no real difference in meaning between the words "commenced" and "brought." Chief Justice Waite said: "A suit is brought when in law it is 'commenced,' and we see no significance in the fact that, in the legislation of Congress on the subject of limitations, the word 'commenced' is sometimes used, and at other times the word 'brought.' In this connection the two words evidently mean the same thing, and are used interchangeably." United States v. American Lumber Co. (U. S.) 80 Fed. 309, 315. So, also, Rawle v. Phelps (U. S.) 20 Fed. Cas. 320, 321; Kaelser v. Illinois Cent. R. Co. (U. S.) 6 Fed. 1, 4.

Day of teste of writ.

The words "commencement of a writ," for the purpose of computing time under the act of limitation, is to the day indorsed on a writ. Reed v. Brewer, 7 Tenn. (Peck) 275, 276.

The date of the writ is prima facie evidence that it was issued on that day. Chapman v. Goodrich, 55 Vt. 354, 355.

A writ in chancery commences from the date of the subpoena which is issued out and returned or placed in the hands of the officer. Pindell v. Maydwell, 46 Ky. (7 B. Mon.) 314.

In general the day of the teste of the writ is to be considered as the time of the commencement of the action, and, when the day of the teste of a writ is the day it was made out, neither party can be permitted to show under any circumstances that the suit was commenced on another day; but where a writ is made out before the cause of action arises, and bears teste the day when so made, the writ must be copied so as to bear teste on the day when the cause of action arose, or on a day subsequent thereto, or the suit will fail. Thus, where defendant lived a long distance from the plaintiff, and plaintiff brought an action of trover for a horse, and had a writ made out, and took it and an officer with him, and, on the defendant's refusal to deliver the horse, directed the officer to serve the writ, the time of the service of the writ, and not the making of it, must be considered as the actual commencement of the action. Robinson v. Burleigh, 5 N. H. 225, 227.

Delivery of process to officer.

"The time of the commencement of a suit or action is the time of the delivery of the writ to the proper officer, or leaving it at his house for the purpose of its being executed." Bronson v. Earl (N. Y.) 17 Johns. 63, 65. A suit or action is formally commenced when the original writ is actually delivered to the proper officer for service. Ross v. Luther (N. Y.) 4 Cow. 158, 15 Am. Dec. 341.

"The suing out of a writ has been held in civil cases by this court to be 'commencement of suit,' and, although there may be some uncertainty or ambiguity in the term 'suing out a writ,' yet there can be no doubt that the delivery of the writ to the proper officer, or leaving it at his house for the purpose of being executed, is to be deemed an actual commencement of the suit." Bronson v. Earl (N. Y.) 17 Johns. 63, 65.

Shannon's Code, §§ 4445, 4446, relating to limitations, and providing that the suing out of the summons is the "commencement of an action," whether it be executed or not, if the action is duly prosecuted, is not satisfied where the summons is issued to plaintiff's counsel, and not given to an officer for service, and the suit is dismissed for want of service. East Tennessee Coal Co. v. Daniel, 42 S. W. 1062, 1065, 100 Tenn. 65.

For the purpose of commencing an action by a process of foreign attachment, the affidavit was filed and writ issued, but it does not appear that the writ was ever served or returned by the sheriff, nor that it was ever placed in his hands, or in any manner delivered to him. No property was attached or person summoned as garnishee, nor do any steps appear to have been taken to bring the defendants into court, by notice or otherwise. The record states that the writ issued, and it is copied into the record, but such statement does not imply that it was placed in the hands of the sheriff for service, and without a delivery of the writ to the sheriff for service, or something equivalent to such delivery, the action would not be commenced. Hancock v. Ritchie, 11 Ind. 48, 51.

The delivery of the original notice in a personal action to the sheriff of the proper county, with the intent that it be served immediately, or by the actual service of that notice by another person, is the commencement of the action. This rule applies to all actions in personam. Elliott v. Stevens, 10 Iowa, 418; Hagan v. Burch, 8 Iowa (8 Clarke) 309, 311. Hence, that being done, the addition of the new cause of action to the first petition by amendment, the facts stated arising out of the same transaction, cannot be the commencement of a new action. Mather v. Butler County, 16 Iowa, 59, 61.

A suit is deemed for some purposes to have been commenced by filing the petition in the district court, but, strictly speaking, it is commenced by delivering the original notice to the sheriff, or by actual service thereof by another. Reed v. Chubb, 9 Iowa, 178.

Where a writ had been sued out and placed in the hands of an officer before limitations took effect against the action, the action was "commenced and sued," within the meaning of such phrase in the statute of limitations. Johnson v. Farwell, 7 Me. (7 Greenl.) 370, 375, 22 Am. Dec. 203.

The issuing of the writ is the commencement of the suit in a case where time is material so as to save the statute of limitations. Nor is it necessary to prove an actual delivery of the writ to the sheriff, providing it be shown that it was actually made out and sent to the sheriff, with a bona fide and absolute intention of having it served. But such intention must be positive and unequivocal. Hence where, a day or so before the expiration of the time in which an action could be brought, an attorney made out the writ and entered it in his register, either then or afterwards, as of the last day on which action could be brought, and gave it to the plaintiff with instructions not to deliver it to the sheriff before such last day, and it appeared that there was no intention to bring the action until an assignment of a certain note had been secured, and this assignment was not in fact secured until the last day, and did not reach the plaintiff until afterwards, the intention with which the writ was delivered by the attorney to the plaintiff was not shown to have been such a bona fide and absolute intention of having it served as was necessary in order to effect a commencement of the suit. Burdick v. Green (N. Y.) 18 Johns. 14, 17, 18, 20.

"Commenced and sued," as used in an act of limitation providing that actions shall be commenced and sued within a certain limited time, is equivalent to a declaration that the party shall do everything that the statute requires to have a writ issued. "Simply leaving a petition with a person who may be a clerk, with direction to use it, not as a clerk of the court, but as an individual, cannot be considered as filing the same with the clerk officially. When a writ is made provisionally, and delivered to an officer with instructions that it is not to be used until after a certain time or the happening of a certain event, the action cannot be considered as commenced until the arrival of the time or the happening of the event. A writ is not considered as legally sued out until it is delivered to the sheriff with authority to him to serve it on the defendant." The suit is not instituted till after the petition is filed with the clerk, and he is expressly or impliedly ordered to issue the writ. Maddox v. Humphries, 30 Tex. 494, 496.

Exhibition of claim to trustees.

The exhibition of a claim to the trustees appointed under an act for giving relief against absent and absconding debtors may be considered as equivalent to the commencement of a suit, so as to bar the running of the statute of limitations, and ought to be so considered, since an action at law will not lie against such trustees. Peck v. Trustees of Randall (N. Y.) 1 Johns. 165, 172, 176.

Filing complaint or petition.

"In England it is settled that the filing of a bill or declaration is to be regarded, for every essential purpose, as commencement of the suit." Lowry v. Lawrence (N. Y.) 1 Caines, 69, 72 (quoting Cowp. 454).

Code, § 523, providing that no proceeding for reversing, affecting, or modifying judgments or final orders shall be "commenced" within three years after the rendition of a judgment or making the final order complained of, does not mean the filing of a petition, but includes both the filing of a petition and causing a summons to issue, which is the method provided by the Code (section 55) for the commencement of an action. Robinson v. Orr, 16 Ohio St. 284, 286.

"In common parlance, an action will be deemed 'commenced' when the first step is taken in court, which under our law is the filing of the petition." Burton v. Buckeye Ins. Co., 26 Ohio St. 467, 469.

Where a petition in mechanic's lien suit is filed within 90 days after the filing of the lien, the action is commenced within the meaning of the statute, though the writ is issued subsequent to that period. Gosline v. Thompson, 61 Mo. 471.

The expression "preceding the commencement of this action," as used in a complaint stating that no action has accrued to the plaintiff by reason of the matter as therein set forth at any time within two years preceding the commencement of this action, is equivalent to the words "preceding the filing of the complaint." Adams v. Patterson, 35 Cal. 122, 126. See, also, Pimental v. City of San Francisco, 21 Cal. 351, 367.

A suit is deemed to be commenced, for some purposes, such as suing out of an attachment, by the filing of the petition in the district court. Reed v. Chubb, 9 Iowa, 178, 180.

"Commencement of proceedings," as used in the bankruptcy act, with reference to time, shall mean the date when the petition was filed. U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3419.

"Commencement of proceedings in bankruptcy" is the filing of a petition for adjudication of bankruptcy by or against a debtor, upon which such debtor shall be adjudicated a bankrupt. Section 38, Bankr. Law 1867; United States v. Pusey (U. S.) 27 Fed. Cas. 631, 633 (citing In re Patterson [U. S.] 18 Fed. Cas. 1315).

Filing indictment or information.

The "commencement of a prosecution" which will toll the statute of limitations is the presentation or filing of an indictment or information. Mere filing of a complaint before a magistrate charging the commission of a felony cannot be regarded as the commencement of the prosecution, since neither the preliminary examination nor the prosecution is founded on the complaint. In re Griffith, 11 Pac. 174, 175, 35 Kan. 377.

The filing of an information, the arrest of the accused, and his recognizance to appear and answer in the district court, if done within a year after the offense is alleged to have been committed, are the "commencement of a prosecution" within the meaning of the statute of limitation. State v. Groome, 10 Iowa, 308, 309.

Filing oath or affidavit in criminal cases.

The usual commencement of a criminal procedure, according to Wharton, is a preliminary oath before a magistrate, on which a warrant is issued for arrest. Hartnett v. State, 42 Ohio St. 568, 576.

A criminal prosecution is commenced on the filing of an affidavit and issuing a warrant by a committing magistrate, within the meaning of Rev. St. § 643, providing that, when any criminal prosecution is commenced in any court of the state, it may under certain circumstances be removed into the United States court. Georgia v. Bolton (U. S.) 11 Fed. 217, 218.

Filing præcipe.

A suit is commenced when a plaintiff, by filing with the clerk a præcipe for the process he desires, submits himself and the subject-matter to the court's controversy. The jurisdiction which the court thus obtains is the power to hear and determine the cause. "It is coram iudice whenever a case is presented which brings this power into action." Bush v. Hanson, 70 Ill. 480; United States v. Arredondo, 31 U. S. (6 Pet.) 691, 709, 8 L. Ed. 547. When the court thus has jurisdiction of the plaintiff and of the subject-matter, the action is commenced, though there be no jurisdiction as yet of the defendant. Therefore, where a præcipe was filed, and summons was issued to a fire insurance company within a year after a loss, but the summons was not served, and another process was issued on the return day of the first process, the suit was commenced within a year, though the second process did not issue until after the expiration of the year. Schroeler v. Merchants' & Mechanics' Ins. Co., 104 Ill. 71, 76.

Foreclosure notice.

A fire policy provided that if the property should be sold, transferred, or become incumbered by mortgage or trust deed, or by judgment tax or mechanic's lien, or upon the "commencement" of proceedings for its foreclosure or sale, or levy thereon, the policy should become void. Held, that an advertisement for a mortgage sale was a "commencement" of foreclosure within the meaning of the word in the policy. Springfield Steam Laundry Co. v. Traders' Ins. Co. of Chicago, 66 Mo. App. 199, 203.

"Commencement of an action or suit," in a statute providing in effect that limitations will be sustained on all debts, grounded upon any contract in writing, by the commencement of an action or suit within four years next after the same could have been instituted, does not include the mere fact of posting notices of a trust sale by a trustee before the debt secured by the trust deed is barred, but not in time to make the sale before the bar of limitations would be complete. Blackwell v. Barnett, 52 Tex. 323, 335.

Issuance of summons.

The commencement of an action, prosecution, or suit is the issuance of the summons, and not the filing of the petition. Butts v. Turner, 68 Ky. (5 Bush) 435, 436.

"Proceedings in error are not commenced when personal service can be obtained, until a summons is issued, which shall be duly served." Bemis v. Rogers, 8 Neb. 149, 150.

The commencement of a suit in justice court happens on the issuing of the summons. Boyce v. Morgan (N. Y.) 3 Caines, 133.

Issuance of warrant in criminal case.

A criminal prosecution is deemed "commenced" by the issuing of a warrant within the Indiana statute requiring that prosecutions for certain offenses shall be commenced within two years after the examination thereof. Flick v. State, 51 N. E. 951, 952, 22 Ind. App. 550.

The commencement of prosecution is the issuance of a warrant in good faith, and its delivery to the officer to execute, and, where the defendant was afterwards arrested on such warrant and bound over for trial, such issuance constituted a sufficient commencement of a prosecution to satisfy the statute of limitations. People v. Clark, 33 Mich. 112, 120.

Rev. St. § 643 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 521], declares that, whenever any civil suit or criminal prosecution is commenced in a state court for any act done by an officer under the revenue laws of the United States, the same may be removed to the United States Circuit Court. Held, that the "commencement of an action" within such statute was the issuance of a warrant and the arrest made by a state officer, and that it was no objection to the removal that no indictment had been found against the federal officer in the state court. North Carolina v. Kirkpatrick (U. S.) 42 Fed. 689.

A warrant of arrest issued and returned by a proper officer is the commencement of a criminal prosecution. Ross v. State, 55 Ala. 177.

Issuance of writ.

The commencement of a suit in this country is usually the time of the issuance of the writ, and differs from the English rule, which fixes the filing of the bill or declaration as the time of the commencement of the suit. Lowry v. Lawrence (N. Y.) 1 Caines, 69, 72; Cheetham v. Lewis (N. Y.) 3 Johns. 42; Burdick v. Green (N. Y.) 18 Johns. 14, 17.

The time of the "commencement of a suit or action," in order to stop the running of the statutes of limitation, is the day when the writ is issued, provided the writ must be served and returned. Day v. Lamb, 7 Vt. 426, 429; Chapman v. Goodrich, 55 Vt. 354, 355.

The expression "commencement of the action," as used in a plea in an action of assumpsit alleging that the cause of action did not accrue to plaintiff at any time within six years before the commencement of the action, means the time when the writ issued. The receipt of the writ by the sheriff, or its service on the defendant, is not required in order to constitute the commencement of an action. In contemplation of law the writ is issued, on the application of the creditor, by the sovereign power of the state, through the instrumentality of its officers. It is the state's precept or command, and is issued, and the action commenced, whenever it is in the hands of the plaintiff or his attorney, ready to fulfill its purposes. The commencement of the action depends wholly on the will or the diligence of the plaintiff. Hall v. Spencer, 1 R. I. 17, 19.

As used in the statute of limitations (Rev. St. c. 81, § 82), the "commencement" of an action is the time of actually making a writ with the intention of service. Dodge v. Hunter, 26 Atl. 1055, 1056, 85 Me. 121, 124.

The issuing of the capias ad respondendum is the commencement of a suit. Hogan v. Cuyler (N. Y.) 8 Cow. 203, 205.

The issuance of a capias ad respondendum to stay the statute of limitations is a mere matter of form, and the fact that the writ was delivered to the sheriff with instructions to return it non est, without any intention of its being served on the defendant, did not prevent it from constituting a good commencement of the suit for the purpose of defeating the operation of the statute of limitations, since the defendant is not thereby deprived of any defense. Beekman v. Satterlee (N. Y.) 5 Cow. 519, 526.

Issuance of writ of replevin.

The issuance of a replevin writ to a sheriff constitutes the commencement of a replevin suit. Underwood v. Tatham, 1 Ind. (1 Cart.) 276.

Motion to revive judgment.

"A motion to revive the lien of a judgment under the provisions of Code, § 323, is not the commencement of an action within the meaning of section 27, prescribing that an action on a judgment must be commenced within six years after its rendition, it being only a mode by which to secure the fruits of an action already had and determined between the parties." Burns v. Conner, 23 Pac. 836, 837, 1 Wash. St. 6.

Service of notice in ejectment.

The date of the issue of process is the commencement of an action. The service of notice in ejectment is the commencement of that action, although the suit is not pending until the return of the notice and filing of the declaration and notice in court. Pindell v. Maydwell, 46 Ky. (7 B. Mon.) 314.

Service of summons or writ.

An action is not commenced until service is made on the defendants, and, where one of the defendants dies before service is made on either, the action does not survive. Clark v. Helms (Conn.) 1 Root, 486, 487.

The commencement of a suit or action is the service of the writ, and not the signing or issuance of the writ. Jencks v. Phelps, 4 Conn. 149, 152; Spalding v. Butts, 6 Conn. 28, 30; Reliance Trust Co. v. Atherton (Neb.) 93 N. W. 150.

Within Kan. Rev. St. 1868, pp. 624, 634, § 20, declaring that if any action be commenced within due time and a judgment thereon for plaintiff be reversed, or if plaintiff fail in such action otherwise than on the merits, and the time and limit for the same shall have expired, the plaintiff may commence a new action within a year after the reversal or failure, held, that the service of a summons and the return thereof constituted the commencement of an action contemplated by such section. Isaacs v. Price (U. S.) 13 Fed. Cas. 154, 156.

Where an attorney sues out a summons and shows it to a defendant, requesting him to sign his appearance thereto, and defendant promised so to do, if he cannot arrange with plaintiff, and afterwards appears by himself or attorney, the commencement of the suit was at the time when summons was first shown to the defendant. Whitaker v. Turnbull, 18 N. J. Law (3 Har.) 172, 174.

A suit is to be construed as commenced or brought when the writ is sued out and completed in order to have it served on the defendant, and hence, although the writ be completed and put into the hands of an officer, yet if he be directed not to serve it until after the happening of some contingency, the suit is not commenced until after such happening. Mason v. Cheney, 47 N. H. 24, 25.

The actual service of the original notice in a personal action by a person other than the sheriff is the commencement of the action. Elliott v. Stevens, 10 Iowa, 418, 422; Mather v. Butler County, 16 Iowa, 59, 61; Hagan v. Burch, 8 Iowa (8 Clarke) 309, 311.

Paschal's Dig. art. 4604, providing that limitations will be suspended on all debts grounded upon contract in writing by the commencement of an "action or suit" within four years next after the same could have been instituted, is not met by the posting of notices of a trust sale by a trustee before the debt secured by the trust is barred, but not in time to make the sale before the bar of limitation would be complete. Blackwell v. Barnett, 52 Tex. 326-335.

An action to redeem property sold for taxes is not commenced within Code 1873, § 3157, until notice has been served on defendant as provided by section 2599, even for the purpose of avoiding the time limitation. Hawley v. Griffin (Iowa) 92 N. W. 113, 117.

Same—Bona fide attempt to serve.

The commencement of a suit in chancery is the filing of a bill with a bona fide effort to have process served thereon. Greenwood v. Warren, 23 South. 686, 687, 120 Ala. 71.

A suit in equity in a federal court is commenced by the suing out of process and a bona fide attempt to serve it. "Bona fide" in this sense requires an effort to proceed according to law, and to employ the means which the law prescribes. United States v. American Lumber Co. (U. S.) 85 Fed. 827, 830, 29 C. C. A. 431.

Same—Filling up for service.

The commencement of an action or the suing out of a writ is the time when the writ is in fact filled up for service. Howard v. Hunt, 17 N. H. 449.

Service of writ of attachment.

Where, in an action on a promissory note, the real estate of the defendant was attached before the note was signed, the attachment of the realty must be considered the commencement of the action. Swift v. Crocker, 38 Mass. (21 Pick.) 241, 243.

The commencement of an attachment is the service of the writ, and not the delivery of the writ to the officer for service. Gates v. Bushnell, 9 Conn. 530, 535.

Suing out of process.

The time of the commencement of suit, in determining whether it has been brought within period of limitations, "is the day when the writ was issued, if it was served and returned within the time therein limited. For other purposes, service of the writ is regarded as the commencement of the suit." Kirby v. Jackson, 42 Vt. 552, 554.

"The words 'commence a suit' have a definite legal signification, and mean the suing out of process, or originating proceedings, whereby an action in a court of law or equity is instituted to establish some right or redress some wrong." Wilson v. Baptist Education Soc. (N. Y.) 10 Barb. 308, 318.

Within the Judicial Code of March 31, 1875, providing that when any suit is "commenced" in any Circuit Court of the United States to enforce any legal or equitable lien on property situate within the district where the suit is brought, and one or more of the defendants shall not be an inhabitant or found within the district, it shall be lawful for the court to make an order directing such absent defendant to appear and plead on a day certain, the suit is "commenced" to an absent defendant whenever the complainant has in good faith obtained process, or, perhaps, whenever he has shown all that is necessary for him to do to obtain process, to bring a defendant before the court, and it does not mean that the suit is commenced against such absent defendant on the filing of the bill. Bisbee v. Evans (U. S.) 17 Fed. 474, 476.

By the procurement of a blank form of process from the clerk or an attorney, suitably filled out and intended to be served, the writ or action may well be called "commenced" or "sued out." It is the intention and act combined which in fact constitute the institution of the suit. Cross v. Barber, 15 Atl. 69, 70, 16 R. I. 266.

An action is to be regarded as "commenced," so as to avoid the statute of limitations, when the writ is completed with the purpose of immediate service. If completed, except for the affixing of a revenue stamp, but the purpose is to serve it without, the suit will be regarded as commenced at the date of the writ, but if the writ was retained for several days for want of a stamp, and then it be affixed, and nothing more is shown, a suit must be regarded as commenced when the stamp was affixed. Mason v. Cheney, 47 N. H. 24, 25.

"Commencement of an action" means the time when there is a declaration and voluntary appearance of the defendant, or the declaration and issuing of a writ, and in the latter case the commencement of the action is the time when the writ is actually sued out. State Bank v. Bates, 10 Ark. (5 Eng.) 120, 122.

As when writ returnable.

Act Feb. 24, 1806, declared that no action should be removed from any of the courts of common pleas to the supreme or circuit courts, unless the same is removed on or before the first day of the next term that the action shall have been commenced. Held, that such clause should be interpreted as meaning the first day of the term to which the writ was returnable, inasmuch as the writ of removal is directed to the court in which the action is brought, which court can have no knowledge of the action until its session at the term succeeding its commencement, and hence removal must be had "on or before the first day of the term next after that to which the writ is returnable." Lyle v. Baker (Pa.) 4 Dall. 433, 434, 1 L. Ed. 897.

COMMENCEMENT OF BUILDING.

The "commencement" of a building, within the mechanic's lien law, is the doing of some act upon the ground on which the building is to be erected, and in pursuance of a design to erect, the result of which act would make known to a person viewing the premises, from observation alone, that the erection of a building on that land had been commenced. Work done in breaking the ground for a cellar is a commencement of a building, because it must have changed the appearance of the ground so as to show the purpose of the work. James v. Van Horn, 39 N. J. Law (10 Vroom) 353, 363. A statute giving a mechanic's lien priority over a mortgage recorded after the "commencement of the building" means the first labor done on the ground which is made the foundation of the building, the effects of which are apparent, such as beginning to dig the foundation, or work of like description, which every one can readily recognize as the commencement of the building. Mutual Ben. Life Ins. Co. v. Rowand, 26 N. J. Eq. (11 C. E. Green) 389, 392. Code, art. 61, § 15, Mechanic's Lien Law, providing that a mechanic's lien shall have preference over a mortgage which was not recorded until after the "commencement of the building," means some work and labor on the ground, the effects of which are apparent and easily seen by everybody, such as beginning to dig the foundation, or work of like description, which every one can readily see and recognize as the commencement of the building. Brooks v. Lester, 36 Md. 65, 70; Kelly v. Rosenstock, 45 Md. 389, 392. "Commencement of the building," as used in the mechanic's lien law, means an excavation for a foundation which has progressed so far as to make it apparent on the ground that the building is to be erected. Jacobus v. Mutual Ben. Life Ins. Co., 27 N. J. Eq. (12 C. E. Green) 604, 606; Kansas Mortg. Co. v. Weyerhaeuser, 29 Pac. 153, 156, 48 Kan. 335. Such work must be done with an intention and purpose then formed to continue such work to the completion of the building, and work done on the ground without any design or purpose to construct a building at that time, and which is intermitted, is not sufficient. Kelly v. Rosenstock, 45 Md. 389, 392.

The act of furnishing or placing on the ground some material that is afterward used in the construction of the building is not the "commencement" of the building. Kansas Mortg. Co. v. Weyerhaeuser, 29 Pac. 153, 156, 48 Kan. 335 (citing Pennock v. Hoover, 5 Rawle, 291).

Comp. St. Neb. c. 54, § 3, provides that, on filing the proper account for a mechanic's lien, the same shall operate as a lien for two years from the commencement of the labor or the furnishing of such materials. Held, that the word "commencement" qualified both "labor" and "material," and the materialman's lien dates from the time of the first delivery. Courtney v. Insurance Co. of North America (U. S.) 49 Fed. 309, 312, 1 C. C. A. 249.

"Commencement," as used in Pub. St. c. 177, § 1, amended Laws 1888, c. 696, giving a lien for labor and material furnished in the construction of a building, before any other lien which shall originate subsequent to the commencement of the building, relates to the construction of the building itself, and not of different jobs of work thereon, where the work is performed dividedly, at different times, by different employes or contractors. Bassett v. Swarts, 21 Atl. 352, 17 R. I. 215.

COMMENT.

A statute declaring that counsel for the state in a criminal prosecution shall not comment on the failure of the accused to testify does not mean that the counsel shall not criticize or condemn or anathematize the accused, but it forbids in unmistakable language any reference, friendly or unfriendly, to his failure to testify. It forbids any remark, of any character or in any words, on such failure, and requires that the attention of the jury shall not be called to the fact at all by counsel. Yarbrough v. State, 12 South. 551, 70 Miss. 593.

Laws, § 2055, declaring that the court shall not "comment" on the weight of evidence, means statements with reference to the sufficiency or value of the evidence of particular witnesses, or certain parts thereof, but does not include a case where the court instructed the jury that evidence relating to common notoriety referring to the defendant could be considered only on the question of probability that defendant had heard that he was charged with the crime. Trujillo v. Territory, 32 Pac. 154, 155, 156, 7 N. M. 43.

"Commerce" is defined in Gibbons v. Ogden, 22 U. S. (9 Wheat.) 1, 6 L. Ed. 23, to mean, not only traffic, but also intercourse. When applied to states, it means commercial intercourse as between them. This definition has been approved in many cases. Henderson v. Wickham, 92 U. S. 259, 271, 23 L. Ed. 543; Welton v. Missouri, 91 U. S. 275, 280, 23 L. Ed. 347; Hannibal & St. Joseph R. Co. v. Husen, 95 U. S. 465, 468, 24 L. Ed. 527; Brown v. Houston, 5 Sup. Ct. 1091, 1093, 114 U. S. 622, 29 L. Ed. 257; State of Minnesota v. Barber, 10 Sup. Ct. 862, 866, 136 U. S. 313, 34 L. Ed. 455; Brimmer v. Rebman, 11 Sup. Ct. 213, 214, 138 U. S. 78, 35 L. Ed. 862; Voight v. Wright, 11 Sup. Ed. 182; Dillon v. Erie R. Co., 43 N. Y. Supp. 320, 325, 19 Misc. Rep. 116; Schmidt v. People, 31 Pac. 498, 18 Colo. 78; Farris v. Henderson, 33 Pac. 380, 383, 1 Okl. 384; State v. Duckworth, 51 Pac. 456, 457, 5 Idaho, 642; Commonwealth v. Gloucester Ferry Co., 98 Pa. 105, 120; Campbell v. Chicago, M. & St. P. Ry. Co., 53 N. W. 351, 352, 86 Iowa, 587.

Commerce is traffic, but it is something more—it is intercourse. It comprehends intercourse for the purposes of trade in any and all its forms, including the transportation, purchase, sale, and exchange of commodities between the citizens of our country and the citizens or subjects of other countries, and between the citizens of different states. McNaughton Co. v. McGirl, 49 Pac. 651, 653, 20 Mont. 124, 38 L. R. A. 367, 63 Am. St. Rep. 610 (citing Welton v. Missouri, 91 U. S. 275, 23 L. Ed. 347; Mobile County v. Kimball, 102 U. S. 691, 26 L. Ed. 238).

"Commerce," as used in the United States Constitution, providing that Congress shall have power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several states and with the Indian tribes, includes commerce in all its ramifications, and every feature or form which it may assume; that is, with foreign countries and among the states, and, if the power to regulate it be exclusive, it is coextensive with the meaning of the word. Ex parte Crandall, 1 Nev. 294, 302.

It has been considered that the power given to Congress to regulate commerce is the power to prescribe the rule by which it shall be governed, and that "commerce," in the sense in which the word is used in the Constitution, is coextensive in its meaning with "intercourse." In so far as intercourse between two states consists in traffic, a rule prescribing the subjects of that traffic, or dictating the mode in which or the condition on which such traffic must be prosecuted, is a commercial regulation. Carson River Lumbering Co. v. Patterson, 33 Cal. 334, 339.

It is well said that domestic commerce and interstate commerce are different things. Still both are comprehended in the single word "commerce"; and a title with the regulation of commerce as its expressed subject would, beyond doubt, be broad enough to include provisions as to both domestic commerce and interstate commerce. State v. Schlitz Brewing Co., 59 S. W. 1033, 1039, 104 Tenn. 715, 78 Am. St. Rep. 941.

"Commerce with foreign nations and among the several states" can mean nothing more than intercourse with those nations and among those states, for purposes of trade, be the object of the trade what it may; and this intercourse must include all the means by which it can be carried on, whether by the free navigation of the waters of the several states, or by a passage overland through the states, where such passage becomes necessary to the commercial intercourse between the states. It is this intercourse which Congress is invested with the power of regulating, and with which no state has a right to interfere. Corfield v. Coryell (U. S.) 6 Fed. Cas. 546, 550.

"Commerce," in its general sense, means an interchange or mutual change of goods, wares, productions, or property of any kind between nations or individuals, either by barter, or by purchase and sale; but adopting the definition given it in its connection as used in the Constitution of the United States, it also means intercourse and navigation. Fuller v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co., 31 Iowa, 187, 207.

"Commerce" is defined as the interchange of goods, merchandise, or property of any kind; trade, traffic; used more especially of trade on a large scale carried on by transportation of merchandise between different countries, or between different parts of the same country, distinguished as "foreign commerce" and "internal commerce." Master Granite & Blue Stone Cutters' Ass'n of Philadelphia, 23 Pa. Co. Ct. R. 517, 520.

The word "commerce" is not defined in the Constitution. Undoubtedly, the carrying from one state to another by independent carriers of goods and commodities that are ordinary subjects of traffic, and which have in themselves a recognized value in money, constitutes interstate commerce. Champlon v. Ames, 23 Sup. Ct. 321, 322, 188 U. S. 321, 47 L. Ed. 492.

"Commerce with foreign nations and among states," strictly considered, consists of intercourse and traffic, including in these terms navigation and the transportation and transit of persons and property, as well as the purchase, sale, and exchange of commodities. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Railroad Commission of Tennessee (U. S.) 19 Fed. 679, 709 (citing Mobile County v. Kimball, 102 U. S. 691, 702, 26 L. Ed. 238); Lindsay & Phelps Co. v. Mullen, 20 Sup. Ct. 325, 333, 176 U. S. 126, 44 L. Ed. 400; Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. v. Illinois, 118 U. S. 557, 571, 7 Sup. Ct. 4, 30 L. Ed. 244; Gloucester Ferry Co. v.

Pennsylvania, 5 Sup. Ct. 826, 828, 114 U. S. 196, 29 L. Ed. 158; Ex parte Jervey (U. S.) 66 Fed. 957, 959; In re Green (U. S.) 52 Fed. 104, 113; Cooley v. Board of Wardens of Philadelphia, 53 U. S. (12 How.) 299, 318, 13 L. Ed. 996; Bowman v. Chicago & N. W. Ry. Co., 8 Sup. Ct. 689, 693, 699, 125 U. S. 465, 31 L. Ed. 700; Kidd v. Pearson, 9 Sup. Ct. 6, 10, 128 U. S. 1, 32 L. Ed. 346; In re Grand Jury (U. S.) 52 Fed. 840, 841; Welton v. Missouri, 91 U. S. 275, 279, 23 L. Ed. 347; State v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co., 30 N. J. Law (1 Vroom) 473, 487; Williams v. Fears, 35 S. E. 699, 701, 110 Ga. 534.

"Commerce" is defined to be an exchange of commodities, but this definition does not convey the full meaning of the term. It also includes navigation and intercourse, and the transportation of passengers is a part of commerce. Passenger Cases, 48 U. S. (7 How.) 283, 401, 12 L. Ed. 702. The term "commerce" includes the transportation of passengers. Anderson v. Louisville & N. R. Co. (U. S.) 62 Fed. 46, 49. As used in Const. U. S. art. 1, § 8, giving Congress power to regulate interstate commerce, etc., "commerce" is not to be construed as limited to an exchange of commodities only, but includes as well intercourse with foreign nations and between the several states, and includes the transportation of passengers. People v. Raymond, 34 Cal. 492, 497; Fry v. The State, 63 Ind. 552, 562, 30 Am. Rep. 238.

"Commerce," briefly stated, is the sale or exchange of commodities. But that which the law looks upon as the body of commerce is not restricted to specific acts of sale or exchange. It includes the intercourse—all the initiatory and intervening acts, instrumentalities, and dealings that directly bring about the sale or exchange. Though the sale or exchange is a commercial act, so also is the solicitation of a drummer whose occupation is to bring about the sale. Brennan v. City of Titusville, 153 U. S. 289, 14 Sup. Ct. 829, 38 L. Ed. 719. The whole transaction, from initiation to culmination, is commerce. United States v. Swift & Co. (U. S.) 122 Fed. 529, 531.

Commerce is traffic, but it is much more. It embraces also transportation by land and water, and all the means and appliances necessarily employed in carrying it on. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Fuller, 84 U. S. (17 Wall.) 560, 568, 21 L. Ed. 710. The term "commerce," in its broadest acceptance, includes not merely traffic, but the means and vehicles by which it is prosecuted. Winder v. Caldwell, 55 U. S. (14 How.) 434, 444, 14 L. Ed. 487.

"Commerce," as used in Const. U. S. art. 1, § 8, cl. 3, declaring that Congress shall have "power to regulate commerce" with foreign nations and among the several states, embraces a vast field, containing not only many, but exceedingly various, subjects quite unlike in their nature, some imperatively demanding a single uniform rule operating equally on the commerce of the United States in every particular, and some as imperatively demanding that diversity which alone can meet the local necessities of navigation. Cooley v. Board of Wardens of Philadelphia, 53 U. S. (12 How.) 299, 318, 13 L. Ed. 996.

"Commerce," as used in Const. art. 1, § 8, providing that Congress shall have power to regulate commerce, etc., embraces all instruments by which commerce may be conducted. Trade-Mark Cases, 100 U. S. 82, 96, 25 L. Ed. 550.

Commercial agencies.

"Commerce," as used in Const. U. S. art. 1, § 8, relating to the regulation of commerce by Congress, consists of intercourse and traffic, including in these terms navigation, the transportation and transit of persons and property, as well as the purchase, sale, and exchange of commodities. Information or intelligence is not an article of "commerce," in any proper meaning of that word. Neither are they subjects of trade and barter, offered in the market as something having an existence and value independent of the parties to them. Neither are they commodities, to be shipped or forwarded from one state to another, and there put up for sale. The information furnished by mercantile agencies to subscribers of their rating books is like other personal contracts between parties. It is individual in its character, and has no relation to the general public. The mercantile agency is not a common carrier. It is no intermediate instrument to disseminate its information, but it is a collector, storer, and holder of it, to be given directly to those who wish to purchase or pay for it. Mercantile commercial agencies, therefore, are not instruments of commerce, so as to be placed exclusively under the regulation of Congress and free from state control. State v. Morgan, 48 N. W. 314, 320, 2 S. D. 32.

Commercial travelers.

"Commerce," as used in the United States Constitution, reserving to Congress the right to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several states and with the Indian tribes, cannot be construed to apply to a law requiring a license for selling goods by sample in one state as the representative of a resident of another state, for it does not prescribe rules for the conduct of commercial transactions, nor contemplate any restriction on commerce, but simply imposes a tax on an occupation exercised by all persons within the limits of the state. Territory v. Farnsworth, 5 Pac. 869, 874, 5 Mont. 303.

Act Tex. May 4, 1882, imposing a license on drummers and others selling goods, by sample or otherwise, or soliciting trade, is a regulation of commerce, and unconstitutional as applied to citizens of other states. Asher v. Texas, 9 Sup. Ct. 1, 2, 128 U. S. 129, 32 L. Ed. 368.

Driving live stock on foot.

Commerce is traffic, but it is much more. It embraces also transportation by land and water, and all the means and appliances necessarily employed in carrying it on. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Fuller, 84 U. S. (17 Wall.) 565, 568, 21 L. Ed. 710. Act May 29, 1884, c. 60, § 1, 23 Stat. 31 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 299], making it a misdemeanor for one to drive live stock on foot from one state to another, knowing them to have a contagious disease, is within the power given to Congress to regulate interstate commerce. United States v. Slater (U. S.) 123 Fed. 115, 121.

Emigrant agents.

The business of procuring contracts for personal labor to be performed out of the state is not a commodity of commerce, and any transportation of persons that might result from such contract is so remote and incidental as not to be deemed within the protection or meaning of the law of interstate commerce. State v. Napier, 41 S. E. 13, 16, 63 S. C. 60 (citing Williams v. Fears, 179 U. S. 270, 21 Sup. Ct. 128, 45 L. Ed. 186, affirming the judgment of the Supreme Court of Georgia, 35 S. E. 699, 110 Ga. 584, 50 L. R. A. 685).

Exchange or sale of commodities.

Commerce is the exchange of commodities. Commonwealth v. Housatonic R. Co., 9 N. E. 547, 551, 143 Mass. 264.

Commerce between nations and among states has several branches. It consists in selling the superfluity and in purchasing the articles of necessity, as well products as manufactures; in buying from one nation and selling to the other, and transporting the merchandise from the seller to the buyer to gain the freight. Passenger Cases, 48 U. S. (7 How.) 283, 416, 12 L. Ed. 702.

Commerce proceeds from trade, and is the exchange of one kind of property for another, whether it be by barter, or by purchase and sale. In re Nickodemus (U. S.) 18 Fed. Cas. 222, 224.

Commerce includes not only the transportation of person and property, and the navigation of public waters for that purpose, but also the purchase, sale, and exchange of commodities. Commonwealth v. Hogan, Mc-Morrow & Tleke Co. (Ky.) 74 S. W. 737, 738, 25 Ky. Law Rep. 41 (citing Robbins v. Shelby County Taxing Dist., 120 U. S. 489, 7 Sup. Ct. 592, 30 L. Ed. 694; O'Neil v. Vermont, 144 U. S. 223, 12 Sup. Ct. 693, 36 L. Ed. 450).

"Commerce," as used in the federal Constitution, is traffic; it is the act of buying and selling, and not the result of the act, not the thing bought, or the thing that stands in place of the thing sold—the price; the sale. It is true the liberal rule of construction makes "commerce" mean intercourse, and mean navigation, but the word has no such meaning by dictionaries, by the common law, or by common usage; and if this rule permits you to step beyond the meaning of the word thus defined to intercourse and to navigation, it may perhaps allow you to step to sales; but sales, if commerce at all, are not commerce with foreign nations or among the states. If commerce at all, they must be held to be internal commerce, a commerce that takes place entirely within the state. Padelford v. City of Savannah, 14 Ga. 438, 514.

"Commerce," within the provisions of the federal Constitution giving Congress the power to regulate commerce, etc., consists in intercourse and traffic, including in these terms navigation and the transportation and transit of persons and property, as well as the purchase, sale, and exchange of commodities; and an act regulating sale of goods made by convicts in other states violates such provision. Arnold v. Yanders, 47 N. E. 50, 51, 56 Ohio St. 417, 60 Am. St. Rep. 753.

"Commerce is the interchange or mutual change of goods, productions, or property of any kind between nations or individuals." City of Council Bluffs v. Kansas City, St. J. & C. B. R. Co., 45 Iowa, 338, 349, 24 Am. Rep. 773.

Commerce is intercourse. One of its most ordinary ingredients is traffic. Sale, being the object of importation, is an essential ingredient of that intercourse of which importation constitutes a part. Brown v. Maryland, 25 U. S. (12 Wheat.) 419, 446, 6 L. Ed. 678.

In the clause of the federal Constitution giving Congress power to regulate commerce, the word "commerce," whether with foreign nations, the several states, or with the Indian tribes, embraces all the transportation, purchase, sale, and exchange of all such commodities as are transported, bought, and sold by the usage of the commercial world. Gen. Laws Minn. 1889, c. 8, prohibiting the sale of meat unless inspected by state inspectors, is a regulation of commerce in violation of the commerce clause of the federal Constitution. In re Christian (Minn.) 39 Fed. 636, 637, note.

Floating of logs.

Neither a log nor any number of logs floating upon the surface of a stream, uncontrollable and uncontrollable, is navigation or commerce, and an act regulating the floating of logs upon a navigable stream is not a regulation of "commerce among the several states." Harrigan v. Connecticut River Lumber Co., 129 Mass. 580, 585, 37 Am. Rep. 387.

Freight and passenger traffic.

In his work on the Constitution, Judge Story asserts that the sense in which the word "commerce" is used in that instrument includes not only traffic, but intercourse and navigation; and in the Passenger Cases, 48 U. S. (7 How.) 416, 12 L. Ed. 702, it was said "commerce" consists in selling the superfluities in purchases, articles of necessity, as well productions as manufactures, in buying from one nation and selling to another, or in prospecting the merchandise from the seller to the buyer; nor does it make any difference whether this interchange of commodities is by land or by water, in either case the bringing of the goods from the seller to the buyer is commerce. Among the states it must have been principally by land when the Constitution was adopted. Hence a tax on freight brought into a state is a regulation of commerce. State Freight Tax Case, 82 U. S. (15 Wall.) 232, 275, 21 L. Ed. 146.

"Commerce," as used in Const. art. 1, § 8, empowering Congress to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several states, includes the transportation of property by a common carrier, including the rates to be charged therefor. State v. Chicago, St. P., M. & O. Ry. Co., 41 N. W. 1047, 40 Minn. 267, 3 L. R. A. 238, 12 Am. St. Rep. 739. Gibbons v. Ogden, 22 U. S. (9 Wheat.) 1, 190, 6 L. Ed. 23; In re State Freight Tax, 82 U. S. (15 Wall.) 232, 241, 21 L. Ed. 164; Lord v. Goodall S. S. Co., 102 U. S. 541, 544, 26 L. Ed. 224; Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. v. Illinois, 4 Sup. Ct. 4, 11, 118 U. S. 557, 30 L. Ed. 244; Philadelphia & S. M. S. S. Co. v. Pennsylvania, 7 Sup. Ct. 1118, 1123, 122 U. S. 326, 30 L. Ed. 1200; Fargo v. Michigan, 7 Sup. Ct. 857, 860, 121 U. S. 230, 30 L. Ed. 888; United States v. Joint Traffic Ass'n, 19 Sup. Ct. 25, 31, 171 U. S. 505, 43 L. Ed. 259; Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. v. Husen, 95 U. S. 465, 470, 24 L. Ed. 527; Kaelser v. Illinois Cent. R. Co. (U. S.) 18 Fed. 151, 153; Carton v. Illinois Cent. R. Co., 13 N. W. 67, 68, 59 Iowa, 148, 44 Am. Rep. 672; Hardy v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co., 5 Pac. 6, 9, 32 Kan. 698. "Commerce," as used in a clause of the federal Constitution, providing that Congress shall regulate commerce with foreign nations and between the several states, includes the transportation of merchandise from place to place by rail. Hardy v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co., 5 Pac. 6, 9, 32 Kan. 698. The term "commerce" includes transportation upon a railroad passing through more states than one, or from a point in one state to a point in another. Mobile & O. R. Co. v. Sessions (U. S.) 28 Fed. 592, 593.

The term "commerce" includes the transportation of property, and therefore a tax upon property in its transportation from state to state is a regulation of commerce.

2 Wds. & P.—19

Lehigh & W. Coal Co. v. Carrigan, 39 N. J. Law (10 Vroom) 35, 37.

"Commerce" includes all the negotiations and contracts which have for their object, or involve as an element, such transmission or passage from one state to another. In re Greene (U. S.) 52 Fed. 104, 113.

"Commerce," as used in the federal Constitution, includes within its scope and meaning interstate passenger travel, and the power vested in Congress to regulate commerce as applied to such travel is so far exclusive in its character that the state may not by any act of legislation impose burdens upon either the carrier or the passenger which would obstruct or hinder the free course of travel. Fry v. State, 63 Ind. 552, 562, 30 Am. Rep. 238.

"Commerce," as the term is used in the federal Constitution, vesting in Congress the right to regulate commerce between the states, with foreign nations, and Indian tribes, is limited to the transportation and means for the transportation of goods and personal property in general, but does not include the regulation of the carriage of passengers, since they are in no sense an object of commerce. City of New York v. Miln, 36 U. S. (11 Pet.) 102, 136, 9 L. Ed. 648.

A law which prescribes the terms and conditions on which alone vessels can discharge their passengers is a regulation of commerce, and, in case of vessels and passengers coming from foreign ports, it is a regulation of commerce with foreign nations. Henderson v. Wickham, 92 U. S. 259, 271, 23 L. Ed. 543.

"Commerce," says Chief Justice Marshall, "undoubtedly is traffic, but it is something more—it is intercourse. Transportation is essential to commerce, or, rather, it is commerce itself, and every obstacle, debt, or burden laid upon it by legislative authority is regulation." By Code, § 1967, imposing a penalty on railroad companies for the detention of freight more than five days after delivery or shipment, without the consent of the shipper, as regards freight to be shipped to another state, does not conflict with Const. U. S. art. 1, § 8, cl. 3, delegating the power to regulate interstate commerce to the federal government, since its enforcement would expedite and not obstruct interstate commerce. Bagg v. Wilmington, C. & A. R. Co., 14 S. E. 79, 80, 109 N. C. 279, 14 L. R. A. 596, 26 Am. St. Rep. 569.

"Commerce," as used in the clause of the federal Constitution giving Congress exclusive right to regulate interstate commerce, includes passengers traveling into or through a state, and hence a state statute imposing a tax upon persons passing through or beyond its territorial limits is unconstitutional. Crandall v. State of Nevada, 73 U. S. (6 Wall.) 35, 43, 18 L. Ed. 744, 745.

Immigration.

Commerce cannot be carried without the agency of persons, and a tax, the effect of which is to diminish personal intercourse, is necessarily a tax upon commerce, and the power exercised in imposing it may be so used as not only to diminish, but to destroy. If we acknowledge the power, no limitation can be affixed to its exercise, for the power to tax is a sovereign power, and, wherever it exists, may be exercised at the will and discretion of the sovereign. Immigration is an ingredient of intercourse and traffic, so that the power to regulate commerce includes the power to regulate immigration; hence a state statute attempting to do so is unconstitutional. Lin Sing v. Washburn, 20 Cal. 534, 570.

Act N. Y. Feb. 11, 1824, requiring the masters of all vessels arriving at the port of New York from any other state or foreign country to make written reports, within 24 hours after arrival, to the mayor, of the names, ages, places of birth, etc., of all passengers landed, and making such masters subject to a certain specified tax for failure to comply, is not a "regulation of commerce," but of police. "It is apparent, from the whole scope of the law, that the object of the Legislature was to prevent New York from being burdened by an influx of persons brought thither in ships, either from foreign countries or from any other of the states. The provisions in the Constitution declaring that Congress shall have power to regulate commerce of the foreign nations among the several states, etc., does not apply to persons. They are not the subject of commerce, and, not being imported goods, cannot fall within the train of reasoning founded on the construction of a power given to Congress to regulate commerce, and the prohibition of the states from imposing a duty on imported goods." City of New York v. Miln, 36 U. S. (11 Pet.) 102, 130, 9 L. Ed. 648.

Insurance.

It is only by a strained construction that the word "commerce" can be made to embrace the business of insurance, and to say that insurance is an article of commerce is a construction still more strained. It is an aid to commerce, but not commerce itself, nor is it an article of commerce. Queen Ins. Co. v. State, 24 S. W. 397, 401, 86 Tex. 250, 22 L. R. A. 483.

The term "commerce" cannot be applied to the business of insurance, as the contract of insurance is not an instrumentality of insurance. The making of such a contract is a mere incident of commercial intercourse, but in this respect there is no difference whatever between insurance against fire and insurance against the perils of the sea. Thus the constitutional provision giving Congress power to regulate interstate commerce does not prevent the state from prescribing conditions on which a foreign insurance company may do business in the state, or from enforcing such conditions. Hooper v. People of State of California, 15 Sup. Ct. 207, 209, 155 U. S. 648, 39 L. Ed. 297; Nutting v. Commonwealth of Massachusetts, 22 Sup. Ct. 238, 239, 183 U. S. 553, 46 L. Ed. 634.

"Commerce," as used in the United States Constitution, providing that Congress shall have power to regulate commerce in foreign states and among the several states, cannot be construed to include the issuing of a policy of insurance, though the parties be domiciled in different states, for it is a simple contract of indemnity against loss. List v. Commonwealth, 12 Atl. 277, 279, 118 Pa. 322; Paul v. Virginia, 75 U. S. (8 Wall.) 168, 185, 19 L. Ed. 357; State v. Phipps, 31 Pac. 1097, 50 Kan. 609, 18 L. R. A. 657, 34 Am. St. Rep. 152.

The business of marine insurance cannot be regarded as commerce, or an instrumentality thereof. Hooper v. People of State of California, 15 Sup. Ct. 207, 210, 211, 213, 155 U. S. 648, 39 L. Ed. 297.

Manufacture distinguished.

"Manufacture" and "commerce" are two distinct and very different things. The latter does not include the former. Buying and selling are elements of commerce, but something more is required to constitute commerce, which, strictly considered, consists in intercourse and traffic, including in its term navigation, and the transportation and transit of persons and property, as well as the purchase, sale, and exchange of commodities. United States v. E. C. Knight Co. (U. S.) 60 Fed. 934, 936.

Mr. Justice Lamar says, in Kidd v. Pearson, 9 Sup. Ct. 6, 128 U. S. 1, 32 L. Ed. 346, that manufacture is transformation—the fashioning of raw materials into a change of form for use. The functions of commerce are different. The buying and selling, and the transportation incident thereto, constitute commerce; and the regulating of commerce, in the constitutional sense, embraces the regulation, at least, of such transportation. If it be held that the term includes the regulation of all such manufactures as are intended to be the subject of commercial transactions in the future, it is impossible to deny that it will also include all productive industries that contemplate the same thing. The result would be that Congress would be invested, to the exclusion of the states, with the power to regulate, not only manufactures, but also agriculture, horticulture, stock raising, domestic fisheries, and mining; in short, every branch of human industry. The business of refining sugar is a manufacture, and not an operation of commerce, and therefore not within the commerce clause of the federal Constitution. United States v. E. C. Knight Co., 15 Sup. Ct. 249, 254, 156 U. S. 1, 39 L. Ed. 325.

Navigation.

"From the adoption of the Constitution, the universal sense has been that the word 'commerce,' as used in that instrument, is to be construed as a generic term, comprehending navigation, or that a control over navigation is necessarily incidental to the power to regulate commerce." The Wilson v. United States (U. S.) 30 Fed. Cas. 239, 243.

"Commerce" embraces transportation by land and water, and all the means and appliances necessarily employed in carrying it on. Cuban S. S. Co. v. Fitzpatrick (U. S.) 66 Fed. 63, 67; Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Fuller, 84 U. S. (17 Wall.) 560, 568, 21 L. Ed. 710; South Carolina v. Georgia, 93 U. S. 4, 10, 23 L. Ed. 782; Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. v. Husen, 95 U. S. 465, 470, 24 L. Ed. 527; Gloucester Ferry Co. v. Pennsylvania, 5 Sup. Ct. 826, 828, 114 U. S. 196, 29 L. Ed. 158; also Justice Miller's Lectures, p. 447; Pacific Coast S. S. Co. v. Board of Railroad Com'rs (U. S.) 18 Fed. 10, 11; Pollock v. Cleveland Shipbuilding Co., 47 N. E. 582, 584, 56 Ohio St. 655 (citing Sweatt v. Boston, H. & E. R. Co. [U. S.] 23 Fed. Cas. 530); North River Steamboat Co. v. Livingston (N. Y.) 3 Cow. 713, 742; Delaware & H. Canal Co. v. Lawrence (N. Y.) 2 Hun, 163, 179; Crow v. State, 14 Mo. 237, 296; Howell v. State (Md.) 3 Gill, 14, 18.

"The acts of the Legislature of New York, granting licenses for the exclusive navigation of all the waters within the jurisdiction of that state, with boats moved by fire or steam, for a term of years, are repugnant to that clause of the federal Constitution which gives to Congress the power of regulating commerce, inasmuch as these acts prohibit vessels licensed by the United States from carrying on trade in the said waters by means of fire or steam." "The subject to be regulated is commerce. If commerce does not include navigation, the government of the Union has no direct power over that subject, and can make no law prescribing what shall constitute American vessels, or requiring that they shall be navigated by American seamen. Yet this power has been exercised with the consent of all, and has been understood by all to be a commercial regulation. All America understands, and has uniformly understood, the word 'commerce' to comprehend navigation. The power of Congress, then, comprehends navigation within the limits of every state in the Union, so far as that navigation may be in any manner connected with 'commerce with foreign nations, or among the several states, or with the Indian tribes.' It may, of consequence, pass the jurisdictional line of New York, and act on the very waters to which the prohibition now under consideration applies. Steamboats may be enrolled and licensed in common with vessels using sails. They are, of course, entitled to the same privileges, and can no more be restrained from navigating the waters and entering ports which are free to such vessels than if they were wafted on their voyage by the winds instead of being propelled by the agency of fire. The one element may be as legitimately used as the other for every commercial purpose authorized by the laws of the Union, and the act of a state inhibiting the use of either to any vessel having a license under the act of Congress comes in direct collision with that act." Gibbons v. Ogden, 22 U. S. (9 Wheat.) 1, 14, 6 L. Ed. 23.

"Commerce," as used in the clause of the federal Constitution authorizing Congress to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several states, "comprehends navigation, and extends to every species of commercial intercourse between the states and foreign nations, and to all commerce in the several states, except such as is completely internal, and which does not extend to or affect other states." Webb v. Dunn, 18 Fla. 721, 724; State Tonnage Tax Cases, 79 U. S. (12 Wall.) 204, 214, 20 L. Ed. 370; Veazle v. Moor, 55 U. S. (14 How.) 568, 573, 14 L. Ed. 545.

"Commerce," as used in Const. U. S. art. 1, § 8, providing that Congress shall have a right to regulate commerce with foreign nations, etc., includes navigation, as well as "traffic" in its ordinary signification, and embraces ships and vessels as the instruments of intercourse and trade, as well as officers and seamen employed in their navigation. State Tonnage Tax Cases, 79 U. S. (12 Wall.) 204, 216, 20 L. Ed. 370; People v. Brooks (N. Y.) 4 Denio, 469, 476.

"Commerce includes navigation. The power to regulate commerce comprehends the control for that purpose, and to the extent necessary, of all the navigable waters of the United States which are accessible from a state other than those in which they lie. For this purpose they are the public property of the nation, and subject to all the requisite legislation by Congress. This necessarily includes the power to keep them open and free from obstruction as to their navigation interposed by the states or otherwise, to remove such obstruction when they exist, and to provide, by such sanctions as they may deem proper, against the occurrence of the evil, and the punishment of offenders. For these purposes, Congress possesses all the powers which existed in the states before the adoption of the national Constitution, and which have always existed in the Parliament of England." Gilman v. Philadelphia.

70 U. S. (3 Wall.) 713, 724, 18 L. Ed. 96. It has therefore the power to determine what shall or shall not be deemed, in judgment of law, an obstruction to navigation. Pennsylvania v. Wheeling & B. Bridge Co., 59 U. S. (18 How.) 421, 431, 15 L. Ed. 435.

The term "commerce," as used in the federal Constitution, giving Congress the right to regulate commerce, etc., embraces navigation, and "the improvement of harbors and bays along our coast, and of navigable rivers within the states connecting with them, falls within the power." Mobile County v. Kimball, 102 U. S. 691, 697, 26 L. Ed. 238.

"Commerce," as used in the United States Constitution, giving Congress power to regulate commerce, embraces navigation. So that the jurisdiction of the United States over the navigable waters is paramount to the title of the state to the land under the water. Jencks v. Miller, 40 N. Y. Supp. 1088, 1089, 17 Misc. Rep. 461.

The title which the state has to land lying beneath its public navigable rivers is held subject to a high public trust to forever preserve them as public highways, and is subject to the power given Congress under Const. art. 1, § 8, to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the states; and, where this title is passed by local laws to riparian owners, they take it subject to the same trust and to the same power; and such right to regulate commerce involves the right to regulate navigation, which, in turn, involves the use of submerged lands, in so far as such use is essential to the maintenance of the public highway; and the title of the riparian owners is subject to the right of Congress to occupy such submerged lands, without compensation, for the erection of structures in aid of commerce between the states. Scranton v. Wheeler (U. S.) 57 Fed. 803, 813, 6 C. C. A. 585.

While commerce between the states may not be interfered with by taxation or other interruption, its instruments and vehicles may be. Thus a tax upon the use of the public waters of the country, such as a license fee for navigating such waters, or a charge for port wardens, whether any services were performed or not, is a restraint of commerce, while the tax upon a vessel lying at a wharf is not. Morgan v. Parham, 83 U. S. (16 Wall.) 471, 475, 21 L. Ed. 303.

"Shipbuilding, the carrying trade, and protection of seamen are such vital agents of commercial prosperity that the nation which could not legislate over these subjects would not possess power to regulate commerce." The power of Congress to regulate commerce is exclusive when exercised, and an act of Congress authorizing mortgages of vessels to be made and recorded, and making the record thereof notice to third parties, is valid, though in conflict with the statute of frauds of the state in which the mortgage is recorded. Mitchell v. Steelman, 8 Cal. 363, 372.

In 1789 Congress had passed a law declaring that all pilots should continue to be regulated in conformity with the laws of the states respectively wherein they should be. Hence each state continued to administer its own laws, or passed new laws, for the regulation of pilots in its harbors. Pennsylvania passed the law then in question in 1803. Yet the Supreme Court held that this was clearly a regulation of commerce, and that the state laws could not be upheld without supposing that, in cases like that of pilotage, not requiring a national and uniform regulation, the power of the states to make regulations of commerce, in the absence of congressional regulation, still remained. The court held that the power did so remain, subject to those qualifications, and the state law was sustained under that view. Ex parte Siebold, 100 U. S. 371, 385, 25 L. Ed. 717.

Commerce includes the business of ferrying across a navigable stream which is between two states, and hence the business of maintaining such ferry could not be taxed under the laws of the state on the ground that its business was largely transacted within the state. Gloucester Ferry Co. v. Pennsylvania, 114 U. S. 196, 5 Sup. Ct. 826, 29 L. Ed. 158; Commonwealth v. Gloucester Ferry Co., 98 Pa. 105, 120; United States v. Burlington & H. County Ferry Co. (U. S.) 21 Fed. 331, 333.

The term "commerce," within the meaning of the rule that in order to authorize salvage there must be a service rendered to a vessel, etc., engaged in commerce or navigation, does not apply to a dismantled steamboat which has been fitted up as a saloon and hotel, and therefore salvage cannot be recovered for services in assisting the boat from the shore, where she had grounded while she was being towed from one place to another. The Hendrick Hudson (U. S.) 11 Fed. Cas. 1085, 1086.

"An act of Illinois declaring it to be a nuisance for the owner or owners of any boat or locomotive engine to permit dense smoke to issue or be emitted from the smokestack of any such boat or engine, and fixing a penalty therefor, is not in conflict with that clause of the Constitution which gives to Congress the power to regulate commerce. Tugboats are, in a limited sense, engaged in commerce among the states, and perhaps with foreign nations; but this ordinance does not impose any restraint on the use of such vessels, although engaged in general commerce. At most, it purports only to regulate their use in such a manner as may not produce effects detrimental to property and business. * * * Controlling the use of tugboats in towing in and out vessels to and from the harbor is in no sense in conflict with the power existing in Congress to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several states. That is very far from an attempt to regulate commerce. * * * It is in no sense imposing any restraint upon commerce, nor does it in any manner conflict with the power of Congress under what is called the 'commerce clause,' of the Constitution of the United States." Harmon v. City of Chicago, 110 Ill. 400, 405, 51 Am. Rep. 698.

The power given to Congress to regulate commerce, which comprehends the control, to the extent necessary, of all navigable rivers, and Act Cong. March 3, 1899, c. 425, § 15, 30 Stat. 1152 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3543], providing that it shall not be lawful to anchor vessels in navigable channels so as to obstruct the passage of other vessels, implies that navigation shall not be hindered or interfered with by obstruction in such a manner as to prevent its safe accomplishment. The Northern Queen (U. S.) 117 Fed. 906, 915.

The power to regulate commerce, given to Congress by the Constitution, has a most extensive application. With regard to commerce, it has been held expressly that it is not confined to commercial transactions but extends to seamen, ships, navigation, and facilities for commerce. Under this power the navigation of rivers has been opened and improved, and the act of Congress of June 16, 1886, authorizing the Staten Island Rapid Transit Company and the Baltimore & New York Railroad Company to construct and maintain a bridge across the Staten Island Sound known as the "Arthur Kill," and establish the same as a post road, is within the power to regulate commerce. Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Baltimore & N. Y. R. Co. (U. S.) 87 Fed. 129.

"Commerce," as used in Const. U. S. art. 1, § 8, providing that Congress shall have power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several states, includes the regulation of intercourse and navigation, and consequently the power to determine what shall or shall not be deemed, in the judgment of law, an obstruction of navigation. South Carolina v. Georgia, 93 U. S. 4, 13, 23 L. Ed. 782.

"Commerce," as employed in the Constitution, where Congress is given the control of commerce, does not mean merely buying and selling and the exchange of commodities, but it includes navigation, and the uses and purposes of it. City of New York v. Miln, 36 U. S. (11 Pet.) 102, 117, 9 L. Ed. 648.

Undoubtedly a state, in conferring rights on a river dividing it from another state, might pass laws so infringing the commercial power of the nation that it would be the duty of the federal courts to annul or control them; but the function is one of delicacy, and should only be performed where the infraction is clear; and the mere establishment and regulation of such ferries is not included in the power of the federal government to regulate commerce among the several states. The authority to regulate ferries is undoubtedly part of an immense mass of undelegated powers reserved to the states respectively. Conway v. Taylor, 66 U. S. (1 Black) 603, 604, 17 L. Ed. 191.

Passenger agent.

Pomeroy, in his work on Constitutional Law, § 378, referring to the signification of the word "commerce," said "it includes the fact of intercourse and of traffic, and the subject-matter of intercourse and traffic. The fact of intercourse and traffic again embraces all the means, instruments, and places by and in which intercourse and traffic are carried on; and, further still, comprehends the act of carrying them on at these places, and by and with these means. The subject-matter of intercourse or traffic may be either things, goods, chattels, merchandise, or persons." Thus a license tax on an agent who solicits passenger traffic for a railroad in another state is a regulation of commerce among the states. McCall v. California, 10 Sup. Ct. 881, 882, 136 U. S. 104, 34 L. Ed. 392.

Railroad and cars.

"Commerce," as used in the clause of the federal Constitution giving Congress the right to regulate commerce, includes navigation and commercial intercourse, and railroads transporting freight and passengers may be regulated under this provision. Sweatt v. Boston, H. & E. R. R. Co. (U. S.) 23 Fed. Cas. 530, 533.

"Commerce" consists, among other things, of the transportation of commodities, and if such transportation be between states it is "interstate commerce." A combination of competing railroads engaged in interstate traffic into a joint traffic association for the purpose of maintaining reasonable and just rates, fares, rules, and regulations, to prevent unjust discrimination, etc., is held to be in restraint of interstate commerce within the meaning of the anti-trust statute. United States v. Joint Traffic Ass'n, 19 Sup. Ct. 25, 31, 171 U. S. 505, 43 L. Ed. 259.

The term "commerce" may be correctly applied to the use of Pullman cars in receiving and delivering travelers at points widely separated. Pullman Southern Car Co. v. Nolan (U. S.) 22 Fed. 276, 279; United States v. Cassidy (U. S.) 67 Fed. 698, 705.

The provision of section 4578 of the Code, making it a misdemeanor to run a freight train upon any railroad in the state on the Sabbath day, is a regulation of internal police, and not a regulation of commerce, even as to freight trains passing through the state from and to adjacent states, and laden exclusively with goods and freights received on board before the trains entered the state, and consigned to points beyond its limits. Hennington v. State, 17 S. E. 1009, 1011, 90 Ga. 396.

It is not a "regulation of commerce" within Const. art. 1, § 8, conferring the right to regulate commerce among the states on Congress, for a state to require locomotive engineers to be examined and licensed by a board appointed by the Governor, even when it applies to the case of an engineer operating a locomotive attached to a passenger and express train running from a point in that state to points in other states. Smith v. Alabama, 8 Sup. Ct. 564, 566, 124 U. S. 465, 31 L. Ed. 508.

Sale of liquors.

"Code Iowa 1873, § 1553, which forbids any common carrier to bring within the state any intoxicating liquors from any other state or territory of the United States without first having been furnished with a certificate, under the seal of the county auditor, to the county to which said liquor is to be transported or is consigned for transportation, certifying that the consignee or person to whom said liquor is to be transported is authorized to sell intoxicating liquors in such county, is void, as acting against section 8, art. 1, of the Constitution, which gives the power to regulate commerce to Congress. It is an attempt to exert jurisdiction over persons and property within the limits of other states. * * * It is not one of those local regulations designed to aid and facilitate commerce; it is not an inspection law to secure the due quality and measure of a commodity; * * * it is not a regulation confined to the purely internal and domestic commerce of the state. It is * * * a regulation affecting interstate commerce in an essential and vital point. * * * It is therefore a regulation of that character which constitutes an unauthorized interference with the power given to Congress over the subject. * * * The power to regulate or forbid the sale of a commodity after it has been brought into the state does not carry with it the right and power to prevent its introduction by transportation from another state." Bowman v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co., 8 Sup. Ct. 689, 125 U. S. 465, 31 L. Ed. 700.

The exclusive power to regulate commerce has reference to burdens or restraints imposed directly on the articles themselves, and not upon the materials of which they are composed, nor upon the vehicles of commerce. Hence a law regulating the sale of liquor within the state is not in violation of the constitutional provision. McGuire v. State, 42 Ohio St. 530, 534.

"The term 'commerce,' in the clause of the federal Constitution which gives Congress power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several states, and with the Indian tribes, extends to all lawful commerce with foreign nations, and in the same terms to all lawful commerce among the states; and 'among' means between two only, as well as among more than two. If it was otherwise, then an intermediate state might interdict and obstruct the transportation of imports over it to a third state, and thereby impair the general power." Thus, trading in ardent spirits falls within the provision of the Constitution, as they have been for ages, and now are, subjects of sale and of lawful commerce, and that of a large class throughout a great portion of the civilized world. License Cases, 46 U. S. (5 How.) 504, 599, 12 L. Ed. 256.

Telegrams.

"Commerce," as used in the federal Constitution, giving Congress the exclusive power to regulate interstate commerce, means trade in articles of property. Telegrams or correspondence by any other method, although between citizens of different states, though they may relate to commercial transactions, are not commerce. Western Union Tel. Co. v. Mayer, 28 Ohio St. 521, 531.

Telegraph and telephone.

The Supreme Court of the United States, by one of its ablest members, has given a plain and comprehensive exposition of the term "commerce," less general than the word "intercourse," used without qualification, but sufficient to include all the ramifications of commerce. Says Marshall, C. J.: "It describes the commercial intercourse between nations and parts of nations in all of its branches, and is regulated by prescribing rules for carrying on that intercourse." The telegraph constitutes a branch of commercial intercourse. "So interwoven has the custom of communication by telegraph become with trade and traffic, that to separate itself without serious disturbance of vast trade relations and financial transactions would be a task as difficult as to cut the pound of flesh without a drop of blood." Western Union Tel. Co. v. Atlantic & Pacific States Tel. Co., 5 Nev. 102, 108.

As used in the clause of the federal Constitution giving Congress the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, between the states, and with Indian tribes, "commerce," is not confined to the instrumentalities of commerce in use when the Constitution was adopted. They keep pace with the progress of the country, and adapt themselves to the new developments of time and circumstances. They extend from the horse with its rider to the stagecoach, from the sailing vessel to the steamboat, from the coach and steamboat to the railroad, and from the railroad to the telegraph. As these new agencies are successfully brought into use to meet the demands of increasing population and wealth, they were intended for the government of the business to which they relate, at all times and under all circumstances. Pensacola Telegraph Co. v. Western Union Telegraph Co., 96 U. S. 1, 9, 24 L. Ed. 708.

"Commerce," as used in the Constitution of the United States, providing that Congress shall have power to regulate commerce among the several states, includes the foreign and interstate business of telegraph companies. "A telegraph company occupies the same relation to commerce as a carrier of messages that a railroad company does as a carrier of goods. Both companies are instruments of commerce, and their business is commerce itself." Western Union Tel. Co. v. Texas, 105 U. S. 460, 464, 26 L. Ed. 1087; Leloup v. Port of Mobile, 8 Sup. Ct. 1380, 1382, 127 U. S. 640, 32 L. Ed. 311; State v. Indiana & I. S. R. Co., 32 N. E. 817, 821, 133 Ind. 69, 18 L. R. A. 502.

Though intercourse by telegraphic messages between the states is held to be interstate commerce, it differs in material particulars from that portion of commerce with foreign countries and between the states which consists in the carriage of persons and the transportation of commodities. It differs not only in the subjects which it transmits, but in the means of transmission. Other commerce deals only with persons, or with visible and tangible things, but the telegraph transports nothing visible or tangible; it carries only ideas, wishes, orders, and intelligence. Other commerce requires the constant attention of the carrier for the safety of the person and property carried; the message of the telegraph passes at once beyond the control of the sender, and reaches the office to which it is sent almost instantaneously. It is plain that the regulations necessary for one of these kinds of commerce will be entirely inapplicable to the other. Western Union Tel. Co. v. Pendleton, 7 Sup. Ct. 1126, 1127, 122 U. S. 347, 30 L. Ed. 1187.

"Commerce," as used in the clause of the federal Constitution giving Congress control over interstate commerce, includes telephone communication between places in separate states, and therefore cannot be prohibited or regulated by injunction in either state because the operatives do not pay state taxes. In re Pennsylvania Tel. Co., 20 Atl. 846, 48 N. J. Eq. (3 Dick.) 91, 27 Am. St. Rep. 462.

Trade distinguished.

The words "trade" and "commerce" are said by Jacobs in his Law Dictionary not to be synonymous; that commerce relates to dealings with foreign nations, and trade, on the contrary, means mutual traffic among ourselves, or the buying, selling, or exchanging articles between members of the same community. Where the owners of five separate and powerful lines of boats operating on the public canals enter into a combination to establish and maintain rates of freight, and equalize the business among themselves and thereby prevent competition, the transaction amounts to a conspiracy to commit an act injurious to trade or commerce. Hooker v. Vandewater (N. Y.) 4 Denio, 349, 353, 47 Am. Dec. 258. See, also, People v. Fisher (N. Y.) 14 Wend. 9, 15, 28 Am. Dec. 501.

"Commerce," as used in Act July 2, 1890, c. 647, § 1, 26 Stat. 209 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3200], declaring illegal every contract or combination in the form of a trust or otherwise in restraint of trade or commerce among the states or with foreign nations, is not synonymous with "trade" as used in the common-law phrase "restraint of trade," but is the meaning of that word in that clause of the Constitution which grants to Congress the power to regulate interstate and foreign commerce. United States v. Debs (U. S.) 64 Fed. 724, 749. It has in such act a broader meaning than the word "trade," which has been defined as the exchange of commodities for other commodities or for money; the business of buying and selling; dealing by way of sale or exchange. Pullman cars in use upon the railroads are instrumentalities of commerce. United States v. Cassidy (U. S.) 67 Fed. 698, 705.

In the Statutes of the United States of 1890, c. 647, making it a misdemeanor for any person to engage in combinations with others to monopolize any part of the trade or commerce among the several states or with foreign nations, the words "trade" and "commerce" are synonymous. The word "commerce" is undoubtedly, in its usual sense, a larger word than "trade" in its usual sense. Sometimes "commerce" is used to embrace less than "trade," and sometimes "trade" is used to embrace as much as "commerce." United States v. Patterson (U. S.) 55 Fed. 605, 639.

"Commerce," as used in the Constitution, has a broader meaning than the word "trade." Commerce among the states consists of intercourse and traffic between their citizens, and includes the transportation of persons and property, and the navigation of public waters for that purpose, as well as the purchase, sale, and exchange of commodities. Such commerce cannot stop at the external boundary line of each state, but may be introduced into the interior. Thus a combination of coal dealers who regulate the price arbitrarily and provide against competition is one in restraint of commerce. United States v. Coal Dealers' Ass'n (U. S.) 85 Fed. 252, 265.

Commerce consists of intercourse and traffic between the citizens or inhabitants of different states, and includes not only the transportation of persons and property, and the navigation of public waters for that purpose, but also the purchase, sale, and exchange of commodities; and any agreement or combination which directly operates, not only upon the manufacture, but upon the sale, transportation, and delivery of an article of interstate commerce, by preventing or restricting its sale, etc., thereby regulates interstate commerce to that extent, and to the same extent trenches upon the power of Congress, and violates the anti-trust act of Congress passed July 2, 1890, c. 647, 26 Stat. 209 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3200], in so far as it applies to sales for delivery beyond the state in which the sale is made. Such a contract was that of the Addyston Pipe & Steel Company and other manufacturers of iron pipe, fixing the amount of the output and prices, and apportioning the territory each manufacturer should supply. Addyston Pipe & Steel Co. v. United States, 20 Sup. Ct. 96, 107, 175 U. S. 211, 44 L. Ed. 136.

Transactions between individuals.

By its universal signification when applied to governmental polity, "commerce" can mean nothing less than commercial intercourse carried on between states or governments. Without a palpable perversion of the term, it cannot be held applicable to ordinary business transactions occurring between individuals. Hicks v. Ewhartsonah, 21 Ark. 106, 107.

Water supply.

"Commerce," as used in Act April 14, 1853, as amended by Act April 30, 1855, authorizing the formation of corporations for the purpose of engaging in any "species of trade or commerce," foreign or domestic, includes a corporation organized for the purpose of furnishing a city with water. People v. Blake, 19 Cal. 579, 694.

COMMERCE AMONG STATES.

See "Commerce"; "Interstate Commerce"; "Regulate Commerce."

COMMERCE WITH FOREIGN NATIONS.

"Commerce with foreign nations," as used in Const. U. S. art. 1, § 8, providing that Congress shall have power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, means commerce between the citizens of the United States and the citizens or subjects of foreign governments. It means trade and commercial intercourse between nations and parts of nations, in all its branches, and includes intercourse as the principal means by which foreign intercourse is effected; and to "regulate" this trade and intercourse is to prescribe the rules by which it shall be conducted. Henderson v. Wickham, 92 U. S. 259, 270, 23 L. Ed. 543; United States v. Steffens, 100 U. S. 82, 96, 25 L. Ed. 550.

"Commerce with foreign nations," as used in Const. U. S. art. 1, § 8, providing that Congress shall have power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, means commerce between the citizens of the United States and the citizens or subjects of foreign governments as individuals. United States v. Holliday, 70 U. S. (3 Wall.) 407, 409, 417, 18 L. Ed. 182.

"Commerce with foreign nations," as used in the commerce clause of the federal Constitution, is limited to commerce which, either immediately or at some stage of its progress, is extraterritorial. The phrase can never be applied to transactions between citizens of the same state, nor can it properly be concluded that, because products of domestic enterprise may ultimately become subjects of foreign commerce, the control of the means or the engagements by which such enterprise is fostered and protected is legitimately within the import of the phrase "foreign commerce," or fairly implied in any investiture of the power to regulate such commerce. Veazie v. Moor, 55 U. S. (14 How.) 568, 573, 14 L. Ed. 545.

"Commerce with foreign nations," within the meaning of the clause of the federal Constitution giving Congress exclusive power to regulate such commerce, "must signify commerce which in some sense is necessarily connected with these nations; transactions which, either immediately or at some stage of their progress, must be extraterritorial. The phrase can never be applied to transactions wholly internal between citizens of the same community, or to a polity and laws whose ends and purposes and operations are restricted to the territory and soil and jurisdiction of such community. Nor can it be properly concluded that, because the products of domestic enterprise in agriculture or manufactures or in the arts may ultimately become the subjects of foreign commerce, the control of the means or the encouragements by which enterprise is fostered and protected is legitimately within the import of the phrase 'foreign commerce,' or fairly implied in any investiture of the power to regulate such commerce." The clause does not preclude a state from granting the exclusive right to navigate a river wholly within the state, the lower portion of which is not navigable, and the upper portion only subject to imperfect navigation. Veazie v. Moore, 55 U. S. (14 How.) 568, 573, 14 L. Ed. 545; Winder v. Caldwell, 55 U. S. (14 How.) 434, 444, 14 L. Ed. 487; Lord v. Goodall Steamship Co., 102 U. S. 541, 544, 26 L. Ed. 224.

"Commerce with foreign nations" signifies transactions which, either immediately or at some stage of their progress, is extraterritorial, and when vessels on a voyage between ports of the same state are required to navigate the ocean they are not engaged in purely domestic commerce, and when they go beyond the marine limit they pass from under the jurisdiction of the state and come under the exclusive control of Congress; and, to bring transportation within the control of the state as a part of its domestic commerce, the subject transported must be within the exclusive jurisdiction of the state during the entire voyage. Lord v. Goodall Steamship Co., 102 U. S. 541, 544, 26 L. Ed. 224.

COMMERCE WITH INDIAN TRIBES.

The Constitution is an instrument of enumeration, and not of definition, and, in order to ascertain the extent of the power conferred on Congress "to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several states and with the Indian tribes," it becomes necessary to determine the meaning of words. The words being general, so the sense must be general, and embrace all subjects comprehended under them, unless there be some limit in the nature of the power itself, or a repugnance to some other parts of the Constitution. "Commerce" is traffic, but it is more: it is intercourse between nations, in relation to foreign nations, and intercommunication by the coast trade among the states. The main object was the government of navigation and intercourse by this means. In the phrase "commerce among the several states," the word "among" means "intermingled with." Commerce among the states cannot stop at the external boundary of each, but must be introduced into the interior. It means commerce which concerns more states than one, not mere internal regulation and traffic. This being the admitted meaning of the sentence in its application to foreign nations and the states, it must carry the same meaning throughout the sentence. Gibbons v. Ogden, 22 U. S. (9 Wheat.) 1, 194, 6 L. Ed. 23; 2 Story's Comm. 510. Therefore, as to the Indian tribes, it includes intercourse and traffic, that interests more than one, in which the United States and the Indians are both concerned. State v. Foreman, 16 Tenn. (8 Yerg.) 256, 316.

Commerce relates to trade. Intercourse may be carried on without trade. Commerce, therefore, includes no intercourse but that which consists in trade or traffic, and certainly does not include jurisdiction. In conferring upon Congress the power to regulate commerce with the Indian tribes, the states had no more intention to surrender their sovereignty over those tribes than they had to divest foreign nations of jurisdiction within their own territories by placing in the hands of the federal government the power to regulate commerce with them, and an offense committed in the Indian territory, to which the Indian title has not been extinguished, but over which territory the jurisdiction of the state courts has been extended, is properly cognizable in the courts of the state. Caldwell v. State (Ala.) 1 Stew. & P. 327, 430.

"Commerce with the Indian tribes," as used in Const. U. S. art. 1, § 8, providing that Congress shall have power to regulate commerce with the Indian tribes, means commerce with the individuals composing the Indian tribes, and relates to buying and selling and exchanging commodities, which is the essence of all commerce; and hence, if traffic or intercourse is carried on with the Indian tribe or with a member of such tribe, it is a subject to be regulated by Congress, though within the limits of a state. The locality of the traffic can have nothing to do with the power. The right to exercise the power is absolute, without reference to the locality of the traffic, or locality of the tribe, or of the member of the tribe with whom it is carried on. United States v. Holliday, 70 U. S. (3 Wall.) 407, 409, 417, 18 L. Ed. 182.

The power to regulate commerce with the Indian tribes which is given to Congress by the federal Constitution does not necessarily cease on their being included within the limits of the state. United States v. Ciska (U. S.) 25 Fed. Cas. 422, 424.

The power to regulate commerce with the Indian tribes, as given to Congress by the federal Constitution, does not authorize Congress to pass laws for the punishment of crimes having no relation to the Indians, which are committed on the Indian territory situated within a state. United States v. Bailey (U. S.) 24 Fed. Cas. 937, 938.

COMMERCIAL.

"Commercial," as used in a rule that, in fixing the classification of goods for the payment of duties, the name or designation thereof is to be understood in its known commercial sense, is to be understood in its comprehensive sense of buying, selling, and exchange in the general sales or traffic of our own markets. Zante Currants (U. S.) 73 Fed. 183, 189 (citing Earnshaw v. Cadwalader, 145 U. S. 247, 258, 12 Sup. Ct. 851, 36 L. Ed. 693).

When a term is spoken of in reference to its meaning in a "commercial sense," not merely the sense among merchants, but among buyers and sellers generally in the domestic trade, is meant. United States v. Breed (U. S.) 24 Fed. Cas. 1222, 1223.

COMMERCIAL AGENCY.

See "Special Mercantile Agency."
See, also, "Mercantile Agency."

A "commercial agency" is the same thing as a mercantile agency. Between the words "commercial" and "mercantile," as adjectives qualifying the noun "agency," there is no material distinction, and the adoption of the name of the "United States Commercial Agency" was an infringement on the name of the "United States Mercantile Agency." In re United States Mercantile Reporting & Collection Co., 4 N. Y. Supp. 916, 917, 52 Hun, 611.

Mercantile commercial agencies are establishments which make a business of collecting information relating to the credit, character, responsibility, general reputation, and other matters affecting persons, firms, and corporations engaged in business, for the purpose of furnishing this information to its customers for a cash consideration. These agencies have become recognized and permanent adjuncts to the world of trade. Their rise and progress are of but recent date. The mercantile and commercial agencies were originally established for the purpose of reporting the credit of buyers. Later there have been established what are termed "special agencies," which confine themselves to reporting a particular business, such as furniture, stationery, jewelry, and hardware. The United States and Canada are divided into districts, each district reporting its territory, but there is a daily interchange of information between the districts. Correspondents are usually selected residing in the several towns and cities, whose special business is to collect information relating to the resident business firms of their respective places. The agency is the agent of the merchant or subscriber. These agencies are not instruments of commerce, though as necessary to modern commerce as railroads and telegraphs, without which the free interchange of commerce would be hindered and delayed, so as to bring them within the exclusive regulation of commerce and free from state control. Information or intelligence is not an article of "commerce" in any proper meaning of that word. Neither are they subjects of trade and barter, offered in the market as something having an existence and value independent of the parties to them. Neither are they commodities to be shipped or forwarded from one state to another, and there put up for sale. The information furnished by mercantile agencies to subscribers of their rating books is like other personal contracts between parties; it is individual in its character, and has no relation to the general public. The mercantile agency is not a common carrier. It is no intermediate instrument to disseminate its information, but it is a collector, storer, and holder of it, to be given directly to those who wish to purchase or pay for it. The business as conducted by mercantile agencies may be an adjunct of commerce and of commercial transactions, but it is a separate and distinct appliance, and does not come within the principles of law which govern or regulate either of them. State v. Morgan, 48 N. W. 314, 321, 2 S. D. 32.

Commercial agencies are agencies whose business it is to collect information as to the circumstances, means, and pecuniary ability of merchants and dealers throughout the country, and keep accounts thereof, so that the subscriber to the agency, when applied to by a customer to sell goods to him on credit, by referring to the agency or to the lists which it publishes, may ascertain the standing and responsibility of the customer to whom it is proposed to extend credit. Eaton, Cole & Burnham Co. v. Avery, 83 N. Y. 31, 34, 38 Am. Rep. 389; Genesee Sav. Bank v. Michigan Barge Co., 17 N. W. 790, 793, 52 Mich. 164.

COMMERCIAL AGENT OR BROKER.

See "Sale by Commercial Broker."

In the revenue statutes a "commercial broker" is defined to be one who negotiates the sale of merchandise without possession or control of it, as commission merchants have in their business. A person who solicits orders by samples solely for nonresident merchants, and whose employment is confined exclusively to the negotiation of sale of goods which are not in the state, is a broker. Adkins v. City of Richmond, 34 S. E. 967, 968, 98 Va. 91, 47 L. R. A. 583, 81 Am. St. Rep. 705.

"Commercial agent," within the meaning of a statute providing that every person whose business it is, as agent, to offer for sale goods, wares, or merchandise by samples, catalogue, or otherwise, shall be regarded as commercial agents, only includes persons offering goods for sale, whether the offer is made by samples or by catalogues or otherwise, and has no reference to those who sell and deliver the goods at the time of the sale. In re Willson, 19 D. C. 341, 349, 12 L. R. A. 624.

Acts 1881-82, in reference to licensing commercial brokers, declares "that every person who negotiates the sale of merchandise after having possession or control of it as commission merchants, shall be deemed a commercial broker." Henderson v. Commonwealth, 78 Va. 488, 489.

Diplomatic officer.

"Consul general," "consul," and "commercial agent," as used in the title relating to diplomatic and consular officers, shall be deemed to denote full, principal, and permanent consular officers, as distinguished from subordinates and substitutes. U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1149.

COMMERCIAL CORPORATIONS.

Within Bankr. Act 1867, § 37, providing that the provision of the act shall apply to moneyed business and commercial corporations, railroad corporations are commercial corporations. Sweatt v. Boston, H. & E. R. Co. (U. S.) 23 Fed. Cas. 530, 535.

COMMERCIAL DOMICILE.

A commercial domicile is a domicile which is acquired by the maintenance of a commercial establishment. The residence of the person holding such domicile is immaterial to its existence. United States v. Chin Quong Look (U. S.) 52 Fed. 203, 204.

"Commercial domicile" is the domicile which the citizen of a foreign country may acquire by the conduct of a business in a different country. "By general international law, foreigners who have become domiciled in a country other than their own acquire rights and must discharge duties in many respects the same as possessed by and imposed upon the citizens of that country, and no restriction on the footing on which such person stands by reason of his domicile of choice or commercial domicile is to be presumed." Lau Ow Bew v. United States, 12 Sup. Ct. 517, 521, 144 U. S. 47, 36 L. Ed. 340.

COMMERCIAL FERTILIZERS OR MANURES.

The term "commercial fertilizer," as used in the act relating thereto, shall be taken to mean any and every substance imported, manufactured, prepared, or sold for fertilizing or manurial purposes, except barnyard manure, marl, lime, wood ashes, and plastering. Horner's Rev. St. Ind. 1901, § 4899.

The words "commercial manures, artificially manufactured or manipulated fertilizers," shall be taken and construed to include all manures and fertilizers which shall be sold for a greater price than one cent per pound. Pub. Gen. Laws Md. 1888, p. 972, art. 61, § 7.

The term "commercial fertilizers," as used in an act regulating the sale of fertilizers, shall be taken to mean any or every substance imported, manufactured, prepared, or sold for fertilizing or manuring purposes, except barnyard manure, marl, lime, and wood ashes. P. & L. Dig. Laws Pa. 1894, vol. 1, col. 2092, § 6.

The term "commercial fertilizer" shall mean compounds and manufactured substances containing, or represented as containing, two or more of the following ingredients, namely, nitrogen, ammonia, potash, and phosphoric acid, but shall not apply to the separate ingredients used to manufacture the same, or to bone meal, land plaster, lime, or any substance, the product of nature, which has not been compounded. V. S. 1894, 4346.

The words "commercial manures, artificially manufactured, or manipulated fertilizers," shall be taken and construed to include all manures and fertilizers which shall be sold for a greater price than three-fourths of one cent per pound. Code Va. 1887, § 1894.

COMMERCIAL INDORSEMENT.

The words "transferred, and its collection guaranteed," indorsed on the back of a negotiable note, is not in any sense a commercial indorsement of the note, but only constitutes a transfer and a guaranty of payment. Omaha Nat. Bank v. Walker (U. S.) 5 Fed. 399, 402.

COMMERCIAL INSURANCE.

"Commercial insurance" is defined as having reference to indemnity agreements, issued in the form of insurance bonds or policies, whereby parties to commercial contracts are to a designated extent guaranteed against loss by reason of a breach of contractual obligations on the part of the other contracting party. To this class belong policies of contract credit and title insurance. Cowles v. United States Fidelity & Guaranty Co., 72 Pac. 1032, 1033, 32 Wash. 120.

COMMERCIAL LAW.

See "Law Merchant."

"Commercial law" is that branch of the law which comprises and includes rules established for the government of commercial transactions. The general commercial law is not circumscribed within local limits, nor committed for its administration to any particular jurisdiction, and, the Constitution and laws of the United States having conferred on the citizens of the several states and on aliens the privilege of enforcing their rights acquired under and defined by that general commercial law before the judicial tribunals of the United States, it must follow by regular consequence that any state law or regulation, the effect of which would be to impair the rights thus secured, or to divest the federal courts of jurisdiction thereof, would be nugatory and unavailing. Watson v. Tarpley, 59 U. S. (18 How.) 517, 521, 15 L. Ed. 509.

"Commercial law" is a phrase employed to denote that branch of the law which relates to the rights of property and the relation of persons engaged in commerce. Persons engaged in commercial adventures, wherever they may have their domicile, have business relations throughout the civilized world, from which it results that commercial law is less local and more international than any other system of law except the law of nations. R. R. Co. v. Nat. Bank, 102 U. S. 14, 55; Williams v. Gold Hill Min. Co. (U. S.) 96 Fed. 454, 464. Thus the decision of the Supreme Court of California, holding that judgment creditors of a mining corporation may question the validity of a mortgage given by the corporation on the ground that it was not ratified by the stockholders as required by the state statute, does not relate to any question of commercial law. Williams v. Gold Hill Min. Co. (U. S.) 96 Fed. 454, 464.

"Law" is defined as a rule prescribed by the sovereign power, and incidentally it is said there is no such thing as a general commercial or general common law separate from and irrespective of a particular state or government whose authority makes it law. By whom, says the court, is a general commercial law prescribed, and what tribunal has authority or recognition to declare or enforce it outside of the local jurisdiction of the government it represents? Even the law of nations, the widest reaching of all, is a law only in name. The so-called "commercial law" is likewise only a name. Upon many questions arising in the business dealings of men, the laws of modern civilized states are substantially the same, and it is therefore common to say that such is the commercial law, but, except as a convenient phrase, such general law does not exist. There must be a state or government of which every law can be predicated, and to whose authority it owes its existence as a law. Without such sanction it is not law at all. Forepaugh v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co., 18 Atl. 503, 504, 128 Pa. 217, 5 L. R. A. 508, 15 Am. St. Rep. 672.

COMMERCIAL MANURE.

See "Commercial Fertilizers or Manures."

COMMERCIAL MARK OR NAME.

The two terms "commercial mark" and "commercial name," as used in the treaty with France of April 16, 1869, are translations of terms used in the civil law of France. The distinction between a trade-mark and a commercial mark is pointed out by Pouillet in his work on Marques de Fabrique, in which he says a trade-mark is not a commercial mark, and it is with reason that the law mentions both. The trade-mark is specially or purely the mark of the manufacturer, or him who creates the product or manufactures it; the commercial mark is that of the dealer, who, receiving the product of the manufacturer, sells it in turn to the consumer. The name of a town, or, more generally, the name of a locality, may serve as a trade-mark, yet here still it is on condition that the name shall be presented under a distinct special form, always the same. It is this peculiar expression which constitutes the mark, and not the name taken separately and for itself. The commercial name is the name of an individual, or any name which is the property of the merchant, without reference to its use as a mark or trade-mark in distinctive form. The name "Vichy" is a commercial name. La Republique Francaise v. Schultz (U. S.) 57 Fed. 37, 41.

COMMERCIAL PAPER.

His commercial paper, see "His."

"Commercial paper," as used in the bankrupt act of 1867, providing that any merchant, banker, or trader who fraudulently fails to pay his commercial paper for a period of 14 days shall be deemed to have committed an act of bankruptcy, means bills of exchange, promissory notes, bank checks, and other negotiable instruments for the payment of money, which by their form and their face purport to be such instruments as are by the law merchant recognized as falling under the designation of "commercial paper." In re Hercules Mut. Life Assur. Soc. (U. S.) 12 Fed. Cas. 12, 15; In re Nickodemus (U. S.) 18 Fed. Cas. 222, 223. Such paper is usually denominated "commercial paper," and it is to be presumed that Congress used the term in this common acceptation, rather than in the more restricted sense of paper which grows out of and is part of a strictly commercial transaction. In re Nickodemus (U. S.) 18 Fed. Cas. 222, 223. The terms are descriptive of the kind of paper, and not of the mode in which it was in fact issued or used. In re Chandler (U. S.) 5 Fed. Cas. 447, 448. See, also, Bank of Newport v. Cook, 30 S. W. 35, 36, 60 Ark. 288, 29 L. R. A. 761, 46 Am. St. Rep. 171.

"Commercial paper," as used in the bankrupt act of 1867, means "negotiable paper: that is, promissory notes or bills of exchange made by a banker, merchant, or trader in the due course of his business as such banker, merchant, or trader, whether the elements of negotiability be given the instrument by the law merchant or by statute." In re Sykes (U. S.) 23 Fed. Cas. 552.

A note and duebill given for money loaned to a manufacturing company, payable on demand, is not "commercial paper" within Bankr. Act 1867, § 39. In re McDermott Patent Bolt Mfg. Co. (U. S.) 16 Fed. Cas. 16, 17.

"Where obligations are issued to secure the payment of money upon time, and contain on their face an expression showing that they are expected to pass from one person to another, and thus to perform the office of bills and notes or of money, as the words 'bearer' or 'assigns' or 'holder,' or the like, the courts of this country, with a single exception, have concurred in attaching to them the attributes of commercial paper." Chase Nat. Bank v. Faurot, 44 N. E. 164, 165, 149 N. Y. 532, 35 L. R. A. 605 (citing Brainerd v. New York & H. R. Co., 25 N. Y. 496).

The term "commercial paper" does not include receiver's certificates. Central Nat. Bank v. Hazard (U. S.) 30 Fed. 484, 485.

COMMERCIAL PROPERTY.

Property of a charitable institution leased out for revenue is no part of the asylum proper, but is "commercial property," and not exempt from taxation under the Constitution. Female Orphan Soc. v. Board of Assessors, 33 South. 592, 593, 109 La. 537.

COMMERCIAL RAILROAD COMPANY.

A "commercial railroad" is a railroad properly equipped for the running of passenger trains, freight trains, and doing and conducting general freight and railway passenger business. Demaree v. Bridges, 65 N. E. 601, 602, 30 Ind. App. 131.

A commercial railroad company is one whose general business is not carried on within a city. Savannah, T. & I. H. Ry. v. City of Savannah, 37 S. E. 393, 112 Ga. 164.

COMMERCIAL TRAVELER.

See, also, "Drummer"; "Commerce"; "Traveling Salesmen."

An agent, such as is usually designated a "drummer" or "commercial traveler," who simply exhibits samples of goods kept by his principal, and takes orders from his purchasers for such goods, which goods are afterwards delivered by the principal to the purchaser, and payment for the goods is to be made by the purchaser to the principal on such delivery, is neither a peddler nor a merchant. City of Kansas v. Collins, 8 Pac. 865, 867, 34 Kan. 434.

It has never been understood that a commercial traveler—that is, one who sells to retail dealers or others by sample—is either a hawker or a peddler, within a statute requiring a peddler to be licensed. City of Olney v. Todd, 47 Ill. App. 439, 440.

Commercial travelers are not men of a like character with grocers, merchants, brokers, peddlers, and junk dealers, so as to be liable to a license tax authorized by a city charter for such callings. They are more nearly like merchants and peddlers than any of the others named, and yet they are quite unlike either. They follow no independent business, they make no contracts for themselves, nor do they come, ordinarily, under any sort of personal obligation. They are merely solicitors of orders for others, and differ in no respect from clerks or salesmen, except that they are ambulatory in their operations, and do not usually carry or deliver the goods sold. Ex parte Taylor, 58 Miss. 478, 481, 38 Am. Rep. 336.

As laborer or merchant.

See "Day Laborer"; "Merchant."

COMMINGLE.

The word "commingle" means to put together in one mass; so that an allegation that an officer commingled funds in his hands is sufficient to show that the funds were blended so as to become indistinguishable, and facts constituting the commingling need not be alleged. Pfau v. State, 47 N. E. 927, 929, 148 Ind. 539.

COMMISSION.

See "Del Credere"; "Usual Commission." Brokers or brokerage commission, see "Brokerage."

The word "commission" means a brokerage or allowance made to a factor or agent for the transacting of business for another. Jackson v. Stanfield, 37 N. E. 14, 15, 137 Ind. 592, 23 L. R. A. 588; Woolsey v. Jones, 4 South. 190, 192, 84 Ala. 88.

"Commission" legally imports a sum allowed as compensation to a servant, factor, or agent, who manages the affairs of others, in recompense for his services. The right to such allowance may either be the subject of a special contract or it may rest on implied contract to pay quantum meruit. Ralston v. Kohl's Adm'r, 30 Ohio St. 92, 98.

"Commissions" of executors or trustees are compensation for labor and responsibility, and the rate is graduated by the responsibility incurred, the amount of the estate, and the sum of the labor expended. Appeal of Ziegler (Pa.) 4 Atl. 837, 839 (citing In re Harland [Pa.] 5 Rawle, 323).

"Commissions," in reference to a sale of land by a trustee under a trust deed, mean compensation for selling. Whitaker v. Old Dominion Guano Co., 31 S. E. 629, 630, 123 N. C. 368.

A carrier contracted with defendant to deliver certain leather to the French government, by the terms of which contract the leather was to be paid for on delivery. Defendant, in a letter of instructions to plaintiff, stated that the "commissions upon sales and investments" would be a certain per cent., and directed how the leather should be delivered and how plaintiff was to obtain payment, but gave no authority whatever to sell. Held that, plaintiff having only delivered the leather to the French government, and not made any sale of it or investment, he was not entitled to commissions. "Commissions" means an allowance or compensation made upon the sale or purchase of goods. Miller v. Livingston (N. Y.) 1 Caines, 349, 357.

"Commissions" is a word without technical meaning, but, when used to express compensation for services rendered, it usually denotes a percentage on the amount of moneys paid out or received. Purifoy v. Godfrey, 16 South. 701, 703, 105 Ala. 142; Brenan v. Perry (Pa.) 7 Phila. 242, 243.

Where a policy of reinsurance against loss which insured may sustain on certain policies in excess of 50 per cent. of the net premiums received by insured during the term of such policy provides that the net premiums shall be determined by deducting from the gross premiums the commissions paid, the term "commissions paid" includes the entire compensation paid by the insurer to its attorneys in fact, and is not confined merely to commissions paid for business procured. Alker v. Rhoads, 76 N. Y. Supp. 808, 811, 73 App. Div. 158.

The word "commissions," as used in the bankruptcy act of 1898, can mean nothing more nor less than the compensation allowed to referees and trustees, other than the fees deposited for them with the clerk. In re Sabine (U. S.) 1 Am. Bankr. R. 322, 326.

Discount distinguished.

In its technical as well as its ordinary sense, commission generally signifies a percentage upon the amount of money involved in the transaction, as distinguished from discount, which is a percentage taken from the face value of the security or property negotiated. Swift & Courtney & Beecher Co. v. United States (U. S.) 18 Ct. Cl. 42, 57.

"Commission," as used in Revenue Act 1863 (12 Stat. 714), which provides that the proprietors of certain articles, who furnish their dies for stamps, shall be allowed the following commission from amounts purchased at one time, etc., means the sum to be paid the purchaser on the purchase of stamps at par, it being calculated as a per cent. on the amount of the purchase money, and it necessarily implies that the amount is to be paid in money. It is synonymous with the word "discount" in Act 1862, c. 119, § 102 (12 Stat. 477). Swift & Courtney v. United States, 4 Sup. Ct. 244, 245, 111 U. S. 22, 28 L. Ed. 341.

As fees.

See "Fees."

In tariff act, as commission paid.

"Commissions," as used in Act April 20, 1818, c. 74, § 4, directing that duties on ad valorem goods shall be estimated upon the actual cost, including all charges except commissions, etc., means "whatever sum is bona fide charged and paid as commissions." It does not include a mere charge of commissions which is not paid. United States v. May (U. S.) 26 Fed. Cas. 1224.

As wages.

See "Wages."

COMMISSION (Of Crime).

"Commission" means the act of committing, doing, or performing the act of perpetrating. Thus, within the rule that in order to constitute the offense of an attempt to commit a crime the accused must do some act towards its commission, mere acts of preparation not proximately leading to the consummation of the intended crime will not suffice to establish an attempt to commit it. Groves v. State, 42 S. E. 755, 756, 116 Ga. 516, 59 L. R. A. 598.

COMMISSION (Of Officer).

See "Duly Commissioned and Sworn."

The commission of a militia officer is the evidenced authority of the officer. The authority itself is derived from the choice of the company, and is not conferred by the commission. Scofield v. Lounsbury, 8 Conn. 109, 111.

From the organization of the first Republican government in the state, officers have been appointed by a "commission"—a term which, whether regarded according to its ordinary meaning or its legal sense, imports a delegation of authority, and is defined to be a delegation by warrant of an act of Parliament or of common law, whereby jurisdiction, power, or authority is conferred to others. Our earliest books draw a distinction between a grant of an office and a commission, and inform us that the former, as its name implies, is not revocable, but that the latter, which is only the delegation of an authority, is. State v. Dews (Ga.) R. M. Charl. 443.

A commission is a warrant of office, a written authority or license granted by a person or persons duly constituted by law for the purpose of a public officer, empowering and authorizing him to execute the duties of the office to which he may be appointed; and, where there is no particular form for such commission prescribed by law, those who are constituted for the purpose may use such form and language as to them may seem proper, so that the purport of such commission be clearly understood. Dew v. Judges of Sweet Springs District Court (Va.) 3 Hen. & M. 1, 43, 3 Am. Dec. 639.

An officer's commission which the Governor may think proper to give him on his appointment is only evidence of the appointment, and does not fix the tenure by which the office is held, which must depend upon the provisions of the act creating the office or upon the Constitution. State v. Jeter (S. C.) 1 McCord, 233, 235.

In the schedule to the new Constitution, § 16, providing that, after the expiration of the term of any present judge of any court of common pleas in commission at the adoption of this Constitution, the judge of said court learned in the law and "oldest in commission" shall be the president judge thereof, will be construed to mean oldest in continuous service, without regard to the date of the commission under which he was then serving. Commonwealth v. Pattison, 109 Pa. 165, 170.

A commission grants the right to hold and discharge the duties of a certain office. United States v. Planter (U. S.) 27 Fed. Cas. 544, 546.

The commission of a public officer is his letters patent granted by the government under the public seal, giving him authority to perform the duties of his office. A judgment for the possession of an office is not a "commission of office," within Pol. Code, § 936, providing, when the title of the incumbent of the office is contested by proceedings in court, no warrant for his salary can be drawn until the proceedings are finally determined; provided, that this shall not apply to one who holds the certificate of election or commission of office. Bledsoe v. Colgan, 70 Pac. 924, 138 Cal. 34.

COMMISSION (Of Vessel).

The word "commission," as used with reference to a vessel ex vi termini, imports a written authority, given under the hand of a government officer, to the vessel, to do a particular thing or to travel on a particular voyage. United States v. Reyburn, 31 U. S. (6 Pet.) 352, 365, 8 L. Ed. 424.

COMMISSION BUSINESS.

The term "commission business" in its largest signification may mean any and every kind of business for the transaction of which a commission is paid, and includes any vendible commodity. De Wolf v. Crandall, 31 N. Y. Super. Ct. (1 Sweeney) 556, 566.

COMMISSION DE LUNATICO INQUIRENDO.

The main purpose of a commission de lunatico inquirendo is to determine, in the first place, whether the subject of the inquiry is a lunatic or not, and, if he is found to be a lunatic, then to provide for the safeguarding of both his person and his property. In re Misselwitz, 35 Atl. 722, 177 Pa. 159.

COMMISSION MERCHANT.

A "commission merchant" is generally defined to be an agent employed to sell goods or merchandise consigned or delivered to him by or for his principal for a compensation, commonly called "factorage" or "commission." State v. Thompson, 25 S. W. 346, 348, 120 Mo. 12.

A commission merchant is an agent employed to sell goods to another which are in his possession, his possession being a commission. Spears v. Loague, 46 Tenn. (6 Cold.) 420, 422.

A "commission merchant," within the meaning of Acts 1881-82, pp. 511, 513, "is one who buys and sells on commission, and may sell any personal property which is left with or consigned to him for sale, except such as is expressly excepted by the act." White v. Commonwealth, 78 Va. 484, 485.

"'Commission merchant' is synonymous with the legal term 'factor,' and means one who receives goods, chattels, or merchandise for sale, exchange, or other disposition, and is to receive a compensation for his services, to be paid by the owner or derived from the sale of the goods." Perkins v. State, 50 Ala. 154; Thompson v. Woodruff, 47 Tenn. (7 Cold.) 401, 410.

A commission merchant is one who receives goods, chattels, or merchandise for sale or exchange, and possession of the thing to be sold or exchanged, and authority either to sell or exchange or otherwise dispose of it for a compensation to be paid by the owner or derived from the disposition, are essential to the character of the commission merchant. Perkins v. State, 50 Ala. 154, 156.

Merchant distinguished.

As distinguished from merchants who purchase in bulk and sell at retail, there is another class of traders called "commission merchants." Their particular designation is derived from the fact that they are the mere agents to sell the goods of others for a commission. They are distinguished from the former class sometimes by an advertised or proclaimed line of business in which they are engaged, sometimes by the fact that they disclose their principals and profess only to be intermediaries to bring seller and buyer together, sometimes by selling in the name of the vendor, and possibly in other ways. A commission business is confined to the making of sales for others. Alabama Fertilizer Co. v. Reynolds, 79 Ala. 497, 502.

See "Wholesale Dealer."

COMMISSION OF LUNACY.

Pol. Code, § 996, providing that a vacancy occurs in an office on the happening of the incumbent's insanity, found on a "commission of lunacy" issued to determine the fact, should be construed to mean only a commission issued out of chancery for the purpose of inquiring into the sanity of the person, and not to the superior proceedings taken to send a person to the insane asylum. In re Moore, 9 Pac. 164-166, 68 Cal. 281.

COMMISSION TO TAKE DEPOSITIONS.

A commission is a process issued under the seal of the court and the signature of the clerk, directed to one or more persons, designated as "commissioners," authorizing them to examine the witness upon oath, on interrogatories annexed thereto, and to take and return the deposition of the witness, according to the directions given with the commission. Cr. Code N. Y. 1903, § 638.

A commission is a process issued under the seal of the court and the signature of the clerk, directed to some person designated as "commissioner," authorizing him to examine the witness upon oath or on interrogatories annexed thereto, to take and certify the deposition of the witness, and to return it according to the directions given with the commission. Pen. Code Cal. 1903, § 1351.

"Commission," as the term is used with reference to depositions, is a writ or process issued by a special order of the court under seal, empowering another officer in a distant place or province to take testimony of a witness by deposition. A seal is essential to its validity, and a paper containing no seal conferred no authority on the commissioner, and depositions annexed and taken thereunder were void and extrajudicial. Tracy v. Suydam (N. Y.) 30 Barb. 110, 115.

COMMISSIONED OFFICER.

The words "commissioned officers," as understood in the United States army, do not include cadets at the military academy, but the latter are inferior officers, who for purposes of instruction may be required to serve as officers, noncommissioned officers, or privates. Babbitt v. United States (U. S.) 16 Ct. Cl. 202, 203.

COMMISSIONER.

See "County Commissioners"; "Railroad Commission"; "Special Commission"; "Special Commissioner"; "Statehouse Commissioners"; "Street Commissioner"; "United States Commissioner."

"The term 'commissioners' is a legal and appropriate designation of such persons as have a commission, letters patent, or other lawful warrant to examine any matters or to execute any public office, etc. 1 Jac. Law Dict. 507." It "is nomen generale, designating the office of a public or private nature, permanent or temporary, and, although the term be not used in constituting the office, they may be nevertheless commissioners if their duties be confined to a particular case or class of cases. Thus, we may have commissioners who make partitions of lands, street commissioners, or commissioners of bankruptcy." State v. Morris Canal & Banking Co., 14 N. J. Law (2 J. S. Green) 411, 437.

The term "commissioner," as used in the statute in relation to the taking of depositions, has no limited or specific meaning. It is merely the legal designation or characterization of a person having the lawful warrant to do a certain act. It is a general term, not a specific title, involving in its conception, as applicable thereto, any particular set of legal principles. A person becomes a commissioner simply by being named in the commission. In re Canter, 81 N. Y. Supp. 338, 340, 40 Misc. Rep. 126.

The word "commissioners," as used in the chapter relating to towns and cities, shall be construed to mean aldermen or other municipal authorities. Code N. C. 1883, § 3827.

As master in chancery.

The term "commissioner," as used in an order of court appointing a certain person as commissioner, and directing him to hear the parties and to report facts and such of the evidence as either party may desire, and to make report thereof to the court as soon as it may be, will be construed to mean "master in chancery," and hence the order is sufficient to authorize the person so named to act as master. Dean v. Emerson, 102 Mass. 480, 482.

COMMISSIONER OF CIRCUIT COURT.

Commissioners of the Circuit Court are officers appointed by the court, and authorized by law to exercise important jurisdiction and ministerial functions in aid of the Circuit and District Courts in the administration of justice. They are appointed by the Circuit Court, but their powers are expressly conferred upon them by law. And they are not strictly officers of such courts and subject to their supervisory control. In re Com- missioners of Circuit Court (U. S.) 65 Fed. 314, 317 (citing In re Eaves [U. S.] 30 Fed. 21).

COMMISSIONER OF COUNTY COURT.

The words "commissioner of the county court" and "county commissioner" shall be construed to mean and have reference to the commissioners, or one of them, composing the county court of an existing tribunal created in lieu of a county court. Code W. Va. 1899, p. 134, c. 13, § 17.

COMMISSIONER OF HIGHWAYS.

The word "commissioner," whenever used in the act relating to highways, excepting some special commissioner be mentioned, shall be construed to mean the commissioner of highways elected in and for each township. Comp. Laws Mich. 1897, § 4192.

COMMISSIONER OF ROADS AND REVENUES.

The term "commissioners of roads and revenues," as used in Const. 1890-81, art. 11, § 3, par. 1, providing that whatever tribunal or officer may hereafter be created by the General Assembly for the transaction of county matters shall be uniform throughout the state, and of the same name, jurisdiction, and remedies, except that the General Assembly may provide for the appointment of commissioners of roads and revenues in any county, was used as naming the tribunal, and was derived from the principal functions of those officers, and is not restrictive of its powers when created Conley v. Poole, 67 Ga. 254, 257.

COMMISSIVE WASTE.

Voluntary or commissive waste consists of injury to the demised premises or some part thereof, when occasioned by some deliberate or voluntary act, as, for instance, the pulling down of a house or the removal of wainscots, floors, benches, furnaces, windows, doors, shelves, or other things fixed to and constituting a material part of the freehold. Regan v. Luthy, 11 N. Y. Supp. 709, 710, 16 Daly, 413 (citing 1 Washb. Real Prop. p. 125).

COMMIT.

To "commit an assault" means to perpetrate an assault, and, when used in an indictment that the defendant did commit an assault, is equivalent to the words "make an assault," and the use of the word "commit" instead of the word "make" did not render the indictment obscure as constituting a mere implication or the statement of an opinion that the offense had been committed, but constituted a distinct averment of an act done. State v. Murphy, 35 La. Ann. 622, 623.

2 Wds. & P.—20

In order that one accused of crime should be "legally committed" it is necessary only that he should be committed by a magistrate who has jurisdiction to hold the examination, and who has actually heard the evidence and determined that probable cause exists for holding the defendant. People v. Beach, 54 Pac. 369, 370, 122 Cal. 37.

As confine.

"Committed," as used in St. 1841, c. 77, providing that whenever any lunatic shall be committed to the state lunatic hospital from any town in which he has not a legal settlement, etc., includes the action of the overseers of a town in sending a lunatic pauper to the state hospital, though there was no adjudication by any court or magistrate as to his lunacy. Inhabitants of Cummington v. Inhabitants of Wareham, 63 Mass. (9 Cush.) 585, 589.

"Committed" is the act of carrying a person to prison after his arrest. French v. Bancroft, 42 Mass. (1 Metc.) 502, 504.

As commitment after conviction.

The word "commit" in Code Civ. Proc. § 6, providing that magistrates' courts shall not be open on Sunday, except where it is necessary to preserve the peace, or, in a criminal case, to arrest, commit, or discharge a person charged with an offense, "covers a commitment after conviction as well as a commitment to await trial." The regular word or term used to describe the act by which a magistrate sentences in cases such as the one before us is "commit," and this is the word used in the various statutes and codes as meaning conviction and sentence by a magistrate. As said in Perkins v. Smith, 116 N. Y. 441, 23 N. E. 21: "Words having a precise and well-settled meaning in the jurisprudence of a country are to be understood in the same sense when used in its statutes, unless a different meaning is unmistakably intended." There appears in the present instance nothing to indicate that the Legislature intended, after a hearing, if a situation was disclosed calling for punishment, a magistrate might not commit or sentence forthwith, as well as discharge. On the contrary, the long continued and uniform custom has been for magistrates, after the hearing, which is necessary to ascertain whether there be grounds for holding the persons arrested, to commit, if the guilt of the person is apparent. The purpose of the provision was to preserve the peace, and, while doing so, at the same time to accord to persons who might otherwise be injured by longer detention an opportunity to be at once heard, and in proper cases set at liberty. People v. Warden of New York State Reformatory, 76 N. Y. Supp. 728, 73 App. Div. 174.

Wag. St. p. 626, § 14, allowing sheriffs a fee of one dollar for "committing any person to jail," relates to the execution by the sheriff of an order or warrant of commitment made or issued by some officer exercising judicial functions, and does not contemplate cases where the prisoner is arrested under a capias, and for default of bail is committed by the sheriff to the county jail to await examination. Thomas v. St. Louis County, 61 Mo. 547, 548.

Convict distinguished.

Code, § 3466, declares that for the preservation of such persons as shall be committed to jail the commissioners shall mark out a parcel of land, not exceeding six acres, adjoining the prison, and every person not committed for treason or felony, giving bond, etc., shall have the liberty to walk therein. Held, that the term "committed" was not synonymous with "convicted," and that the statute did not apply to one imprisoned under sentence in a criminal case, but was intended to apply to persons who in civil cases are committed to jail on mesne process, or on final judgment, and in criminal cases when the prisoner is committed to jail for lack of bail, in order to secure his presence before the appropriate court to answer the criminal charge preferred against him. State v. Pearson, 6 S. E. 387, 389, 100 N. C. 414.

COMMIT SUICIDE.

"Commit suicide," as used in a life policy exempting the company from liability if the insured "commits suicide," is limited to the deliberate act of the insured in ending his own existence, or committing any unlawful malicious act, the consequence of which is his own death. The insured must be of years of discretion, and in his senses when committing such act, as "it would be unreasonable to interpret it as including death by accident or by mistake, though the direct or immediate act of the insured may have contributed to it." Supreme Commandery of Knights of the Golden Rule v. Ainsworth, 71 Ala. 436, 448, 46 Am. Rep. 332.

COMMIT TO JAIL.

The words "committing any person to jail," as used in a statute relating to the fee bill of a sheriff, relate to the execution by the sheriff of an order or warrant of commitment made or issued by some officer exercising judicial functions. State v. Clark, 70 S. W. 489, 492, 170 Mo. 67 (citing Thomas v. St. Louis County, 61 Mo. 547).

A statute authorized the sheriff to charge for every person committed to jail 35 cents, and for every person discharged from jail 35 cents. Held, that the words "committed" and "discharged" should be construed to mean a technical committal and discharge, and could not be so liberally construed as to authorize the sheriff to charge 35 cents for taking out, and 35 cents for returning, a prisoner to jail in the course of the proceedings against them. Lee v. Ionia County Sup'rs, 36 N. W. 83, 68 Mich. 330.

COMMITMENT.

See "Legal Commitment."

The term "commitment" merely describes the process by which a person is confined under the order of a court at any time before or after final sentence. People v. Rutan, 3 Mich. 42, 49.

"Commitment" has in law a well-defined meaning, and signifies the act of sending an accused or convicted person to prison. Guthmann v. People, 67 N. E. 821, 822, 203 Ill. 260 (citing And. Law Dict. 210; Bouv. Law Dict. 296).

A commitment is a warrant or order by a court or magistrate directing a ministerial officer to take a person to prison. Commonwealth v. Barker, 133 Mass. 399, 400.

The commitment is the sending of a person charged with an offense to prison to await his being held to answer. It is not the warrant or mittimus by which such person is sent to prison. People v. Lee Ah Chuck, 6 Pac. 859, 861, 66 Cal. 662.

A commitment is a warrant, order, or process by which a court or magistrate directs a ministerial officer to take a person to prison or to detain him there. From the earliest times, as appears from the reported cases on the subject, this process was required to contain a statement of the nature of the crime with which the prisoner was charged. The legal requisites of such a process are thus described by an acknowledged authority on the subject of crimes and criminal procedure as defined by the common law: "It must be in writing, under the hand and seal of the person by whom it is made, and expressing his office or authority, and the time and place at which it is made, and must be directed to the jailer or the keeper of the prison. It may be made either in the name of the King, and only tested by the person who makes it, or may be made by such person in his own name. It may command the jailer to keep the party in safe and close custody; for, if every jailer be bound by the law to keep his prisoner in such custody, surely it can be no fault in a mittimus to command him to do so. It ought to set forth the crime alleged against the person with convenient certainty, whether the commitment be by the privy council or any other authority; otherwise, the officer is not punishable by reason of such mittimus for suffering the party to escape, and the court before whom he is removed by habeas corpus ought to discharge or bail him. And this doth not only hold where no cause at all is expressed in the commitment, but also where it is so loosely set forth that the court cannot adjudge whether it were a reasonable ground of imprisonment. Allen v. Hagan, 62 N. E. 1086, 1087, 170 N. Y. 46 (citing 2 Hawk. P. C. p. 119, c. 16).

A commitment, in the absence of any statutory provisions prescribing its form and contents, does not sufficiently state the offense by simply designating it by the species or class of crimes to which the committing magistrate may consider it to belong, but in order to be a sufficient or valid commitment it ought to state the facts charged or found to constitute the offense with sufficient particularity to enable the court, on a return to the habeas corpus, to determine what particular crime is charged against the prisoner. State v. Birchim, 9 Nev. 95, 100.

COMMITTEE.

A committee is a bailiff whose power is limited to the mere care of an estate under the direction of the court. Lloyd v. Hart, 2 Pa. (2 Barr) 473, 478, 45 Am. Dec. 612.

A committee may be defined as a person or persons to whose consideration or determination certain business is referred or confided, and need not consist of more than one person. Farrar v. Eastman, 5 Me. (5 Greenl.) 345, 350.

COMMITTEE OF LUNATIC.

As trustee, see "Trustee."

COMMODATUM.

Commodatum is the bailment created when useful goods and chattels "are lent to a friend gratis to be used by him." It is called "commodatum" because the thing is to be returned in specie. Coggs v. Bernard, 2 Ld. Raym. 909, 913.

A bailment of the kind called "commodatum" in the civil law is where the thing lent remains the property of the lender and is to be returned, if it be money, in the identical bills and coins lent. Adams v. Colonial & United States Mortg. Co. (Miss.) 34 South. 482, 525.

In an action by the Republic of France for the loss of exhibits at the World's Columbian Exposition it was contended that the exhibits constituted a bailment made by the former at the request and for the sole use and benefit of the latter, and so constituted a bailment, known as "commodatum"; but it was held that inasmuch as such exhibit was not made solely for the benefit of the local corporation, and without thought for the commercial advantage and for the glory of France, it was a bailment for the benefit of both parties. World's Columbian Exposition Co. v. Republic of France (U. S.) 96 Fed. 687, 693, 38 C. C. A. 483.

COMMODITY.

Commodities "are the productions of a country which become articles of sale, or, in the language of Webster in his dictionary, in commerce, including everything movable that is bought and sold, unless, perhaps, animals may be excepted. The word includes all the movables which are the objects of commerce." Best v. Bauder (N. Y.) 29 How. Prac. 489, 492.

In a statute providing that no person whatever shall buy or receive from any slave any coin or commodity whatever, without the consent of the owner of the slave, the term "commodity" is opposed to coin, and the two words mean the same thing, which is now frequently expressed by the vulgar and popular language of "money and property." The term "commodity" is properly used to signify almost any description of article called movable or personal estate. Barnett v. Powell, 16 Ky. (Litt. Sel. Cas.) 409, 410.

In a statute providing that any person who buys or receives from any slave any article or commodity of any kind or construction, without the consent of the master, shall on conviction be fined or imprisoned, the words "article" and "commodity" are used in the same sense, and at least embrace most movable things which can become the subject of commerce between white persons and slaves. A black bottle comes clearly within this definition. Shuttleworth v. State, 35 Ala. 415, 417.

Business privileges.

Const. art. 4, § 1, authorizing the Legislature to impose and levy reasonable duties and excises on any produce, goods, wares, merchandise, and "commodities" brought into, produced, manufactured, or being within the state. Held, that the word "commodity," as there used, was a general term, and included the privilege and conveniences of transacting business, and therefore authorized a privilege tax imposed on savings banks. Commonwealth v. Lancaster Sav. Bank, 123 Mass. 493, 495.

Commodities "embrace everything which may be subject to taxation, and sometimes mean the privilege of using particular branches of business or employment, as the business of an auctioneer, of an attorney, of a tavern keeper, of a retailer of spirituous liquors, etc. In this sense it signifies conveniences, privilege, profit, and gains, as well as goods and wares, which are only its vulgar signification." Portland Bank v. Apthorp, 12 Mass. 252, 256.

"Commodities," as used in a constitutional provision authorizing the taxation of commodities, will be construed to mean "convenience, privilege, profits, and gains," and will not be confined to goods and wares only.

Hamilton Mfg. Co. v. Massachusetts, 73 U. S. (6 Wall.) 632, 640, 18 L. Ed. 904.

Corporate franchise.

A privilege granted by a sovereign authority, such as an act of incorporation, is a commodity. Commonwealth v. People's Five Cents Sav. Bank, 87 Mass. (5 Allen) 428, 435.

"Commodities," as used in Const. c. 1, art. 4, authorizing the Legislature to tax commodities brought into, produced, manufactured, or being within the state, has been given a very broad and extensive meaning. It has been universally held to include corporate franchises. So with franchises granted by a foreign government, which by comity are permitted to be exercised within the state of Massachusetts. Gleason v. McKay, 134 Mass. 419, 424, 425.

Cotton.

"Commodity," as used in Act March 6, 1850, § 1, for the suppression of trade and barter with slaves, providing that any person buying, selling, or receiving of, to, or from any slave any corn, fodder, hay, meal, spirituous liquors, or other produce or commodity whatsoever, should be punished, should be construed to include cotton, and an indictment charging the selling of cotton charges a sale of produce or commodity. State v. Borroum, 23 Miss. (1 Cushm.) 477, 481.

Devise and inheritance.

The privilege of transmitting and receiving, by will or descent, property on the death of the owner, is a "commodity," within the meaning of this word in Const. art 4, c. 1, § 1, pt. 2, authorizing the laying of an excise on goods, wares, merchandise, and commodities. Minot v. Winthrop, 38 N. E. 512, 515, 162 Mass. 113, 26 L. R. A. 259.

Horse.

A statute forbidding any person to buy, sell, or receive of, to, or from any slave "any commodity whatsoever," without leave of his master, means any movable article or piece of personalty, and embraced a mare. Barnett v. Powell, 16 Ky. (Litt. Sel. Cas.) 409, 410.

Insurance.

The word "commodity" has two significations. In its most comprehensive sense it means convenience, accommodation, profit, benefit, advantage, interest, commodiousness; but according to Webster's International Dictionary, p. 286, the word in this sense is obsolete. The word is ordinarily used in the commercial sense of any movable or tangible thing that is ordinarily produced or used as the subject of barter or sale. Thus, it was held that commodity did not apply to a combination of fire insurance companies to fix uniform rates. Queen Ins. Co. v. State, 24 S. W. 397, 401, 86 Tex. 250, 22 L. R. A. 483.

"Commodity" is defined to be that which affords advantage, profit, or convenience; and hence insurance is a commodity, within the provisions of McLain's Code, § 5454, prohibiting combinations to fix the price of oil, lumber, etc., or other commodity. Beechley v. Mulville, 70 N. W. 107, 109, 102 Iowa, 602, 63 Am. St. Rep. 479.

Labor.

Hiring a slave to haul rails without the written consent of the owner is not "purchase of any commodity" whatsoever from the slave, within a statute prohibiting the same, as the statute was obviously designed to prevent the slaves from trading, selling, or dealing in any commodity—that is, anything movable that is bought and sold—with a person, without the master's permission. State v. Henke, 19 Mo. 225, 226.

Oysters.

Cove oysters, packed, canned, and sold as merchandise, are a "commodity," within Code 1892, c. 140, § 4437, declaring any agreement to limit, increase, or reduce the price of a commodity, etc., to be a criminal conspiracy, and declaring all such contracts to be void; and a contract by which the defendant agreed to sell plaintiff all the cove oysters which defendant should pack during certain months, except three car loads per month, and reciting that such three car loads should not be sold to the trade at a lower price than the price offered the trade by the plaintiff, was invalid as an agreement to limit the price of a commodity. Barataria Canning Co. v. Jouliau, 31 South. 961, 962, 80 Miss. 555.

COMMON.

See "In Common"; "Public Common"; "Tenant in Common"; "Things Common."

"Common" is defined as frequent, usual, customary, habitual. State v. O'Conner, 49 Me. 594, 596.

"Common" is said by Webster to denote primarily that in which many share, and hence that which is often met with. Koen v. State, 53 N. W. 595, 596, 35 Neb. 676, 17 L. R. A. 821.

"The word 'common' means, according to Webster: (1) Belonging equally to more than one or to many indefinitely; (2) belonging to the public; (3) general; (4) universal; (5) public. And such is its meaning in the provision of the Constitution which guarantees the right to keep and bear arms for common defense." Aymette v. State, 21 Tenn. (2 Humph.) 154, 158.

Dedication to public implied.

Where, at an intersection of two streets crossing diagonally, there was a piece of ground marked on the plat "Common," it indicated an intention on the part of the owner to dedicate it to the public for any use which the proper authorities might deem proper and which could be legitimately regarded as public; and though, at the time the plat was made, the proprietor did not fully understand the meaning of the word "Common" as there used, this can make no difference. White v. Smith, 37 Mich. 291, 295.

Where the owner of land lying on the bank of a river caused the land to be platted into lots, blocks, streets, alleys, and a strip lying along the river bank, to be marked on the plat as "Common," reserving on said strip a ferry landing at a point where such ferry landing was then and previously had been established, such act was a dedication of such strip as public ground for the convenience and accommodation of the town and the public, and for such appropriate uses, exclusive of the ferry right so reserved, and not inconsistent with such right. City of Newport v. Taylor's Ex'rs, 55 Ky. (16 B. Mon.) 699, 807.

Where, on the plat of a town, an open space appeared marked "The Esplanade. To remain a common forever," the word "common" must be understood, not in its technical sense as being a right or profit which one man may have in the land of another, but in its popular sense as a piece of ground left open for common and public use for the convenience and accommodation of the inhabitants of the town, and its dedication by the plat and by the act establishing the town was dedication of it as public ground for the convenience and accommodation of the town and public, and for such appropriate uses as are to be implied in the dedication of a narrow strip of open ground between the lots and a navigable river, which include the right of constructing wharves and charging wharfage. City of Newport v. Taylor's Ex'rs, 55 Ky. (16 B. Mon.) 699, 807.

Highway.

A "common" is an inclosed or uninclosed tract of ground for pasturage, for pleasure, etc., the use of which belongs to the public or a number of persons. A highway is not uninclosed land or public common within the meaning of such word as used in Burns' Rev. St. 1894, § 2333 (Horner's Rev. St. 1896, § 2639), authorizing the impounding of animals found pasturing in such places. Beeson v. Tice, 45 N. E. 612, 613, 17 Ind. App. 78.

As land belonging to public.

The word "common" is not to be understood as used by the proprietors of a town in its strict legal sense, as being a right or profit which one man may have in the land of another, but in its popular sense, and means a piece of ground left open for common or public use for the convenience and accommodation of the inhabitants of the town. City of Cincinnati v. White, 31 U. S. (6 Pet.) 431, 435, 8 L. Ed. 452.

The term "common," as used in the plat of a city in which it is provided that the land designated thereon by a certain mark is to be and remain a common forever, is not to be construed as being used "in any technical sense, but in its popular signification as a parcel of ground set apart for public and common use for the convenience and accommodation of the inhabitants of the city." The city has no authority to sell such lands. Cummings v. City of St. Louis, 2 S. W. 130, 131, 90 Mo. 259.

The word "common" in Act 1827, providing for the laying off of the town in the Coweta Reserve, and incorporating the town of Columbus and dedicating to such town a common of 1,200 acres, did not mean common of pasture, estovers, etc., but common in the higher sense of a common appurtenant to the town and for the advancement of its interests as a town. Crawford v. Mobile & G. R. Co., 67 Ga. 405, 416.

Where land had been dedicated to a town for the convenient common about a meeting house and for other necessary public uses at its discretion, and, after a school-house had been built on a part of said tract, a bequest was made to the town for a reclamation and embellishment of the common, the presumption is that the testator used the word "common" in a sense consistent with the legal public uses which the town could make of the common under the original grant, and did not mean the lawn or park not occupied by buildings. Newell v. Town of Hancock, 35 Atl. 253, 254, 67 N. H. 244.

In the act of 1729, entitled "An act to confirm Bath town common," and providing that "the tract of land herein described shall be and hereby is appointed a common to lie perpetually for the use and benefit of the inhabitants of the town of Bath," the term "common" which is used in the act includes and means the land itself, and not the mere incorporeal right existing in idea, an abstract contemplation of which is called the right of common, by virtue whereof one man or set of men is entitled to have the profit in the lands of another, such as the right of feeding one's beast on another man's land, or fishing in another man's water, or cutting necessary wood from another man's estate, or digging turf upon another man's ground. Commissioners of Town of Bath v. Boyd, 23 N. C. 194, 197.

Park synonymous.

In legal contemplation a "common" is not synonymous with "park." The legal definition of a common is "an uninclosed piece of land set apart for public or municipal purposes in many cities and villages of the United States." Black, Law Dict. The adjudged cases hold the same views. Thus the Supreme Court of the United States, when speaking of the word, says: "We are not to understand the term in its strict legal sense of being a right of profit, which one man may have in the lands of another, but in its popular sense, as a piece of ground left open for common or public use, for the convenience and accommodation of the inhabitants of the town." The lexicographers define "park" as a piece of ground inclosed for public recreation or amusement (Worcester); a piece of ground within a city or town inclosed and kept for ornament and recreation (Webster). The use of the term "common" in a plat of certain land in which a strip was designated to be and remain a common forever does not exclude the use of such plat for railroad trains in lieu and instead of the slow moving wagons of former times, which is but a change in the method of the public use and not of the use itself, and such method is entirely germane to the purposes of the original dedication and control of the municipal authority. Goode v. City of St. Louis, 20 S. W. 1048, 1051, 113 Mo. 257.

As right or privilege in land.

"Common or a right of common is a right of privilege which several persons have to the produce of the land or waters of another." Van Rensselaer v. Radcliff (N. Y.) 10 Wend. 639, 647, 25 Am. Dec. 582.

Common is an estate well known to the law. It is an incorporeal hereditament giving to the owner of one tract of land the privilege of common in other lands. It is a privilege annexed to the land, and passing by a conveyance of the land to which it is annexed. Trustees of Western University v. Robinson (Pa.) 12 Serg. & R. 29, 31.

Common is an incorporeal hereditament, being a profit which one man has in the land of another, as to feed his beasts, take fish, dig turf, cut wood, or the like. Smith v. Floyd (N. Y.) 18 Barb. 522, 527.

COMMON APPENDANT.

Common appendant is a right belonging to the owners or occupants of arable lands. Smith v. Floyd (N. Y.) 18 Barb. 522, 527 (citing 2 Bl. Comm. 33).

Common appendant is a right annexed to the possession of arable land, by which the owner is entitled to feed his beasts on the lands of another, usually of the owner of the manor of which the lands entitled to common are a part. This kind of common must have existed from time immemorial, and can be claimed by prescription only, and is confined to such, and so many cattle as are necessary to plow and manure the land which is entitled to common, and which are levant and couchant; that is, so many as the land will sustain during the winter. Van Rensselaer v. Radcliff (N. Y.) 10 Wend. 639, 648, 25 Am. Dec. 582.

COMMON APPURTENANT.

Common appurtenant is a right annexed to lands in other manors. Smith v. Floyd (N. Y.) 18 Barb. 522, 527 (citing 2 Bl. Comm. 33).

Common appurtenant of pasture does not necessarily arise from any connection of tenure, "but must be claimed by grant or prescription, which may be created by grant, and may be annexed to any kind of land, whether arable or not." Van Rensselaer v. Radcliff (N. Y.) 10 Wend. 639, 649, 25 Am. Dec. 582.

COMMON BARRATOR.

Lord Coke defines a barrator to be "a common mover and exciter, or maintainer, of suits, quarrels, or parts, either in courts or elsewhere in the country. In courts, as in courts of record, or not of record, as in the county, hundred, or other inferior courts. In the country, in three manners: First, in the disturbance of the peace; second, in taking and keeping possession of lands in controversy, not only by force, but also by subtilty and deceit, and most commonly by suppression of truth and right; thirdly, by false inventions and sowing of calumniation, rumors, and reports, whereby discord and disquiet may grow between neighbors." Co. Litt. 368a, 368b. "He is not a barrator," it is said, "who prosecutes an infinite number of his own suits, although they are unjust, for, if such a person shall be a barrator, then he that sues for cause may be comprehended." 4 Vin. Abr. 208, Barretors A. "Lord Coke has applied to a barrator the cognomen of 'busy-body.' 8 Rep. 72. According to others he is a deceiver, a vile knave, and unthrift, and a maintainer of quarrels, etc., and the vilest of all is he who deals in criminal process or enforces the poor party, ad redimendam vexationem, to give him money or to make other composition. So that he who promotes or excites unjust suits, although an offender of high rank, is not exclusively so. The busy-body, the deceiver, the vile knave, or unthrift who excited others to litigation with an intention to vex and to oppress, and by these means to extort money, is no less an offender against public justice." State v. Chitty (S. C.) 1 Bailey, 379, 397, 400. See, also, Commonwealth v. Davis, 28 Mass. (11 Pick.) 432, 434.

COMMON BARRATRY.

Common barratry is the practice of exciting groundless judicial proceedings. Cook's Pen. Code N. Y. § 132.

COMMON BAWDYHOUSE.

The definition of a bawdyhouse embraces the facts that lewd persons of both sexes resort thereto and commit acts of prostitution therein, and these acts are embraced in the charge of keeping the house. Nelson v. Territory, 49 Pac. 920, 5 Okl. 512.

COMMON BENEFITS.

Common benefits arising from municipal improvements are such as are enjoyed by the public at large, without reference to the ownership of private property adjacent to the public improvement out of which arose the benefits under consideration. Kirkendall v. City of Omaha, 39 Neb. 1, 6, 57 N. W. 752.

COMMON BRAWLER.

Where defendant in his own dwelling was in the habit of using loud and violent language, consisting of opprobrious epithets and exclamations, in such a manner as to attract crowds of persons passing and living in the neighborhood, he was a common raller or brawler. Commonwealth v. Foley, 99 Mass. 497, 499.

COMMON BUSINESS.

A person owning or cultivating two or more farms, and passing from one to another with teams engaged in his ordinary agricultural pursuits, is within that provision of the act of incorporation which exempts from toll any "person passing to or from his common business upon his farm." Camden, E. & M. Turnpike Co. v. Fowler, 24 N. J. Law (4 Zab.) 205, 208.

COMMON CARRIER.

Business of common carrier, see "Business."

A common carrier is one who, by virtue of his calling, undertakes for compensation to transfer personal property from one place to another for all such as may choose to employ him; and every one who undertakes to carry, for compensation, the goods of all persons indifferently, is, as to liability, to be deemed a common carrier. Jackson Architectural Iron Works v. Hurlbut, 52 N. E. 665, 158 N. Y. 34 (affirming 36 N. Y. Supp. 808, 15 Misc. Rep. 93); Lough v. Outerbridge, 38 N. E. 202, 293, 143 N. Y. 271, 25 L. R. A. 674, 42 Am. St. Rep. 712; Alexander v. Greene (N. Y.) 7 Hill, 533, 544 (citing Story, Bailm. § 495); Orange County Bank v. Brown

Wood*, 17 Pac. 910, 911, 11 Colo. 287 (citing Hutch. Carr. § 47); Wyatt v. Larimer & W. Irr. Co., 20 Pac. 906, 909, 1 Colo. App. 480; Shelden v. Robinson, 7 N. H. 157, 159, 26 Am. Dec. 726; Moses v. Norris, 4 N. H. 304, 306; Elkins v. Boston & M. R. Co., 23 N. H. 275, 284; McDuffee v. Portland & R. R. Co., 52 N. H. 430, 447, 13 Am. Rep. 72; Central R. & Banking Co. v. Lampley, 76 Ala. 357, 365, 52 Am. Rep. 334; Lang v. Brady, 49 Atl. 199, 200, 73 Conn. 707; Naugatuck R. Co. v. Waterbury Button Co., 24 Conn. 468, 479; Murphy v. Staton (Va.) 3 Munf. 239; Mershon v. Hobensack, 22 N. J. Law (2 Zab.) 372, 377; Buckland v. Adams Exp. Co., 97 Mass. 124, 129, 93 Am. Dec. 68; Dwight v. Brewster, 18 Mass. (1 Pick.) 50, 11 Am. Harp. 468, 469; Bamberg v. South Carolina R. Co., 9 S. C. (9 Rich.) 61, 67, 30 Am. Rep. 13; United States v. Adams (U. S.) 24 Fed. 348, 354; The Huntress (U. S.) 12 Fed. Cas. 984, 985; The Neffie (U. S.) 17 Fed. Cas. 1260, 1261; Sumner v. Caswell (U. S.) 20 Fed. 249, 251; Niagara v. Cordes, 62 U. S. (21 How.) 723, 16 L. Ed. 41; Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Frankenberger, 54 Ill. 88, 95, 5 Am. Rep. 92; Doty v. Strong (Wis.) 1 Pin. 313, 326, 40 Am. Dec. 773; Maslin v. Baltimore & O. R. Co., 14 W. Va. 180, 188, 35 Am. Rep. 748; Michigan S. & N. I. R. R. Co. v. McDonnough, 21 Mich. 165, 4 Am. Rep. 466; Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Perkins, 25 Mich. 329, 338, 12 Am. Rep. 275; Varble v. Bigley, 77 Ky. (14 Bush) 698, 703, 29 Am. Rep. 435. This definition has been held to be very broad, and its application to facts is subject to certain limitations, holding that a better definition is "one who offers to carry goods for any person between certain termini, or on a certain route, and who is bound to carry for all who tender their goods and the price of carriage." The Neffie (U. S.) 17 Fed. Cas. 1260, 1261; Varble v. Bigley, 77 Ky. (14 Bush) 698, 703, 29 Am. Rep. 435. It is the readiness to carry for all who will employ which gives character to the bailment, rather than the extent of his business or the number of trips performed. Fuller v. Bradley, 25 Pa. (1 Casey) 120; Verner v. Sweitzer, 32 Pa. (8 Casey) 208, 212. Though the number of instances employed in carrying may be evidence of the character of a common carrier, it is not the rule which constitutes it. The law fixes no number of instances which shall stamp him with that character. If a person holds himself forth to the public to carry for hire, he is a common carrier as much in his first trip as in his subsequent trips. Fuller v. Bradley, 25 Pa. (1 Casey) 120. A common carrier exercises a public employment, and consequently has public duties to perform. He cannot, like the tradesman or mechanic, receive or reject a customer at pleasure, or charge any price that he chooses to demand. If he refuse to receive a passenger or carry goods, according to the course of his particular employment, without a sufficient excuse, he will be liable to an action; and he can only demand a reasonable compensation for his services and the hazard which he incurs. Hollister v. Nowlen (N. Y.) 19 Wend. 234, 239, 32 Am. Dec. 455. "He is, in general, bound to take the goods of all who offer, unless his complement for the trip is full, or the goods be of such a kind as to be liable to extraordinary danger or such as he is unaccustomed to convey." Sumner v. Caswell (U. S.) 20 Fed. 249, 251 (quoting Niagara v. Cordes, 62 U. S. [21 How.] 7, 16 L. Ed. 41). He cannot refuse to carry a proper article tendered to him at a proper time and place on the offer of the usual reasonable compensation. "A common carrier is a public carrier. He engages in a public employment, takes upon himself a public duty, and exercises a sort of public office. His duty being public, the correlative right is public. A public right signifies a reasonably equal right." Hence he is not allowed to decline the duties and responsibilities of his occupation as they are defined and fixed by the law. In the carriage of passengers he cannot exercise any unreasonable discrimination, neither can he do so in the carriage of freight. He may be a common carrier of one kind of property and not of another, but as to those goods of which he is a common carrier he cannot discriminate unreasonably against any individual. McDuffee v. Portland & R. R. Co., 52 N. H. 430, 447, 13 Am. Rep. 72; Scofield v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co., 3 N. E. 907, 920, 43 Ohio St. 571, 54 Am. Rep. 846. A common carrier serves both the public and itself. It has public and private functions. The public part is the exercise of its franchise for the accommodation of the parties; the private part is its incidental business with which the public is not concerned, and which the company manages for its own interests. In re Rhode Island Suburban Ry. Co., 48 Atl. 591, 592, 22 R. I. 457, 52 L. R. A. 879.

"'Common,' in its legal sense, used as the description of a carrier and his duty, and the correlative right of the public, contains the whole doctrine of the common law on the subject. The defendants are common carriers. That is all that need be said. All beyond that can be no more than an explanation or application of the legal meaning of 'common' in that connection." McDuffee v. Portland & R. R. Co., 52 N. H. 430, 457, 13 Am. Rep. 72.

The true test of the character of a party, as to the fact whether he is a common carrier or not, is his legal duty and obligation with reference to transportation. Is it optional with him whether he will or will not carry? or must he carry for all? If it is his legal duty to carry for all alike, who comply with the terms as to freight, etc., then he is a common carrier, and is subject to all those stringent rules which, for wise ends, have long since been adopted and uniformly enforced, both in England and in all the states, upon common carriers. If, on the contrary, he may carry or not, as he deems best, he is but a private individual and is invested, like all other private persons, with the right to make his own contracts, and, when made, to stand upon them. While the law has imposed duties and heavy responsibilities on common carriers, which they cannot avoid, limit, or shake off, yet it has never attempted to hamper those who are not common carriers with the stringent rules applicable to carriers, or to prevent them from exercising their own judgment as to the responsibilities which they are willing to assume in a special case. Piedmont Mfg. Co. v. Columbia & G. R. Co., 19 S. C. 353, 364.

The distinction between a common carrier and a private one is that the former holds himself out in common—that is, to all persons who choose to employ him as ready to carry for hire—while the latter agrees in some special case with some private individual to carry for hire. The employment of a common carrier is a public one, and he assumes a public duty, and is bound to receive and carry the goods of any one who offers. Allen v. Sackrider, 37 N. Y. 341, 342.

A distinction is made between carriers of goods and those whose business it is to convey passengers, who were said to be common carriers. A carrier of goods undertakes to deliver them at all hazards, while a carrier of passengers is not responsible for accidents which happen in spite of every precaution. Elkins v. Boston & M. R. Co., 23 N. H. (3 Fost.) 275, 284.

To render a person liable as a common carrier, he must exercise the business of carrying as a public employment, and must undertake to carry goods for all persons indiscriminately, and hold himself out as ready to engage in the transportation of goods as a business. If a carrier be employed in carrying for one or a definite number of persons by way of special undertaking, he is only a private carrier. Wyatt v. Larimer & W. Irr. Co., 29 Pac. 906, 909, 1 Colo. App. 480.

What constitutes a common carrier is a question of law, but whether a party comes within that meaning is a question of fact. Pennewill v. Cullen (Del.) 5 Har. 238, 241.

The word "common" is added to the word "carrier" to distinguish a common car rier from one who undertakes for hire on a particular occasion. — v. Jackson, 2 N. C. 14, 15.

Every one who offers to the public to carry persons, property, or messages, excepting only telegraphic messages, is a common carrier of whatever he thus offers to carry. Civ. Code Cal. 1903, § 2168; Civ. Code Mont. 1895, § 2870; Rev. St. Okl. 1903, § 700; Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 4224; Civ. Code S. D. 1903, § 1577.

One who pursues the business of transporting to another place for a compensation, constantly and continuously, for any time or period of time, or any distance of transportation, is a common carrier. Civ. Code Ga. 1895, § 2264.

All persons carrying goods for another for hire or pay shall be deemed "common carriers," within the provisions of the lien laws. Comp. Laws N. M. 1897, § 2245.

Where a slave is employed by his master to carry travelers and others over a river for a reward, this places the master in the light of a common carrier. Spivey v. Farmer's Adm'r, 3 N. C. 339, 340.

An owner of a wagon train who, without any special agreement, sends his train to transport goods for all who may employ him, is a common carrier. Seligman v. Armijo, 1 N. M. 459, 463.

Carriage as part of business only.

A common carrier is one who undertakes for hire or reward to transport the goods of such as choose to employ him from place to place; and the business of a common carrier may be carried on at the same time with other business, and the practice of taking parcels for hire to be conveyed in a stagecoach was sufficient to constitute those operating the stagecoach common carriers. Dwight v. Brewster, 18 Mass. (1 Pick.) 50, 53, 11 Am. Dec. 133.

Where the owners of a steamboat took produce to be carried and sold by them for certain freight, and agreed to bring back the money obtained therefor, the fact that they also acted as a factor in the disposition of the property carried did not the less render them liable for the safe return of the money, or the loss of the goods, in their capacity of common carriers. Harrington v. McShane (Pa.) 2 Watts, 443, 27 Am. Dec. 321.

As carrier as a business.

The distinguishing feature of a common carrier is that he holds himself out as ready to engage in the transportation of goods for hire as a business, and not as a mere casual occupation pro hac vice. Alexander v. Greene (N. Y.) 7 Hill, 533, 564; Place v. Union Exp. Co. (N. Y.) 2 Hilt. 19, 26; Varble v. Bigley, 77 Ky. (14 Bush) 698, 703, 29

Am. Rep. 435; Chevallier v. Straham, 2 Tex. 115, 117, 47 Am. Dec. 639; Gordon v. Hutchinson (Pa.) 1 Watts & S. 235, 286, 37 Am. Dec. 464; Samms v. Stewart, 20 Ohio, 69, 71, 55 Am. Dec. 445.

"To constitute one a common carrier he must make that a regular and constant business, or at all events he must for a time hold himself ready to carry for all persons indefinitely who choose to employ him." A dock and bridge builder who in his business had occasion to transport dirt and stones, for which purpose he owned and used several scows moved by means of tugs, which he employed for the most part in his own business, but sometimes chartered to other parties by the day or month, but was not in the carrying trade and not in the habit of transporting any cargo except his own, the scows, when employed by him, being used solely to transport his own articles in his own business, and, when chartered to others, the transporting being done at the expense of the charterers, was not a common carrier, and hence he was not liable as an insurer for the loss of property carried by him on his scows. Bell v. Pidgeon (U. S.) 5 Fed. 634, 637.

So far as the responsibility of a "carrier" is concerned, the term includes a wagoner, who carries goods for hire, no matter whether transportation be his principal and direct business or an occasional and incidental employment. Gordon v. Hutchinson (Pa.) 1 Watts & S. 285, 286, 37 Am. Dec. 464.

Carrier by water.

A common carrier, says Judge Kent, consists of two distinct classes of persons, namely, inland carriers by land or water, and carriers by sea; and in the aggregate body are included the owners of stagecoaches who carry goods for hire, wagoners, teamsters, cartmen, the masters and owners of ships, and all water crafts, including steam vessels, and steam towboats belonging to internal, as well as coasting and foreign, navigation, lightermen, and ferrymen. Hale v. New Jersey Steam Nav. Co., 15 Conn. 539, 543, 39 Am. Dec. 398 (citing Story, Bailm. 319, 323); The Montana (U. S.) 22 Fed. 715, 726. Owners of a steam vessel carrying for hire the goods of all persons indefinitely from place to place are common carriers. Hale v. New Jersey Steam Nav. Co., 15 Conn. 539, 543, 39 Am. Dec. 398.

In 1 Pars. Mar. Law, c. 7, § 5, p. 173, it is said that one who carries by water in the same way and on the same terms as a common carrier by land is also a common carrier; or, in other words, it is not the land or water which determines whether a carrier of goods is a common carrier, but other considerations, which are the same in both cases; and a common carrier is said to be (page 74) one who offers to carry goods for any person between certain termini, as on a certain route. A vessel which advertises for cargo and passengers, and carried general cargo, but refused to carry cargo which would taint other cargo or be dangerous to passengers or would overload the vessel, is a common carrier. The Montana (U. S.) 22 Fed. 715, 728.

One who undertakes for reward to convey produce or goods of any sort from one place upon a river to another by boat is a common carrier. Craig v. Childress, 7 Tenn. (Peck) 270, 271, 19 Am. Dec. 751.

The phrase "common carrier" includes one who carries by water. McCaffrey v. Knapp, Stout & Co. Company, 74 Ill. App. 80, 85.

The owner of a steamboat employed to carry passengers and merchandise between port and port is a common carrier. The Hunters (U. S.) 12 Fed. Cas. 984.

Carrier of live stock or animals.

Carriers of live stock are held not to be common carriers. Michigan S. & N. I. R. Co. v. McDonough, 21 Mich. 165, 4 Am. Rep. 466; Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Perkins, 25 Mich. 329, 333, 12 Am. Rep. 275.

A common carrier is one who undertakes for hire or reward to transport the goods of those who choose to employ him from place to place. A common carrier who does not assume to act as such in the carriage of dogs is not liable as a common carrier. Honeyman v. Oregon & C. R. Co., 10 Pac. 628, 13 Or. 852, 57 Am. Rep. 20.

Carrier of mails.

A railroad company is not a common carrier as to mails, even though being engaged in the regular business of transporting goods for the public. Central R. & Banking Co. v. Lampley, 76 Ala. 357, 365, 52 Am. Rep. 334.

Carrier of passengers.

A common carrier is defined to be one whose business, occupation, or regular calling is to carry chattels for all persons who may choose to employ or remunerate him. A common carrier is one who undertakes as a business, for hire or reward, to carry from one place to another the goods of all persons who may apply for such carriage. Code, § 2263, defines a common carrier as one who undertakes to transport goods for a compensation, and who pursues the business constantly or continuously for any period of time or any distance of transportation. Under such definition the term "common carrier" does not include a carrier of passengers. Central of Georgia Ry. Co. v. Lippman, 36 S. E. 202, 205, 110 Ga. 665, 50 L. R. A. 673.

Common carriers are carriers of property, unless from the context it appears that carriers of persons are intended, for, when carriers of persons are spoken of, they are designated as common carriers of passengers or passenger carriers; and in an act providing that no preference for the transaction of the business of a common carrier upon the cars, in the depots, or upon the grounds shall be granted, the term must be limited to carriers of freight, and hence does not include hackmen. New York Cent. & H. R. R. Co. v. Sheeley, 27 N. Y. Supp. 185, 192.

A common carrier of persons is not a "common carrier" in the strict sense of the term. While a common carrier, in the transportation of property, is an insurer of its safe transit when the obligation is not qualified by contract, the negligence of a carrier of persons is essential to liability for injury to them. Brewer v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co., 26 N. E. 324, 325, 124 N. Y. 59, 11 L. R. A. 483, 21 Am. St. Rep. 647.

Commercial agency.

See "Commercial Agency."

Elevators in buildings.

See, also, "Carrier of Passengers"; "Common Carrier of Passengers."

No one can be considered as a common carrier unless he has in some way held himself out to the public as a carrier in such a manner as to render him liable to an action if he should refuse to carry for any one who wished to employ him. Allen v. Sackrider, 37 N. Y. 341. Hence the United States is not a common carrier in the operation of an elevator in a government building devoted to government purposes. Bigby v. United States (U. S.) 103 Fed. 597, 599.

Express and messenger companies.

An express company whose business it is to take for hire goods from the custody of the owner, assume entire possession and control of them, transfer them from place to place, and deliver them at a point of destination to consignees or agents authorized to receive them, though it transmits the goods by steamboats, railroads, coaches, etc., owned and controlled by other parties, is a common carrier. Buckland v. Adams Exp. Co., 87 Mass. 124, 129, 93 Am. Dec. 68; Christenson v. American Exp. Co., 15 Minn. 270, 279 (Gil. 208, 212) 2 Am. Rep. 122.

An express company which pursues continuously, for any period of time, the business of transporting goods, packages, etc., is a common carrier; and in case of loss of the goods, etc., the presumption of law is against it, and no excuse will avail it unless the loss was occasioned by the act of God or the public enemies of the state. Rev. Code, § 2040. Southern Exp. Co. v. Newby, 36 Ga. 635, 643, 91 Am. Dec. 783 (citing Fish v. Chapman, 2 Ga. [2 Kelly] 349, 46 Am. Dec. 393). See, also, Place v. Union Exp. Co. (N. Y.) 2 Hilt. 19, 26.

An express company is to be regarded as a common carrier, and its responsibility for the safe delivery of the property intrusted to it is the same as that of a carrier. Southern Exp. Co. v. McVeigh (Va.) 20 Gratt. 264, 286 (citing Belger v. Dinsmore [N. Y.] 51 Barb. 69).

A messenger company is a common carrier, as it undertakes as a business to carry from one place to another the goods of all persons who may apply for such carriage, provided the goods be of the kind which it professes to carry. Sanford v. American District Tel. Co., 34 N. Y. Supp. 144, 145, 13 Misc. Rep. 88.

Ferryman.

A ferryman holding himself out as carrying such goods as are offered to him for carriage is a common carrier. Dudley v. Camden & P. Ferry Co., 45 N. J. Law (16 Vroom) 368, 369, 46 Am. Rep. 781; Miles v. James (S. C.) 1 McCord, 157, 159; Cook v. Gourdin (S. C.) 2 Nott & McC. 19, 21.

The proprietors of a ferry are not under the obligations of a common carrier, but are bound only to use due care and diligence. City of New York v. Starin, 12 N. E. 631, 632, 106 N. Y. 1.

A common carrier is one who undertakes for hire or reward to transport the goods of such as choose to employ him from place to place. A public ferryman who, according to the statutes, has given bond, is a common carrier. Babcock v. Herbert, 3 Ala. 392, 396, 37 Am. Dec. 695.

Forwarder.

See "Forwarder."

Hackmen and truckmen.

A person who holds himself out to carry goods of all persons indiscriminately is a common carrier; and while a hackman comes within the general definition as stated in text-books, yet, when speaking of common carriers, we would not ordinarily understand his business to be included within that term. He transports passengers here and there about the streets of a village or city, having no established route over which his conveyance runs nor any specified times for making his trips. He assumes the right to let his rig for a day or any other specified time, to suit the convenience or wishes of his patrons. He gives exclusive use of his carriage to a less number of persons than it can conveniently accommodate, and is not a common carrier under the provisions of Laws 1892, c. 676, providing that no preference in the transaction of business of a common carrier on its cars or in its depots or buildings or on its grounds shall be granted by any railroad corporation to any one of two or more persons or corporations competing in the same business or in the business of transporting property for itself or others. Brown v. New York Cent. & H. R. R. Co., 27 N. Y. Supp. 69, 71, 75 Hun, 355. See, also, New York Cent. & H. R. R. Co. v. Sheeley, 27 N. Y. Supp. 185, 192.

One who is the proprietor of a line of omnibuses and baggage wagons, and engaged in carrying, for hire, passengers and their baggage, and also baggage alone, for all persons choosing to employ him, from, to, and between the various railroad depots and hotels of a city, and who has agents to solicit such business on the incoming trains, is a common carrier of goods as well as passengers, and as such is answerable for all losses which do not fall within the excepted cases of the act of God or the public enemy. Parmelee v. Lowitz, 74 Ill. 116, 117, 24 Am. Rep. 276.

A hackman who has no established route, place of business, or time of employment, though a carrier in a restricted sense, is not a common carrier. Godbout v. St. Paul Union Depot Co., 81 N. W. 835, 839, 79 Minn. 188, 47 L. R. A. 532.

A common carrier is one who, by virtue of his calling, undertakes, on recompense, to transfer personal property from one place to another for all such as may choose to employ him. The criterion is whether he carries for particular persons only or whether he carries for every one. If a man holds himself out to do it for every one who asks him, he is a common carrier. To be a common carrier one must exercise the business as a public employment; he must undertake to carry the goods for persons generally, and must hold himself out to engage in the transportation of goods for hire as a business, not as a casual occupation. One may be a common carrier who has no fixed termini, but leaves the course of transportation in each case to depend upon his customers' wishes. A firm describing themselves as truckmen and forwarding agents, who make a business of moving heavy machinery from place to place for hire for all who are willing to pay for it, are common carriers. Jackson Architectural Iron Works v. Hurlbut, 36 N. Y. Supp. 808, 809, 15 Misc. Rep. 93 (affirmed in Jackson Architectural Iron Works v. Hurlbut, 52 N. E. 665, 158 N. Y. 34, 70 Am. St. Rep. 432).

Common carriers are those who make a business of transporting goods from place to place, either by themselves or servants, and includes draymen, cartmen, porters, drivers of ox sleds, etc. Robertson v. Kennedy, 32 Ky. (2 Dana) 430, 431, 26 Am. Dec. 466.

Log boom company.

"One who transports property from one place to another without the use of any carriage, vehicle, or artificial motive power is not a common carrier. A boom company engaged in the business of driving and booming logs, though resembling a common carrier in the universality of its duty, and given by statute a lien upon these specific logs for the charges of transportation, is not a common carrier, since its chief business is to prevent the property from straying or stopping, and not to furnish motive power. The function of guiding and regulating things which move themselves or are moved by some independent force is not sufficient to establish the relation of common carrier." Mann v. White River L. & B. Co., 8 N. W. 350, 46 Mich. 38, 41 Am. Rep. 141.

Railroad company.

A railroad company is not a common carrier beyond its own terminal, over connecting lines, unless it become so by usage, character of business, or contract; and the payment of freight or fare beyond such terminal does not make it such common carrier. Piedmont Mfg. Co. v. Columbia & G. R. Co., 19 S. C. 353, 364.

Sleeping car company.

A sleeping car company is not a common carrier. Welding v. Wagner, 1 City Ct. R. 66.

The term "common carrier" cannot be applied to a sleeping car company whose cars are attached to, and movements controlled by, a railroad company which sells the tickets and collects the fares of passengers. Blum v. Southern Pullman Palace Car Co. (U. S.) 3 Fed. Cas. 755.

The proprietors of sleeping cars, who only furnish sleeping accommodation for travelers who have paid their transportation to the railroad company, over whose road the sleeping car runs, no part of which pay for transportation is received by the owners of the sleeping cars, are not common carriers, so as to be liable as such for property lost by, or stolen from, passengers while in their cars. Pullman Palace Car Co. v. Smith, 73 Ill. 360, 20 Am. Rep. 232.

The term "common carrier" does not include a sleeping car company, as its cars are under the control of the railroad company, except as to furnishing lodging to those who may pay for it; and the agents of the railroad company are entitled to determine who shall occupy the sleeping cars as a part of the train. Lemon v. Pullman Palace Car Co. (U. S.) 52 Fed. 262; Pullman Palace Car Co. v. Gavin, 23 S. W. 70, 93 Tenn. 53, 21 L. R. A. 298, 42 Am. St. Rep. 902; Welding v. Wagner (N. Y.) 1 City Ct. R. 66.

Special employment.

It is not sufficient to prove the owner of a sloop to be a common carrier, to prove that he was specially employed to make a trip for a load of grain for which he was to receive a sum of money. Allen v. Sack-rider, 37 N. Y. 341, 342.

Where a ship is chartered to carry the goods of a single freighter only upon a single voyage, it seems she is not a common carrier. Sumner v. Caswell (U. S.) 20 Fed. 249, 251.

Street railway.

See, also, "Common Carrier of Passengers."

A street railway company, by undertaking the transportation of passengers for hire, assumes toward its patrons the relation of common carrier; and the character of the easement possessed by it in its right of way is not material, so that it is still a common carrier, though its right of way passes over private property. East Omaha St. R. Co. v. Godola, 70 N. W. 491, 492, 50 Neb. 906.

Telegraph or telephone company.

See "Telephone Company."

A telegraph company, in the absence of a statutory enactment of that effect, is not a common carrier, and its obligations and liabilities are not to be measured by the rules applied to common carriers. Western Union Tel. Co. v. Carew, 15 Mich. 525, 532.

Telegraph companies are not common carriers, but they are governed by the law applicable to that class of bailments which are styled "locatio operis faciendi." Pinckney v. Western Union Tel. Co., 19 S. C. 71, 84, 45 Am. Rep. 765.

A common carrier is one who undertakes for hire or reward to carry from place to place the goods of those who choose to employ them. The fact that a corporation is declared by an ordinance to be a common carrier does not make it so, and, where the corporation was a telegraph company, it is not a common carrier. State v. City of St. Louis, 46 S. W. 981, 988, 145 Mo. 551, 42 L. R. A. 113.

Towboats, tugs, etc.

"Common carriers are those whose trade is to carry goods for hire. A common carrier cannot be held to the full measure of his liability as an insurer of goods unless they are absolutely under his control; as, for instance, the law regulating the responsibility of common carriers has been held not to apply to the carrying of intelligent beings, such as negroes, since the carrier has not over them the same absolute control that he has over inanimate matter. But the owner of a towboat is held liable as a common carrier of ships which he tows, even though the rudders of the ships might have some control over the course of the boats, since the vessels which are towed are almost entirely passive. By the contract for towing, the master of the towboat is bound to carry them safely to their destination, and, if the boat be so much under the influence of the rudder of the ship, it is the duty of the master to look to it. His undertaking is to tow the vessel in safety, and he has a right to assume all the authority necessary to effect that purpose. The commission and care of the vessel towed should be either subject to his commission whilst she is carried by his boat, or the rudder should be placed in the hands of one of his own men. A vessel thus towed should be considered as property carried for hire, in which her crew should not be regarded as having any lawful agency." Smith v. Pierce, 1 La. 349, 356. See, also, Adams v. New Orleans Steam Towboat Co., 11 La. 46; Walston v. Myers, 50 N. C. 174; White v. The Mary Ann, 6 Cal. 462, 470, 65 Am. Dec. 523; Ashmore v. Pennsylvania Steam Towing & Transportation Co., 28 N. J. Law (4 Dutch.) 180.

The owners of a steamboat who undertook to tow a freight boat for hire are not quoad hoc common carriers. Caton v. Rumney (N. Y.) 13 Wend. 387, 389. Nor a steamboat engaged in towing a barge. The James Jackson (U. S.) 9 Fed. 614. See, also, Wells v. Steam Nav. Co., 2 N. Y. (2 Comst.) 204; Leonard v. Hendrickson, 18 Pa. (6 Harris) 40, 55 Am. Dec. 587.

The owners of a steam tug or towboat engaged in the business of towing vessels from point to point, but not receiving the vessels or property on board of them into their care or custody otherwise than is involved in the mere act of towage, are not liable as common carriers. The Neaffle (U. S.) 17 Fed. Cas. 1260, 1261; Bothwell v. Vessel Owners' Towing Ass'n (U. S.) 3 Fed. Cas. 967. So, also, a steamboat towing a canal boat which remained in possession of its master and crew. Alexander v. Greene (N. Y.) 7 Hill, 533, 544.

Owners of towboats jobbing and towing on the Ohio river and its tributaries are not common, but are private, carriers. Varble v. Bigley, 77 Ky. (14 Bush) 698, 703, 29 Am. Rep. 435.

The weight of authority is that the owner of a steamboat engaged in the business of towing is not a common carrier. McCaffrey v. Knapp, Stout & Co. Company, 74 Ill. App. 80, 85.

COMMON CARRIERS OF CATTLE.

Railway carriers are not by the common law common carriers of live stock, and can only make themselves common carriers of that species of property by assuming to convey it as common carriers. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Perkins, 25 Mich. 329, 333, 12 Am. Rep. 275 (citing Michigan S. & N. I. R. Co. v. McDonough, 21 Mich. 163, 4 Am. Rep. 466).

A railroad is a common carrier of cattle, and as such is not responsible for losses occasioned by the cattle dying or being injured by heat, unless the loss or damage has been occasioned by the negligence of the company or its servants. Such a common carrier does not become a private carrier by a special contract whereby it is relieved from its responsibility as a common carrier. Maslin v. Baltimore & O. R. Co., 14 W. Va. 180, 188, 35 Am. Rep. 748.

COMMON CARRIER OF PASSENGERS.

A common carrier of passengers is one who undertakes for hire to carry all persons who may apply for passage. Gillingham v. Ohio River R. Co., 14 S. E. 243, 35 W. Va. 588, 14 L. R. A. 798, 29 Am. St. Rep. 827.

To constitute one a common carrier it is necessary that he should hold himself out as such. A carrier of passengers who undertakes to carry all persons who apply to him for transportation is engaged in a public employment, and is a public or common carrier of passengers. "A common carrier of passengers," says Judge Thompson, "is one who undertakes for hire to carry all persons indefinitely who may apply for passage." It is true that carriers of passengers are not common carriers as to the persons of those whom they carry, but common carriers are classified as carriers of goods and as carriers of passengers. Thompson & Houston Electric Co. v. Simon, 25 Pac. 147, 148, 20 Or. 60, 10 L. R. A. 251, 23 Am. St. Rep. 86.

A common carrier of passengers is one who undertakes for hire to carry all persons, indifferently, who may apply for passage. A railroad company is under no obligations to carry passengers on freight trains, or freight on passenger trains, but if it voluntarily designates freight trains to carry passengers, and permits its agents to sell tickets therefor to passengers generally, it becomes a common carrier of passengers, by the means so adopted. Richmond v. Southern Pac. Co., 67 Pac. 947, 949, 41 Or. 54, 57 L. R. A. 616, 93 Am. St. Rep. 694.

Elevators in buildings.

The law is well settled that persons operating elevators in buildings for the purpose of carrying persons from one story to another are common carriers of passengers. Springer v. Ford, 59 N. E. 953, 189 Ill. 430, 52 L. R. A. 930, 52 Am. St. Rep. 464 (citing Hartford Deposit Co. v. Sollitt, 172 Ill. 222, 50 N. E. 178, 64 Am. St. Rep. 35; Goodsell v. Taylor, 41 Minn. 207, 42 N. W. 873, 4 L. R. A. 673, 16 Am. St. Rep. 700); Western Union Tel. Co. v. Woods, 88 Ill. App. 375; Field v. French, 80 Ill. App. 78.

The owner of a passenger elevator for the use of tenants and others in a building, being under no obligation to carry passengers, is not a common carrier of passengers, within the meaning of Pub. St. c. 73, § 6, relating to the liability of common carriers of passengers. Seaver v. Bradley, 60 N. E. 795, 179 Mass. 329, 88 Am. St. Rep. 394; Bigby v. United States (U. S.) 103 Fed. 597, 599.

Street railway.

A street railway company is a common carrier of passengers. Spellman v. Lincoln Rapid Transit Co., 55 N. W. 270, 36 Neb. 890, 20 L. R. A. 316, 38 Am. St. Rep. 753; Dean v. Chicago General Ry. Co., 64 Ill. App. 165, 166; Omaha St. R. Co. v. Boeson (Neb.) 94 N. W. 619, 621.

COMMON CEDAR BLOCKS.

A resolution directing the paving of a street with common cedar blocks meant cedar blocks which were not necessarily sapless or free from sap, and hence a change in the specifications directing that the paving be done with sapless cedar blocks, which made a difference in the cost of the work of from $1,200 to $1,500, was a material change beyond the power of the board of public works. Common Council of City of Grand Rapids v. Grand Rapids Board of Public Works, 58 N. W. 335, 99 Mich. 392.

COMMON CONSENT.

The expression "common consent," as used in Ordinance 1787 providing that it shall be binding until "abrogated by common consent," means that, whenever the United States and this state shall agree that the whole or any part of the ordinance shall be repealed, it will, so far as it affects this state, become a dead letter. Phoebe v. Jay, 1 Ill. (Breese) 268, 272.

COMMON CONTROL.

Where a railroad company and a steamship company each receives and forwards freight which has been transported by the other and delivers freight to the other, but each makes its own rate and undertakes for the carriage and delivery of goods not otherwise than over its own route, the fact that both are interested in maintaining the traffic over their joint route, and so secure it against competition, does not bring such lines within the provisions of the Interstate commerce act as "lines under a common control, management, or arrangement for a continuous carriage or shipment from one state or territory of the United States to another." To make these carriers subject to the act, the railway and vessel must be operated or used under a common control—a control to which each are alike subject, and by which rates are prescribed and bills of lading given for the carriage of goods over both routes as one. Ex parte Koehler (U. S.) 30 Fed. 867, 870.

COMMON CONVENIENCE AND NECESSITY.

The phrase "common convenience and necessity," as used in reference to constructing a railroad in the highways from town to town, so as to parallel another railroad, when common convenience and necessity requires, has no legal meaning except when used to indicate a public necessity, which justifies some act affecting the rights of person or property which would not be justifiable if that necessity did not exist. In re Shelton St. Ry. Co., 38 Atl. 362, 363, 69 Conn. 626.

A city ordinance authorized the construction of a street when required by common convenience and necessity. Held, that a finding that public convenience and necessity of the city required the street was a sufficient finding of common convenience and public necessity; "public convenience" and "common convenience" being synonymous, public convenience being common to all citizens of the city. Dorman v. City Council of Lewiston, 17 Atl. 316, 318, 81 Me. 411.

"Common convenience and necessity," as used in Gen. St. § 2700, forbidding the layout of a highway, not crossing a railroad track, within 100 yards of such a track, unless first approved by a judge of the superior court on a finding that common convenience and necessity required it there, is an expression not very easy to define, but its meaning may be sufficiently well understood by considering the elements of which it is composed. When it is applied to a new highway, one element which properly enters into it is the one of expense—expense of laying out and constructing the highway, and the expense of maintaining it after it is laid out. It is not, however, the simple question of cost that is to be considered in such case, but the mixed question of cost compared with the ability of the municipality upon which the expense is cast to bear it. City of Hartford v. Day, 29 Atl. 480, 64 Conn. 250.

COMMON COUNCIL.

The phrase "common council," as used in an act relative to a municipal corporation, means the governing body of the city. Olliver v. Jersey City, 42 Atl. 782, 783, 63 N. J. Law, 96.

The use of the word "common" in a city ordinance making various appropriations for the fiscal years, which in its title describes the enacting body as the common council instead of the city council, as is required by the city charter, does not operate to render the ordinance void. Law v. People, 87 Ill. 385, 403.

COMMON COUNTS.

Different forms of the action of assumption at common law were divided into four classes: (1) The indebitatus count; (2) the quantum meruit count; (3) quantum valent; and (4) the account stated. The indebitatus count included a count for real property sold, and such count was used to recover the price or value of the estate sold by the plaintiff to the defendant. Nugent v. Teauchot, 35 N. W. 254, 255, 67 Mich. 571.

COMMON CURRENCY.

"Common currency," as used in a note executed in 1840, at a time when gold and silver or lawful coin had ceased to circulate as money and their place was supplied by bank issues or paper money, meant such bank notes or paper issues, and therefore the note was not payable in money, but in such bank notes as a commodity. Dillard v. Evans, 4 Ark. (4 Pike) 175, 178.

COMMON DILIGENCE.

See, also, "Ordinary Diligence."

"Common or ordinary diligence is that degree of diligence which men in general exercise in respect to their own concerns." Union Pac. R. Co. v. Rollins, 5 Kan. 167, 180; Litchfield v. White, 7 N. Y. (3 Seld.) 438, 442, 57 Am. Dec. 534. It is distinguished from high or great diligence, which is that with which prudent persons take care of their concerns, and slight diligence, which is that with which persons of less than common prudence, or, indeed, of any prudence at all, take care of their own concerns. Litchfield v. White, 7 N. Y. (3 Seld.) 438, 442, 57 Am. Dec. 534.

COMMON DRUNKARD.

See, also, "Habitual Drunkard."

In a statute expressly making the being a common drunkard an offense, the words by which the offense is created and defined are fully descriptive of it, and are therefore technical; and, because they are so, a party may well be charged in the general words of the statute in a complaint charging such offense. Commonwealth v. Boon, 68 Mass. (2 Gray) 74, 75.

In construing a statute authorizing the imprisonment in any inebriate or insane asylum of any person convicted of being an inebriate, habitual or common drunkard, it was said: "Just what would make a person such is not very clearly defined. Manifestly, it was intended that the drunkenness should be repeated to the extent of becoming habitual, but just how frequent it should occur, or the extent of the delirium or stupefaction, is left, as a matter of fact, to be determined by those who might differ widely in regard to it. Such conviction is not made dependent upon his inability to attend to business, nor to any want of physical self-control, nor upon his being dangerous to himself or others." Such a statute is in violation of Const. U. S. Amend. art. 14, § 1, which declares that no state shall deprive any person of liberty without due process of law, or deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws. State v. Ryan, 36 N. W. 823, 827, 70 Wis. 676.

"The exact degree of intemperance which constitutes a drunkard, it may not be easy to define, but speaking in general terms, and with the accuracy of which the matter is susceptible, he is a drunkard whose habit is to get drunk—whose ebriety has become habitual. To convict a man of the offense of being a common drunkard, it is at the least necessary to show that he is an habitual drunkard. Indeed, the terms 'drunkard' and 'habitual drunkard' mean the same thing. The word 'common' would seem to be used in the sense of 'public.'" Commonwealth v. Whitney, 71 Mass. (5 Gray) 85, 86.

The word "common" imports frequency, and it has been held that to convict a man on a charge of being a common drunkard it must be shown that he is an habitual drunkard. The law in no case undertakes to define how many instances of intoxication in any given time shall be deemed sufficient to fix upon a man the imputation of being a common drunkard. Commonwealth v. McNamee, 112 Mass. 285, 286.

The two phrases "common drunkard" and "habitual drunkard" have been held in some states to be synonymous in meaning. Either of the expressions may, in general terms, be defined as one who drinks intoxicating liquors to excess, with habitual frequency. Indulgence by a person, on the one hand, in occasional acts of drunkenness, would not be sufficient to bring him within the scope of the definition, nor, on the other hand, need he be constantly drunk every day or week in the year in order to be an habitual drunkard. Common observation, however, shows that there are people who are in the habit of getting drunk almost regularly every week, while they indulge in drink at no other time, and there are still others whose formed habit is to fall into drunken debauches lasting for days, and even weeks, and repeated from one year to another with a periodicity more or less regular, according to the peculiar temperament of the man. State v. Savage, 7 South. 183, 89 Ala. 1, 7 L. R. A. 426.

St. c. 244, § 24, declares that "every person who shall have been convicted three times, within a period of six months, of intoxication, under such circumstances as to amount to a violation of decency, or who shall be proved to have been thus intoxicated three times within the period of six weeks, shall be deemed a common drunkard. State v. Flynn, 11 Atl. 170, 171, 16 R. I. 10.

Within the contemplation of the statutes, to constitute a person a common drunkard who has not been convicted of intoxication under such circumstances as will amount to a violation of decency, he must be proved to have been so intoxicated three several times within a period of six weeks. The offense is not complete until he has been so intoxicated the third time. Then, and not until then, has he acquired the character of a "common drunkard," within the meaning of, and so as to be liable to prosecution under, the statute. State v. Kelly, 12 R. I. 535, 536.

Habitual intoxication from the use of chloroform will not sustain a complaint under St. p. 143, § 5, providing a punishment for "common drunkards." Burt v. Burt, 46 N. E. 622, 623, 168 Mass. 204 (citing Commonwealth v. Whitney, 65 Mass. [11 Cush.] 477).

COMMON EMPLOYMENT.

See "Same General Business"; "Same Grade of Employment."

"Servants, it is said, are engaged in a common employment when each of them is occupied in service of such kind that all the others, in the exercise of ordinary sagacity, ought to be able to foresee, when accepting their employment, that it may probably expose them to the risk of injury in case he is negligent." Baird v. Pettit, 70 Pa. (20 P. F. Smith) 477, 482; McAndrews v. Burns, 39 N. J. Law (10 Vroom) 117, 119. Thus, a draftsman in locomotive works is not engaged in the same common employment as workmen excavating a cellar under the building. Baird v. Pettit, 70 Pa. (20 P. F. Smith) 477, 482. So, also, a laborer whose duty it was to deliver appliances at the mouth of a mine shaft, or keep in repair the instrumentalities provided by the master for the safe conduct of laborers to and from such tunnel, was, in the view of the law, a fellow servant of one whose place of labor was in the tunnel, and they were engaged in a common employment. McAndrews v. Burns, 39 N. J. Law (10 Vroom) 117, 119.

Under the rule that the common employer is not responsible for injuries resulting from neglects committed by fellow servants upon each other in their common employment, by the term "common employment" is meant that the work upon which the servants are engaged is of the same general character. The trade of a carpenter differs from work of cutting and preparing ice for the purpose of storage, and servants thus engaged, each upon his appropriate work, cannot be said to be in common employment. Yet, where a carpenter by trade was engaged in cutting ice for storage, he was in the same occupation and common employment with the icemen, who were engaged in the same work. Johnson v. Armour (U. S.) 18 Fed. 490, 492.

COMMON FIELD LOTS.

"Town lots, outlots, common field lots, and commons were known and recognized parts of the Spanish town or commune of St. Louis. They existed by public authority, whether by concession, custom or permission." Vasquez v. Ewing, 42 Mo. 247, 256.

"Common field lots," as used in Act Cong. June 13, 1812, declaring that the rights, titles, and claims of town or village lots, outlots, common field lots, and commons adjoining and belonging to the several towns and villages named in the act, including St. Louis, which lots had been inhabited, cultivated, or possessed prior to the 20th of December, 1803, were thereby confirmed to the inhabitants of the respective towns and villages according to their several rights or rights in common thereto, is a term of American invention, and adopted by Congress to designate small tracts of ground of a peculiar shape, usually from one to three arpents in front by forty in depth, used by the occupants of the French villages for the purpose of cultivation, and protected from the inroads of cattle by a common fence. The peculiar shape of the lot, its contiguity to places of similar shape, and the purposes to which it was applied, constituted it a common field lot. It could not be confounded with lots or tracts of land of any other character. Glasgow v. Hortiz, 66 U. S. (1 Black) 595, 599, 17 L. Ed. 110.

In Act Cong. June 13, 1812, the term "common field lots" means lots in the vicinity of the village occupied and cultivated by the inhabitants of the village in a common field. Harrison v. Page, 16 Mo. 182, 203.

COMMON FISHERY.

See "Common of Fishery."

A "common fishery" is a very different thing from a "common of fishery"—the latter being a right held by an individual in common with the owner of the soil covered by the water in question; the former being a public or common right, which is or may be exclusive of the owner of the soil. Bennett v. Costar, 8 Taunt. 183. Sir William Blackstone, indeed, while he classifies the common fishery among the rights of profits a prendre which are capable of being held by private grant or private prescription, seems inclined to treat a free fishery as a species of royal franchise conferring upon the citizen an exclusive right in a public river; but in this he is criticised by Mr. Hargreave in Co.

Litt. 122a, note 7, who seems to think the term "free fishery" may appropriately be used to designate a common or public fishery. Certainly, the sort of fishing rights that were attempted to be set up in Cobb v. Davenport, 32 N. J. Law (3 Vroom) 369, and in Albright v. Courtright, 64 N. J. Law, 332, 45 Atl. 634, were common rights in the sense of being open to the inhabitants in general, and it was rights of this sort that the court decided could not be claimed under a custom, but must arise by grant or prescription. Albright v. Sussex County Lake & Park Commission, 53 Atl. 612, 618, 68 N. J. Law, 523.

COMMON FORM.

Under the English practice there were two modes of proving a will of personal property,—“the common form,” in which the will was propounded by the executor, and proved ex parte; “the solemn form,” in which the next of kin of the testator were cited to witness the proceedings, and in which the proof was taken per testes, or in form of law, as it was called. In Oregon probate in common form is the only one which appears to have been adopted by any positive enactment of the Legislature. Hubbard v. Hubbard, 7 Or. 42; Richardson v. Green (U. S.) 61 Fed. 423, 426, 9 C. C. A. 565; Luther v. Luther, 13 N. E. 166, 168, 122 Ill. 558.

A will is said to be proved in common form when the executor presents it for probate in absence of the parties in interest to be affected by the probate, and without citing them, proceeding ex parte with his proof; and it is said to be in solemn form when those in interest are cited to be present at the probate or approbation of the will. When a will is proved in common form, a court at any time within 30 years after probate may require the executor, of its own motion, or at the instance of the next of kin, or other person interested, to prove the will in solemn form. In re Straub, 24 Atl. 569, 570, 49 N. J. Eq. (4 Dick.) 264.

Probate of a will in common form is ex parte, and, when made, is prima facie only. It is allowed merely for convenience and on account of its informal character, and the fact that it is made without notice to any one is not conclusive from its date, but parties interested are allowed a given time within which to call for proof in solemn form. Sutton v. Hancock, 45 S. E. 504, 506, 118 Ga. 436.

COMMON GAMBLER.

The offense of being a common gambler consists in having acquired that character by acts of gambling; three or more acts being necessary for conviction. State v. Groves, 43 Atl. 181, 21 R. I. 252.

Pen. Code, § 344, defines a “common gambler” as a person who owns a place of gambling, or who hires or allows a room to be used for such purposes, or who engages as dealer, gamekeeper, or player in any gambling or banking game. Lyman v. Shenandoah Social Club, 57 N. Y. Supp. 372, 373, 39 App. Div. 459.

Under Pen. Code, § 344, an indictment for being a common gambler, charging defendant in one count with having played at dice for money in a certain village on a certain day, and in another count with having played at dice for liquor on the same day and in the same village, was not invalid as charging more than one crime, as the acts charged are but a series of acts showing the crime charged. People v. O'Malley, 64 N. Y. Supp. 843, 52 App. Div. 46.

COMMON GAMING HOUSE.

The keeping of a common gaming house, indictable at common law, does not consist in the keeping of the house for the playing of any particular unlawful game, or in the playing of any particular game by the visitors. The common law judges such an establishment to be per se a common nuisance. Accordingly, an indictment which charged the defendant with keeping a gaming room and place in a certain house where people came together for “play,” and remained to “game and play together,” was sufficient, though it did not state an offense under a statute, prohibiting the carrying on of the “bank” gambling games. Vanderwerker v. State, 13 Ark. 700, 703.

A common gaming house is a house or room kept for the purpose of permitting persons to resort to it and gamble therein for money or other valuable thing. It is the keeping or using the house or room or like place for gaming purposes that determines its character. The manner of fitting it up does not constitute a house a gaming house. The fact that the keeper has his bed or takes his meals in the room where the gaming is done does not necessarily change the character of the house. State v. Black, 94 N. C. 809, 812.

A gaming house is a common nuisance at common law, and as such indictable. The offense was the causing and procuring many persons to resort to such a house for the purpose of gaming, and for the defendant's profit, either upon the game itself or the incidental sale of oysters or other things. Such a house is an encouragement to idleness, cheating, and other corrupt practices; tends to produce public disorder by congregating many people, and to draw the young and unwary from the paths of virtue. It is also a nuisance if it hold out inducements and attractions to bring together persons in such numbers or so often as to make it injurious to the public and dangerous to the neighborhood, by drawing the sober and industrious into habits of idleness and vice, and corrupting the young and unwary. But it must be of such a character as to amount to a nuisance, or it is not an indictable offense; for a private person may allow gaming in his house without being guilty of a nuisance. State v. Layman (Del.) 5 Har. 510, 511.

The word "common," as applied to a gaming house, does not necessarily mean that it is open to all the public; and hence rooms used for gambling by a club, and such other persons as the members invite, constitute a common gaming house. Commonwealth v. Blankinship, 42 N. E. 115, 165 Mass. 40.

A common gaming house may be set up and kept in a single room of a house of many rooms, without any proof that the balance of the house was unoccupied. State v. Mohr, 55 Mo. App. 329, 332.

A common gambling house, within the meaning of the statute prohibiting such houses, may consist of a single room rented in a house of many rooms; and it may not necessarily be open to the whole public in common, nor the gambling be visible from the exterior, nor need gambling be the only business for which it is used, nor need it be constantly kept for that business, and it may be used for other business, and it may be also used as a sleeping room; but occasional games of poker privately played with acquaintances in a private room does not make it a common gambling house. State v. Mosby, 53 Mo. App. 571, 578.

The term "common gaming house" includes a house wherein the keeper permits persons to habitually assemble and engage in betting, winning, and losing money and property on the prospective rise and fall in stocks, bonds, grain, and other produce. Kneffer v. Commonwealth, 22 S. W. 446, 94 Ky. 359.

The term "common gaming house," as used in Cr. Code, § 129, providing for the punishment of any person who shall for his profit or gain keep, have, or maintain a common gaming house, cannot be construed to include a billiard saloon in which different persons play billiards on tables therein, it being the custom for the loser to pay a certain sum for the use of the table for each game that was played, for the billiard tables were merely kept for amusement and exercise of persons desiring to use them for that purpose, and not for the purpose of gaming for money. The fact that the persons using the tables may have played for the purpose of determining who should pay for their use does not render the saloon a common gaming house. Harbaugh v. People, 40 Ill. 294, 295.

A partly inclosed place within the inclosure of a race course, for the purpose of bookmaking and selling pools, contingent upon the result of horse racing, is a "common gambling house" within Ill. Rev. St. c. 38, § 127. Swigart v. People, 40 N. E. 432, 433, 154 Ill. 284.

COMMON HIGHWAY.

See "Common Road."

An allegation in an indictment that a certain road is a common highway made and laid out for the people of the state to go, return, and pass at their pleasure, etc., is equivalent to an allegation that the road was and is an established highway, under the statute punishing the obstruction of any public road or established highway, and providing for the removal of the obstruction. Palatka & I. R. Ry. Co. v. State, 3 South. 158, 23 Fla. 546, 11 Am. St. Rep. 395.

COMMON INFORMERS.

"Common informer" is a name used to designate the person commencing a qui tam action. In re Barker, 56 Vt. 14, 20.

At common law, suits for penalties were often prosecuted by informers. Some of these were called "common informers." These informers were empowered to bring action for penalties established by law in their names. United States v. Stocking (U. S.) 87 Fed. 857, 861.

COMMON IN GROSS.

Blackstone, in discussing the rights of common and how they may be acquired and held, says: "Common in gross or at large is such as is neither appendant or appurtenant to land, but is annexed to a man's person, being granted to him and his heirs by deed, or it may be claimed by prescriptive right, as by a parson of a church or the like corporation sole. This is a separate inheritance, entirely distinct from any landed property, and may be vested in one who has not a foot of ground in the manor." Mitchell v. D'Olier, 53 Atl. 467, 469, 68 N. J. Law, 375, 59 L. R. A. 949 (citing 2 Bl. Comm. 34).

A common in gross is one which has no relation to the tenure of the land, but is annexed by deed or prescription to a man's person. Van Rensselaer v. Radcliff, 10 Wend. 639, 647, 25 Am. Dec. 582.

A common in gross or at large is neither appurtenant nor appendant, but is a right annexed to the person, and is granted by deed or gained by prescriptive right. Smith v. Floyd, 18 Barb. 522, 527 (citing 2 Bl. Comm. 33).

COMMON INN.

"A 'common inn' is defined by Bacon to be a house for the entertainment of travelers and passengers in which lodging and necessities are provided for them and for their horses and attendants." Cromwell v. Stephens (N. Y.) 2 Daly, 15, 21, 3 Abb. Prac. (N. S.) 26, 33.

COMMON LABOR.

"Common labor," as used in Acts 1855, p. 159, making it criminal for any person to engage at common labor on Sunday, means "such acts of labor or business as may be performed on days of the week usually devoted to secular business in the pursuit of a legal employment." State v. Conger, 14 Ind. 396, 397.

A statute forbidding the exercise of any common labor on Sunday means "ordinary labor as contradistinguished from intellectual. Thus to construe it is to give to it both its strict and popular signification." Bloom v. Richards, 2 Ohio St. 387, 403.

Contracts.

"Common labor," as used in a statute prohibiting common labor on the Sabbath, does not include the making of a contract. Horacek v. Keebler, 5 Neb. 355, 358.

Rev. St. 1801, § 2000, providing that whoever, being over 14 years of age, is found on the first day of the week rioting, hunting, fishing, quarreling, at common labor, or engaged in his usual avocation, is not to be restricted in its meaning to mere manual labor, but the execution of ordinary contracts and the transactions to which they relate are acts of "common labor," within the meaning of the statute. Bryan v. Watson, 26 N. E. 666, 667, 127 Ind. 42, 11 L. R. A. 63.

Entertainments.

Cr. Code, § 241, providing for the punishment of any person found at common labor on Sunday, except in works of necessity and charity, cannot be construed to include the giving of a performance consisting of music, dancing, and feats of contortion. Wirth v. Calhoun, 89 N. W. 785, 786, 64 Neb. 316.

Execution of instruments.

Rev. St. 1838, p. 219, forbidding common labor on Sunday, includes the execution of a bond. Link v. Clemmens (Ind.) 7 Blackf. 479, 480.

"Common labor," within the meaning of the Sunday statute, prohibiting common-law labor on Sunday, except, etc., includes the making of a promissory note. Reynolds v. Stevenson, 4 Ind. 619.

Judicial or official business.

The term "common labor," as used in the Sunday laws, forbidding common labor, etc., on Sunday, does not include the holding of courts, and does not include ministerial transactions of judicial business. State v. Thomas, 56 N. E. 276, 279, 61 Ohio St. 444, 48 L. R. A. 459.

1 Chase's Laws, pp. 97-101, § 22, prohibiting common labor on Sunday, does not include acts of a public officer in the performance of official duty for several very satisfactory reasons: (1) Such duty is not within the ordinary meaning of the words. (2) In Bloom v. Richards, 2 Ohio St. 387, Thurman, J., in speaking of these words and the statute in which they occur, took occasion to say the law in question is a penal statute, and therefore to be strictly construed. Such statutes are not to be extended by implication. (3) An examination of the English statutes prohibiting labor, etc., on Sunday, shows the prohibition had no relation whatever to official duties. Hastings v. Columbus, 42 Ohio St. 585, 591.

Trading.

"Common labor," as used in the act prohibiting common labor on Sunday, neither in common parlance nor in its strict philological sense embraces the simple making of a bargain. Bloom v. Richards, 2 Ohio St. 387, 403.

As the term "common labor" is used in a statute prohibiting common labor on Sunday, it embraces the business of trading, bartering, selling, or buying goods, wares, and merchandise. City of Cincinnati v. Rice, 15 Ohio, 225, 241; Eitel v. State, 33 Ind. 201, 203; Sellers v. Dugan, 18 Ohio, 489, 493.

COMMON LAW.

See "Rules of Common Law."

Christianity as part of, see "Christianity."

"In every nation that has advanced a few steps beyond the first organization of political society and has made any progress in civilization, an extensive and important part of the rules which govern men is derived from what is called in certain countries 'common law,' and here 'jurisprudence.' This jurisprudence, or common law, in some nations is found in the decrees of their courts; in others it is furnished by private individuals eminent for their learned integrity, whose superior wisdom has enabled them to gain the proud distinction of legislating as it were for their country, and enforcing their legislation by the most noble of all means, that of reason alone. After a long series of years it is sometimes difficult to say whether these opinions and judgments were originally the effect of principles previously existing in society, or whether they were the cause of the doctrines which all men at last recognize. But whether the one or the other, when acquiesced in for ages, their force and effect cannot be distinguished from the statutory law. No civilized nation has been without such a system. None, it is believed, can be without it, and every attempt to expel it only causes it to return with increased strength on those who are so sanguine as to think it may be dispensed with." Saul v. His Creditors (La.) 5 Mart. (N. S.) 569, 582, 16 Am. Dec. 212.

The "common law" is not, in its nature and character, an absolute, fixed, and inflexible system, like the statute law, providing only for cases of a determinate form which fall within the letter of the language in which a particular doctrine or legal proposition is expressed. It is rather a system of elementary proceedings and of general juridical truths, which are conditionally explained with the progress of society, and adapting themselves to the gradual changes of trade and commerce and the mechanic arts, exigencies, and usages of the country. There are certain fundamental maxims in it which are never departed from, and there are others which, though true in a general sense, are at the same time susceptible of modifications and exceptions to prevent them from doing manifest wrong and injury. Pierce v. Proprietors of Swan Point Cemetery, 10 R. I. 227, 240, 14 Am. Rep. 667.

The "common law" consists of those principles, maxims, usages, and rules of action which observation and experience of the nature of man, the constitution of society, and the affairs of life have commended to enlightened reason as best calculated for the government and security of persons and property. Its principles are developed by judicial decisions as necessities arise from time to time demanding the application of those principles to particular cases in the administration of justice. The authority of its rules does not depend on positive legislative enactment, but on the principles they are designed to enforce, the nature of the subject to which they are to be applied, and their tendency to accomplish the ends of justice. It follows that these rules are not arbitrary in their nature nor invariable in their application, but from their nature, as well as the necessities in which they originate, they are and must be susceptible of a modified application, suited to the circumstances under which the application is to be made. People v. Randolph, 2 Parker, Cr. R. 174, 176.

The rule of civil conduct prescribed and recognized by the supreme power of a state, commanding what in its opinion is right or convenient, and prohibiting what is wrong or inconvenient, is based upon certain principles which can neither be ignored nor left out, and these principles, controlled in their application by custom, constitute "common law." Hulings v. Hulings Lumber Co., 18 S. E. 620, 627, 38 W. Va. 351.

"The common law has been aptly called the 'lex non scripta,' because it is a rule prescribed by the common consent and agreement of the community as being applicable to its different relations, and capable of preserving the peace, good order, and harmony of society, and rendering unto every one that which of right belongs to him. Its sources are to be found in the usages, habits, manners, and customs of a people; its seat in the breast of the judges who are its expositors and expounders. Every nation must of necessity have its common law, let it be called by what name it may, and it will be simple or complicated in its details as society is simple or complicated in its relations. A few plain and practical rules will do for a wandering horde of savages, but they must and will be much more extensively ramified when civilization has polished, and commerce and arts and agriculture enriched, a nation. The common law of a country will therefore never be entirely stationary, but will be modified and extended by analogy, construction, and custom so as to embrace new relations springing up from time to time from an amelioration or change of society." Jacob v. State, 22 Tenn. (3 Humph.) 493, 514.

"The common law consists of a few broad and comprehensive principles, founded on reason, natural justice, and enlightened public policy. * * * It has its foundations in the principles of equity, natural justice, and that general convenience which is public policy." Edgerly v. Barker, 31 Atl. 900, 905, 66 N. H. 434, 28 L. R. A. 328 (quoting Norway Plains Co. v. Boston & M. R. Co., 67 Mass. [1 Gray] 263, 267, 268, 61 Am. Dec. 423).

The common law "is a system of principles not capable of expansion, but always existing and attaching to whatever particular matter or considerations may arise or come within the one or other of them." "The common law is derived from immemorial usage or custom, originating from acts of Parliament not recorded, or which are lost or have been destroyed. It is a system of jurisprudence founded on the immutable principles of justice, and denominated by the greatest luminary of the law of England 'the perfection of reason.' Its evidences are the treatises of the sages of the law, the judicial records or adjudications of the courts of justice of England." Per Chase, C. J., in State v. Buchanan (Md.) 5 Har. & J. 317, 365, 9 Am. Dec. 534.

The common law of England may be said to consist of a collection of principles found in the opinions of sages, or deduced from universal and immemorial usage, and receiving progressively the sanction of the courts. The best evidence of the common law is found in the decision of the courts, contained in numerous volumes of reports, and in the treatises and digests of learned men. Lux v. Hagglin, 10 Pac. 674, 750, 69 Cal. 255.

The common law of England is derived from memorial usage and custom, originating from the acts of Parliament, not recorded, or which have been destroyed or lost. It is a system of jurisprudence founded on the principles of justice, and in the United States is composed partly of the common law of England, and partly of the usages which have grown up and are indigenous to the United States. Barry v. Village of Port Jervis, 72 N. Y. Supp. 104, 112, 64 App. Div. 268.

"There is no common law of the United States, in the sense of a national customary law, distinct from the common law of England, as adopted by the several states each for itself, applied as its local law, and subject to such alterations as may be provided by its own statutes. Wheaton v. Peters, 33 U. S. (8 Pet.) 591, 8 L. Ed. 1055. A determination in a given case of what that law is may be different in a court of the United States from that which prevails in the judicial tribunals of a particular state. This arises from the circumstance that the courts of the United States, in cases within their jurisdiction, where they are called upon to administer the law of the state in which they sit or by which the transaction is governed, exercise an independent though concurrent jurisdiction, and are required to ascertain and declare the law according to their own judgment. There is, however, one clear exception to the statement that there is no national common law. The interpretation of the Constitution of the United States is necessarily influenced by the fact that its provisions are framed in the language of the English common law, and are to be read in the light of its history. The code of constitutional and statutory construction which, therefore, is gradually formed by the judgments of this court in the application of the Constitution and laws, and treaties made in pursuance thereof, has for its basis so much of the common law as may be implied in the subject, and constitutes a common law resting on national authority." Smith v. Alabama, 8 Sup. Ct. 564, 569, 124 U. S. 465, 31 L. Ed. 508; United States v. Wong Kim Ark, 18 Sup. Ct. 456, 459, 169 U. S. 649, 42 L. Ed. 890.

"There can be no common law of the United States as a unit. What is common law in one state is not necessarily so in another. In the various states the common law as recognized is by no means uniform. This want of uniformity springs from the fact that in many of them the legislatures have adopted the common law and certain English statutes passed by Parliament prior to a particular date fixed in the act of adoption. In most of those states which were a part of the original thirteen colonies, and which have not adopted the common law and the British statutes by legislative enactment, the courts have defined the 'common law' to be the 'lex non scripta,' and such statutes of Great Britain of a general nature, in amendment of the common law, not locally inapplicable, nor in conflict with the Constitution of the United States, the acts of Congress, or the constitution and laws of the particular states, and which are suitable to the condition of their inhabitants, in force at the time of the emigration of our ancestors. Patterson v. Winn, 30 U. S. (5 Pet.) 233, 8 L. Ed. 108. There are three classes of common law as recognized in the United States of America: First, in those states which were a part of the original colonies, and which have not by legislation adopted statutes passed prior to a particular date, the unwritten law, and such general British statutes applicable to their condition as were in force at the time of the formation of the colonial governments, and such as were afterwards adopted, expressly or tacitly, constituted the common law; second, in those states which have adopted the common law and the British statutes passed and in force prior to the date fixed in the act of adoption, and were of a general nature and suitable to their situation, such common law and statutes constitute their common law; and, third, in those states and territories which were not of the original colonies, and which have not in terms adopted any English statutes, but have adopted the common law, the unwritten or common law of England, and the acts of Parliament of a general nature, not local to Great Britain, which had been passed and were in force at the date of the War of the Revolution, and not in conflict with the Constitution or laws of the United States, nor of the state or territory, and which were suitable to the wants and conditions of the people, are the common law of such states and territories." Browning v. Browning, 9 Pac. 677, 682, 3 N. M. (Johns.) 371.

There is "no national common law in the United States distinct from that adopted by the several states, each for itself, except so far as the history of the English common law may be involved in the interpretation of the federal Constitution. The judicial decisions, the usages and customs of the respective states, determine to what extent the common law has been introduced. What is common law in one state may not be so considered in another. It must also be remembered that we have no such courts in this country deriving their existence from the common law. They are all established either by the provisions of the organic law or by legislative enactments." In re Dean, 22 Atl. 385, 386, 83 Me. 489, 13 L. R. A. 229.

There is within the boundaries of the several states no common law of the United States as a distinct sovereignty; neither the Congress or Constitution having adopted that law, and the power of the nation to make laws within the field of power assigned to it by the Constitution being exercised only by express enactments of Congress or by treaties. Swift v. Philadelphia & R. R. Co. (U. S.) 64 Fed. 59, 61.

In considering the question whether ministers were exempt from taxation, the Supreme Court of New Hampshire says that, if they are exempt, it must be so because by the usage of the state from the earliest times of which we have any knowledge, i. e., by the common law of the state, the estates of persons of his character and description have been exempt. Kidder v. French, Smith, 155, 158.

Civil law distinguished.

The act of 1850, in adopting the "common law of England," designates the common law as interpreted, as well in the English courts as in the states of the Union that have adopted the English common law, and does not designate the civil law, nor the jus commune antiquum, or Roman "law of nature" of some of the civil law commentators, nor the Mexican law, nor any hybrid system. Lux v. Hagglin, 10 Pac. 674, 741, 69 Cal. 255.

As common law of England

The common law consists of those principles and forms which grew out of the customs and habits of the people, and therefore in its very nature involves only so much of the English law as is adapted to our circumstances and customs. In re Pennock's Estate, 20 Pa. 268, 274, 59 Am. Dec. 718.

"Every country has its common law. Ours is composed partly of the common law of England and partly of our own usages. When our ancestors emigrated from England, they took with them such of the English principles as were convenient for the situation in which they were about to place themselves. It required time and experience to ascertain how much of the English law would be suitable to this country. By degrees, as circumstances demanded, we adopted the English usages, or substituted others better suited to our wants, until at length, before the time of the Revolution, we had formed a system of our own, founded in general on the English Constitution, but not without considerable variations." Guardians of the Poor v. Greene (Pa.) 5 Bin. 554, 557.

The Constitution of the United States, amend. 7, provides that in suits at common law, where the value in controversy shall exceed $20, the right of trial by jury shall be preserved, and no fact tried by a jury shall be otherwise re-examined in any of the courts of the United States than according to the rules of the common law. It was held that the "common law" refers to the common law of England. Capital Traction Co. v. Hof, 19 Sup. Ct. 580, 582, 174 U. S. 1, 43 L. Ed. 873. As used in the clause of a constitution providing that in suits at common law, where the value in controversy shall exceed $20, the right of trial by jury shall be preserved, does not mean "the common law of any individual state, but the common law of England, the great reservoir of all jurisprudence." United States v. Wonsan (U. S.) 28 Fed. Cas. 745, 750.

The term "common law," as used in Gen. St. § 3021, providing that the common law of England, so far as it is not repugnant to or in conflict with the Constitution and laws of the United States or the Constitution and laws of this state, shall be the rule of decision in all the courts of this state, "was employed in the sense in which it is generally understood in this country, and the intention of the Legislature was to adopt only so much of it as was applicable to our condition. The common law of England is not to be taken in all respects to be that of America. Our ancestors brought with them its general principles, and claimed it as their birthright, but they brought with them and adopted only that portion which was applicable to their situation. Van Ness v. Pacard, 27 U. S. (2 Pet.) 137, 144, 7 L. Ed. 374. 'The common law,' says Chancellor Kent, 'so far as it is applicable to our situation and government, has been recognized and adopted as one entire system by the Constitutions of Massachusetts, New York, New Jersey, and Maryland. It has been assumed by the courts of justice, or declared by statute, with the like modifications, as the law of the land in every state. It was imported by our colonial ancestors as far as it was applicable.'" Reno Smelting, Milling & Reduction Works v. Stevenson, 21 Pac. 317, 319, 20 Nev. 269, 4 L. R. A. 60, 19 Am. St. Rep. 364 (citing 1 Kent, Comm. 473).

As a rule the term "common law" means both the common law of England, as opposed to statutes or written laws, and the statutes passed before the immigration of the first settlers to America. Cowhick v. Shingle, 37 Pac. 689, 692, 5 Wyo. 87, 25 L. R. A. 608, 63 Am. St. Rep. 17.

"The common law of England has been considered as not put in force, directly or indirectly, by means of any clause in the Constitution of the United States, so as to create, make, or help to make anything an offense which has not been made so by the Constitution itself, or acts of Congress passed under it. Dup. Jur. p. 9, says the common law of the United States is no longer the source of power or jurisdiction, but the means or instrument through which it is exercised. At the same time, in deciding on private rights in civil cases, which must often be according to the laws of the respective states, the common law will govern so far as it is in force in each state. But it will be the law of that state rather than of the United States." United States v. New Bedford Bridge (U. S.) 27 Fed. Cas. 91, 107.

The term "common law of England," as used in Comp. St. 1901, c. 15a, refers to that general system of law which prevails in England and in most of the United States by derivation from England, as distinguished from the Roman or civil-law system. It does not require adherence to the English common-law courts prior to the Revolution in case the courts of the state consider subsequent decisions, either in England or America, better expositions of the general principles of that system. Williams v. Miles (Neb.) 94 N. W. 705, 708, 62 L. R. A. 383.

Equity and admiralty distinguished.

Mr. Justice Story, in Parsons v. Bedford, 28 U. S. (3 Pet.) 452, 7 L. Ed. 732, in defining the meaning of the phrase "common law" as used in the seventh amendment to the Constitution, providing that in suits at common law, where the value in controversy shall exceed $20, the right to trial by jury shall be reserved, said the phrase "common law" found in this clause is used in contradistinction to "equity and admiralty and maritime jurisprudence." The Constitution had declared in the third article that the judicial power is extended to all cases in law and equity arising under this Constitution, the laws of the United States, and treaties made or which shall be made under their authority, and to all cases of admiralty and jurisdiction. It is well known that, in civil causes in courts of equity and admiralty, juries do not intervene, and that courts of equity use the trial by jury only in extraordinary cases to inform the conscience of the court. When, therefore, we find the amendment requires that the right of trial by jury shall be preserved in suits at common law, the natural conclusion is that this distinction was present to the minds of the framers of the amendment. By common law they meant what the Constitution denominated in the third article law; not merely suits which the common law recognized among its old and settled proceedings but suits in which legal rights were to be ascertained and determined in contradistinction to those where equitable rights alone were recognized and equitable remedies were administered, or where, as in the admiralty, a mixture of public law and of maritime law and equity were often found in the same suit. Klever v. Seawall (U. S.) 65 Fed. 393, 395, 12 C. C. A. 661.

In the seventh amendment of the Constitution of the United States, and in the judiciary acts, by "common law" is meant what the Constitution denominated in the third article "law"; not merely suits which the common law recognized among its old and settled proceedings, but suits in which legal rights were to be ascertained and determined, in contradistinction to those where equitable rights alone were recognized and equitable remedies administered (Fenn v. Holme, 62 U. S. [21 How.] 481, 486, 16 L.

Ed. 198; Michaelson v. Cantley, 32 S. E. 170, 172, 45 W. Va. 533; United States v. Block [U. S.] 24 Fed. Cas. 1176, 1179); or where, as in admiralty, a measure of public law and of maritime law and equity was often found in the same suit (United States v. Block [U. S.] 24 Fed. Cas. 1176, 1179). Thus a fact once tried by a jury cannot be retried or re-examined except by another jury, if either party require it, according to such procedure. Michaelson v. Cantley, 32 S. E. 170, 172, 45 W. Va. 533.

Equity jurisprudence included.

The term "common law" in its broadest sense includes those doctrines of equity jurisprudence which have not been expressed in legislative enactments. Campbell v. Colorado Coal & Iron Co., 10 Pac. 248, 250, 9 Colo. 60.

In the statute providing that "so much of the common law of England as is applicable and not inconsistent with the Constitution of the United States, the organic law of this territory, or any law passed or to be passed by the Legislature of this territory, is adopted and declared to be law within this territory," the phrase "common law" was not used in contradistinction to the rules of equity. It undoubtedly includes the law derived from the English Court of Chancery. Bloomfield State Bank v. Miller, 75 N. W. 569, 570, 55 Neb. 243, 44 L. R. A. 387, 70 Am. St. Rep. 381.

Statute law distinguished.

According to Kent, the "common law" includes those principles, usages, and rules of action applicable to the government and security of person and property which do not rest for their authority upon any expression and positive declaration of the will of the Legislature. 1 Kent, Comm. 471. As Blackstone says: "Whence it is that in our law the goodness of a custom depends upon its having been used time out of mind, or in the solemnity of our legal phrase time 'whereof the memory of man runneth not to the contrary.' This it is that gives it its weight and authority. And of this nature are the maxims and customs which compose the common law, or 'lex non scripta,' of this kingdom. This unwritten or common law is properly distinguishable into three kinds: (1) General customs, which are the universal rule of the whole kingdom, and form the 'common law' in its stricter and more usual signification." 1 Bl. Comm. 67. In Black's Law Dictionary, p. 232, it is thus defined: "As distinguished from law created by the enactment of legislatures, the 'common law' comprises the bodies of those principles and rules of action relating to the government and security of persons and property which derive their authority solely from usages and customs of immemorial antiquity, or from the judgment and decrees of the courts recognizing, affirming, and enforcing such usages and customs, and in this sense particularly the ancient unwritten law of England." Western Union Tel. Co. v. Call Pub. Co., 21 Sup. Ct. 561, 564, 181 U. S. 92, 45 L. Ed. 765.

The term "common law" is constantly and generally used in contradistinction to "statute law." It is used in such sense in Act 1776, providing a scheme of descents, and providing that, in all cases of descent not provided for by the act, the common law shall govern. "If it had been intended to recognize any state enactments of England, we should usually expect to find some clear expression of such an intention by some appropriate words." Levy v. McCarter, 31 U. S. (6 Pet.) 102, 110, 8 L. Ed. 334.

Statute of frauds.

In the case of Pyeatt v. Powell (U. S.) 2 C. C. A. 367, 51 Fed. 551, it was decided that while the common law could not presume to exist in the Indian Territory on March 1, 1889, when Congress created a United States court in the territory, yet, such court having been created, it would be inferred that Congress intended that such court should apply rules and principles of the common law to the adjudication of such cases as came before it. The phrase "common law" as so used was intended to signify those rules and principles of common law, not embodied in the provisions of any statute, which are termed "lex non scripta," and thus does not embrace the statute of frauds. So that a verbal lease of land for a seven years' term made prior thereto was valid. Wilson v. Owens (U. S.) 86 Fed. 571, 573, 30 C. C. A. 257.

Statute of uses.

Common law is composed of ancient maxims and customs. 1 Bl. Comm. (Cooley [3d Ed.] 67). In determining whether the common law of this country consists of the ancient common law or the common law with statutory definitions, it has been stated by the Massachusetts court, generally and particularly, with reference to the statute of uses: "The statute of uses being enforced in England when our ancestors came here, they brought it with them as an existing modification of the common law, and it has always been considered a part of our law." Marshall v. Fisk, 6 Mass. 24, 4 Am. Dec. 76. It has been observed that English statutes passed before the emigration of our ancestors, applicable to our situation, or in amendment or amelioration of the common law, are part and parcel of the common law of our country. 5 Am. Reg. 644. While there have been conflicting theories as to the origin of the law in America, it has been settled that the law of England as it existed at the time of the colonial settlement is the common law in this country, with the exception of Louisiana. But the statute of uses is not a part of the common law in Nebraska. Farmers' & Merchants' Ins. Co. v. Jensen, 78 N. W. 1054, 1055, 58 Neb. 522, 44 L. R. A. 861.

COMMON-LAW ACTION.

Within the meaning of Act March 3, 1887, c. 373, § 1, 24 Stat. 552, Act Aug. 13, 1888, c. 866, § 1, 25 Stat. 433 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 508] § 1, providing that courts of the United States shall have original cognizance of all suits of a civil nature, at common law or in equity, the expression "at common law" does not mean such a suit as existed at common law. It is used to distinguish it from a criminal action, or from an action to enforce a regulation arising under the police power of the state, or an action to recover penalty; but in such a sense proceedings for a condemnation of land are suits at common law. Kirby v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. (U. S.) 106 Fed. 551, 555. See, also, United States v. Block (U. S.) 24 Fed. Cas. 1174, 1175.

COMMON-LAW ASSIGNEE.

A "common-law assignee," under our statute, is a representative of creditors. He is in effect a lienholder, in trust for creditors. Emerson v. Detroit Steel & Spring Co., 100 Mich. 127, 130, 58 N. W. 659.

COMMON-LAW ASSIGNMENT.

The words "common-law assignment" in How. Ann. St. § 8739, providing that all instruments commonly called "common-law assignments for the benefit of creditors" shall be void unless without preference, etc., as construed by the Supreme Court of Michigan include such general assignments as were known to the common-law, in which the failing debtor undertook to divide his property to the payment of his debts through a trustee. An instrument creating a trust to sell lands for the benefit of creditors, which does not withdraw the debtor's equity of redemption in the property from the reach of his other creditors, and under which he or they could compel a reconveyance in payment of the debts secured, does not constitute a common-law assignment. Ontario Bank of Toronto v. Hurst (U. S.) 103 Fed. 231, 235, 43 C. C. A. 193.

COMMON-LAW CERTIORARI.

See "Certiorari."

COMMON-LAW CHEAT.

To constitute a common-law "cheat," the money or property must have been obtained by means of some false token, symbol, or device, as distinguished from mere words, however false and fraudulent. As the act of obtaining goods by false pretenses is made indictable by another section, it must be held that, to constitute the crime of swindling, the property must have been obtained by some false token or device other than mere words. State v. Wilson, 75 N. W. 715, 716, 72 Minn. 522.

Perhaps the commonly accepted definition of "common-law cheat" is that it is a fraud wrought by some false symbol or token, of a nature against which common prudence cannot guard, to the injury of one in pecuniary interest; but it is also given a wider signification, and is sometimes defined as the fraudulent obtaining of the property of another by any deceitful practice or token, short of felony, which affects or may affect the public. Under this definition the cheat need not necessarily be accomplished through the use of a symbol or token. Where defendant, a married man, pretended, under a fictitious name to an unmarried woman, that he was single, and by these means, together with his promise to marry her, obtained money from her, he was not a false token, and hence was not guilty of obtaining money by false pretenses by means of a false token. State v. Renick, 56 Pac. 275, 276, 33 Or. 584, 44 L. R. A. 266, 72 Am. St. Rep. 758.

COMMON-LAW COMPOSITION.

See "Agreement for Common-Law Composition."

COMMON-LAW COURT.

The term "common-law courts" is used in England to designate the courts administering the common law. Equitable Life Assur. Soc. v. Paterson, 41 Ga. 338, 364, 5 Am. Rep. 535.

COMMON-LAW CRIMES.

"Common-law crimes" are crimes which are punishable by the force of the common law, as distinguished from crimes created by statute. There are no common-law crimes against the United States. In re Greene (U. S.) 52 Fed. 104, 111.

COMMON-LAW DEDICATION.

See "Dedication."

COMMON-LAW JURISDICTION.

The court authorized to hear and determine all complaints or prosecutions in like manner as justices of the peace and having jurisdiction of all civil suits and actions cognizable by a justice of the peace exercises a common law jurisdiction. Ex parte Gladhill, 49 Mass. (8 Metc.) 168, 170.

The state courts mentioned in the act of Congress as having common-law jurisdiction are such as exercise their powers according to the course of the common law. It was not meant they should have all common-law jurisdiction over every class of subjects, including all civil and criminal matters. If this were so, it is apprehended but few courts could be found in any of the states that would possess the requisite common-law jurisdiction. As a matter of fact, some subjects are excluded from the original jurisdiction of circuit courts in this state and in the state of Missouri, and perhaps no court in either state could be found with such extended and unlimited jurisdiction as to include within that jurisdiction all subjects determinable in the various courts, either under the statute or under the common law. Courts having exclusive jurisdiction in criminal causes, with no civil jurisdiction, are nevertheless courts of general jurisdiction, though limited to a certain class of cases, and may and do exercise their powers, together with those having jurisdiction only in civil cases, according to the course of the common law, and their jurisdiction may, with as much propriety as with many of the common-law courts of England, be said to be general. People v. McGowan, 77 Ill. 644, 648, 20 Am. Rep. 254.

The expression "common-law jurisdiction," as used in Rev. St. U. S. § 2165 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1329], conferring power to issue papers of naturalization upon every court of record in any individual state having a common-law jurisdiction, "is capable of no other meaning than jurisdiction to try and decide cases which were cognizable by the courts of law under what is known as the 'common law' of England. Our judicial system having been modeled chiefly after that of England, we have adopted the nomenclature which prevailed in her courts; hence when we speak, through our statutes and courts, of common-law actions, proceedings at common law, and common-law jurisdiction, we mean such actions, proceedings, and jurisdiction as appertain to the common law of England as administered through her courts." In re Conner, 39 Cal. 98, 100, 2 Am. Rep. 427; Kenyon v. Kenyon, 24 Pac. 829, 830, 3 Utah, 431; United States v. Power (U. S.) 27 Fed. Cas. 607, 608. But the statute does not require that the court shall exercise all the common-law jurisdiction which pertains to all classes of cases. United States v. Power (U. S.) 27 Fed. Cas. 607, 608; In re Dean, 22 Atl. 385, 386, 83 Me. 489, 13 L. R. A. 229.

COMMON-LAW JURY.

See "Jury."

COMMON-LAW LIEN.

Liens are, so far as the source of their creation is concerned, divisible into common law, equitable, maritime, and statutory.

Originally, by the common law, a lien consisted merely in the right to retain possession, under certain circumstances, of the property of another until some debt or charge was paid. Equitable liens did not depend upon possession, nor, strictly speaking, did they constitute a jus in re or a jus ad rem, but more properly constituted a charge upon the thing. 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 1215; Peck v. Jenness, 48 U. S. (7 How.) 612, 12 L. Ed. 841. At common law, though ordinarily the delivery of possession by the one entitled to a lien destroyed or terminated the lien, yet by contract the parties might agree to continue the lien after delivery, or, in other words, might agree that the property, after delivery, should be subject to be taken and sold if the purchase price or other charge thereon was not paid. Gregory v. Morris, 96 U. S. 619, 24 L. Ed. 740. In equity, the lien consisted in the right to subject the property, even though not in possession of the lienor, to the payment of the debt or claim, as a charge upon the property; and a maritime lien is of like nature in this respect. Thus, in the Case of Rock Island Bridge, 73 U. S. (6 Wall.) 213, 18 L. Ed. 753, it is said: "A maritime lien, unlike a lien at common law, may in many instances exist without possession of the thing upon which it is asserted, either actually or constructively. It confers, however, upon its holder such a right in the thing that he may subject it to condemnation and sale to satisfy his claim for damages." Bouvier defines a "lien" to be "a hold or claim which one has upon the property of another as security for some debt or charge." When, therefore, a statute declares that under certain circumstances a person shall have a lien upon a certain class of property for a debt due or charge due, what is meant is that the person shall have the right to hold the property for, or subject it to, the payment of the claim or charge. On the other hand, if the statute declares that the person shall have the right, under the given circumstances, to hold certain property for, or subject it to, the payment of a certain claim or charge, this in like manner creates and confers a lien, although the word "lien" may not be used in the statute. It is the right to hold or subject the property to the payment of the claim or debt that constitutes the lien, and the mere words used in the statute are immaterial, so long as the substantial right itself is created. The Menominee (U. S.) 38 Fed. 197, 199.

COMMON-LAW MARRIAGE.

A marriage not solemnized in the ordinary way, but created by an agreement to marry, followed by cohabitation, is designated in the books and by counsel as a "common-law marriage." Taylor v. Taylor, 44 Pac. 675, 7 Colo. App. 549; Taylor v. Taylor, 50 Pac. 1049, 10 Colo. App. 303.

A common-law marriage exists when the man and woman enter into an agreement to become husband and wife, and live together as husband and wife, and in pursuance of such agreement do live together and cohabit as husband and wife, and hold each other to the public as husband and wife; and such agreement may be either express or implied, an express agreement being where the parties thereto expressly agree, and an implied agreement being one where the conduct of the parties with reference to the subject-matter is such as to induce the belief that they intended to do that which their acts indicate they have done. Cuneo v. De Cuneo, 59 S. W. 284, 285, 24 Tex. Civ. App. 436.

A common-law marriage is a consummated agreement to marry between a man and a woman, per verba de præsenti, followed by cohabitation.—Morrill v. Palmer, 33 Atl. 829, 830, 68 Vt. 1, 33 L. R. A. 411.

To constitute a common-law marriage, the contract and consent must be per verba de præsenti, or, if made per verba de futuro cum copula, it is presumed that the parties at the time of the copula accepted each other as man and wife. Port v. Port, 70 Ill. 484; Hebblethwaite v. Hepworth, 98 Ill. 126; Cartwright v. McGown, 121 Ill. 388, 12 N. E. 737, 2 Am. St. Rep. 105; Stoltz v. Doering, 112 Ill. 234; Hiler v. People, 156 Ill. 511, 41 N. E. 181, 47 Am. St. Rep. 221. It is not sufficient to agree to present cohabitation, and a future marriage when more convenient. Robertson v. State, 42 Ala. 509; Duncan v. Duncan, 10 Ohio St. 181, 182; In re Beverson's Estate, 47 Cal. 621; Fryer v. Fryer (S. C.) Rich. Eq. Cas. 85; Maher v. Maher, 56 N. E. 124, 126, 183 Ill. 61; In re Maher's Estate, 68 N. E. 159, 160, 204 Ill. 25.

COMMON-LAW MORTGAGE.

"A formal or common-law mortgage has the component parts of a deed, conveying the fee, with the condition added that it is to be void upon the payment of a specified debt, or the performance of some other designated thing charged. Covenants against waste are sometimes inserted." Citing Jones Mortg. § 60. Thus an act executed in the state of Michigan between citizens of that state, and which by the parties to the contract is intended to operate as a mortgage on real estate situated in the state of Louisiana, will be given effect as a conventional mortgage affecting third persons after due inscription. Gates v. Gaither, 15 South. 50, 53, 46 La. Ann. 286.

COMMON-LAW RECEIVER.

A person appointed to preserve the assets of a partnership during the pendency of an action was, in the absence of any statutory provision, what is known as a "common-law receiver" or "custodian" merely. Allen v. United Cigar Stores Co., 80 N. Y. Supp. 401, 402, 39 Misc. Rep. 500.

COMMON-LAW SEAL.

The "common-law seal" in use in this state (New York) consists simply of an impression made on a round bit of paper affixed to the instrument by mucilage or by a wafer. Metropolitan Life Ins. Co. v. Bender, 124 N. Y. 47, 52, 26 N. E. 345, 346, 11 L. R. A. 708.

COMMON-LAW WIFE.

The term "common-law wife" is one not known to the law, and the law looks with no favor upon the connection indicated by it. As properly used, this term is a synonym for a woman who, having lived in a state of concubinage with a man during the time when she might have been openly declared to be his wife if she were such, only seeks to assume that relation openly after his death, and when she is impelled to it by the loss of the support he had given her, and by a desire to obtain that support by sharing in the proceeds of his property. In re Brush, 49 N. Y. Supp. 803, 806, 25 App. Div. 610.

COMMON MOB.

The difference between a "rebellious mob" and a "common mob" is that the first is in treason, and the latter a riot; the mob wants a universality of purpose to make it a rebellious mob or treason. Harris v. York Mut. Ins. Co., 50 Pa. (14 Wright) 341, 350 (citing Ang. Ins. § 136).

COMMON NIGHT-WALKER.

A "common night-walker" is one whose habit is to be abroad at night for the purpose of committing some crime, of disturbing the peace, or doing some wrongful or wicked act. State v. Dowers, 45 N. H. 543, 544.

COMMON NUISANCE.

See "Public (or Common) Nuisance."

Private nuisance distinguished, see "Private Nuisance."

COMMON OF ESTOVERS.

A common of estovers "is the right a tenant has of taking necessary wood and timber from the woods of the lord for fuel, fencing, etc." Van Rensselaer v. Radcliff, 10 Wend. 639, 641, 649, 25 Am. Dec. 582.

COMMON OF FISHERY.

See "Common Fishery."

A "common of fishery" is a right held by an individual in common with the owner of the soil covered by the water in question. Albright v. Sussex County Lake & Park Commission, 53 Atl. 612, 618, 68 N. J. Law, 523.

A "common of fishery" is the right to fish in the waters of another. Hardin v. Jordan, 11 Sup. Ct. 808, 814, 140 U. S. 371, 35 L. Ed. 428.

It differs from a "free" or "several" fishery in that it is not exclusive. Freary v. Cooke, 14 Mass. 488, 489 (citing 2 Bl. Comm. 39, 40).

COMMON OF PASTURE.

A "common of pasture" is the right to feed the beasts of one person on the lands of another. Van Rensselaer v. Radcliff, 10 Wend. 639, 647, 25 Am. Dec. 582.

COMMON OF PISCARY.

A "common of piscary" is the right the tenant has to take fish in the waters of the lord. Van Rensselaer v. Radcliff, 10 Wend. 639, 641, 649, 25 Am. Dec. 582.

COMMON OF TURBARY.

A "common of turbary" is the right of a tenant to cut turf on the grounds of the lord. Van Rensselaer v. Radcliff, 10 Wend. 639, 647, 25 Am. Dec. 582.

COMMON ORDER.

Under the practice of Virginia, when the defendant is brought into court by a summons requiring him to appear on a certain day, when a declaration will be or has been filed, if he fail to appear and plead, the clerk enters what is called a "common order." This rule is called "common order" because it is a usual order. Mahoney v. New South Building & Loan Ass'n (U. S.) 70 Fed. 513.

COMMON PERIL.

A "common peril," within the meaning of the rule that, to constitute a right of general average for goods thrown overboard, the act must have been the result of a common peril affecting vessel and cargo, means a peril which is from without, such as the sea, winds, waves, rocks, shoals, pirates, and the like. Certain it is we have found no case of a different character, none arising from the state and condition of the cargo, as fruit or fish in a putrid state, whether it arises from the nature and inherent qualities of the cargo, or has been superinduced by water getting upon it from some cause wholly unavoidable, and involving no fault in the carrier. It is doubtless true in the sense that a peril by fire threatens the whole property, but this is not enough to make the loss one of a peculiar character denominated a "jettison." The peril is general, but the cause is not. The latter is special, local, and peculiar, and, when removed, the rest remains uninjured and secure. The peril must also be a sea peril. Fire aboard ship is not a common peril within the meaning of the rule. Slater v. Hayward Rubber Co., 26 Conn. 128, 142.

COMMON PLEAS.

"Common pleas," as the term is used to designate a court, is generally understood to mean a court having jurisdiction of actions or pleas brought by private persons against private persons, or by the government where the cause is of a civil nature. In England, whence the phrase was derived, the courts of "common pleas" were so called to distinguish them from "pleas of the crown." Dallett v. Feltus (Pa.) 7 Phila. 627, 628.

COMMON PROCEEDING.

A "common proceeding," within Code, § 2606, defining a civil action to be a "common proceeding" in a court of justice, etc., is that kind of a proceeding which is instituted and conducted in a manner common to other civil actions. Brown v. Crego, 29 Iowa, 321, 322.

COMMON PROPERTY.

See "Community."

Under the acts defining the rights of husband and wife, property of the wife owned by her before marriage, and that acquired afterwards by gift, bequest, etc., shall be her separate property, but the rents and profits of her separate property are common property. Snyder v. Webb, 3 Cal. 83, 87.

The words "common property," as used in the chapter relating to community land grants, is held to "be, mean, and intend to include only such lands as have been granted heretofore to a colony, community, or town, and which under the terms of this act shall be vested in a corporation hereby authorized to be formed." Comp. Laws N. M. 1897, § 2184.

COMMON RECOVERY.

At common law a married woman's land could be alienated only by either levying a fine or suffering a "recovery," as the collusive suits to that end were technically called. "A common recovery is a collusive suit instituted by the intended grantee against the intended grantor, in which the land in question is supposed to be recovered by the grantee." Christy v. Burch, 2 South. 258, 259, 25 Fla. 942 (citing 2 Bl. Comm. 348).

Though it has the form of a suit at law and the effect of a judgment at common law, yet the whole transaction is one of common assurance, and the recovery is a creature and instrument of the tenant in tail for whose benefit the recovery is suffered. Lyle v. Richards (Pa.) 9 Serg. & R. 322, 363.

COMMON REPUTE.

"Common repute" is nothing more than the prevailing belief in a certain community, and to allow that to be adduced as evidence, upon an issue of title, would be to substitute the belief or opinion of the community for that of the jury called on to pass upon such issue. Brown v. Foster, 41 S. C. 118, 121, 19 S. E. 299, 301 (citing Sexton v. Hollis, 26 S. C. 231, 235, 236, 1 S. E. 895).

COMMON RESORT.

Though women with soiled reputations for chastity may visit a house kept for the purpose of selling beer and cigars, etc., and for a variety theater, in order that they may witness the theatrical performance and purchase such articles as are there kept for sale, it is not a house kept as a "common resort for prostitutes," within the meaning of a statute declaring a house kept for such purpose to be a disorderly house. Johnson v. State, 13 S. W. 1005, 1006, 28 Tex. App. 562.

COMMON RIGHT.

Kent says: "Corporations or bodies politic are the most usual franchises known in our law." 3 Kent, Comm. 459. It is true that the privileges so granted by the government do not pertain to the citizens of the state by common right. But what is the "common right" here referred to? Is it not a right which pertains to the citizens by the common law, the investiture of which is not to be looked for in any special law, whether established by a Constitution or an act of the Legislature? Coke says: "De commun droit—of common right—that is, by the common law, because the common law is the best and most common birth-right that the subject hath for the safeguard and defense not only of his goods, lands, and revenues, but of his wife and children. * * * This common law of England is sometimes called 'right,' sometimes 'common right,' and sometimes 'communis justitia.'" Spring Valley Waterworks v. Schottler, 62 Cal. 69, 106 (quoting Co. Inst. 142a).

COMMON ROAD.

See "Common Highway."

The word "highway" may include a county bridge, and shall be equivalent to the words "county way," "county road," and "common road." Rev. Laws Mass. 1902, p. 88, c. 8, § 5, subd. 4.

COMMON RULE.

A "common rule" was one in which it was agreed that a majority should decide in case of necessity, and in particular meant that the referee should proceed if one of the parties, upon being duly notified, should not appear. Billington v. Sprague, 22 Me. (9 Shep.) 34, 44.

COMMON SCHOOL.

"Common schools," as used in Const. Amend. art. 18, providing that all moneys raised by taxation in the towns and cities for the support of public schools, and all moneys which may be appropriated by the state for the support of common schools, shall be applied to, and expended in no other schools than those which are conducted according to law, etc., is used in its broadest sense, and is synonymous with "public schools" as there used. Jenkins v. Inhabitants of Andover, 103 Mass. 94, 98.

"Common schools" are such as are organized by law, and are not confined to any class of pupils, but are open to all. They are such that the trustees have no power to admit or reject pupils arbitrarily, nor to make rules or regulations fixing a standard of admission for members. They are bound to instruct all the children who present themselves, without regard to their social relations, their station in life, or their religious faith. The word "common," as applied to our schools, bears the broadest and most comprehensive signification, it being equivalent to public, universal, open to all, and they are common to all children in the sense that public highways are common to all persons who may choose to ride or drive thereon. Common schools are distinct from such schools as savor of sectarian opinion or control. People v. Brooklyn Board of Education, 13 Barb. 400, 410.

"Common schools," as used in a statute giving a common council of a city power to take and hold property transferred to them for the use of the common schools of the city, means schools that are common or open to all in a certain locality. In this sense common schools of the state have always been free schools; but it must be conceded that the general understanding of the provisions of law confirm this: that the common schools, in one sense, are not free; that is, that scholars attending them could not do so free of all charge and expense. Le Couteux v. City of Buffalo, 33 N. Y. 333, 337.

A judgment stating that the recovery was for services as a "teacher of common schools" meant a teacher of the common schools of the state provided for by law. Town of Milford v. Simpson, 11 Ind. 520, 521.

The word "common," used in connection with the word "schools," means that the schools are to be open to all without regard to denomination; that they belong to the public. The word "common" has no reference to the kind of studies to be taught in such school, nor as to any method or rule of conduct or government. While a university education cannot be given in the public schools, yet within the limits of a common school education, as distinguished from that given in universities, the State Legislature has full discretion as to what shall be taught. Roach v. Board of Directors of St. Louis Public Schools, 7 Mo. App. 567.

College distinguished.

"Common schools" are distinct from academies, colleges, and private seminaries of learning. People v. Brooklyn Board of Education, 13 Barb. 400, 410.

"Common schools," as used in Const. Amend. art. 18, providing that all moneys which may be appropriated by the state for the support of common schools shall be applied to and expended on no other schools than those which are conducted, according to law, under the order and superintendence of the authorities of the town or city in which the money is to be expended, cannot be construed as applying to the higher seminaries of learning, such as incorporated academies and colleges. "These, in a certain broad and comprehensive sense, are public institutions, because they are controlled by corporations, and are usually open to all persons who are willing to comply with the terms of admission and tuition. But the broad line of distinction between these and the common schools is that the latter are supported by general taxation, that they are open to all free of expense, and that they are under the immediate control and superintendence of agents appointed by the voters of each town and city." Merrick v. Inhabitants of Amherst, 94 Mass. (12 Allen) 500, 508.

Without being able to give any accurate definition of a "common school," it is safe to say the common understanding is that it is a school that begins with the rudimentary elements of education, whatever changes it may embrace, as contradistinguished from academies or universities, devoted exclusively to teaching advanced pupils in the classics and in all the higher branches of study usually included in the curriculum of the colleges. Powell v. Board of Education, 97 Ill. 375, 378, 37 Am. Rep. 123.

"The term 'school,' ex vi termini, does not imply a restriction to the rudiments of an education. When contrasted with the term 'college' or 'university,' it may and ordinarily does imply a lower grade, but just where the one ends and the other begins may not be easy to detect." Roach v. Board of Trustees of St. Louis Public Schools, 77 Mo. 484, 487.

High school.

Const. art. 6, § 2, authorizing a uniform system of "common schools," includes high schools, as well as schools teaching mere elementary branches. Board of Education of City of Topeka v. Welch, 83 Pac. 654, 658, 51 Kan. 792.

Common schools shall include all district grades and high schools that are maintained at public expense in each school district, and under the control of boards of directors. Ballinger's Ann. Codes & St. Wash. 1897, § 2334.

Normal school.

"In construing a constitutional provision providing that the common school fund, etc., shall be held inviolate for the purpose of constraining a system of common schools, the court say that the words 'common schools' have in themselves no ascertained and definite signification. It is only by looking into the history of the common-school system of Kentucky that we are enabled to understand what was meant by those words. If we look to the legislation on this subject prior to the adoption of the present Constitution, we find that a 'common school' was a school taught in a district laid out by authorities of school laws, under the control of trustees elected under those laws, by a teacher, qualified according to law to teach. Rev. St. c. 88, art. 8, § 1, prepared by three of the ablest lawyers of the state, two of whom have been members of the convention by which the Constitution was framed, after declaring that the object of that chapter was to carry into effect the intention of the people, as expressed in their Constitution, in promoting the establishment throughout the state of a system of common schools, proceeded to declare that every school which was put under the control of trustees and commissioners pursuant to that chapter, and which should be actually kept by a qualified teacher, and at which every free white child in the district between the ages of 6 and 18 years should have the privilege of attending, whether contributing anything toward defraying the expenses thereof or not, and none other, should be deemed a common school, or entitled to any contribution out of the school fund." The term does not include normal schools. Collins v. Henderson, 74 Ky. (11 Bush) 74, 82.

"Common schools," within the meaning of Const. 1846, art. 9, § 1, declaring that the capital of the common school fund shall be kept inviolate, and that its revenues shall be applied to the support of the common schools, does not include normal schools, which are not intended for the education of the children of the inhabitants of the districts where they are located, but for the training of teachers for all the common schools, and therefore the income of the common school fund cannot be devoted to the support of such normal schools. Gordon v. Cornes, 47 N. Y. 608, 616; People v. Crissey, 45 Hun, 19, 21.

Orphan asylum.

Orphan asylums are not "common schools" within the constitutional meaning of such term as used in article 9, § 1, providing that the revenue of the common school fund shall be applied to the support of common schools, so that moneys devoted by the Constitution for such support cannot be lawfully appropriated to the support of such asylums. St. Patrick's Orphan Asylum v. Board of Education of City of Rochester, 34 How. Prac. 227.

COMMON SCHOOL EDUCATION.

The phrase "a common school education" is one not easily defined. One might say that a student instructed in reading, writing, geography, English grammar, and arithmetic had received a common school education, while another who had more enlarged notions on the subject might insist that history, philosophy, and algebra be included. It would thus be impossible to find two persons who would in all respects agree in regard to what constituted a common school education. Const. art. 8, § 1, providing that the General Assembly shall provide a thorough and efficient system of free schools, whereby all the children of the state may receive a good "common school education," is intended as a limitation upon the power of the Legislature to provide for the maintenance of free schools by lawful taxation of a different character from that named in the section; and School Law, § 35, providing for the creation and maintenance of high schools for the township, on a vote of the people, is not in violation of the Constitution, but is a valid and binding law. Richards v. Raymond, 92 Ill. 612, 617, 34 Am. Rep. 151.

COMMON SCHOOL FUND.

In Const. art. 8, § 4, providing that the common school fund, the interest of which shall be exclusively applied to the support and maintenance of common schools and purchase of suitable libraries and apparatus therefor, should be derived from certain sources, the term "common school fund" means a sum which was to operate as a foundation of the common school system, the income of which is devoted to a specific object, to wit, the support and maintenance of the common schools. State v. Barnes, 22 Fla. 8, 11.

COMMON SCHOOL SYSTEM.

See "System."

COMMON SCOLD.

A "common scold," in the ancient common law, was a woman whose habit and the exercise of the capacity of scolding was sufficient to make her a public nuisance to her neighborhood. It was an indictable offense, punishable by being submerged in water by means of the ducking stool. United States v. Royall (U. S.) 27 Fed. Cas. 907, 909.

A "common scold" is a woman who makes a too free use of her tongue. It was held to be an offense in Pennsylvania, the court saying that, "as to the unreasonableness of holding women liable to punishment for a too free use of their tongue, it is enough to say that the common law, which is the expressed wisdom of ages, adjudges that it is not unreasonable. The argument drawn from the indelicacy and unreasonableness of such a prosecution of a female should be addressed, therefore, to the Legislature rather than to the court, for courts of justice, who declare rather than make the law, are invincible to all considerations of gallantry." Commonwealth v. Mohn, 52 Pa. (2 P. F. Smith) 243, 246, 91 Am. Dec. 153.

A woman does not become a common scold by scolding several persons on several occasions. It is the habit of scolding resulting in a public nuisance which is criminal. Baker v. State, 20 Atl. 858, 53 N. J. Law (24 Vroom) 45.

COMMON SELLER.

The offense of "common seller" of intoxicating liquors is a frequent repetition of the act of selling without authority, and upon common principles there must be such a continuation, or rather repetition, of unlawful sales as would prove the allegation in the complaint of being a common seller. The eighteenth section of the act of 1852, however, provides that any number of sales exceeding five may subject a person to be adjudged a "common seller." The offense of being a common seller is but one, and is an entire offense, and it may be necessary to prove all of the several and distinct acts of sale which the party has been guilty of to make out the offense, or a less number may suffice; but we think if a respondent is charged with being a "common seller," and is convicted and sentenced for that offense, it must be a conclusive bar, up to the time the complaint is made, to any prosecution grounded upon any one act of sale prior to that time, whether it was proved or attempted to be proved on the trial or not. State v. Nutt, 28 Vt. 598, 602.

The statutory criminal known as a "common seller of liquors" is one who sells commonly spirituous or forbidden liquors without license, and it has been decided that to establish this crime the state must prove at least three different sales by the accused, and in some states this alone would not suffice to prove the offense in all cases. Moundsville v. Fountain, 27 W. Va. 182, 194.

"Common seller," as used in Laws 1858, c. 33, § 8, providing that no person shall be a "common seller" of intoxicating liquors, means one who sells frequently, usually, customarily, or habitually, "common" being defined by Worcester, as "frequent, usual, customary, habitual." No certain definite number of acts are necessary to constitute one a "common seller," but it is to be determined by whether one sells frequently, usually, customarily, or habitually. State v. O'Conner, 49 Me. 594, 596.

A common seller of liquor is established by proof of three sales either to one or several persons. Commonwealth v. Tubbs, 55 Mass. (1 Cush.) 2, 4.

COMMON SERVICE.

"Common service," within the statutory requirement that to constitute co-employés fellow servants they must be engaged in the common service, means the thing or work being performed for the employer at the time of the accident, and out of which it grew. Gulf, C. & S. F. Ry. Co. v. Warner, 35 S. W. 364, 365, 89 Tex. 475 (cited in Masterson v. Galveston, H. & S. A. Ry. Co. [Tex.] 42 S. W. 1001, 1002); Masterson v. Galveston, H. & S. A. Ry. Co. (Tex.) 42 S. W. 1001, 1002. Under such definition, the crews of separate engines, one engaged in switching and the other having additional work, were not engaged in "common service" so as to be fellow servants. Masterson v. Galveston, H. & S. A. Ry. Co. (Tex.) 42 S. W. 1001, 1002.

"Common service" is a service which admits of a common participation, no one of the parties in such relation being placed in control over the other. Howard v. Denver & R. G. R. Co. (U. S.) 26 Fed. 837, 841 (citing Cleveland, C. & O. R. Co. v. Keary, 3 Ohio St. 201).

"Common service," as used in a statement that in order to constitute two or more employés fellow servants they must be engaged in a common service, means the thing or work performed for the employer at a specified time at which the relationship is sought to be determined. Patterson v. Houston & T. C. R. Co. (Tex.) 40 S. W. 442, 445.

COMMON SEWER.

In Gen. St. c. 48, § 4, requiring every person who empties his particular drain into the "common sewer," not only to pay the city or town a proportionate part of the charge of making and repairing the same, but also of the charge of making and repairing "other main drains and common sewers" through which the same discharges, the term "common sewer" does not mean that connecting sewers forming a continuous line shall be deemed to be a single common sewer, but such line may be divided by the municipal authorities and designated as "separate sewers." Ayer v. City of Sommerville, 10 N. E. 457, 458, 143 Mass. 585.

A structure underground constructed by a city, not only to carry off the sewerage from the streets and houses, but also to divert the waters of a brook, is a "common sewer" within the meaning of a provision in the city charter authorizing the city to lay out common sewers. An appropriate use of a common sewer may be to relieve from the natural, as well as the surface, flow of water. Bennett v. City of New Bedford, 110 Mass. 433, 438.

COMMON SOLDIERS.

The term "common soldiers," as used in reference to the United States army, does not include cadets at West Point, who are inferior officers, and for purposes of instruction may be required to serve as officers, noncommissioned officers, or privates. Babbitt v. United States (U. S.) 16 Ct. Cl. 202, 222.

The term "common soldier" includes a gunner in a train of artillery, though he is appointed by warrant, receives a high compensation, and takes an oath; as his extraordinary pay is only in consideration of the skill which is requisite in his place. Johnson v. Louth, 1 Strange, 7.

COMMON STOCK.

Where a person agreed that of the capital invested in a business he should keep a certain sum invested in the business, to be of the capital of said business, such sum was contributed to the "common stock" of the business. Richardson v. Carlton, 80 N. W. 532, 534, 109 Iowa, 515.

Preferred stock distinguished.

"Common stock" differs in many ways from what is termed "preferred stock." The owner of the former is entitled to an equal pro rata division of the profits, if there be any, but has no advantage of any other shareholder or class of shareholders in common stock. "Preferred stock," on the other hand, generally entitles its owner to dividends out of the net profits before and in preference to the holders of the common stock. Storrow v. Texas Consol. Compress & Mfg. Ass'n (U. S.) 87 Fed. 612, 616, 31 C. C. A. 139.

COMMON SURETY.

A surety company permitted by law to act as sole surety for trustees, guardians, administrators, and other fiduciaries may be called a "common surety," not exactly in the nature of a common carrier, like railroads and telegraph companies, but still one of those public agencies to which are given unusual powers, and who have assumed the most sacred responsibilities. Bank of Tarboro v. Fidelity & Deposit Co., 38 S. E. 903, 910, 128 N. C. 366, 83 Am. St. Rep. 682.

COMMON THIEF.

A "common thief" is one who by practice and habit is a thief. World v. State, 50 Md. 49, 54.

Under a statute providing that every person who shall be convicted at the same term of the court, either as principal or accessory, in three distinct larcenies, shall be deemed a common and notorious thief, and be punished by imprisonment for not more than 20 years, one who was convicted at the same term of court of two distinct larcenies and also of housebreaking, the indictment in a later case also charging larceny, cannot be sentenced as a common thief. Commonwealth v. Hope, 39 Mass. (22 Pick.) 1, 3.

Rev. St. c. 126, § 19, provides that a person convicted of three distinct larcenies at the same term of court shall be deemed a common, notorious thief, and shall be punished. Haggett v. Commonwealth, 44 Mass. (3 Metc.) 457, 459.

An indictment with three counts for stealing property on the same day, alleged to be the property of three persons, each count being for one person's property, does not show that the theft was one act, done at one time, taking by that one act the property of different persons. In such case the court are of the opinion that it would not be three distinct larcenies within the provisions of the statute requiring the person convicted of three distinct larcenies at the same term of court to be punished as a common and notorious thief. Stevens v. Commonwealth, 45 Mass. (4 Metc.) 360, 364.

COMMON THING.

Things which are "common" are those the ownership of which belongs to nobody in particular, and which all men may freely use conformably with the use for which nature has intended them; such as air, running water, the sea, and its shores. Civ. Code La. 1900, art. 450.

COMMON TIPPLING HOUSE.

"Common tippling house," as used in a statute prohibiting the keeping of a disorderly common tippling house, meant a house that was commonly resorted to for drinking purposes, and which commonly became disorderly. Thus it was not sufficient to satisfy such offense that the house was once used for tippling and there was one act of disorder therein. Dunnaway v. State, 17 Tenn. (9 Yerg.) 350, 352.

COMMON TOOLS OF TRADE.

A set of harness does not fall within the words "common tools of trade," as used in the Georgia statute exempting such tools of trade from execution. Kirksey v. Rowe, 40 S. E. 990, 114 Ga. 893, 88 Am. St. Rep. 65.

Act 1822, exempting "common tools" of the debtor's trade from levy or sale under execution, means some simple instrument used by the hand by which a manual occupation is performed, and therefore cannot be held to exempt lawbooks contained in a lawyer's library, though they are necessary for the proper prosecution of the lawyer's profession. Lenoir v. Weeks, 20 Ga. 596, 597.

COMMON USAGE.

The phrase "according to common usage," in a statute authorizing the court to grant a "dedimus potestatem to take depositions according to common usage," means according to the existing practice, whether at law or in equity; that is, by a commission upon interrogatories, as was the common usage at the time when the statute was passed. There is nothing in the phrase "according to common usage" which imports that the federal courts in any of the states must adopt all subsequent new regulations that may be from time to time enacted by state Legislatures or adopted by state practice. United States v. Fifty Boxes and Packages of Lace (U. S.) 92 Fed. 601, 602.

A "common usage," within the meaning of Rev. St. § 866 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 663], cannot be established by a state statute. Counsel cited to us an opinion by Judge McCreary in which he interprets the words "common usage" to mean the usage prevalent in the state, but Judge Miller, in writing his opinion, very emphatically says: "It is not according to common usage to call a party in advance of the trial at law, and subject him to all the skill of the opposing counsel, to extract something which he may then use or not, as suits his purpose. This is a very special usage, dependent wholly upon the New York statutes." Turner v. Shackman (U. S.) 27 Fed. 183, 184.

"Common usage," as used in Rev. St. § 866 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 663], authorizes 2 Wds. & P.—22

ing the taking of depositions in equity cases according to common usage, means common usage in the practice in courts of equity. Bischoffsheim v. Baltzer (U. S.) 10 Fed. 1, 3; United States v. Parrott (U. S.) 27 Fed. Cas. 444, 447.

"Common usage," as used in Rev. St. § 866 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 663], authorizing the granting of a dedimus to take depositions according to common usage, means in accordance with the mode provided for by the statutes of the state. Giles v. Paxson (U. S.) 36 Fed. 882, 883.

As used in Rev. St. § 866 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 663], providing that any of the courts of the United States may grant a dedimus to take depositions according to common usage, the words "common usage" mean the common usage of the courts of the state in which the federal court is sitting, and are not synonymous with "common law." United States v. Cameron (U. S.) 15 Fed. 794, 796.

COMMON USE.

"Common use" and "the care of a prudent man" are not necessarily equivalent terms. That a machine is in common use is at the most a circumstance bearing upon the question of negligence. A machine might be one of a kind in common use, or even the best in use, and yet its safety, in respect to its position or setting in a mill, be questionable. It would hardly be a defense for an employer to say that a certain machine upon which an employé had been injured was one of a kind in common use, if the employer was compelled as a prudent man to admit its use was, in his own judgment, dangerous. Geno v. Fall Mountain Paper Co., 35 Atl. 475, 478, 68 Vt. 568.

COMMON UTTERER OF COUNTERFEIT COIN.

Under a statute providing that if any person shall at the same term of court be convicted of either of the offenses defined in the preceding section, and relating to his having in possession any number of pieces of counterfeit coins less than 10, or uttering and passing out such coins as true, knowing the same to be false, he shall be deemed a common utterer of counterfeit coin, and punished by imprisonment of not more than 20 years, one who is convicted under two indictments charging offenses under that section, and also under another indictment at the same term of court charging him with the more aggravated offense, described in another section, of having in his possession at the same time 10 or more pieces of counterfeit coin, knowing the same to be false and counterfeit, and with intent to utter or pass the same as true, is not a common utterer of counterfeit coin, and cannot be sentenced as such. Murray v. Commonwealth, 54 Mass. (13 Metc.) 514, 516.

COMMON WALL.

A "common or party wall" is one which has been built at a common expense, or one which has been built by one party, but in which another has acquired a common right. Every wall or separation between two buildings is presumed to be a common or party wall. Campbell v. Mesler, 4 Johns. Ch. 334, 342, 8 Am. Dec. 570.

COMMONERS.

See "Free Commoners."

COMMONLY SAID.

The phrase, in the preface to the announcement of a legal principle, that "it is commonly said," means it is commonly the legal opinion; that is, it is the common opinion, and communis opinio is of good authority in law. O'Donnell v. Glenn, 23 Pac. 1018, 1019, 9 Mont. 452, 8 L. R. A. 629.

COMMONS.

See "Town Commons."

The recognized part of the Spanish town or commons of St. Louis consisted of town lots, outlots, common field lots, and commons. To constitute an outlot, it must be shown to have had an existence as such under the former government prior to the 20th day of December, 1803, with a definite location and boundaries, and land included in such an outlot could not have been commons. Vasquez v. Ewing, 42 Mo. 247, 256. In the absence of any official survey of commons in lands ceded to the United States and included in the Louisiana Purchase, the only way in which a title to commons under the act of Congress of June 13, 1812, can be shown, is by proof of some grant, concession, survey, or actual possession, claim, or user, of some definite tract of land as commons prior to the 20th day of December, 1823. Without such evidence there can be no title to commons under that act where no official survey is shown. Robbins v. Eckler, 38 Mo. 494, 504.

The title to the "commons" of St. Louis at the time Louisiana was ceded to the United States is as follows: A claim for 4,293 arpents, situated adjoining the town of St. Louis, known by the name of "St. Louis Commons," and said to have been granted by a decree of Lieut. Gov. Cruzat in 1782, filed in the office of the recorder. At the same time was filed a document containing the proceedings of certain inhabitants of St. Louis for the appointment of syndics on the 22d day of September, 1782, with the approbation of the Lieutenant Governor, proceeding to establish certain regulations concerning the inclosure of the commons, and these regulations were signed by said syndics and the Lieutenant Governor. A survey of the commons was made by James McKay in 1806 at the request of the principal inhabitants, and on the 13th of June, 1812, by act of Congress, the title of the inhabitants of St. Louis to its commons was confirmed. Mackay's Widow v. Dillon, 7 Mo. 7, 11.

It is said that the Cahokia "commons" were granted by the French government to the inhabitants first settling Cahokia, and that their title thereto was recognized and secured to them by the treaty of cession from that government to the government of Great Britain, and by the latter by a like treaty with the government of the United States, and if not, then the act of Congress of 1812 granted these commons to the inhabitants of that village. Lavelle v. Strobel, 89 Ill. 370, 378 (cited in Haps v. Hewitt, 97 Ill. 498, 502).

The city of St. Louis, in disposing of her commons under an act of the Legislature, does not occupy the position of a mere trustee, but the position similar to that which the United States does as a great landed proprietor, and in an action of ejectment by the owner, claiming by a deed from the city, one who does not claim the title from the same source cannot question the validity of such deed. Swartz v. Page, 13 Mo. 603, 604.

Under the statute giving power to county courts to incorporate towns and villages and their commons, by the term "their commons" is meant lands included in or belonging to the town, set apart for public uses. The natural import of the word, when used in connection with or with reference to towns or villages, is public ground belonging or pertaining to the town or village. The word "commons," as used in the statute, was certainly never meant to include the farms and farming lands of individuals who happen to reside and own lands in the vicinity of the town or village. State ex rel. Patterson v. McReynolds, 61 Mo. 203, 210.

COMMONWEALTH.

"Commonwealth," as used in recognizances payable to the commonwealth of West Virginia, is synonymous with the word "state," and such recognizances are sufficient. State v. Lambert, 28 S. E. 930, 931, 44 W. Va. 308.

Act 1889, giving a corporation the power and right to become security on any writ of error or appeal, or in any proceeding instituted in any court of this commonwealth in which security may be required, may be understood to restrict the power to cases in the courts of the state, and not as extending to cases in the United States Circuit Courts. Black v. Black (U. S.) 53 Fed. 985, 986.

COMMONWEALTH PAPER.

In an agreement binding the defendant to pay $210 in a good wagon at its value in commonwealth paper, the balance, if any, to be discharged in the same currency, "commonwealth paper" is not synonymous with "commonwealth bank notes," and hence, in an action on the agreement, the value of commonwealth paper at the time when the contract was to have been performed must be ascertained by proof, and the recovery be limited to such sum as the value of such paper represented at that time in lawful money of the United States. Brashear v. Kendall, 22 Ky. (6 T. B. Mon.) 545, 546.

COMMORANCY—COMMORANT.

"Commorancy" is defined in Webster's Dictionary as meaning, in law, "residence, temporarily or for a short time." The term, from its derivation from the Latin, implies something less than a regular residence, such as a staying, a sojourning, and, more literally, a tarrying. It was as used to express these minor degrees of residence that the word got in vogue in our jurisprudence, though not often so used. A commorancy may be all the residence a man has, but usually not. The distinction is between a permanent and a temporary home. Pullen v. Monk, 82 Me. 412, 19 Atl. 909. See, also, Gilman v. Inman, 85 Me. 105, 26 Atl. 1049, where the court said, "The etymological signification implies an abiding or tarrying for some appreciable, though temporary, duration, less than a permanent residence." It is not such a residence as will justify service of process at the last and usual place of abode of a person. Thomas v. Thomas, 52 Atl. 642, 643, 96 Me. 223, 90 Am. St. Rep. 342.

"Commorant," as used in Rev. St. p. 11, § 6, which provides that no assignment of wages is valid against any other person than the parties thereto unless such assignment is recorded by the clerk of the city, town, or plantation organized for any purpose, in which the assignor is commorant while earning such wages, implies an abiding or tarrying for some appreciable, though temporary, duration, less than a permanent residence, and would apply to laborers in logging camps, who live there during the logging season (Wright v. Smith, 74 Me. 495), and also laborers working under contractors constructing a railroad, who live for some time in camps near their work (Pullen v. Monk, 82 Me. 412, 19 Atl. 909). But it does not apply to one who is employed as river driver, and who changes his place of encampment from day to day. Gilman v. Inman, 26 Atl. 1049, 1050, 85 Me. 105.

Where a person is described as in one place within the commonwealth and commorant at another, it clearly indicates that the former is his domicile, dwelling house, or place of abode, and the latter a place of temporary residence. Ames v. Winsor, 36 Mass. (19 Pick.) 247, 248.

COMMOTION.

See "Civil Commotion."

COMMUNE.

Sir Edward Coke's comment on the charter in the twenty-eighth year of Edward the First, providing that the Great Charter of the liberties of Englishmen granted to all the communality of the realm shall be observed, kept, and maintained in every point, is that here "commune" is taken for "people." Inhabitants of Township of Bernards v. Allen, 39 Atl. 716, 718, 61 N. J. Law, 228 (citing 2 Co. Inst. 540).

COMMUNICATE.

Under an insurance policy covering a mill and additions, adjoining and communicating buildings, certain buildings "were adjoining and communicating buildings because they were within a few feet of, and next to, the mill building, and because their common use in the business made it necessary that some communication or connection should exist between them and the mill building. If they had not been in common use with the mill building—if, for instance, they had been used for stores or dwelling houses—the evidence of the meaning of these terms in the policy would be less convincing. The parties, knowing the relative locations of the buildings and their interdependent uses, would be guilty of no great perversion of language in designating the smaller buildings as 'adjoining and communicating' with the larger building. The word 'communicating' alone does not convey a definite meaning. There are many senses in which communication may be said to exist, as by telegraph, telephone, or conversation between individuals, or by physical contact or apparent uses between inanimate objects. The context, purposes, and circumstances in view of which it is used must be resorted to, to determine its significance in a particular case. Kendall v. Green, 87 N. H. 557, 562, 563, 42 Atl. 178. Nor does the literal meaning of the word 'adjoining' when used in a contract or statute, exclude all other evidence of intention and of the subject-matter involved. If it is apparent it was used in its literal and restricted sense, or if there is no evidence indicating its use in a different sense, the court would not be justified in giving it some other or more comprehensive meaning. In a criminal statute, the meaning of 'adjoining' may properly be determined by the legislative purpose requiring a strict construction, such as was applied in State v. Downs, 59 N. H. 320." Marsh v. Concord Mut. Fire Ins. Co., 51 Atl. 898, 899, 71 N. H. 253.

"Communicating" as used in a fire insurance policy on a frame mill building and all additions thereto adjoining and communicating, appropriately describes a dry house and engine house not built onto the main building, but which communicates with the main building by means of a movable bridge. Marsh v. New Hampshire Fire Ins. Co., 49 Atl. 88, 70 N. H. 590.

A fire is none the less "communicated" from an engine because intermediate land, which was burned over, belonged to other persons, or because the distance was half a mile. Perley v. Eastern R. Co., 98 Mass. 414, 418, 96 Am. Dec. 645.

COMMUNICATIONS.

See "Confidential Communication"; "Privileged Communication."

The fact of a witness having a conversation with a deceased person is not a "communication," within the meaning of Code, § 399, prohibiting the giving of testimony as to a transaction or communication with a deceased person. Hier v. Grant, 47 N. Y. 278, 281.

"Communicate" means substantially the same as "converse"; so that an oath administered to an officer not to allow a jury to converse, etc., is substantially the same as not to allow them to communicate. Scott v. State, 75 Tenn. (7 Lea) 232, 233.

The word "communication," in the statute making it a criminal offense to send or convey an insulting, etc., letter or communication, was construed to include a writing inclosed in an envelope and transmitted by mail, and it was said that such writing could properly be called either a "letter" or a "communication." Larison v. State, 9 Atl. 700, 701, 49 N. J. Law (20 Vroom) 256, 60 Am. Rep. 606.

The delivery of a deed by a husband to a wife is not a "communication," within Code Civ. Proc. § 1881, subd. 1, disqualifying as witnesses a husband or wife as to any communication made by one to the other during marriage. Poulson v. Stanley, 55 Pac. 605, 606, 122 Cal. 655, 68 Am. St. Rep. 73.

As confidential communications.

As used in 3 How. Ann. St. § 7546, providing that neither husband nor wife, during marriage or afterwards, without the consent of the other, shall be examined as to any communication made by or to the other during marriage, the word "communication" must be understood as having been used in the sense which had attached to it by its common use in the same connection, as such provision is only declaratory to the common law, and hence applies to such communications as were confidential. Hagerman v. Wigent, 65 N. W. 756, 757, 108 Mich. 192.

The word "communication," as used in Civ. Code Prac. § 606, providing, "Neither husband nor wife shall be competent for or against each other, or concerning any communication made by one to the other during marriage, whether called while that relation subsisted or afterwards," etc., should be given a liberal construction. It should not be confined to a mere statement by the husband to the wife, or vice versa; it should be construed to embrace all knowledge upon the part of the one or the other obtained by reason of the marriage relation, and which, but for the confidence growing out of it, would not have been known to the party. Commonwealth v. Sapp, 14 S. W. 834, 835, 12 Ky. Law Rep. 484, 486, 90 Ky. 580, 29 Am. St. Rep. 405.

"Communications," as used in Gen. St. 1870, c. 73, § 10, making communications between husband and wife inadmissible in evidence, is employed without qualification or limitation, and includes all conversations, though not on subjects of a confidential nature. Leppla v. Minnesota Tribune, 35 Minn. 310, 29 N. W. 127, 128.

COMMUNION OF PROFITS.

By the term "communion of profits," as used in defining the elements of a partnership, is meant a joint and mutual interest in the profits, not simply a joint interest in the property; for persons may be jointly concerned in the purchase of goods, yet, if they are not jointly concerned in the profits arising from the goods after they are purchased, they are not partners as between themselves. Setzer v. Beale, 19 W. Va. 274, 287.

"A communion of profits, within the meaning of the rule that to constitute a partnership between the parties themselves there must be a communion of profits between them, implies a communion of loss, for every man who has a share of the profits of a trade ought also to bear his share of the loss. Collier, Partn. § 18. Neither reason nor authority seems to favor the rule that there may be a legal and valid partnership, though one or more of the partners are guarantied by the others against loss." Whitehill v. Schickle, 43 Mo. 537, 544.

COMMUNITY.

The term "community" is sometimes used to designate a body of people residing in a given territory whose property is acquired and used in common. Such a community, whether incorporated or not, is an artificial person. In re Huss, 27 N. E. 784, 785, 126 N. Y. 537, 12 L. R. A. 620.

"Community," as used in an agreement transferring the practice and good will of one physician to another, and an agreement on the part of the vendor not to re-establish himself as a competitor of the vendee unless the latter should commit some act which should forfeit the confidence of the community, means a population residing in the village and its vicinity, among which the vendor was practicing his profession at the time of the contract. Gilman v. Dwight, 79 Mass. (13 Gray) 356, 359, 74 Am. Dec. 634.

The word "community," as used in a statement that the general reputation of a person is the estimate in which he is held in the community, is composed of those called by some jurists his neighbors, by others his associates or acquaintances, and by still others those who are conversant with him. In a city of 100,000 people it is not necessary that the majority of the persons should know anything about the particular person concerned, or even a small portion of the whole number. If a witness has heard enough to enable him to say that he knows the prevailing opinion entertained of him by his acquaintances, he is competent to speak. Cunningham v. Underwood (U. S.) 116 Fed. 803, 811, 53 C. C. A. 99.

In common parlance the meaning of the word "community" has a broader significance than the word "neighborhood" or "locality." Thus, instructing the jury to disregard general benefits accrued to plaintiff's property in common with other property in the same community, instead of neighborhood or vicinity, could not mislead the jury unfavorably to defendant in an action against a street railroad for changing a grade of a street. Berkson v. Kansas City Cable Ry. Co., 45 S. W. 1119, 1122, 144 Mo. 211.

Community in general, as used in connection with the right of the property owner to sue for damages not shared by the community in general, does not mean those who use a street, and yet reside at such a distance from it that the railroad thereon, if such be the obstruction of which complaint is made, is not an annoyance, but it means those who reside in the immediate vicinity of the railroad and are subject to the inconveniences incident to such a structure. Decker v. Evansville S. & N. Ry. Co., 133 Ind. 493, 495, 33 N. E. 349.

Partnership distinguished.

"Partnership and community," says Pothier, "are not the same thing. The first is founded on the contract of the parties, which creates the community, while the last may exist independent of any contract whatever." Pickerell v. Fisk, 11 La. Ann. 277, 278.

COMMUNITY DEBT.

Every debt created by the husband during the existence of the marriage is prima facie a community debt. Calhoun v. Leary, 32 Pac. 1070, 1071, 6 Wash. 17.

COMMUNITY OF PROFITS.

The term "community of profits," as used in the definition of partnership, that if there is a community of profits a partnership follows, means a proprietorship in them, as distinguished from a personal claim upon the other associate; in other words, a property right in them from the start in one associate as much as in the other. Bradley v. Ely, 56 N. E. 44, 45, 24 Ind. App. 2, 79 Am. St. Rep. 251; Moore v. Williams, 62 S. W. 977, 980, 26 Tex. Civ. App. 142.

COMMUNITY PROPERTY.

As estate of decedent, see "Estate."

The fundamental idea of the community system is that marriage makes the man and woman partners. Mable v. Whittaker, 39 Pac. 172, 174, 10 Wash. 656.

"Community property is that which is acquired by the husband and wife during marriage." Mitchell v. Mitchell, 15 S. W. 705, 707, 80 Tex. 101; Mable v. Whittaker, 39 Pac. 172, 174, 10 Wash. 656.

Property owned by a husband and wife jointly is called "community property" in California. In re Lux's Estate, 45 Pac. 1023, 1025, 114 Cal. 73.

Property acquired after marriage by the efforts of the husband alone, but not by gift, devise, or descent, or by exchange of his individual property, or from the rents, issues, or profits of his separate estate, belongs to the community. Lake v. Bender, 4 Pac. 711, 725, 18 Nev. 361.

Community property is that acquired by husband or wife by onerous title, while that which is acquired by either of the spouses by gift, devise, or descent is the separate property of the heir, donee, or devisee. Under this principle the San Jacinto donations, granting lands to those who were in the battle of San Jacinto and other battles, did not create community property. The grants were gifts as manifestation of public gratitude. But even had the grants been made to remunerate those to whom they had been issued, they would still be the separate property of the donees. For "remunerators or compensatory donations form no part of the community estate," "and that which the husband acquires by military services and the rewards bestowed upon him by the government for such services are his separate property." Ames v. Hubby, 49 Tex. 705, 710 (citing Eschriche, 367).

The statute provides that "all property acquired after marriage by either husband or wife, except such as may be acquired by gift, bequest, devise, or descent, shall be common property." All property is common property, except that owned previous to marriage, or subsequently acquired in a particular way. The presumption, therefore, attending the possession of property by either, is that it belongs to the community. Exceptions to the rule must be proved. Meyer v. Kinzer, 12 Cal. 247, 251, 73 Am. Dec. 538.

Where a wife claims property as her separate estate, it must have been conveyed to her before marriage, or, if afterwards, it must have been by gift, devise, or descent; otherwise, it will be considered community property. Bessie v. Earle, 4 Cal. 200, 201.

Community property is property acquired by husband and wife, or either, during marriage, when not acquired as the separate property of either. Civ. Code Cal. 1903, § 687; Civ. Code Idaho 1901, § 2351.

If a husband and wife acquire personal property in one state, and then remove to another state with the same, the law of the state where they lived when the property was acquired governs as to whether it is separate or community. Kraemer v. Kraemer, 52 Cal. 302, 306.

Under Civ. Code, § 164, providing that all property or assets acquired after marriage by either husband or wife, except that acquired by bequest, devise, or descent, is community property, it includes moneys earned by a wife while living with her husband, by her services as a nurse to another. Smith v. Furnish, 12 Pac. 392, 393, 70 Cal. 424.

The word "community," as used in Act 1879 relating to the sale of community property, means a compound creature of the statute constituted by the husband and wife together. "This creature is sometimes, though inaccurately, denominated a species of partnership. It probably approaches more nearly to that kind of partnership called universal than to any other business relationship known to the civil or common law. A conventional community might be contrived which would be substantially a partnership; but an ordinary legal community is, in many important particulars, quite distinct. It is like a partnership in that some property coming from or through one or other or both of the individuals forms for both a common stock which bears the losses and receives the profits of its management, and which is liable for individual debts; but it is unlike in that there is no regard paid to proportionate contribution, service, or business fidelity; that each individual, once in it, is incapable of disposing of his or her interest; and that both are powerless to escape from the relationship, to vary its terms, or to distribute its assets or its profits. In fixity of constitution a community resembles a corporation. It is similar to a corporation in this, also: that the state originates it, and that its powers and liabilities are ordained by statute. In it the proprietary interests of husband and wife are equal, and those interests do not seem to be united merely, but unified; not mixed or blent, but identified. It is sui generis—a creature of the statute." Holyoke v. Jackson, 3 Pac. 841, 8 Wash. T. 235.

COMMUNITY REAL PROPERTY.

The terms "community real property" and "community real estate," as used in the statutes relating to the acquisition and disposition of real property by a husband and wife, have the same meaning. Ross v. Howard, 72 Pac. 74, 75, 81 Wash. 393.

COMMUTE—COMMUTATION.

Of punishment.

"To commute" is defined, "To exchange for one penalty or punishment another, less severe." Webst. Dict. The change of a punishment to which a person has been condemned to a less severe one. Bouv. Law Dict. The substitution of a lesser for a greater penalty. Rich v. Chamberlain, 65 N. W. 235, 107 Mich. 381 (citing Anderson's Law Dict.); Ex parte Parker, 17 S. W. 658, 660, 106 Mo. 551; Ex parte Collins, 6 S. W. 345, 346, 94 Mo. 22; State v. State Board of Corrections, 52 Pac. 1090, 1092, 16 Utah, 478; Young v. Young, 61 Tex. 191, 193; State v. Peters, 43 Ohio St. 629, 651, 4 N. E. 81.

"A commutation is a change of one punishment known to the law for another and different punishment also known to the law." Ex parte Janes, 1 Nev. 319, 321.

Commutation is the substitution of a less for a greater punishment by authority of law, and may be imposed upon the convicted without his acceptance and against his consent. Lee v. Murphy (Va.) 22 Grat. 789, 798, 12 Am. Rep. 563.

The power of commutation, acting on the original sentence of the court, cuts down and modifies that sentence, and the force of that sentence, thus modified, sends the prisoner to the penitentiary. The commutation does not annul the sentence of the court, but is pro tanto an affirmation of it with a modification. Ex parte Collins, 6 S. W. 345, 346, 94 Mo. 22.

"In its legal acceptance commutation is a change of punishment from a higher to a lower degree in the scale of crimes and penalties fixed by the law, and it is presumed, therefore, to be beneficial to the convict. It is not a conditional pardon, nor is it simply the substitution of one punishment for another." In re Victor, 31 Ohio St. 206, 207; State v. Peters, 43 Ohio St. 629, 4 N. E. 81; In re Conditional Discharge of Convicts, 51 Atl. 10, 13, 73 Vt. 414, 56 L. R. A. 658.

A parole of a convict who remains in the legal custody and under the control of the board of prison managers, and subject at any time to be taken back within the inclosures of the prison, the board having full power to enforce such rules and regulations, and to retake and reimprison any convict so on parole, is not a commutation of such person's sentence; the prisoner simply being allowed to go outside of the buildings and inclosures of the penitentiary, but remaining in the legal custody and under the control of the board of prison managers. A law providing that the prison board of managers was empowered to parole convicts is not an encroachment on the pardoning power, and therefore is valid. State v. Peters, 43 Ohio St. 629, 4 N. E. 81; In re Conditional Discharge of Convicts, 51 Atl. 10, 13, 73 Vt. 414, 56 L. R. A. 658.

Of taxes.

As used with reference to taxation and assessment, the term "commute" means a payment of a designated sum for the privilege of exemption, or the selection in advance of a specific sum in lieu of an ad valorem tax. Louisiana Cotton Mfg. Co. v. City of New Orleans, 31 La. Ann. 440, 447.

COMMUTATION TICKET.

The term "commutation ticket" "applied to railroad tickets, is defined by Webster to be the purchase of a right to go upon a certain rate during a specified period for a less amount than would be paid in the aggregate for separate trips. The Century Dictionary gives the following definition: A ticket issued at a reduced rate by a carrier of passengers, entitling the holder to be carried for a given rate a limited number of times, or an unlimited number during a certain period. And as used in Interstate Commerce Act, § 22, authorizing sale of commutation passenger tickets, it includes party rate tickets." Per Sage, J., in Interstate Commerce Commission v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. (U. S.) 43 Fed. 37, 56; Id., 12 Sup. Ct. 844, 848, 145 U. S. 263, 36 L. Ed. 699.

COMMUTATIVE CONTRACTS.

Commutative contracts are those in which what is done, given, or promised by one party is considered as equivalent to, or a consideration for, what is done, given, or promised by the other. Civ. Code La. 1900, art. 1768.

The Code declares that a resolutive condition is implied in all commutative contracts in case either of the parties does not comply with his engagements, which is a condition effecting a dissolution or release of an obligation already vested as soon as the condition is fulfilled. Ridings v. Johnson, 9 Sup. Ct. 72, 73, 128 U. S. 212, 32 L. Ed. 401 (citing Black's Law Dict.).

COMPACT.

The word "compact" has different meanings, according to the subject in connection with which it is used. It is defined as meaning closely and firmly united, as the parts or particles of solid bodies having the parts or particles pressed or packed together; close, solid, dense, as a compact mass of property. But as used in connection with territorial surface in the constitutional provision that senatorial districts shall be formed of contiguous and compact territory, the word "compact" means closely united, and the provision that the districts shall be formed of contiguous and compact territory means that the counties or subdivisions of counties, when combined to form a district, must not only touch each other, but must be closely united territorially. People v. Thompson, 40 N. E. 307, 315, 155 Ill. 451.

The Constitution, providing that the subdivisions of the judicial districts shall be of compact territory bounded by county lines, etc., requires that the county composing a judicial subdivision shall be adjacent, and denies to the General Assembly the authority to create a subdivision consisting of separate bodies of territory. The word cannot be construed to mean that the territory should be divided so that the districts should be as nearly square as possible. State v. Jacobi, 39 N. E. 317, 318, 52 Ohio St. 66.

As an agreement or contract.

"'Compact' is synonymous with 'contract.' A compact is a mutual consent of the minds of the parties concerned, respecting some property or right that is the object of the stipulation, or something that is to be done or foreborne; a transaction between two or more persons in which each party comes under an obligation to the other, and each reciprocally acquires a right to whatever is promised or stipulated by the other; and any words manifesting that congregatio mentium are sufficient to constitute a compact or contract, no technical words being necessary for such purpose." Chesapeake & O. Canal Co. v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. (Md.) 4 Gill & J. 1, 129.

"Compact," as used in the constitutional prohibition of compacts or agreements between the states, means a compact tending to the increase of political power in the state, which may encroach upon or interfere with the just supremacy of the United States.

Stearns v. Minnesota, 21 Sup. Ct. 73, 82, 179 U. S. 223, 45 L. Ed. 162.

The compact of 1785 between Maryland and Virginia, in relation to the use for fishing purposes of waters of Chesapeake Bay and the Potomac river, was not a treaty, confederation, or alliance, within the meaning of the prohibition of the Articles of Confederation (article 6, cl. 2). Wharton v. Wise, 14 Sup. Ct. 783, 786, 153 U. S. 155, 38 L. Ed. 669.

The terms "compact" and "contract" are synonymous; and in Fletcher v. Peck, 10 U. S. (6 Cranch) 87, 3 L. Ed. 162, the Chief Justice defines a contract to be a compact between two or more parties. Green v. Biddle, 21 U. S. (8 Wheat.) 1, 92, 5 L. Ed. 547.

The terms "agreement" and "compact," as used in the Constitution in relation to the several states, taken by themselves are sufficiently comprehensive to embrace all forms of stipulation, written or verbal, and relating to all kinds of subjects—to those to which the United States can have no possible objection to or have any interest in interfering with, as well as to those which may tend to increase and build up the political influence of the contracting states, so as to encroach upon or impair the supremacy of the United States, or interfere with their rightful management of particular subjects placed under their entire control. There are many matters upon which different states may agree that can in no respect concern the United States. If, for instance, Virginia should come into possession and ownership of a small parcel of land in New York, which the latter state might desire to acquire as a site for a public building, it would hardly be deemed essential for the latter state to obtain the consent of Congress before it could make a valid agreement with Virginia for the purchase of the land. If Massachusetts, in forwarding its exhibits to the World's Fair at Chicago, should desire to transport them a part of the distance over the Erie Canal, it would hardly be deemed essential for the state to obtain the consent of Congress before it could contract with New York for the transportation of the exhibits through that state in that way. If the bordering line of two states should cross some malarious and disease producing district, there could be no possible reason, on any conceivable public grounds, to obtain the consent of Congress for the bordering states to agree to unite in draining the district, and thus removing the cause of disease. So, in case of the threatened invasion of cholera, plague, or other causes of sickness and death, it would be the height of absurdity to hold that the threatened states could not unite in providing means to prevent and repel the invasion of the pestilence without obtaining the consent of Congress, which might not be at the time in session. If, then, the terms "compact," and "agreement" in the Constitution do not apply to every possible compact or agreement between one state and another, for the validity of which the consent of Congress must be obtained, to what compacts or agreements does the Constitution apply? We can only reply by looking at the object of the constitutional provision, and construing the terms "agreement" and "compact" by reference to it. It is a familiar rule in the construction of terms to apply to them the meaning naturally attaching to them from their context. "Noscitur a sociis" is a rule of construction applicable to all written instruments. Where any particular word is obscure or of doubtful meaning taken by itself, its obscurity or doubt may be removed by reference to associated words, and the meaning of a term may be enlarged or restrained by reference to the object of the whole clause in which it is used. Looking at the clause in which the terms "compact" and "agreement" appear, it is evident that the prohibition is directed to the formation of any combination tending to the increase of political power in the states, which may encroach upon or interfere with the just supremacy of the United States. Story, in his Commentaries (section 1403), referring to a previous part of the same section of the Constitution in which the clause in question appears, observes that its language may be more plausibly interpreted from the terms used, "treaty, alliance, or confederation," and, upon the ground that the sense of each is best known by its association ("noscitur a sociis"), to apply to treaties of a political character, such as treaties of alliance for purpose of peace and war, and treaties of confederation, in which the parties are leagued for mutual government, political co-operation, and the exercise of political sovereignty, and treaties of session of sovereignty, or conferring internal political jurisdiction on external political dependence, or general commercial privileges, and that the latter clause, "compacts and agreements," might then very properly apply to such as regarded what might be deemed mere private rights of sovereignty, such as questions of boundary, interests in land situate in the territory of each other, and other internal regulations for the mutual comfort and convenience of states bordering on each other. And he adds: "In such cases the consent of Congress may be properly required in order to check any infringement of the rights of the national government, and at the same time a total prohibition to enter into any compact or agreement might be attended with permanent inconvenience or public mischief." Virginia v. Tennessee, 148 U. S. 503, 517, 519, 13 Sup. Ct. 728, 37 L. Ed. 537.

The words "company or association," as used in the act relating to insurance companies other than life, fire, and marine, shall be construed to mean any company, association, corporation, partnership, individual, or association of individuals doing or attempting to do business herein, under any charter, compact, or agreement, or statute of this state, or any other state, involving a guaranty, contract, or pledge of insurance other than life, fire, or marine underwriting. Gen. St. Minn. 1894, § 3334.

The term "company," as used in the insurance act of 1895, includes all corporations, associations, partnerships, or individuals engaged as principals in the business of insurance, when consistent with the context and not obviously used in a different sense. Shannon's Code Tenn. 1896, § 3274.

When consistent with the context, and not obviously used in a different sense, the term "company," as used in a chapter relating to home, life, and accident insurance companies, includes all corporations engaged as principals in the business of life, accident, or life and accident insurance. Rev. St. Tex. 1895, art. 3096a.

The term "company" embraces and applies to every person, firm, association of persons, and company, whether incorporated or not, who or which shall own or operate a telegraph or telephone line, or do an express or sleeping car business. Code Miss. 1892, § 4336.

The word "company," when used in reference to a corporation, shall be deemed to embrace the words "successors and assigns of such company or association," in like manner as if these last named words, or words of similar import, were expressed. U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 4.

The word "companies," as used in the chapter relating to special taxes in cities, shall be taken to mean and include any persons, companies, corporations, or associations owning or operating any street or other railway in any such city. Rev. St. Utah 1898, § 266.

When consistent with the context and not obviously used in a different sense, the term "company" or "insurance company," includes all corporations, associations, partnerships, or individuals engaged, directly or indirectly, as principals in the business of insurance. Civ. Code Ala. 1896, § 2575.

The term "company" or "insurance company," as used in the chapter relating to insurance, includes all corporations, associations, partnerships, or individuals engaged as principals in the business of insurance. Rev. Laws Mass. 1902, p. 1120, c. 118, § 1.

The term "company," as used in the act relating to street railway companies, shall include any corporation, partnership, or person owning or operating a street railway. Pub. St. N. H. 1901, p. 532, c. 27, § 69.

The word "company" or "association," as used in the act relating to plate glass, etc., insurance, shall be construed to mean any company, association, corporation, partnership, individual, or association of individuals, doing or attempting to do business in the state, under any charter, compact, agreement, or statute of this or any other state or foreign government, or whether incorporated or not, involving a guaranty, contract, or pledge of insurance upon plate glass or steam boilers, or upon the life of domestic animals lost by disease, accident, or theft of such animals, owned or located in the state, or upon individuals, residents of the state, against personal injury, disablement, or death resulting from accident, or guarantying the fidelity of any person holding public or private trust. Comp. Laws Mich. 1897, § 5113.

In the construction of statutes the words "corporation" and "company" may be construed as including any corporation, company, person, persons, partnership, joint-stock company, or association. Ky. St. 1903, § 457.

Club.

A club is not a company, within the joint-stock companies' winding-up acts. In re St. James' Club, 13 Eng. Law & Eq. 589.

Association.

In St. March 20, 1848, to suppress illegal banking, the terms "corporation, company or association of individuals" are applied to many persons acting together through officers or agents, and do not include a commercial firm of three parties. Mr. McCulloch, in his Commercial Dictionary, says, "When there are only a few individuals associated, it is most commonly called a 'copartnership'; the term 'company' being usually applied to large associations, like the East India Company, the Bank of England, etc., who conduct their operations by means of agents, acting under the orders of a board of directors." The word "association" is used as synonymous with the word "company." Speaking of joint-stock companies, Mr. McCulloch says, "The business of a great association must be conducted by factors or agents." Treating of open or regulated companies, the same author says, "The affairs of such companies or associations are managed by directors appointed by the members." Mills v. State, 23 Tex. 295, 303.

"Company," as used in an indictment of a fire insurance company charging that it exercised the privilege of a fire insurance company or association without having obtained a license, is synonymous with "association," as there used. Lee Mut. Fire Ins. Co. v. State, 60 Miss. 395, 396.

Rev. St. § 3205, provides that in an action by or against a corporation the complaint must aver that the plaintiff or defendant, as the case may be, is a corporation. The title of chapter 40, in which the section appears, is "All actions and proceedings by or against corporations and companies." Held, that the term "companies," as there used, could only denote private associations of persons for the transaction of some enterprise, showing an intention of the Legislature to limit the meaning of the word "corporations," with which the word "companies" is associated, to corporations created for like purposes, to wit, private corporations as distinguished from public corporations. Smith v. City of Janesville, 9 N. W. 789, 52 Wis. 680. As holding that the term "company" includes associations as well as corporations, see State v. Jacksonville Terminal Co., 27 South. 221, 237, 41 Fla. 363; State Board of Assessors v. Central R. Co., 4 Atl. 578, 607, 48 N. J. Law (19 Vroom) 146.

Corporation.

According to its ordinary acceptance, "company" imports a body corporate rather than a mere copartnership. Broom v. Galena, D. D. & M. Packet Co., 9 Minn. 239, 243 (Gil. 225, 229).

In an act prohibiting persons from acting as agents for insurance companies of any other state or government, the word "companies" is used as the equivalent of the word "corporations." Commonwealth v. Reinohl, 163 Pa. 287, 291, 29 Atl. 896, 25 L. R. A. 247.

The term "railroad company" is not equivalent to "railroad corporation," as it may mean either a corporation or a voluntary association. Therefore an indictment for obstructing an engine of a certain railroad company is insufficient under Comp. St. c. 26, § 65, declaring the willful obstruction of the engines of a railroad corporation a misdemeanor. State v. Mead, 27 Vt. (1 Williams) 722, 724.

While the word "company" is frequently used to denote an incorporated association, it does not necessarily involve that idea either in common speech or at law. The Imperial Dictionary says the word "company" is applicable to private partnership or to incorporated bodies, but, when there are only a few individuals associated, the concern is generally called a "copartnership," the term "company" being usually reserved for large associations; while it defines a "corporation" as a body politic or corporate formed and authorized by law to act as a single person. Bouvier's Law Dictionary defines "company" as an association of a number of individuals for the purpose of carrying on their legitimate business, and says that this term is not synonymous with "partnership," though every such incorporated company is a partnership. When these companies are authorized by the government, they are known by the name of "corporations." Bradley Fertilizer Co. v. South Pub. Co., 23 N. Y. Supp. 675, 678, 4 Misc. Rep. 172.

An indictment charged a defendant with taking and carrying away the personal goods of the Acme Brewing Company, and it was alleged that a demurrer was filed on the ground that the term "Acme Brewing Company" was not the name of an individual, and that it did not import either a partnership or a corporation. But the word "company" is more appropriate to a corporation than to a partnership, as partnerships are associations formed under names which would be appropriate to corporations. The name, then, being one more peculiarly suited to a corporation than a partnership, the presumption would be that it was the name of a corporation, and this presumption prevails until the contrary is made to appear; and, as the term imports a corporation, it is not necessary to allege the fact that it was a corporation in the indictment. Mattox v. State, 41 S. E. 709, 712, 115 Ga. 212.

The word "company" no longer applies exclusively to corporations. It may now be a part of the name of a partnership or of an unincorporated company, so that, as used in pleadings, it does not import that the person or thing was designated as a corporation. Leader Printing Co. v. Lowry, 59 Pac. 242, 246, 9 Okl. 89.

In construing a statute prohibiting any person or company from circulating change tickets as currency, the court asked the question, in a manner implying an affirmation, "if the word 'company' does not signify corporations, and was not intended, like the word 'persons,' to restrain and punish them as well as others from issuing or putting into circulation such spurious currency." Van Horne v. State, 5 Ark. (5 Pike) 349, 352.

The term "company," as used in the chapter of the Penal Code relating to frauds in the sale of passage tickets, includes all corporations, whether created under the laws of this state or that of the United States, or those of any other state or nation. Pen. Code N. Y. 1903, § 627.

"Company" and "corporation" are commonly used as interchangeable terms, and are so used in Act March 7, 1899, relating to the incorporation of street railroads. Goddard v. Chicago & N. W. Ry. Co., 66 N. E. 1068, 1068, 202 Ill. 362.

Individuals.

The word "company" sometimes includes individuals as well as corporations. So that, as used in Rev. St. Mo. 1889, § 5910, providing that no company shall transact business in the state without a certificate, the word "company" will be held as including both companies and associations of individuals. State v. Stone, 24 S. W. 164, 165, 118 Mo. 388, 25 L. R. A. 243, 40 Am. St. Rep. 388.

"Company" literally means only a corporation or a partnership, but the word is often used to embrace single individuals, and as used in Tax Act 1886, § 2, par. 17, imposing a tax on "every sewing machine company selling or dealing in sewing machines," refers to single individuals engaged in such business as well as a corporation or partnership. Singer Mfg. Co. v. Wright, 25 S. E. 249, 251, 97 Ga. 114, 35 L. R. A. 497; Singer Mfg. Co. v. Wright (U. S.) 33 Fed. 121, 127.

General Incorporation Law, art. 5, § 1, cl. 90, providing that the city council or board of trustees shall have no power to grant the use of or right to lay down any railroad tracks in any street of the city to any steam or horse railroad company, except upon a petition of the owners of the land representing more than one-half of the frontage of the street, or so much thereof as is sought to be used for railroad purposes, includes both corporations and individuals. "The use of the word 'company,' we have no doubt, was simply because such tracks are always laid and operated by companies." Chicago Dock & Canal Co. v. Garrity, 3 N. E. 448, 451, 115 Ill. 155.

"Company," as used in a special act of incorporation speaking of "property now owned by such company," when in fact the company was not then in existence, meant the individuals composing such company. Keyport & M. P. Steamboat Co. v. Farmers' Transp. Co., 18 N. J. Eq. (3 C. E. Green) 13, 18.

The statute providing that the board of assessors shall ascertain the true value of all property used for railway and canal purposes of each canal company in the state includes not only corporations, but also individuals and associations, owning or operating railroads or canals under a franchise. State Board of Assessors v. Central R. Co., 4 Atl. 578, 607, 48 N. J. Law (19 Vroom) 146.

The terms "owner, lessee, or operators of passenger terminals, and the person or company operating the same," in Laws 1899, c. 4700, § 6, relating to the power of railroad commissioners to compel admission into certain passenger terminals of railroad companies desiring or required by the commissioners to enter, and to fixing reasonable rates, etc., for the use and privilege, cannot be limited to corporations only, but also includes associations and individuals. State v. Jacksonville Terminal Co., 27 South. 221, 237, 41 Fla. 363.

Municipal corporation.

Webster gives one definition of the word "company": "A number of persons united for the same purpose or in a joint concern; as a company of merchants. The word is applicable to private partnerships or incorporated bodies of men; hence it may signify a firm, house, or partnership; or a corporation, as the East India Company." In this case a municipal corporation was held not to come within the term "incorporated company." Kansas City v. Vineyard, 30 S. W. 326, 327, 128 Mo. 75.

The word "company," in Code 1873, § 25, as amended by Act Feb. 2, 1875, providing that if any railroad, turnpike, or canal company shall cross any other railroad, turnpike, or canal, or any state or county road, its work should be so constructed as not to impair the safety or impede or endanger the operations of the work to be crossed, and such crossing should be otherwise effected by such permanent and proper structures and fixtures as would best make life and property passing upon the same safe, and should be satisfactory to the company whose work is to be crossed, does not embrace a county or city. City of Charlottesville v. Southern Ry. Co., 34 S. E. 98, 97 Va. 428.

Partnership.

While the word "company" is frequently used to denote an incorporated association, it does not necessarily involve that idea either in speech or at law, for the word is applicable to private partnerships as well. Bradley Fertilizer Co. v. South Pub. Co., 23 N. Y. Supp. 675, 678, 4 Misc. Rep. 172.

"The proper signification of the word 'company,' when applied to persons engaged in trade, denotes those united for the same purpose or in a joint concern. It is so commonly used in this sense, or as meaning a partnership, that few persons accustomed to purchase goods at shops where they are sold at retail would misapprehend that such was its meaning." Palmer v. Pinkham, 33 Me. 32, 36.

"Company," as used in a note signed "M. & Co." cannot be treated as a mere adjunct or surplage, but imports that a note was made by a partnership, and not by M. individually. Price v. McClave, 13 N. Y. Super. Ct. (6 Duer) 544, 547, 548.

In an agreement between two persons that one should go into a certain business under a specified firm name, and that the other should be the general manager of the company and receive a fixed salary and one-half the profits of the company, each party to receive interest on his investment and credits, the company so formed was a partnership composed of the persons who executed such agreement. Ryder v. Wilcox, 103 Mass. 24, 28.

A firm which was the agent of a farm machinery company, and was known to be such, entered into an agreement with a sub-agent whereby all paper taken by the sub-agent in payment for machines sold by him was to be subject to acceptance by the company. Held, that the words "the company" referred to the farm machinery company, and not to the partnership. Brown v. McCaul, 60 N. W. 151, 152, 6 S. D. 16.

Stockholders.

Const. § 211, declares that no railroad corporation, organized under the laws of another state, doing business in Kentucky, shall have the right of eminent domain or the power to acquire real estate until it shall have become a body corporate in accordance with the laws of Kentucky. Ky. St. 1899, § 841, provides that no company or corporation organized under the laws of any other state shall maintain any railway in Kentucky until it shall have become a citizen, resident, and corporation of the state. Held, in a suit against a foreign railroad corporation which attempted to remove the case to the federal court, that the word "corporation" in Const. § 211, and the word "company," etc., in Ky. St. 1899, § 841, referred to the corporation as a legal entity, and not to its stockholders, and the court would presume, for purposes of jurisdiction, that the stockholders were citizens of the foreign state. Lewis v. Maysville & B. S. R. Co., 76 S. W. 526, 527, 25 Ky. Law Rep. 948.

Unincorporated association.

A law of 1862 in regard to the manner of serving companies of a certain character refers to companies whether incorporated or not. Gillig v. Independent Gold & Silver Min. Co., 1 Nev. 247, 249.

COMPANY (Militia).

The word "division," as used in the section relating to the national guard, in connection with the naval militia, shall have the same meaning and effect as "company" when used in connection with the infantry. Pol. Code Cal. 1903, § 1912.

Whenever the word "company" is used in a military sense in the act relating to the militia, it shall be understood and construed to mean a company of infantry, battery of artillery, or troop of cavalry. Cobbey's Ann. St. Neb. 1903, § 7216.

In the chapter relating to the militia, the word "company" shall include battery, troop, signal corps, and ambulance corps. Rev. Laws Mass. 1902, p. 281, c. 16, § 1.

The word "company," as used in the act relating to militia, includes a company of infantry, battery of artillery, troop of cavalry, hospital or signal corps. Pub. St. N. H. 1901, p. 331, c. 59, § 131.

For the purpose of the chapter relating to the volunteer forces, the word "company" or "companies" shall apply to and include infantry, cavalry, artillery, machine gun and signal corps forces, except where otherwise specified. Code Ga. 1895, § 1109.

In the chapter relating to the militia, the word "company" shall include battery of artillery and troop of cavalry. Code Iowa 1897, § 2207.

Whenever the word "company" is used in a military sense in the chapter relating to the national guard, it shall be construed to mean a company of infantry, troop of cavalry, or battery of artillery. Rev. St. Wis. 1898, § 649.

COMPANY'S PAPER.

"Company's paper," as used in a contract that the parties to it, being stockholders of a certain company, would indemnify those who are or become indorsers of the company's paper, is synonymous with the term "corporate paper," and includes any and all obligations for the payment of money made by the corporation or for its use and benefit. Taylor v. Coon, 48 N. W. 123, 125, 79 Wis. 76.

COMPARATIVE INTERPRETATION.

"In expounding statutes we should have regard to what may properly be termed 'comparative interpretation' of the laws; that is, we should not so collate and compare the several parts of the statute in question, but compare the whole statute with other statutes enacted by the same legislative body in reference to the same subject, and thus determine the real purpose and intent of the Legislature, both by what is expressed and by what is omitted in the statute under consideration." Glenn v. York County Com'rs, 6 S. C. (6 Rich.) 412, 418.

COMPARATIVE NEGLIGENCE.

The doctrine of comparative negligence is that, where there are faults on both sides, the plaintiff may, in some cases, recover, as where it appears that his negligence is slight and that of the defendant gross. There must be fault on the part of defendant, and no want of ordinary care on the part of plaintiff. Calumet Iron & Steel Co. v. Martin, 3 N. E. 456, 463, 115 Ill. 358.

The doctrine of comparative negligence authorizes a recovery by the plaintiff, although he was at fault, provided he was injured under circumstances where by the exercise of ordinary care on his part he could not have avoided the consequences of defendant's negligence. Western & A. R. Co. v. Ferguson, 39 S. E. 306, 308, 113 Ga. 708, 54 L. R. A. 802.

The doctrine of comparative negligence has never been recognized in this state. In Straus v. Kansas City, St. J. & C. B. R. Co., 75 Mo. 185, the direct rule as to contributory negligence in passenger cases was thus announced: "When the concurring negligence of the plaintiff proximately contributes to produce the injury complained of, there can be no recovery, unless such injury is also a direct result of the omission of the defendant, after becoming aware of the injury to which the plaintiff was exposed, to use the proper degree of care to avoid injuring him." Hurt v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. Ry. Co., 7 S. W. 1, 4, 94 Mo. 255, 4 Am. St. Rep. 374.

COMPARISON OF WRITINGS.

"Comparison" is the "act of comparing; an examination of two or more objects with a view of discovering the resemblance or difference; relative estimate." Webst. Int. Dict. It is by "comparison" of the two documents that we ascertain the difference between them, while by "construction" we determine whether the differences are such as that the purported copy is or is not a substantial copy of the original. Johnson v. Des Moines Life Ins. Co., 105 Iowa, 273, 276, 75 N. W. 101, 102.

What is now meant by "comparison of hands" is not exactly what was formerly meant. By comparison is now meant juxtaposition of two or more writings before the jury, that it may, from its own inspection and comparison of the paper in contest with others admitted or proved to be genuine, decide the question. Rowt's Adm'r v. Kille's Adm'r (Va.) 1 Leigh, 216, 222. See, also, Travis v. Brown, 43 Pa. (7 Wright) 9, 12, 82 Am. Dec. 540.

COMPASS DIP.

The term "compass dip," in the mining law, is used to designate a dip "as to the direction it takes from the strike or apex by the points of the compass. If the strike were due east and west, and the vein in its course downward departed from a perpendicular at an angle, so that a perpendicular shaft sunk at the apex would leave the vein to the north of such shaft, the dip, in this point of view, would be said to be due north, or, the conditions reversed, due south. In this respect a dip—that is, the direction of a dip—is said to be and is at right angles to the strike." King v. Amy & Silversmith Consol. Min. Co., 24 Pac. 200, 202, 9 Mont. 543.

COMPEL—COMPELLED.

"Compelling," as used in an instruction in an action for injuries to an employé from a defective scaffolding submitting the question whether or not the defendants were negligent in directing and compelling the plaintiff to go upon the scaffolding, has no other significance than ordering or directing. Haworth v. Seevers Mfg. Co., 51 N. W. 68, 71, 87 Iowa, 765.

"Compelled," as used in an instruction that if the plaintiff was forced or compelled by the conductor to jump from the train while it was in motion, etc., implies force or violence, and has in it the element of irresistibility, and, as employed in the instruction, could not have conveyed any other impression to the mind of the jury than as meaning the same thing as force. St. Clair v. Missouri Pac. Ry. Co., 29 Mo. App. 76, 86.

Cause synonymous.

As cause, see "Cause" (verb)."

Coerce distinguished.

See "Coerce—Coercion."

Obliged by legal process.

The words "compelled to pay," in a contract whereby it was agreed that the party of the second part's balance of the purchase money should be held by the parties of the first part to be applied to one-third of whatever sums of money the parties of the first part might be compelled to pay on certain debts, cannot be construed to require the defendants to pay only such claims as final judgment had been rendered for. What the defendants were legally bound to pay is what the contract meant. Rosenbaum v. Rosenbaum (Miss.) 34 South. 324.

"Compelled to pay," as used in a contract agreeing to repay any sum which the obligee shall be compelled to pay on a certain bond, means "whatever by legal process he shall be obliged to pay, without reference to the laws of any particular state." Parker v. Thompson, 20 Mass. (3 Pick.) 429, 433.

Const. art. 1, § 6, declares that no person shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself. Held, that the word "compulsion," as there used, means merely compulsion exercised through the process of the courts, or through laws acting directly on the party, and has no reference whatever to an indirect or argumentative pressure, such as is claimed is exerted by Act 1869 (Laws 1869, c. 678), declaring that on a criminal trial the accused shall at his own request, but not otherwise, be deemed a competent witness against himself. People v. Courtney, 94 N. Y. 490, 493.

In prohibiting the state from compelling one to be a witness against himself, the Constitution means just what a fair interpretation of the language imports. No person shall be compelled to be a witness against himself—that is, to testify against himself. To use the common phrase, it “closes the mouth” of the person. A defendant in a criminal case cannot be compelled to give evidence under oath or affirmation, or make any statement for the purpose of proving or disproving any question at issue, before any tribunal, court, judge, or magistrate. It is a shield under which he is protected by the strong arm of the law, and this protection was given, not for the purpose of evading the truth, but for the reason that, in the sound sense of the men who framed the Constitution, it was thought that, owing to the weakness of human nature, and the various motives that actuate mankind, a defendant accused of a crime might be tempted to give evidence against himself that was not true. Compelling a defendant to exhibit his arm in such a manner as to show tattoo marks which a witness testified he knew were there—the identity of the defendant being the question at issue—was not in violation of the Constitution. State v. Ah Chuey, 14 Nev. 79, 83, 33 Am. Rep. 530.

Threat of legal proceedings.

“Compelled,” as used in 2 Rev. St. 1876, § 676, providing that, when any defendant surety in a judgment shall be compelled to pay any judgment or any part thereof, the judgment shall not be discharged by such payment, but shall remain in force to the use of the surety, includes a payment made by one under threat of legal proceedings to enforce the payment, since what one may be compelled to do by suit he may do without suit; and the fact that the party did not resist payment, and wait until a suit was instituted, did not render the payment voluntary. Burbank v. Slinkard, 53 Ind. 493, 495.

COMPENSATION.

See “Adequate Compensation”; “Due Compensation”; “Extra Compensation”; “Fair Compensation”; “Full Compensation”; “Just Compensation”; “Legal Compensation”; “Reasonable Compensation”; “Same Compensation.”

Compensation first made, see “First.”

“The primary significance of the word ‘compensation’ is equivalence, and the second or more common meaning is something given or obtained as an equivalent.” Winnona & St. P. R. Co. v. Denman, 10 Minn. 267, 280 (Gil. 208).

As a general rule, compensation is the relief or remedy provided by the law of this state for the violation of private rights and the means of securing their observance. Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 4969.

In a prosecution under Gen. St. c. 47, art. 1, § 1, as amended by Act March 25, 1866, inflicting a penalty on any one who for compensation sets up or conducts a game of cards whereby money or other thing may be won or lost, the addition of the words, “in any form whatever,” after the word “compensation,” in an instruction, is not error, the words “in any form whatever” being embraced by the word “compensation” in the sense in which it is used in the statute. Harper v. Commonwealth, 19 S. W. 737, 93 Ky. 290.

Good public roads or streets is a sufficient compensation for the labor required to be performed by each individual in keeping them in good order and condition, and this labor, or the money paid in lieu thereof, is imposed and taken as an assessment or tax; and such compensation is just as good as the compensation is in any case where persons are taxed. State v. City of Topeka, 12 Pac. 310, 315, 36 Kan. 76, 59 Am. Rep. 529.

“Compensation,” as used in the rule that a state cannot fix the rate of charge for a carrier so low that it will afford no compensation, “implies three things—payment of costs of service, interest on bonds, and then some dividend.” Clyde v. Richmond & D. R. Co. (U. S.) 57 Fed. 436, 440; Chicago & N. W. Ry. Co. v. Dey (U. S.) 35 Fed. 866, 879, 1 L. R. A. 744.

Cost distinguished.

The word “compensation” is a term of larger scope than “cost,” and especially than “actual cost.” City of Newton v. Boston & A. R. Co., 51 N. E. 183, 185, 172 Mass. 5.

Fare distinguished.

When used in reference to common carriers, “compensation” relates to carriage of both passengers and freight, while “fare” relates only to passengers; so that a statute authorizing street surface railroads to carry persons and property in cars for compensation indicates an intention that freight may be carried. Degrauw v. Long Island Electric Ry. Co., 60 N. Y. Supp. 163, 167, 43 App. Div. 502.

As fees, salary, allowances, etc.

In Const. art. 6, § 13, as amended in 1880, providing that the judges of the Supreme Court shall retire at 70 years of age, but that the compensation of every justice whose term of office shall be abridged shall continue during the remainder of the term for which he was elected, the term "compensation" means the sum of money which the judicial officer had been in receipt of from the state, and hence included a yearly sum allowed as expenses. People v. Wemple, 22 N. E. 272, 274, 115 N. Y. 302.

In Const. art. 4, § 21, providing that no person holding any lucrative office under the United States shall be eligible to any civil office of profit under the state, but providing that local officers and postmasters whose compensation does not exceed $500 per annum shall not be deemed lucrative, the word "compensation" means the allowance received by such officers from the government, "which in common understanding, and perhaps in strict grammatical accuracy, may be called his compensation." It is not limited to the clear income of the office after paying all necessary expenses. Searcy v. Grow, 15 Cal. 112, 117.

"Compensation," as used in Const. art. 11, § 9, providing that the compensation of any county, city, town, or municipal officer shall not be increased after his election or during his term of office, is synonymous with "salary," and does not include traveling or other incidental expenses. Kirkwood v. Soto, 25 Pac. 488, 489, 87 Cal. 394.

The term "compensation," in its ordinary acceptation, applies not only to salaries, but to compensation by fees for specific services, so that Ky. St. § 1722, providing for the payment to clerks of circuit courts of a fee of $5 for services in each following case, etc., was unconstitutional in so far as it affected clerks in office at the date of its passage, the Constitution forbidding a change in compensation of any officer during his term. Commonwealth v. Carter (Ky.) 55 S. W. 701, 702.

As used in Const. art. 4, § 26, forbidding the compensation of any officer to be increased or diminished during his term of office, the word "compensation" signified a return for the services of such officers as receive a fixed salary payable out of the public treasury of the state, and does not and was not intended to apply to the remuneration of that large class of officers, such as sheriffs, constables, clerks of courts, and others, who receive specific fees for services, as they are from time to time required to render them. The limitation applied only to those salaried officers paid by the state. State v. Kalb, 6 N. W. 557, 558, 50 Wis. 178; Milwaukee County Sup'rs v. Hackett, 21 Wis. 613.

In Const. 1875, art. 5, § 21, providing that the officers of the executive department shall receive for their services a salary to be established by law, and shall not receive to their own use any fees, costs, perquisites of office, or other compensation, the words "other compensation" mean more than is embraced in the terms "fees," "costs," and "perquisites of office," and do they apply to an increase of salary. State ex rel. McGrath v. Holladay, 67 Mo. 64, 65.

The words "compensation or salary," in Greater New York Charter, § 283, providing that the salary or compensation of officers who become members of the police force through consolidation shall not thereby be decreased as the same is lawfully fixed at the time the charter takes effect and immediately prior thereto, are not synonymous with the phrase "prospective scale of salary," and therefore do not assure to a police officer his prospective scale of compensation according to the grading of a force to which he belonged at the time he became a member of the municipal force, but only preserve his right to the pay which he is actually receiving when transferred to the municipal force. People v. York, 60 N. Y. Supp. 795, 796, 29 Misc. Rep. 158.

Where the words "compensation" or "salary" are used in a statute in reference to the remuneration of the sheriff, they are synonymous terms, and refer to the recompense or consideration that is stipulated to be paid to the sheriff for his personal services. Crawford County v. Lindsay, 11 Ill. App. (11 Bradw.) 261, 263.

"Compensation," as used in the Constitution, requiring the board of supervisors to fix the compensation of a county treasurer, etc., should not be construed as synonymous with "salary," but that a sum fixed as compensation should include not only the sum intended for the treasurer's personal services, but also the allowance intended for fuel, clerk hire, etc. Kilgore v. People, 76 Ill. 548, 552.

Indemnity distinguished.

Though "compensation" may be broad enough in a popular sense to include "indemnity," still, if the terms are used by the parties in a contract in a special or technical sense, they will be so understood; so that in an application for an insurance policy, failing to state that the applicant had received compensation for previous injuries will not be held to mean indemnity. Bayley v. Employers' Liability Assur. Corp. of London, England, 58 Pac. 7, 8, 125 Cal. 345.

As payment in full.

Act Cong. March 3, 1877 (19 Stat. 294), relating to the payment of the salaries of certain officers, and declaring that "the following sums be and the same are hereby appropriated out of any money in the treasury not otherwise appropriated in full compensation for the service of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1878," so limits the salaries of the officers therein provided for that they cannot obtain larger salaries under any other provisions of the statutes than is provided for by this act. United States v. Fisher, 3 Sup. Ct. 154, 155, 109 U. S. 143, 27 L. Ed. 885.

"Compensation," within the meaning of a statute providing that a public officer should receive a certain salary as compensation, except, etc., is to be construed as meaning full, complete, and entire compensation for all services, except those specifically excepted. Erie County Sup'rs v. Jones, 23 N. E. 742, 119 N. Y. 339.

As payment in money.

The term "compensation" "imports that a wrong or injury has been inflicted which must be redressed in money." Symonds v. City of Cincinnati, 14 Ohio, 147, 148, 175, 45 Am. Dec. 529.

In the exercise of the right of eminent domain, no just compensation can be made for the property taken except in money. Money is a common standard, by comparison with which the value of anything may be ascertained. Compensation is a recompense in value, a quid pro quo, and must be in money. Land or anything else may be a compensation, but then it must be at the election of the party; it cannot be forced upon him; and an act of the Legislature which provides that land may be taken and paid for with other lands belonging to the state does not provide a constitutional compensation. Vanborne's Lessee v. Dorrance, 2 U. S. (2 Dall.) 304, 315, 28 Fed. Cas. 1012, 1 L. Ed. 391; Alabama & F. R. Co. v. Burkett, 43 Ala. 83, 89.

"Compensation," as used in the Constitution, providing that private property shall not be taken for public use without just compensation, means the payment of the valuation of the property taken, in money. Loweree v. City of Newark, 38 N. J. Law (9 Vroom) 151, 155.

The word "compensation" imports that a wrong or injury has been inflicted, and which must be redressed in money. Money must be paid to the extent of injury, whether more or less than the value of the property. Thus, if property is benefited by an improvement or the taking of part of it, the payment in full of the value of the part taken would be more than giving compensation. Bauman v. Ross, 17 Sup. Ct. 966, 979, 167 U. S. 548, 42 L. Ed. 270.

As price or value.

"Compensation," though usually called "damages," is in fact the consideration or price of a privilege purchased. Gilmore v. Pittsburgh, V. & C. R. Co., 104 Pa. 275, 281.

As used in a statute providing that commissioners shall be appointed to determine the compensation and damages which an owner of real estate may sustain by reason of his property being taken for a right of way, "compensation" means an equivalent for the value of the land, and anything beyond that is more than compensation, and anything short of it is less. This equivalent is for the present value of the land, and not its future value, since no human tribunal is able to determine judicially what the value of land will be at some future time. New Jersey R. & Transp. Co. v. Suydam, 17 N. J. Law (2 Har.) 25, 47.

"Compensation," as the term is used in reference to compensation for land taken for a railroad, consists in giving back an equivalent, either in money, which is but the measure of value, or in actual value otherwise conferred. Long v. Harrisburgh & P. R. Co., 19 Atl. 39, 40, 126 Pa. 143.

The term "compensation," in regard to compensation for land taken for public use, means much more than "value." In re First Street, 26 N. W. 159, 162, 58 Mich. 641; Virginia & T. R. Co. v. Henry, 8 Nev. 165, 167, 171.

Profits distinguished.

Within the meaning of Rev. St. 1874, p. 291, § 31, providing that "associations and societies which are intended to benefit the widows and orphans as agencies of deceased members thereof, where no annual dues or premiums are required, and where the members shall receive no money as profits or otherwise, shall not be deemed insurance companies," the payment to officers of compensation for their services would not be a receipt of money as profits or otherwise. The word "profits," as ordinarily used, means the gain made upon any business or investment—a different thing altogether from mere compensation for labor. Commercial League Ass'n of America v. People, 90 Ill. 166, 173.

As remuneration for injury.

The term "compensation," when applied to damages, has a fixed legal signification, much more restricted than its common or general acceptance. In actions for personal injuries it is limited to the expense of cure, the value of time lost, a fair compensation for the physical and mental suffering caused by the injury, and for any permanent reduction of the power to earn money. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Logsdon (Ky.) 71 S. W. 905, 906 (citing Louisville, C. & L. R. Co. v. Case's Adm'r, 72 Ky. [9 Bush] 736; Standard Oil Co. v. Tierney, 92 Ky. 367, 17 S. W. 1025, 14 L. R. A. 677, 36 Am. St. Rep. 595).

Literally and strictly speaking, compensation for personal injuries received may be said to include compensation for diminished ability to labor. St. Louis, S. W. Ry. Co. v. Byers (Tex.) 70 S. W. 558, 560.

In an action for libel, compensation includes remuneration for all the injury which the plaintiffs have sustained, whether a pecuniary loss or an injury to the feelings or reputation. Austin v. Wilson, 58 Mass. (4 Gush.) 273, 274, 50 Am. Dec. 766.

"Compensation," as used in the phrase "compensation for pain and suffering," is not to be understood as meaning the price or value. It is, however, compensation, not as a precise equivalent or valuation, nor compensation from a sentimental or benevolent standpoint, but such amount as will be the most reasonable approximation the circumstances admit, to a pecuniary compensation not in the nature of things capable of exact measurement. Schenkel v. Pittsburg & B. Traction Co., 44 Atl. 1072, 1073, 194 Pa. 182.

The word "compensation" in the phrase "compensation for pain and suffering" for which a person may recover in an action for personal injuries, is not to be understood as meaning price or value, but as describing an allowance looking toward recompense for or made because of the suffering consequent upon the injury. Goodhart v. Pennsylvania R. Co., 35 Atl. 191, 193, 177 Pa. 1, 55 Am. St. Rep. 705.

Compensation for a tort means recompense for the whole injury suffered, and, in the case of the ejection of a passenger from a train who had bought a ticket in good faith, in addition to the actual outlay incident to the repudiation of the ticket and the delay in the journey, includes necessary and reasonable expense in and about the prosecution of a suit in vindication of his legal right as a passenger. Cowen v. Winters (U. S.) 96 Fed. 929, 932, 37 L. R. A. 627.

"Compensation," as used in the statement of the rule that the object of damages other than exemplary is to give compensation to the party injured, consists in remuneration for loss of time, necessary expenditures, and for permanent disability, if such occur. Parker v. Jenkins, 66 Ky. (3 Bush) 587, 591.

The word "compensation," as used in connection with assessment of damages in an action for illegal arrest, is usually employed for want of a better phrase to express the thought which underlies the right of recovery for such injuries. It is not a matter of price or market value, but is a substantial award for injuries for which there is no other legal redress, and its amount is left to the sound discretion of the jury. Young v. Gormley, 94 N. W. 922, 924 120 Iowa, 372 (citing Morgan v. Southern Pac. Co., 95 Cal. 501, 30 Pac. 601; Head v. Georgia Pac. Ry. Co., 79 Ga. 358, 7 S. E. 217, 11 Am. St. Rep. 434).

2 Wds. & P.—23

In civil law.

"Compensation is of three kinds, legal or by operation of law, compensation by way of exception and by reconvention." Stewart v. Harper, 16 La. Ann. 181.

Compensation is a reciprocal acquittal of debts between two persons who are indebted one to the other. It is not enough to make compensation that there be a debt on the one side and the other, but it is, moreover, necessary that both the debts be clear and liquid; that is, certain and not liable to dispute. Thus, one cannot compensate with a clear and liquid debt a debt that is litigious, nor a pretension that is not settled. Campbell v. Park, 33 S. W. 754, 755, 11 Tex. Civ. App. 455; Howard v. Randolph, 11 S. W. 495, 497, 73 Tex. 454.

"Compensation is a mode of payment. It takes place by the mere operation of law, without the knowledge of the debtor, and two debts are reciprocally extinguished as soon as they exist simultaneously to the amount of their respective sums." Therefore, after a judgment is rendered and execution issued, the defendant in the suit can purchase a promissory note of the plaintiff, oppose it in compensation of the amount due, and suspend the enforcement of the execution until the verity of the claim thus set up is examined. Caldwell v. Davis (La.) 2 Mart. (N. S.) 135, 136.

For taking property by eminent domain.

"Compensation" is an equivalent for property taken, or for an injury done to another. Louisiana & F. Plank Road Co. v. Pickett, 25 Mo. 535, 539.

"Compensation" is the rendering of an equivalent in value and amount, according to all standard lexicographers. To compensate a person in money for an article of property obtained of him, is to pay him its value in money. The language of the Constitution as to compensation for private property condemned is plain, clear, and positive, and it is on a provision for compensation in money that private property can be taken for public use. Kramer v. Cleveland & P. R. Co., 5 Ohio St. 140, 155.

"Compensation," in condemnation proceedings, is the equivalent for property taken or for an injury, which must be ascertained by estimating the actual damage the party has sustained. That damage is the sum of the actual value of the property taken, and of the injury done to the residue of the property by the use of that part which is taken, less the benefit which accrues to the residue of the said property by the use of that which is taken. Greenville & C. R. Co. v. Partlow (S. C.) 5 Rich. Law, 428, 437.

The right of eminent domain is an incident to sovereignty, and exists in every government. Private mischief, rather than public, must of necessity be endured. The obligation to make compensation, however, follows this right, as the shadow does the substance, and is concomitant with it. It is not in all countries a legal obligation, but it is an obligation of natural equity and justice everywhere. It is, however, incorporated in our organic law that compensation in money shall be made to the owner whenever his property is appropriated for the public welfare. That just, full, and adequate compensation must be made, and in money, is certain; more cannot be required. But if, in appropriating property of the value of $4,000, when by the same appropriation the value of what remains is increased $2,000, and the value of the property taken is the rule of damages, the owner actually takes $2,000 without the least consideration, and receives more than the Constitution enjoins to be paid, because it is more than a compensation. Hence, in estimating the amount of compensation to be paid, the increased value, if any, to the property remaining, resulting directly to it from the appropriation, should be taken into consideration. Symonds v. City of Cincinnati, 14 Ohio, 147, 174, 45 Am. Dec. 526.

The word "compensation," as used in Lateral Railroad Act Feb. 18, 1871 (P. L. 56), is absolute in definition and suggestion, and implies, ex vi termini, that the owner must be paid—that is, must be compensated; must have an award made to him in dollars and cents, in order to make him wholly, fully, and entirely whole for the taking from him of his private property. The term "compensation" in itself is well defined here as "that which is given or received as an equivalent for services, debt, want, loss, or suffering; awards, remuneration, recompense; that which supplies the place of something, or makes good a deficiency." Hays v. Briggs (Pa.) 3 Pittsb. R. 504, 517.

The word "compensation," as used in Const. Cal. art. 1, § 14, providing that private property should not be taken for public use without just compensation having first been made to the owner by paying into court a sum of money, does not include payment into court before the damages have been judicially determined, and when the owner cannot take the money, for such owner is not compensated until he may take the money. It is not paid into court until he can take it. Steinhart v. Superior Court of Mendocino County, 70 Pac. 629, 630, 137 Cal. 575, 59 L. R. A. 404, 92 Am. St. Rep. 183.

The object of an appraisal to the owner of land taken by a railroad company for right of way is to make such owner "good" by rendering an equivalent in money for the loss he sustains in the value of his property by being deprived of a portion of it. This, it is obvious, must be the main ingredient in the compensation which the commissioners are to determine. "Compensation" includes not only the value of the portion taken, but the diminution of the value of that from which it is severed also. Rochester & S. R. Co. v. Budlong (N. Y.) 6 How. Prac. 467, 469.

In Bigelow v. West Wisconsin Ry. Co., 27 Wis. 478, it was held that "just compensation," within the meaning of the term as used in the constitutional provision relative to paying just compensation for land taken for public purposes, consists in making the owner good by an equivalent in money for the loss he sustains in the value of his property by being deprived of a portion of it, and that it includes not only the portion taken, but also the diminution in value from which it is severed." In establishing this rule, we followed the reasoning of this court in Robbins v. Milwaukee & H. R. Co., 6 Wis. 636, Snyder v. Western Union Ry. Co., 25 Wis. 60, and Welch v. Milwaukee & St. P. Ry. Co., 27 Wis. 108, and adopted the doctrine of numerous adjudications by the courts of other states on the same subject. Pick v. Rubicon Hydraulic Co., 27 Wis. 433, 445; Parks v. Wisconsin Cent. R. Co., 33 Wis. 413, 420.

"Compensation," as used in St. Mich. 1883, No. 124, providing that, after the municipality had determined on the policy of a public improvement, a jury of freeholders from the municipality shall determine the public necessity and the proper compensation for land taken, means much more than the term "value." The mere value of the land as isolated land is not the measure of compensation to be awarded a railroad company across whose tracks a street has been extended, but the damage necessarily includes all the additional expenses entailed by such crossing, which in a city would embrace the expense of making the crossing safe and providing guards against accident. In re First Street, 26 N. W. 159, 160, 58 Mich. 641.

"Compensation," as used in St. 1864, 1865, pp. 439, 440, requiring compensation for land appropriated by a railroad to be paid to the landowner, does not mean the mere market value of the land taken, but includes compensation for injuries to adjoining lands. Virginia & T. R. Co. v. Henry, 8 Nev. 165, 171.

"'Compensation' means 'a recompense given for a thing received,' and, where private property is taken for a public use for a canal, the general advantages received by the public from such improvement cannot properly be said to be a recompense given for the land, for they are equally conferred on those who lose no land. Neither, indeed, are they gifts to anybody. They are a mere incident or accident arising out of the existence of the improvement. It is neither a gift ex mero motu, nor can it be tortured into a price given for what he has taken from me. It can create no debt; it can pay no debt. It can neither give a right of action for benefits conferred, nor can it give a right of set-off for damages done or property condemned. If it could give such right of set-off, it is not perceived why it should not give a right of action for the excess of benefit over and above the value of the property taken. Nor can I imagine how the company is to compensate the defendant for her $350 worth of land by setting off a claim for benefits conferred, which they never could enforce by suit, and for which they can have no pretense of claim, legal or equitable." James River & Kanawha Co. v. Turner (Va.) 9 Leigh, 313, 340.

COMPENSATORY DAMAGES.

"Compensatory damages" are such damages as will compensate the injured party for the injury sustained, and nothing more. McKnight v. Denny, 47 Atl. 970, 971, 198 Pa. 323; Morgan v. Southern Pac. Co., 30 Pac. 601, 602, 95 Cal. 501; Sachra v. Town of Manilla, 95 N. W. 198, 200, 120 Iowa, 562; Henderson's Adm'r v. Kentucky Cent. R. Co., 9 Ky. Law Rep. 625, 627, 5 S. W. 875, 86 Ky. 389; Armstrong v. Rhoades (Del.) 53 Atl. 435; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Gordan (Ky.) 72 S. W. 311, 312.

"Compensatory damages," as indicated by the word employed to characterize them, simply make good or replace the loss caused by the wrong. They proceed from a sense of natural justice, and are designed to repair that of which one has been deprived by the wrong of another. Reid v. Terwilliger, 22 N. E. 1091, 1092, 116 N. Y. 530.

"Compensatory damages are damages given as an equivalent for the injury done." Monongahela Nav. Co. v. United States, 13 Sup. Ct. 622, 626, 148 U. S. 312, 37 L. Ed. 463.

"Compensatory damages" are such damages as will make the persons whole; pay for the actual loss they have sustained; for the losses that have accrued from the result of the injury. Wade v. Columbia Electric Street Railway, Light & Power Co., 29 S. E. 233, 236, 51 S. C. 296, 64 Am. St. Rep. 676.

"Compensatory damages" are those given for the violation of a legal right which results in a loss or injury, for the purpose of compensating the person so injured for all the loss and injury which flows directly from the illegal act. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Watson, 15 Pac. 877, 880, 37 Kan. 778.

Compensatory damages "are such as arise from actual and indirect pecuniary loss, mental suffering, value of time, actual expenses; and to these may be added bodily pain and suffering." Smith v. Bagwell, 19 Fla. 117, 121, 45 Am. Rep. 12.

As actual damages.

Damages, in a tort action, are not divided into actual, compensatory, and exemplary. The term "compensatory damages" covers all loss recoverable as matter of right. It includes all damages for which the law gives compensation, and that gives rise to the term "compensatory damages." "Compensatory damages" and "actual damages" are synonymous terms. Pecuniary loss is an actual damage; so is bodily pain and suffering. Gatzow v. Buening, 81 N. W. 1003, 1009, 106 Wis. 1, 49 L. R. A. 475, 80 Am. St. Rep. 1.

As affected by intent.

Compensatory damages are not dependent on nor graded by the intent with which the wrongful act is done. Field v. Munster, 32 S. W. 417, 418, 11 Tex. Civ. App. 341.

"Compensatory damages" are such as are awarded to compensate the injured party for injury caused by the wrong, and must be only such as make just and fair compensation, and are due when the wrong is established, whether it was committed maliciously—that is, with evil intention—or not. Wimer v. Allbaugh, 42 N. W. 587, 588, 78 Iowa, 79, 16 Am. St. Rep. 422.

"Compensatory damages are damages given as a compensation to the injured party for the injury he has received." Under the rule limiting them to "compensatory damages," the juries will, with proper instruction, recognize a broad distinction between a tort unaccompanied by malice or circumstances of aggravation or disgrace, and one producing equal, direct, pecuniary damage, where either of these conditions exist. In the former case they consider only the actual injury to the person or property, including expenses, loss of time, bodily pain, etc., occasioned by the wrongful act; in the latter they allow such additional sum as in their judgment is warranted by the circumstances of contumely, anguish, or oppression; but in both instances the damages are awarded as compensation. The additional sum is given to the individual as a recompense for the mental suffering or wounded sensibilities, as the case may be. Murphy v. Hobbs, 5 Pac. 119, 123, 7 Colo. 541, 49 Am. Rep. 366.

Exemplary damages distinguished.

Compensatory damages and exemplary or punitive damages are of entirely different nature, and rest upon different principles. The former is intended to provide a recompense for injuries sustained, while the latter is intended only as a punishment to the wrongdoer, and to furnish an example to him and other wrongdoers of the dangers attending such wrongdoing. Thus where the Legislature, in the title of an act, declared their intention to provide for such damages against railway companies as may be proportionate to the injury resulting from death to the parties for whom and for whose benefit such action is brought, it implies that the damages are to be compensatory damages. Garrick v. Florida Cent. & P. R. Co., 31 S. E. 334, 337, 53 S. C. 448, 69 Am. St. Rep. 874.

As defined in an instruction that, in case the jury found for the plaintiff, they might assess exemplary as well as compensatory damages, the compensatory damages were such as would compensate the plaintiff for injuries actually sustained, including his pain and anguish of mind and body, while exemplary damages were such "as are given as an example by way of punishment to prevent a repetition of the wrongful act complained of," and described as something in the character of the punishment by the people, with the difference that the person injured is the one that recovers the damages instead of the people by fine or imprisonment. Hamilton v. Third Ave. R. Co., 35 N. Y. Super. Ct. (3 Jones & S.) 118, 129.

In particular torts.

If there has been any actual loss by reason of defendant's fault, then the damages must be compensatory, and for false imprisonment, as for trespass in improperly ejecting plaintiff from defendant's cars, such damages include, in addition to actual expenses incurred, compensation for the loss of time, interruption of business, bodily or mental suffering, humiliation, and injury to feelings. Duggan v. Baltimore & O. R. R., 28 Atl. 182, 184, 159 Pa. 248, 39 Am. St. Rep. 672.

In an action for false imprisonment, "compensatory damages" are such damages as will compensate plaintiff for the injury to her feelings and anxiety of mind. Limbeck v. Gerry, 39 N. Y. Supp. 95, 104, 15 Misc. Rep. 663.

In an action for libel "compensatory damages" are those damages which furnish reparation for the actual injury the plaintiff has suffered because of defamation. Miller v. Donovan, 39 N. Y. Supp. 820, 824, 16 Misc. Rep. 453.

Compensatory damages for breach of a covenant of warranty of the quality of goods sold are not limited to the difference between their value, had they been as warranted, and their actual value; but when the seller knew that such goods were to be used by the buyer in the course of trade and commerce, and that their inferior quality would injure his reputation as an honest, careful, and judicious merchant, compensatory damages may be awarded to cover profits lost, patronage destroyed, and expenses incurred. Swain v. Schieffelin, 31 N. E. 1025, 1026, 134 N. Y. 471, 18 L. R. A. 385.

COMPETENCY.

The word "competent" means answering to all requirements; adequate; sufficient; suitable; capable; legally qualified; fit. King's Lake Drainage & Levee Dist. v. Jamison, 75 S. W. 679, 683, 176 Mo. 557 (citing Webster).

"Credibility" and "competency" are sometimes applied to a witness as if they were synonymous in meaning. "Credibility" relates to whether the witness is such as is entitled to credit or belief. It may not attach by reason of extreme youth, idiocy, insanity, or, under our statutes, conviction of perjury. "Competency" relates more to the relation of witnesses to the matter under investigation. The person, though incompetent in a particular matter, may be a credible witness in other relations to such matters. Formerly incompetency arose from being directly interested in the matter under investigation, or because charged with the commission of the crime under investigation, or because of his relation to the party interested, as husband or wife. Smith v. Jones, 34 Atl. 424, 68 Vt. 132.

"The distinction between the 'competency' and the 'credit' of a witness has been long settled. If a question be made respecting his competency, the decision of that question is an exclusive province of the judge; but if the ground of the objection go to the credit only, his testimony must be received and left with the jury, under such directions and observations of the court as the circumstances of the case may require, to say whether they think it sufficiently credible to guide their decision in the case." Commonwealth v. Holmes, 127 Mass. 424, 430, 34 Am. Rep. 391.

By the "competency" of a person to make a will is meant intelligence sufficient to understand the act he is performing, the property he possesses, the disposition he is making of it, and the persons or objects he makes the beneficiaries of his bounty. Imperfect memory, caused by sickness or old age, forgetfulness of the names of the persons he has known, idle questions, or requiring a repetition of information, will not be sufficient to establish incompetency, if he has sufficient intelligence remaining to fulfill the above definition. Sehr v. Lindemann, 54 S. W. 537, 540, 153 Mo. 276; Lorts v. Wash, 75 S. W. 95, 100, 175 Mo. 487; Southworth v. Southworth, 73 S. W. 129, 133, 173 Mo. 59 (citing Farmer v. Farmer, 129 Mo. 530, 31 S. W. 926; Fulbright v. Perry County, 145 Mo. 432, 46 S. W. 955).

COMPETENT.

"Competent," as used in Code Civ. Proc. Kan. § 112b, providing that in all bills of exception it shall be competent for the party preparing the same to set out the pleadings, motions, and decisions of the justice of the peace thereon, etc., means "sufficient." Winter v. Shutter, 22 Pac. 564, 565, 42 Kan. 544.

Comp. Laws, § 562, providing that the township board should be composed of the supervisor and the two justices of the peace whose terms of office soonest expire, and the township clerk, any three of whom should constitute a quorum; and further providing that, when from any cause there should not be three of the officers constituting such board "competent and able to act," one of the remaining justices should meet with any members of the board and have the same authority as such members—cannot be construed as meaning that any necessity whatever would make a regular member "competent and able to act" as a member of the board who would otherwise be incompetent; and hence, where the town moderator had refused to sign an order in favor of the township clerk for money due under a contract for the erection of a building for a town, such township clerk is not made "competent and able to act" in proceedings by the board for the removal of such moderator for refusal to perform his duties because there was no other member of the board or person present capable of acting as such member in his place. Stockwell v. Township Board of White Lake, 22 Mich. 341, 351.

"Competent," as used in Probate Law, § 69, providing that if the right of the applicant for letters of administration be established, and he or she be competent, etc., means "not addicted to drunkenness, not imprudent, or wanting in integrity or understanding." In re Pacheco's Estate, 23 Cal. 476, 480.

Code, c. 77, § 18, provides that if a will be attested by a person to whom any beneficial interest in any estate is thereby devised, if a will may not otherwise be proved, such person shall be deemed a competent person to witness, but such devise shall be void to him. It was contended that the word "competent," so used, related to the matter of attestation, so that, in order to render the will valid, it was necessary that the person beneficially interested should testify as to its execution, and therefore such person would lose his interest under the will; but it was held that the word "competent" related rather to the matter of the proof of the will, and that the word "competent" in such section 3 of said chapter, describing who should be competent to witness a will, had reference to age, sanity, and moral integrity, so that a person beneficially interested might be competent to witness a will under such section, and a will will not be invalidated if other evidence of its execution can be furnished. Davis v. Davis, 27 S. E. 323, 324, 43 W. Va. 300.

The word "credible," as used in the statute of frauds in relation to devises of real property, and the word "competent," as used in Ga. Code, § 2414, relating to the qualification of the witnesses required to attest a will, are synonymous terms, and in this connection mean witnesses who are competent at the time of attestation to testify in a court of justice. Gillis v. Gillis, 23 S. E. 107, 96 Ga. 1, 30 L. R. A. 143, 51 Am. St. Rep. 121.

COMPETENT ARBITRATORS.

"Competent arbitrators," as used in an insurance policy providing for the appointment of competent arbitrators, means persons who are disinterested, and have the requisite ability to act in the matter. It is not fulfilled by one who is proven to be a drinking man of no account, and who has been arrested for vagrancy. Ætna Ins. Co. v. Stevens, 48 Ill. 31, 33.

COMPETENT AUTHORITY.

The meaning of the words "competent authorities," in the ratification by the King of Spain of the treaty of cession of Florida, in referring to lands which had been granted by competent authority, must be taken to be those persons who exercised the granting power by the authority of the crown. Mitchell v. United States, 34 U. S. (9 Pet.) 711, 735, 9 L. Ed. 283.

A "court of competent authority," as used in Gen. St. 1878, c. 62, § 1, providing that all marriages which are prohibited by law on account of consanguinity between the parties, or on account of either of them having a husband or wife then living, shall, if solemnized within this state, be absolutely void, without any decree of divorce or any other legal proceeding; provided that if any person whose husband or wife has been absent for five successive years, without being known to such person to be living within that time, marries during the lifetime of such husband or wife, the marriage shall be void from the time that its nullity is pronounced by a court of competent authority—means a court with the proper parties before it in an action instituted for the purpose of annulling a marriage, and having jurisdiction of such matters. The decree of such a court would determine the matter conclusively so as to be binding as to the status of the parties, whenever and wherever the question might arise. The marriage is valid until such a court has annulled it, and the validity of such a marriage until annulled cannot be questioned collaterally. Charles v. Charles, 42 N. W. 935, 41 Minn. 201.

COMPETENT CLERK.

"Competent clerk," as used in a Wisconsin resolution instructing a standing committee to reduce into two acts the general laws of the state relating to taxes, and empowering them to employ some competent clerk to assist them in other duties, means simply a "clerk" as the term is generally employed with respect to clerks of committees, and does not authorize the employment of legal counsel; and an attorney employed by the committee under such authority was only entitled to the compensation allowed by law to a clerk employed by the Legislature, and not to compensation for skilled labor as a lawyer. Tenney v. State, 27 Wis. 387, 393.

COMPETENT COMMISSIONER.

A person who had an inchoate right to land owned by his wife, which land was subject to overflow, and was excluded from a district laid out by the drainage commissioners, though included in the original petition, was not a "competent commissioner" under the statute providing for the appointment by the county court of three competent commissioners to lay out and construct a proposed drainage system. Kling's Lake Drainage & Levee Dist. v. Jamison, 75 S. W. 679, 684, 178 Mo. 557.

COMPETENT COURT.

A "competent court" for the prosecution of an action or proceeding, either civilly or criminally, is one having lawful jurisdiction. Landers v. Staten Island R. Co. (N. Y.) 14 Abb. Prac. (N. S.) 346, 353.

To constitute a "competent court" for the trial of a person indicted, a panel of jurors constituted according to law is as necessary an ingredient as the president judge. Clark v. Commonwealth, 29 Pa. (5 Casey) 129, 136.

COMPETENT EVIDENCE.

By "competent evidence" is meant that which the very nature of the thing to be proven requires, as "the production of a writing the contents of which are the subject of the inquiry." Chapman v. McAdams, 69 Tenn. (1 Lea) 500, 504; Porter v. Valentine, 41 N. Y. Supp. 507, 508, 18 Misc. Rep. 213.

"Competent evidence" is that which is admissible. Pen. Code Ga. 1895, § 983; Civ. Code Ga. 1895, § 5143.

By "competent evidence" is meant that which the very nature of the thing to be proved requires as the fit and appropriate proof in the particular case. Horbach v. State, 43 Tex. 242, 249.

In an instruction that plaintiffs, in order to show their inheritance of certain property, must prove by competent evidence that certain parties were lawfully married, the word "competent" means sufficient or adequate, and not that the jury were to determine whether the testimony was legally fit or suitable, or otherwise, to prove the necessary fact or facts. Niles v. Sprague, 13 Iowa, 198, 204.

An assignment of error that there was no "competent evidence" before the jury on a certain issue will be construed to mean relevant evidence. Ryan v. Town of Bristol, 27 Atl. 309, 312, 63 Conn. 261.

Gen. St. p. 531, § 89, providing that, when the fact of marriage is required or offered to be proved before any court, evidence of the admission of such fact by the party against whom the proceeding is instituted, or of general repute or of cohabitation as married persons, or any other circumstantial or presumptive evidence from which the fact may be inferred, shall be "competent," means admissible for the purpose of establishing the fact of marriage; in other words, such evidence as, if believed, would authorize a jury to find the fact of marriage. State v. Johnson, 12 Minn. 476 (Gil. 378, 387).

Articles of agreement which constitute a part of the title under which all the parties to the action claim the premises in controversy are competent evidence, whether the executors who signed the agreement were authorized by the will to do so or not. Ripple v. Ripple (Pa.) 1 Rawle, 386, 389.

COMPETENT INSPECTOR.

Act Pa. June 6, 1893 (P. L. 330), providing for the appointment of a "competent inspector" to investigate the neglect of school directors to furnish suitable school buildings, should be construed to authorize the appointment of a lawyer. If he have reasonably good eyesight and acute perception, a knowledge of the law will not disqualify him as a reporter of facts. Appeal of School Directors, 36 Atl. 151, 179 Pa. 60.

COMPETENT JURISDICTION.

"Competent jurisdiction," in its ordinary signification, refers to the person as well as the cause. Babbit v. Brush, 4 Ind. 355, 359.

The words "competent jurisdiction," as used in Comp. St. c. 23, § 64, relating to sales by guardians under a license from the district court of competent jurisdiction, mean the court which has power or authority conferred upon it by the law to hear and determine the particular application, and whose jurisdiction it was proper to invoke in that instance. Hubermann v. Evans, 65 N. W. 1045, 1049, 46 Neb. 784.

A "court of competent jurisdiction," as used in Rev. St. 427, providing that it shall be the duty of the adverse claimant, within 30 days after filing his claim, to commence proceedings in a court of competent jurisdiction to determine the question of the right of possession, means "a court of general jurisdiction, whether federal, state, or territorial." Burke v. McDonald, 13 Pac. 351, 360, 2 Idaho (Hasb.) 339.

The statute provides that a guardian's sale shall not be void on account of any irregularity in the proceedings, providing it shall appear, among other things, that he was licensed to make the sale by a probate court of competent jurisdiction. Where it appears that license was granted by a probate court, the question is, was such license granted by a probate court of competent jurisdiction? This will depend upon the sense in which the phrase "competent jurisdiction" is used in the statute. The term is susceptible of two meanings: It may signify that the court must acquire and exercise jurisdiction competent to grant the license through and by reason of a strict conformity to the requirements of the statute; or it may signify jurisdiction over the subject-matter, a sort of authority in the abstract to hear and determine the case. In other words, by a probate of "competent jurisdiction" may be meant the court whose jurisdiction it is proper to invoke in the given instance. The phrase "competent jurisdiction" is not to be taken in the first sense above spoken of, for the section in which it occurs is professedly a healing statute, plainly designed to cure certain irregularities, and therefore excusing to some extent a noncompliance with the provisions of law. The term as there used means the probate court whose jurisdiction it is proper to invoke in the particular case in hand. Montour v. Purdy, 11 Minn. 384 (Gil. 278, 296), 83 Am. Dec. 88.

A "court of competent jurisdiction" is one provided for in the Constitution or created by the Legislature, and having jurisdiction of the subject-matter and of the person. In re Norton, 68 Pac. 639, 641, 64 Kan. 842, 91 Am. St. Rep. 255.

COMPETENT OFFICER.

Rev. St. § 5292, making it perjury to make a false oath before any competent tribunal, "officer," or person, etc., means an officer competent under the laws of the United States to administer the oath alleged to be false. United States v. Madison (U. S.) 21 Fed. 628, 629; United States v. Curtis, 2 Sup. Ct. 507, 509, 107 U. S. 671, 27 L. Ed. 534. The terms may include a state officer authorized by act of Congress to administer oaths in proceedings relative to timber claims. United States v. Madison (U. S.) 21 Fed. 628, 629.

COMPETENT PARTY.

In Laws 1857, p. 346, § 11, providing that, if either of the railroad companies to which lands were granted by such act fail to perform the conditions therein specified, the board of control should have power to declare the lands forfeited to the state, and requiring said board to confer the lands upon some other competent party, the term "competent party" means a railroad company proposing to construct the very line of railroad for which the lands were originally granted. Bowes v. Haywood, 35 Mich. 241, 246.

COMPETENT PERSON.

A "competent person, officer, or tribunal," within the meaning of Rev. St. § 5292, making it perjury to take a false oath before any competent tribunal, officer, or person, means a person, officer, or tribunal competent under the laws of the United States to administer the oath alleged to be false. United States v. Madison (U. S.) 21 Fed. 628, 629; United States v. Curtis, 2 Sup. Ct. 507, 509, 107 U. S. 671, 27 L. Ed. 534. The term may include a state officer authorized by act of Congress to administer oaths in proceedings relative to timber claims. United States v. Madison (U. S.) 21 Fed. 628, 629.

Within Code 1892, c. 123, providing for the employment of a competent person by the board of supervisors to investigate the title to school lands and to conduct suits leading thereto, the term "competent person" will not necessarily exclude a lawyer who was otherwise competent, for, if he were competent in other respects, his eminence as a lawyer would not render him less competent to institute and prosecute the suits to effect. Warren County v. Dabney (Miss.) 32 South. 908, 909.

One person named by mutual consent of the parties to determine the value of property and certain premises could not be considered "competent persons," within the meaning of an agreement for submission. Harvey v. Grabham, 5 Adol. & E. 61, 67.

COMPETENT PROOF.

Rev. St. 464, § 4142, providing that whenever a receiver of an insolvent corporation shall show by his oath or "other competent proof" that a person is indebted to the corporation, etc., "does not mean proof competent to establish the fact in a legal sense before a jury, but merely proof sufficient to create a rational belief which may fall far short of that necessary to authorize a verdict." It is sufficient if a receiver who applies for a warrant swore to the facts on information and belief. Noble v. Halliday, 1 N. Y. (1 Comst.) 330, 335.

COMPETENT SUPPORT.

A will providing that testator's daughter and grandson should have a "reasonable and competent support" out of the proceeds of his estate did not mean merely "food and clothing necessary to sustain life, nor any other fixed quantity or allowance, but depends on circumstances and exigencies." Ellerbe v. Ellerbe's Heirs (S. C.) Speers, Eq. 328, 340.

COMPETENT TRIBUNAL.

It is usual to say, even of foreign judgments, that if pronounced by a competent tribunal, and carried into effect without our assistance, they are conclusive of the question decided. And here "competent tribunal" means one of the regularly established courts of the country, and in it. In re Williamson, 26 Pa. 9, 30, 67 Am. Dec. 374.

Rev. St. § 5392, providing that every person who, having taken an oath before a "competent tribunal, officer or person" in any case in which a law of the United States authorizes an oath to be administered, that he will testify truly, etc., and, contrary to such oath, testifies falsely to that which he does not believe to be true, shall be guilty of perjury, etc., means that the oath must be permitted or required by some law of the United States, and be administered by some tribunal, officer, or person authorized by such laws to administer oaths in respect to the particular matters to which it relates. It does not necessarily mean that the tribunal by which the oath is administered shall have been created by the government, which requires it to be taken, in order that the officer who administers it shall be an officer of that government. United States v. Curtis, 2 Sup. Ct. 507, 509, 107 U. S. 671, 27 L. Ed. 534.

A "competent person, officer, or tribunal," within the meaning of Rev. St. U. S. § 5292, making it perjury to take a false oath before any competent tribunal, officer, or person, means a person, officer, or tribunal competent under the laws of the United States to administer the oath alleged to be false. The terms may include a state officer authorized by act of Congress to administer oaths in proceedings relative to timber claims. United States v. Madison (U. S.) 21 Fed. 628, 629.

"Competent tribunal," as used in 2 Rev. St. 563, § 22, providing that persons who are committed or detained by virtue of the final judgment or decree of any competent tribunal, of civil or criminal jurisdiction, shall not be entitled to prosecute the writ of habeas corpus, means a tribunal having jurisdiction of the matter and of the person. People v. Liscomb (N. Y.) 3 Hun. 760, 775; People v. Liscomb, 60 N. Y. 559, 568, 569, 19 Am. Rep. 211.

COMPETENT WITNESS.

A "competent" witness is one competent to testify generally, and laboring under no legal disqualifications. The office of an affidavit made by one party to a suit, for the purpose of taking the testimony of the other, is to point out the fact to be proved, and not the evidence of that fact. Within the range of the affidavit, the party is to be examined like any other witness, and it is as competent for him to prove a fact by admissible declarations of others as it is for any other witness. Hogan v. Sherman, 5 Mich. 60, 65.

The word "competent," when relating to a witness, implies a legal capacity to testify, and, when applied to evidence in law, means having the legal capacity or fitness to be heard in court, as distinguished from credibility or sufficiency. Thus a witness may be competent, although unworthy of belief. Evidence may be competent, although not alone sufficient, even if believed. People v. Comp-ton, 56 Pac. 44, 46, 123 Cal. 403.

"Competent witness," as used in St. 1866, c. 260, providing that a defendant in a criminal case, at his own request and not otherwise, may testify in his own behalf, and he shall be deemed a competent witness, means "competent not for a special purpose, or to give evidence only which shall operate in his favor, but competent to testify to any facts relevant and material to the issue. Like all other witnesses, he is to tell the truth, and the whole truth, concerning any matter proper to be inquired about. If he offers himself as a witness, he waives his constitutional privilege of refusing to furnish evidence against himself, and may be interrogated as a general witness in the case." Commonwealth v. Mullen, 97 Mass. 545, 546.

COMPETING.

The word "competing," in Const. art. 17, § 4, prohibiting the consolidation of any railroad, canal, or other transportation companies owning or having under their control parallel or competing lines, does not apply to street railways, even though their lines are parallel. "The travel over parallel streets is not necessarily a competing travel. Every street has a travel of its own, which is conducted upon its own railway. That travel may be almost entirely conducted without competition with the travel upon another, though parallel, street. Nor do railways upon parallel streets have the same termini. Many of them, though running upon parallel streets for a considerable distance, diverge altogether from such a course at their extremities. Two roads would be 'competing' if laid upon the same street and running in the same direction." Appeal of Montgomery, 20 Atl. 399, 400, 136 Pa. 96, 9 L. R. A. 369.

"Competing railroads," within the meaning of Rev. St. Mo. § 2569, which prohibits any railroad within the state from owning, operating, or managing any parallel or competing railroad within the state, applies only where both the railroads are situated within the state, and the competition between the two must be of some practical importance, such as is liable to have an appreciable effect on the rates. Two railroads which do not touch at any two common points, and between which for a distance of 40 miles another railroad is interposed, and whose traffic, except an unimportant amount, will in no event pass over the other, are not "competing" lines within the meaning of the statute. Kimball v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. (U. S.) 46 Fed. 888, 890.

Whether a railroad is a "competing railroad" in its relation to another road, within the meaning of a statute prohibiting competing railroads from consolidating, cannot be determined by the application of the doctrine of judicial notice, but it is a question of fact only, to be established by evidence. East Line & R. R. Ry. Co. v. Rushing, 6 S. W. 834, 837, 69 Tex. 306.

"Competing line," within the meaning of a clause of the Pennsylvania Constitution, forbidding a railroad corporation from controlling any other railroad corporation having under its control a parallel or competing line, only applies to a line already constructed; but the word "parallel" is not so limited, but may include a projected road surveyed, laid out, and in the process of construction. Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Commonwealth (Pa.) 7 Atl. 368, 373.

The term "competing road," within the meaning of Const. Ky. 1891, § 201, prohibiting consolidation of a railroad with a parallel or competing road, characterizes two railroads which connect two important cities, and are natural competitors for the traffic between such cities. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Commonwealth of Kentucky, 16 Sup. Ct. 714, 719, 161 U. S. 677, 40 L. Ed. 849.

COMPETITION.

See "Unfair Competition."

"Competition" is the struggle between rivals for the same trade at the same time. It is self-evident that there cannot be competition unless there is trade, and so, though the popular saying is that competition is the life of trade, yet it is quite certain that trade is the mother of competition, for the latter springs from the former, so that whatever restrains trade restrains competition in exact degree. Ferd Helm Brewing Co. v. Belinder, 71 S. W. 691, 695, 97 Mo. App. 64.

The essential quality of that series of acts or course of conduct which we call "competition" is that which shall be the result of the free choice of the individual, and not of any legal or moral obligation or duty. Meredith v. New Jersey Zinc & Iron Co., 37 Atl. 539, 543, 55 N. J. Eq. 211.

COMPILE—COMPILATION.

Abridgment distinguished, see "Abridgment."

Code distinguished, see "Code."

To "compile" is to copy from various authorities into one work. Story v. Holcombe (U. S.) 23 Fed. Cas. 171, 174.

COMPLAIN.

The generally understood meaning of the verb "complain" is to express regret or pain. Southern Indiana Ry. Co. v. Davis (Ind.) 68 N. E. 191, 194.

COMPLAINT.

See "Cross-Complaint"; "Supplemental Complaint"; "Supplementary Complaint"; "Sworn Complaint."

Within the meaning of Sess. Laws 1890, p. 52, providing that the county court shall have power to determine all complaints made in regard to the assessed value of any property, and that upon hearing of complaints the board may subpoena and administer orders to witnesses, etc., the word "complaints" is not used in the technical sense in which the word "complaint" is used in the Civil Code. And it is not necessary that a formal allegation or charge in writing should be filed in order to confer jurisdiction upon the board. Central Pac. R. Co. v. Standing, 45 Pac. 344, 345, 13 Utah, 488.

The term "complaint" is not always limited to charges of crime or wrong, and it may be that as used in some statute it comprehends oral as well as written allegations; but whenever used it means the making of a statement of fact as a basis for the taking of legal action. Hence a notice to a sheriff directing him to place in temporary quarantine certain cattle is not a "complaint" within the statute authorizing the sheriff to seize and quarantine cattle on a complaint made to him that such cattle were capable of communicating or liable to impart fever. Asbell v. Edwards, 66 Pac. 641, 642, 63 Kan. 610.

In civil proceedings.

The term "complaint" is that given to designate the first pleading on the part of the plaintiff in a civil action. Sharon v. Sharon, 7 Pac. 456, 457, 67 Cal. 185.

The "complaint" is a statement of the plaintiff's cause or causes of action. Talbot v. Garretson, 49 Pac. 978, 979, 31 Or. 256.

A "complaint" is the exhibiting any action, real or personal, in writing, and the party making it is called the "plaintiff." State v. McCann, 67 Me. 372, 374.

Code Civ. Proc. § 481, describes the following rule for a complaint: "A plain and concise statement of the facts, constituting each cause of action, without unnecessary repetition." Becker v. Fischer, 43 N. Y. Supp. 685, 13 App. Div. 555.

The office of the "complaint" is to state in a plain and concise manner the cause of action upon which the plaintiff relies. Code Civ. Proc. § 481, subd. 2; Hughes v. Wilcox, 39 N. Y. Supp. 210, 211, 17 Misc. Rep. 32.

A "complaint" is defined by the Code to be a statement of the facts constituting a cause of action, in plain and concise language, without repetition, and in such a manner as to enable a person of common understanding to know what is intended. Travelers' Ins. Co. v. Prairie School Tp., 51 N. E. 100, 101, 151 Ind. 36; Wabash R. Co. v. Young, 55 N. E. 853, 854, 154 Ind. 24.

The complaint in an action "is the pleading in an action, containing a statement of a cause of action, with a demand for the proper relief to which the party may be entitled. A verification forms no part of a complaint." McMath v. Parsons, 2 N. W. 703, 704, 26 Minn. 246.

The word "bill" or "complaint," when found in the Code of Civil Procedure, shall mean "petition." Cobbey's Ann. St. Neb. 1903, § 1851.

Same—As affidavit.

See "Affidavit."

Same—As cause of action.

"Complaint," as used in a demurrer which recited that defendant demurred because the complainant did not state facts sufficient to constitute a complaint, was not equivalent to the words "cause of action." Pine Civil Tp. v. Huber Mfg. Co., 83 Ind. 121, 124.

"Complaint," as used in a demurrer to defendant's answer on the ground that it does not state facts to constitute a good defense of plaintiff's complaint, is equivalent to the words "cause of action." Foster v. Dailey, 30 N. E. 4, 3 Ind. App. 530.

Same—Counterclaim.

Gen. St. 1878, c. 65, § 113, allowing an appeal from justice court if "the amount claimed in the complaint" exceeds $30, will not be construed to include amount claimed in pleadings other than the complaint, and hence does not authorize an appeal because more than $30 is demanded in a counterclaim, but will be limited to the amount claimed in the complaint. The term "complaint" has a fixed and well-known meaning, and the language "amount claimed in the complaint" can hardly be construed to be equivalent to the words "amount for which judgment is demanded by either party in his pleadings." Ross v. Evans, 14 N. W. 897, 898, 30 Minn. 206.

Same—Cross-complaint distinguished.

The only real difference between a "complaint" and a "cross-complaint" is that the first is filed by the plaintiff and the second by the defendant. Both contain a statement of the facts, and each demands affirmative relief on the facts stated. White v. Reagan, 32 Ark. 281, 290.

Same—Election contest.

There is a broad distinction between a suit for an office and a mere contest of the result of the election as declared by the officer to whom the duty of certifying the fact is intrusted. The power of the officer or tribunal before whom an election contest is conducted is limited to the mere award of the election, or of ordering another election. Neither the officer nor the tribunal before whom the contest is had gives the contestant a judgment for his right to the office, or for the fees and emoluments of it, but merely gives him a certificate, and leaves him, if the office is not voluntarily surrendered by the contestee, to assert his title thereon. Furthermore, the character of the proceedings is the same, whether the contest is prosecuted before the judge in chambers or before the court. Though heard before the court, it is to be determined without a jury. On the other hand, if it was a suit, a trial by jury should not be denied if demanded. Const. art. 5, § 10. It therefore follows that an election contest is not a "suit, complaint or plea," within the meaning of the phrase as used in defining a constitutional jurisdiction of the district court. Williamson v. Lane, 52 Tex. 335, 345.

"Complaint or plea," as used in a constitution confining the jurisdiction of the district court to a suit, complaint or plea wherein the matter in controversy is valued at or amounts to $500, exclusive of interest, does not include a proceeding to contest an election, there being a difference between the contest of an election and a suit for an office, the latter being a suit within the latter meaning of the Constitution, the former involving a political or rather extrajudicial question, to be regulated under the Constitution by the political authority of the state. Gibson v. Templeton, 62 Tex. 555, 556.

Same—Summons or writ distinguished.

The term "complaint," as used in the removal statute, providing that any party who desires to remove a cause may file his petition at any time before the defendant is required by the law of the state in which the suit is brought to answer or plead to the declaration or complaint of the plaintiff, is not used as synonymous with the words "writ" or "summons," which is at common law the process of commencing the suit, and is the first step taken to bring the parties into court, while the declaration or complaint is necessarily the second step which manifests the case; so that such petition need not be filed within the time when pleas for abatement must be filed under the state practice. Wilson v. Winchester & P. R. Co. (U. S.) 82 Fed. 15, 17.

In criminal proceedings.

A "complaint" is a form of legal process, which consists of a formal allegation or charge against a party, made or presented to the proper court or officer, as for a wrong done or a crime committed. State v. Dodge County, 31 N. W. 117, 120, 20 Neb. 595; Asbell v. Edwards, 66 Pac. 641, 63 Kan. 610; State v. Goetz, 69 Pac. 187, 188, 65 Kan. 125. It imports a charge in clear and distinct form of a writing. State v. Goetz, 69 Pac. 187, 188, 65 Kan. 125.

The complaint is the allegation in writing, made to a court or magistrate, that a person has been guilty of some designated offense. Pen. Code Cal. 1903, § 806; Pen. Code Idaho 1901, § 5219; Rev. St. Utah 1898, § 4604. Under such section the word "complaint" includes the accusation made before the committing magistrate, and also the information filed by the district attorney in the trial court. United States v. Collins (U. S.) 79 Fed. 65, 66.

A complaint is an allegation made to a magistrate that a person has been guilty of some public offense. Comp. Laws Nev. 1900, § 4070.

A "complaint," within the meaning of an article in the Code of Criminal Procedure entitled "Security to Keep the Peace," is a statement in writing, made to a magistrate, that a person has threatened to commit an offense against the person or property of another, and subscribed and sworn to by the complainant. Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 7765.

A "complaint," within the meaning of the chapter relating to security to keep the peace, is a statement in writing of the jurisdictional facts, clearly specifying the threatened offense, and subscribed and sworn to by the complainant. Rev. St. Utah 1898, § 4524.

Complaints are preliminary charges before committing magistrates. Gardner v. People, 62 N. Y. 299, 306.

"The word 'complaint,' as used in the statutes of this commonwealth in reference to criminal offenses, sometimes means the formal written charge of crime to which the accused person is to answer, and sometimes it means the oral charge which may be made to a proper magistrate or court, and which is to be reduced to writing by the magistrate or court. It is used in the latter sense in Pub. St. c. 207, § 25' providing that an officer may arrest a person for drunkenness without a warrant, and when the person is sufficiently recovered from his intoxication, the officer shall make a "complaint" against him for the crime. Hobbs v. Hill, 32 N. E. 862, 157 Mass. 556.

The term "complaint" is a technical one, descriptive of proceedings before magistrates, and a complaint may be made before one magistrate and the warrant thereon returned to another for a hearing. Commonwealth v. Davis, 28 Mass. (11 Pick.) 432, 436.

Where criminal prosecutions originate upon complaint, one made under oath or affirmation is implied. Campbell v. Thompson, 16 Me. (4 Shep.) 117, 120.

A warrant on which a person was arrested, in setting forth that he was to be held to answer to a "complaint" charging him with the crime of perjury, did not import that the instrument charging the perjury was a "technical complaint," as the term is used in the statutes, and the warrant, therefore, was not defective in not using "indictment" instead of "complaint." In re Durant, 12 Atl. 650, 654, 60 Vt. 176.

St. 1808, c. 263, § 2, providing that the penalty for selling adulterated milk "may be recovered on complaint" before any court of jurisdictions, is permissive and not mandatory, and does not exclude an indictment. Commonwealth v. Haynes, 107 Mass. 194, 197.

The term "complaint," when it is a charge for a crime committed, is generally under oath. State v. Dodge County, 31 N. W. 117, 120, 20 Neb. 595.

Same—As affidavit or indictment.

See "Affidavit"; "Indictment."

The affidavit before the magistrate which charges the commission of an offense is called a "complaint." Code Cr. Proc. Tex. 1895, art. 256.

Same—Information distinguished.

Webster defines "complaint" as an accusation or charge against an offender, made by a private person or an informer to the justice of the peace or other proper officer, alleging that the offender has violated the law, and claiming the penalty due to the prosecutor. It differs from "information," which is a prosecution of the offender by an attorney or solicitor; from a "presentment" or "indictment," which are the accusations of the grand jury. Consequently, on a complaint exhibited by a tithing man to a justice of the peace, the accused is not entitled to a jury trial, under the constitutional provision giving one accused by an indictment or information right to a trial by jury. Godard v. State, 12 Conn. 448, 453.

In equity.

The word "complaint" is the technical name of a bill in chancery. United States v. Ambrose, 2 Sup. Ct. 682, 684, 108 U. S. 336, 27 L. Ed. 746.

In justice court.

The "complaint" in justices' courts is a concise statement, in writing, of the facts constituting the plaintiff's cause of action; or a copy of the account, note, bill, bond, or instrument upon which the action is based. Code Civ. Proc. Cal. 1903, § 853.

As used in the Justices' Code, the "complaint" is a concise statement of the facts constituting the plaintiff's cause of action, with a demand for judgment, specifying the sum of money or the relief claimed. Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 6660.

The "complaint" in justices' courts is a concise statement in writing of the facts constituting the plaintiff's cause of action, or the original account, note, bill, bond, or instrument, or a copy thereof, upon which the action is based, which shall be deemed a complaint. Rev. St. Utah 1898, § 3687.

COMPLAINANT.

The term "complainant" is applicable to the actor in suits in chancery. Railway Passenger & Freight Conductors' Mut. Aid & Benefit Ass'n v. Robinson, 35 N. E. 168, 173, 147 Ill. 138.

The word "complainant," when found in the Code of Civil Procedure, shall be construed and held to mean "plaintiff." Cobey's Ann. St. Neb. 1903, § 1851.

The party prosecuting a special proceeding of a criminal nature is designated in this Code as the "complainant," and the adverse party as the "defendant." Cr. Code N. Y. 1903, § 950.

COMPLAINANT'S COSTS.

Where an action is dismissed "at complainant's costs," it means costs to the defendant, to be recovered of the complainant in the usual course. Kellogg Switchboard & Supply Co. v. Glen Telephone Co. (U. S.) 121 Fed. 174, 177.

COMPLETE—COMPLETION.

See "Furnished Complete."

The verb "to complete," like many others, is used with some indefiniteness or indistinctness, and the idea conveyed by it frequently depends upon the connection in which it is found, or the object to which it is referred, and, when used in the statute relating to the application of revenue to the time when certain canals shall be completed, means that the revenue shall be applied so long as the application shall be necessary to such completion, or until the application is complete. Newell v. People, 7 N. Y. (3 Seld.) 9, 131.

"Completion," as used in a contract for the sale of a steam engine, providing that the last installment was to be paid "two months after its completion," did not apply to improvements and alterations made in the engine after it was originally set up and deemed completed. Parsons v. Saxter, 2 Car. & K. 265.

"Completion" ordinarily means the finishing or accomplishing in full of something which has already been commenced; as, for instance, it is most frequent to hear the word "completion" used in connection with the finishing years and months of the education of the young. It is said of the young man or the young woman that he or she has gone for this year or this session to a certain university for the "completion" of his or her education, the training or educational process having been going on for years; the words "to complete" being understood to mean "to finish," "to fulfill"; and, as used in Code, § 1996, authorizing county commissioners to subscribe stock to a railroad company when necessary to aid in the "completion" of a railroad, it does not include a railroad not begun to be built before the Constitution was adopted. Stanley County Com'rs v. Snuggs, 28 S. E. 539, 542, 121 N. C. 394; Same v. Coler (U. S.) 96 Fed. 284, 287, 37 C. C. A. 484; Wilkes County Com'rs v. Call, 123 N. C. 308, 31 S. E. 481, 486.

"Complete," as used in a contract providing that the expenses of completing a certain work, and the labor account incurred in so completing it, should be paid out of a certain sum, signifies the finishing of unfinished work, bringing it from the condition in which it then was to a state in which there was no deficiency. The instruction is not broad enough to include laborers' claims preceding its date. McElwaine v. Hosey, 35 N. E. 272, 276, 135 Ind. 481.

A contract providing that defendant should cause certain houses which had been erected, but were not papered and painted, to be fully "completed," did not constitute a guaranty of the work which had been done on the houses before defendant contracted to finish them, and did not render defendant liable for a loss occasioned by a defective foundation. Hyannis Sav. Bank v. Moors, 120 Mass. 459, 463.

"Completion," as used in the chapter relating to the appropriation and use of waters, means conducting the waters to the place of intended use. Civ. Code Idaho 1901, § 2585.

As commencement.

In the case of Cushwa v. Improvement Loan & Building Ass'n, 32 S. E. 259, 45 W.

Va. 490, it was held that a statute giving a mechanic's lien for work performed, which should be prior to liens of other kinds, gave the mechanic a prior lien dating from the commencement of the work. This case is referred to as being a holding that "completion" means "commencement," and such construction is disapproved in a holding as to a provision in an oil lease in reference to the completion of the well. Yoke v. Shay, 34 S. E. 748, 750, 47 W. Va. 40.

As completion of substantial part.

In the absence of any statutory qualification or definition of the term "completion," there would be no room for its construction by the court, but it would be considered to mean actual completion, and would be a question of fact to be determined in each case. The mechanic's lien statute has, however, provided that a substantial completion is all that is required in any case, whether the work be done at the direct instance of the owner or under the provisions of a contract between him and an original contractor, by declaring that a trivial imperfection shall not be deemed such a lack of completion as to prevent the filing of the lien. What constitutes a "trivial imperfection" is still a question of fact in each instance. Willamette Steam Mills Lumbering & Mfg. Co. v. Los Angeles College Co., 94 Cal. 229, 238, 29 Pac. 629, 632.

In an action to establish and enforce a mechanic's lien, a finding that the plaintiffs substantially complied with all the terms of their contract and "completed" the work is entirely consistent with a finding that some places in the houses were not properly grained and finished. The performance of a contract need not in all cases be literal and exact, in order to entitle the party to compensation therefor. Especially is this the rule in contracts for labor by mechanics or artisans, where the quality of the work done or the manner of its performance is the sole matter in dispute, and is to be decided upon conflicting testimony. Harlan v. Stufflebeem, 25 Pac. 686, 687, 87 Cal. 508.

A contract providing for the construction of waterworks for a village, providing that an estimate shall be made for the value of labor, materials, and all work "completed" up to the first day of the month, did not mean entirely completed, but the contractor was entitled to an estimate of and payment for any work of which a material and substantial part had been performed. Delafield v. Village of Westfield, 28 N. Y. Supp. 440, 445, 77 Hun, 124.

A contract for lumber to be paid "when the house is completed" is to be construed as meaning when the house is substantially finished by any one. Russell v. Barry, 115 Mass. 300.

Of building.

"Completion," as used in Kan. Code, § 632, regulating the time within which a contractor may file a statement for a lien on a building, and declaring that it shall not be filed until after completion, means a final cessation by the contractor of work on the building; and hence the abandonment of work by such contractor is to be deemed a "completion" of the building for the purpose of filing his liens. Catlin v. Douglas (U. S.) 33 Fed. 569, 570.

Code, § 1187, declares that material men shall file their notice of lien within a certain time after the completion of the building. Held, that while in general the word "completed" or "completion" means the finishing of the building, if a dwelling house, according to the plans and specifications, yet when it was made to appear that it was the original purpose of the owner to erect and build it in part only, or that, having proceeded to erect the house in part, he abandoned his design of finishing it, the building should be held to be "completed" within the terms of the statute on such abandonment. Schwartz v. Knight, 16 Pac. 235, 74 Cal. 432.

"Completed," as used in Act March 24, 1876, § 17, establishing a new city hall commission to act until the hall should be erected or "completed as in this act provided," means when the moneys raised under the provisions of the act are employed in the manner directed by the statute. People v. Bartlett, 7 Pac. 417, 67 Cal. 156.

Of irrigation works.

"Completion," within Civ. Code, tit. 8, pt. 4, div. 2, § 1416, regulating irrigation and water rights, and declaring that within 60 days after the posting of notice the claimant must commence the excavation or construction of works by which he intends to divert the water, and must prosecute the work diligently and uninterruptedly to completion unless temporarily interrupted by snow or rain, means a conducting of the waters to the place of their intended use. Lux v. Hagglin, 10 Pac. 674, 740, 69 Cal. 255.

Of purchase.

In a contract for the sale of land, wherein the purchaser covenanted to pay a certain sum on or before a certain time as the consideration for such sale, with interest to the time of the completion of the purchase, the words "completion of the purchase" only meant payment of the rest of the purchase money, and did not necessarily mean completion of the purchase by acquisition of the land. Mattock v. Kinglake, 10 Adol. & E. 50.

Of railroad.

"Completed for use," as used in a vote of a municipal corporation granting aid in the construction of a railroad, which provides that it shall be payable when the road is completed for use, means "such a degree of completion as would make a railroad reasonably safe, fit, and convenient for the public use and accommodation, as new roads are ordinarily used in similar localities." Manchester & K. R. R. v. City of Keene, 62 N. H. 81, 120.

Bonds were voted by a county in aid of a railroad in payment of its subscription to the stock, on condition that the railroad be built and be completed and in operation by a certain date. Held, that the term "completed" would not be construed to require the road to be perfect in every respect at the prescribed date for completion, but the road would be held to be "completed" if it was in operation on that day in such a manner that it might be properly and regularly used for the purpose of transporting freight and passengers. Southern Kansas & P. R. Co. v. Towner, 21 Pac. 221, 224, 41 Kan. 72.

"Completed," as used in a contract in which subscribers to a fund for the building of a railroad promised to pay a specified amount when the road was completed, has a different meaning from that which it has in a contract for the construction of a road, since in a contract for the construction it would mean a completion in accordance with the specifications, while in a subscriber's contract a less perfect construction would satisfy the term; and if the road was in a condition to be open for regular passenger and freight traffic, and was actually in use, it was "completed" within the meaning of the subscriber's contract. Tower v. Detroit, L. & L. M. R. Co., 34 Mich. 328, 338.

In its narrowest signification, "completion" means to carry out something already begun; to fill out something already outlined. The term "completion of a railroad," as used in Code N. C. § 1906, providing that the boards and commissions of the several counties shall have power to subscribe the stock to any railroad company when necessary to aid in the completion of any railroad, etc., involves the selection of the termini, the survey and location of the route, the securing of the right of way, the construction of the roadbed, and the laying and ironing the track. Any aid given in any of these stages is aid in the "completion of a railroad." Coler v. Stanly County Com'rs (U. S.) 89 Fed. 257, 266.

"Completed," within the conditions on which railroad aid bonds were to be issued, means when the road is made, to the suburb of the village to which it is to run, in such a manner as to bear daily trains on it, carrying all freight and travelers that offer, though some portion of the work is intended to be replaced with other and better material. O'Neal v. King, 48 N. C. 517, 519.

The word "completing" has substantially the same signification as "constructing."

A railroad is "completed" or "constructed" when that is done which is necessary to make it a railroad; when it is fitted for use as a railroad; that is to say, when it is made ready and put in a proper condition for the placing and running of regular trains upon it for its "operation," as it is usually termed. In its natural and ordinary sense, the word "completing" does not include the equipment of the road with rolling stock or putting it into operation. De Graff v. St. Paul & P. R. Co., 23 Minn. 144, 146.

Of street.

"Complete," as used in the special statute authorizing the municipality of Boston to complete certain streets, means determine the time at which they should be graded, finished, fitted for travel, and opened for use. Bowman v. City of Boston, 59 Mass. (5 Cush.) 1, 8.

"Completed," as used in a city ordinance with reference to the completion of a street, does not mean "that condition in which they are made smooth and finished, but some work by which they are made streets de facto." Fernald v. City of Boston, 66 Mass. (12 Cush.) 574, 579.

Of sale.

A "completed agreement" for the sale of a piece of property is something more than an unaccepted offer to sell. Milwaukee Mechanics' Ins. Co. v. B. S. Shea & Son (U. S.) 123 Fed. 9, 12, 60 C. C. A. 103.

When a real estate broker is required to "complete a sale" before he is entitled to his commission, it requires the broker to find a purchaser in a situation, and ready and willing, to complete the purchase on the terms agreed on. McGavock v. Woodlief, 61 U. S. (20 How.) 221, 227, 15 L. Ed. 884 (cited and approved in Carstens v. McReavy, 25 Pac. 471, 472, 1 Wash. St. 359).

COMPLETE ANSWER.

In the statute providing that no decree pro confesso shall be set aside but on filing a full and complete answer to the plea, it is evident that the word "complete" gives no strength to the sentence, nor does it enlarge the meaning. A "full" answer is as extensive a term in describing one which is ample and sufficient as if the term had been "complete"; the latter is mere tautology. Bently v. Cleaveland, 22 Ala. 814, 817.

COMPLETE CARGO.

See "Full and Complete Cargo."

COMPLETE COPY OR STATEMENT.

The statement that a transcript contains a "correct" statement of certain proceedings is the practical equivalent of a certificate.

that the transcript is "a true and complete copy of such proceedings" required by statute. Yeager v. Wright, 13 N. E. 707, 709, 112 Ind. 230.

In an agreement submitting mutual accounts between the parties to arbitration, with a stipulation that the party shall accept the annexed statement of disbursements and collections as correct to date, the word "correct" could not have meant "complete," so as to exclude all omitted items of disbursements or collections, but the meaning and intent of the phrase was that the schedule should be taken to be "correct" as far as they went, and as to the items therein specified. Adams v. MacFarlane, 65 Me. 143, 151.

Civ. Code Ind. 1852, § 283 (Rev. St. 1881, § 462), provides that copies of records shall be proved and admitted as legal evidence by the attestation of the keeper of such records that the same are true and complete copies thereof. Held, that the words "true and complete" as used in such statute were not technical words, and that a certificate using words of substantially the same import or words of equivalent meaning was a sufficient attestation to authorize the admission of a copy of a record in evidence. Thus the words "full, true, and complete" were held to be certainly equivalent in meaning to the words used in the statute, and a certificate containing them was a substantial compliance with the statute. Anderson v. Ackerman, 88 Ind. 481, 490.

The clerk in his certificate stated that the transcript of the judgment is a true and "correct" copy. A point was made that the certificate was insufficient, for the reason that the word "correct" is used instead of the word "complete"; that the certificate should have stated that the transcript of the judgment is a true and "complete" copy. There is nothing in this objection. Bailey v. Martin, 119 Ind. 103, 108, 21 N. E. 346.

COMPLETE PURCHASER.

A "complete purchaser" is a purchaser who has paid the purchase price on real estate, and who is entitled in a court of equity to demand a conveyance of the legal title. Preston's Adm'rs v. Nash, 76 Va. 1, 9.

COMPLETE SCHEDULE.

Code, § 2733, requiring a full and complete schedule to be filed with every assignment by a debtor, does not require a minute and detailed inventory of every article, and where a stock of goods, wares, and merchandise conveyed are scheduled as consisting of "dry goods, boots, shoes, hats, caps, gentlemen's furnishing goods, clothing, notions, trunks, and valises," it is a sufficient schedule within the meaning of the statute. Rosenbaum v. Moller, 4 S. W. 10, 12, 85 Tenn. (1 Pickle) 653.

COMPLETE SEARCH OF TITLE.

The expression "complete search of title," as used in an authority to an agent to negotiate a mortgage loaned upon his principal's property, and bind them to pay for making complete searches of title to the premises proposed to be mortgaged, is not an equivalent term to "title insurance," so as to authorize the agent to arrange for giving clear title insurance. "Title insurance" has a much broader scope than "complete search of title." Giltinan v. Lehman, 48 Atl. 540, 65 N. J. Law, 608.

See "Complete Copy or Statement."

COMPLETE TITLE.

Undoubtedly possession is necessary to a complete title to land, for such title has several stages or degrees, namely, first, mere possession or actual occupation, without pretense of right; second, the right of possession, which one man may have while another has the possession in fact; and, third, the mere right of property, which may exist without possession or the right of possession. These being united constitute what Blackstone calls a "completely legal title," but it is held that the question of actual possession of lands is not one of title within the meaning of the statute providing that a justice of the peace shall have no jurisdiction of cases involving the title of land. Ehle v. Quackenboss (N. Y.) 6 Hill, 537.

A "complete title to land," according to Blackstone, consists of juris et seisinæ conjunctio; possession; the right of possession, and the right of property. Dingey v. Paxton, 60 Miss. 1038, 1054.

A complete title, in the sense that complete Spanish or French titles required no confirmation by the government of the United States, was one where the terms of the granting act or concession not only sufficed to convey the land, but which so described it as to identify and locate it, or following the inchoate grant or concession, and before the cession from France, that was done in the way of a survey or act of location which identified and segregated it from the mass of other lands, and thus perfected the title. Teddle v. McNeely, 29 South. 247, 249, 104 La. 603.

Where the Governor of a province, on approving a cession of land by Indian tribes, granted the lands to the purchasers, directing them to apply to him for "a complete title," such words should be construed to refer only to the instruments which constitute the title, and not to the estate or interest conveyed. Slidell v. Grandjean Jean, 4 Sup. Ct. 475, 476, 111 U. S. 412, 28 L. Ed. 321.

COMPLETE TRANSCRIPT.

A transcript of a justice of the peace exhibiting a complete proceeding and judgment against the defendant therein named, and certified as a true and correct copy, is admissible as evidence in support of a deed on a sale of real estate in execution thereunder, under Rev. St. 1894, § 624, Rev. St. 1881, § 612, which requires such justice to make out and certify a true and complete transcript of the proceedings and judgment, the phrases "true and correct copy" and "true and complete transcript" being equivalent terms. Collier v. Collier, 49 N. E. 1063, 1064, 150 Ind. 276.

COMPLY—COMPLIANCE.

Under a will requiring distribution of an estate when all the terms of the will shall have been "complied with," the phrase means to perfect or carry into effect; to complete; to perform and execute. Cleland v. Walters, 16 Ga. 496, 502.

The word "compliance" in a certificate of membership in a life association, in which it is stated that the promise of the insurer is made in consideration of the full compliance by insured with all the by-laws now existing or hereafter adopted, means doing what the by-laws may require the member to do, not submission to seeing his only inducement to do it destroyed; and therefore he is not bound by an attempt of the company to reduce the face of the certificate by subsequent by-laws providing that certificates shall not exceed a certain sum, or providing for the deduction of a percentage from the certificate as an emergency fund. Newhall v. Supreme Council American Legion of Honor, 63 N. E. 1, 181 Mass. 111.

COMPOSE.

"Composing the company," as used in Act May 8, 1851, § 7, providing that the persons composing a manufacturing corporation at the time of its dissolution shall be held individually responsible to the extent of their respective shares of stock in the company for all debts which the company shall be owing at the time of its dissolution, means those who are entitled to the management of the affairs of the corporation at the time of its dissolution. Other persons may have an interest in the property of the corporation, but they do not compose the company, but the company is composed of the owners of stock, and a person to whom stock is transferred on the books of the company, and who appears by such books to be the legal owner, is liable under the statute, though such stock had been transferred and held by him as collateral security for a debt. Rosevelt v. Brown, 11 N. Y. (1 Kern.) 148, 154.

COMPOSITION.

See "Agreement for Common-Law Composition"; "Literary Composition." Composition real or otherwise, see "Otherwise."

A composition is an agreement between an insolvent or embarrassed debtor and his creditors, whereby the latter, for the sake of immediate payment, agrees to accept a dividend less than the whole amount of their claims, to be distributed pro rata in discharge and satisfaction of the whole, and must be made on a sufficient consideration. Continental Nat. Bank v. McGeoch, 66 N. W. 606, 613, 92 Wis. 286; Wilson v. Samuels, 35 Pac. 148, 149, 100 Cal. 514.

A composition agreement is an agreement as well between the creditors themselves, as between the creditors and their debtors. Each creditor agrees to receive the sum fixed by the agreement in full of his debt; the signing of the agreement by one of the creditors is offering an inducement to the others to unite with him in it. Bank of Commerce v. Hoeber, 11 Mo. App. 475, 480 (citing Solinger v. Earle, 82 N. Y. 393, 396).

In determining whether a party is a necessary party to an action for the complete determination of the controversy, in McMahon v. Allen (N. Y.) 12 How. Prac. 39, the phrase "complete determination of the controversy" was held to mean when there are persons not parties whose rights must be ascertained and settled before the rights of the parties to a suit can be determined. Bauer v. Platt, 25 N. Y. Supp. 426, 430, 72 Hun, 326. This definition was cited with approval in Chapman v. Forbes, 123 N. Y. 532, 538, 26 N. E. 3, and in Walsh v. National Broadway Bank, 32 N. Y. Supp. 734, 735, 11 Misc. Rep. 249.

A contract of composition by a debtor with his creditors has characteristics peculiar to that class of agreements, which distinguish it from an ordinary contract inter partes. In one sense it is regarded as a contract of the debtor with his creditors that on payment of a stipulated proportion of his debts he shall be discharged; in another sense it is a contract of each of the creditors with the others that they shall be placed on a basis of entire equality and reciprocity among themselves, that each shall receive his stipulated amount and nothing more. Indeed, it is the mutual agreement of the creditors among themselves that each will surrender a part of his debts that gives a consideration to the contract, and binds the creditors individually to abide by the agreement and take a part of the debt in satisfaction of the whole. In transactions of this kind the utmost good faith is required, and one creditor cannot become a party to the arrangement and sign the composition deed, and by a secret bargain with the debtor obtain an advantage over the other creditors. Crossley v. Moore, 40 N. J. Law (11 Vroom) 27, 34.

The essential elements of a composition agreement are concession to an insolvent or embarrassed debtor, and mutuality of contracts between the creditors. The form of the agreement is immaterial. Such an agreement is not with the debtor only, but with the creditors as well, each acting on the faith of the promise of the others to relinquish a part of his claim, and the benefit which each may derive from the mutual concession is the consideration which sustains the agreement and makes it an exception to the rule that a creditor is not bound by an agreement to accept less than the amount of an ascertained debt. Crawford v. Krueger, 50 Atl. 931, 932, 201 Pa. 348.

A composition agreement "is an agreement between a debtor and creditor, whereby the debtor agrees to give and the creditor to take a less sum at a time fixed instead of the original debt, according to these terms: Where the debtor gives or furnishes a new liability as security for the performance of the composition agreement, it becomes a binding contract." Bailey v. Boyd, 75 Ind. 125, 127.

The distinction between a composition inter partes and in bankruptcy is sustained in Re Merriman's Estate (U. S.) 17 Fed. Cas. 131, where the court says the differences are radical between the nature of a composition inter partes and of a bankruptcy composition. The reason of the difference is the fact that the entire proceedings in a bankruptcy composition are proceedings in bankruptcy and are a part of a system for the compulsory division of assets which is administered by a court, while a composition inter partes derives its validity merely from the will of the parties. The Supreme Court of Massachusetts held, in Guild v. Butler, 127 Mass. 386, that proceedings for composition under the statute differ wholly in nature and effect from a voluntary composition which binds only those executing it. First Nat. Bank v. Wood, 53 Vt. 491, 498.

A composition agreement is an act of favor and indulgence on the part of creditors, but when it is signed and delivered favor ceases, and the debtor, in the absence of any waiver by the creditors, is remanded again to the law, which requires of him a strict compliance if he would avail himself of its advantages. Chapman v. Dennison Paper Mfg. Co., 77 Me. 205, 210.

The purport of the composition or trust deed, in case of insolvency, usually is that the property of the debtor shall be assigned to trustees, and shall be collected and distributed by them among the creditors according to the order and terms prescribed in the deed itself; and in consideration of the assignment the creditors who become parties generally agree to release all their debts beyond what the funds will satisfy. John T. Hardie's Sons & Co. v. Scheen, 34 South. 707, 708, 110 La. 612.

In the case of a composition or compromise between debtors in failing circumstances and their creditors, the law requires the utmost good faith. The parties are held to a strict and literal compliance with their agreement, and arrangements securing advantages to particular creditors are absolutely void. If the creditors of a failing debtor agree between themselves, with the consent of the debtor, to a composition of their respective debts, and to receive in lieu thereof securities of a certain character, and one of the creditors subsequently obtains from the debtor new notes of a character more favorable to the creditor than those provided for in the composition agreement, such new notes are void for fraud, not only as to other creditors, but as to the assenting debtor. Smith v. Owens, 21 Cal. 11, 24.

If a creditor agrees with his debtor that, on being indemnified against his suretyship on a bond signed by him for the debtor, he will accept 30 cents on the dollar in satisfaction of his demand, provided the other creditors will do so, he nevertheless has a right, on signing the composition agreement, to make it a condition that all the other creditors shall accede to the same terms within a specified time, which condition, when annexed, becomes a part of the contract of such creditor, and on delivery of the agreement becomes obligatory as such. Magee v. Kast, 49 Cal. 141, 146.

"An assignment for the benefit of creditors who shall file releases of their debts and claims is not a 'composition agreement' after such creditors shall have accepted the provisions of the assignment." In re Walker, 33 N. W. 852, 854, 37 Minn. 243.

A "composition" is a compact or agreement, the settlement or adjusting of a matter of controversy. As used in Bankr. Act 1898, Act July 1, 1898, c. 541, 30 Stat. 544 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3418], authorizing a "composition" by the debtor with a creditor, the term is used separate from the bankruptcy by the act itself, except as a mere foundation for it. In re Adler (U. S.) 103 Fed. 444, 445.

COMPOSITION METAL.

Old cannon, composed of 91.09 per cent. copper and 7.05 per cent. tin, though practically worthless for use against modern implements of war, are not free from duty as composition metal of which copper is the component material of chief value, but are dutiable as manufactures of metal. Downing v. United States (U. S.) 116 Fed. 779.

COMPOSITION OF MATTER.

Under a patent to the discoverer of a new manufacture or "composition of matter" not known or used by others before his discovery or invention, the franchise or sole right to use, and vend to others to be used, covers the new composition or substance itself, and not merely the process of manufacture. Goodyear v. Central R. Co. of New Jersey (U. S.) 10 Fed. Cas. 664.

Inventors of a new and useful "composition of matter" duly secured by letters patent are entitled to the same protection as the owners of a patent for a new and useful art, machine, or manufacture, and the rules and regulations in suits for infringement are the same in all material respects. A claim in a patent for a bronze dressing for leather as a new article of manufacture, composed of spirit varnish and aniline fuchsine, with or without the addition of aniline blue or bronze powder, covers a patentable invention. Cahill v. Brown (U. S.) 4 Fed. Cas. 1005.

"Compositions of glass or paste, when not set," as used in Tariff Act March 3, 1883, includes merchandise, consisting of glass disks of various colors and sizes, colored and cut in imitation of precious stones. United States v. Popper (U. S.) 66 Fed. 51, 52, 13 C. C. A. 325.

The expression "composition of matter," as used in the patent act of 1836, authorizing the granting of patents for any new and useful art, machine, manufacture, or a composition of matter, does not include a jail. Jacobs v. Baker, 74 U. S. (7 Wall.) 295, 297, 19 L. Ed. 200.

COMPOSITION PROCEEDING.

A "composition proceeding" in bankruptcy is a stage in the proceedings resulting in a decree for a discharge. It intercepts the progress of such proceedings, and supersedes the judicial scrutiny which any creditor may promote touching any of the matters specified as grounds of objections to a discharge. Smith v. Morganstern (U. S.) 2 Fed. 674, 676.

COMPOSITION PUMICE STONE.

"Composition pumice stone" consists of ground pumice stone mixed with clay, in the form of bricks or cakes. Waddell & Co. v. United States (U. S.) 124 Fed. 301.

COMPOUND.

See "Explosive Compound."

The noun "compound" is defined by Webster's Dictionary as "that which is compounded or formed by the union or mixture of elements, ingredients, or parts." And the same word "compound" is defined in the Century Dictionary as "composed of two or more elements, parts, or ingredients; not simple." An article of food, which is produced by abstracting from the natural fruit a valuable part, such as the extracting the oil of the cocoa bean for the manufacture of cocoa, is not a "compound" or "mixture," under Acts March 20, 1884, as amended April 22, 1890, prohibiting the adulteration of foods. Rose v. State of Ohio, 11 Ohio Cir. Ct. R. 87, 91, 92, 5 O. C. D. 72, 74.

The term "compound" signifies, in chemistry, a substance formed by a chemical union of its constituent elements, and never a simple mixture in which a chemical union of the ingredients does not occur. In pharmacy, on the other hand, a "compound" is merely a mixture of different ingredients, without reference to chemical union. The verb "to compound" means to mix or prepare. To "compound" a prescription is to prepare it for use, or put together the different articles specified in a prescription so as to be fit for the patient; and this is the ordinary and common use of the word with druggists. A "compounded" drug is a drug made up of other articles, drugs, or chemicals mixed together by trituration, by rubbing together, or by dissolving, etc. Such an article is not a single definite chemical substance, but "compounded" by the mere mixture of two or more chemical substances, each of which retains its own separate properties, which is not true of a chemical compound. United States v. Stubbs (U. S.) 91 Fed. 608-610.

"Compounded," as used in the war revenue act of 1898 (Act June 13, 1898, c. 448, § 20, 30 Stat. 456 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 2297]), has its ordinary and common meaning of "mixed." It certainly has no special meaning with pharmacists which is generally understood and established. J. Ellwood Lee Co. v. McClain (U. S.) 106 Fed. 164, 166.

"Compounds" are liquors produced by the union of several ingredients, with spirits as the base. Block v. Lewis, 5 Ohio Dec. 370, 5 Ohio N. P. 392.

As discharge of debt.

The word "compound" is defined as "to compromise; to effect a composition with a creditor; to obtain discharge from a debt by the payment of a smaller sum;" and hence, under a statute providing that a county court has authority to "compound for" or release in full or in part any debt due the county, it has not authority to purchase claims against a creditor of the county to be offset against his claim. First Nat. bank v. Malheur County, 45 Pac. 781, 783, 30 Or. 420, 35 L. R. A. 141.

"To compound a debt" is to abate a part on receiving the residue. To abate the whole cannot, in any grammatical or common use of the word, be said to be considered a "composition" with the debtor. Haskins v. Noewcomb, 2 Johns. 405, 408.

Within 5 & 6 Vict. c. 122, relating to the filing of an admission of an indebtedness by a debtor summoned by his creditor, and requiring in section 14 that the debtor, within 14 days after filing his admissions, shall pay or tender to his creditor the amount of the debt, or secure or compound for the same to his satisfaction, "compounding" means an entering into stipulations with the creditors which they are satisfied with at the time. Pennell v. Rhodes, 9 Q. B. 114, 129.

COMPOUND INTEREST.

The words "compound interest" mean interest added to the principal as the former becomes due, and thereafter made to bear interest. Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 5136; Civ. Code S. D. 1903, § 2470; Rev. St. Okl. 1903, § 2809; Hovey v. Edmison, 22 N. W. 594, 599, 3 Dak. 449; United States Mortg. Co. v. Sperry (U. S.) 28 Fed. 727, 730.

"Compound interest" signifies the adding of the growing interest of any sum to the sum itself, and then the taking of interest on this accumulation. Camp v. Bates, 11 Conn. 487, 501.

"Compounding interest" is the charging of interest against a debtor upon a sum which has accrued as interest upon the principal debt. Woods v. Rankin, 49 Tenn. (2 Helsk.) 46, 48.

COMPOUND LARCENY.

Larceny or theft at common law is distinguished into two sorts, the one called "simple larceny" or "plain larceny," unaccompanied with any other atrocious circumstance, and "mixed" or "compound larceny," which also includes in it the aggravation of a taking from one's house or person. Simple larceny, then, is the felonious taking and carrying away of the personal goods of another. Mixed or compound larceny is such as has all the properties of the former—simple larceny—but is accompanied by either one or both of the aggravations of taking from one's house or person. "Larceny from the person" is either by privately stealing from a man's person, as by picking his pocket, or by open and violent assault. "Open and violent larceny from a person," or "robbery," is the felonious and forcible taking from the person of another of goods or money, of any value, by violence or putting him in fear. Anderson v. Winfree, 4 S. W. 351, 352, 85 Ky. 597.

COMPOUND OFFENSE.

The term "compound offense," as used in Code, § 4300, providing that in cases of compound offenses, where in the same transaction more than one offense has been committed, the indictment may charge the several offenses, and that the defendant may be convicted of any offense included therein, means every particular transaction constituting in itself two or more offenses. State v. Ridley, 48 Iowa, 370, 372.

COMPOUND OF PYROXYLIN.

Umbrella sticks of wood having celluloid handles are not subject to duty under paragraph 17, Schedule A, § 1, c. 11, Tariff Act July 24, 1897, 30 Stat. 152 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1628], imposing a duty on articles of which any "compound of pyroxylin" is the component material of chief value, notwithstanding that the handles made of colodion constitute the chief value. United States v. Borgfeldt (U. S.) 124 Fed. 304.

COMPOUNDED WINE.

As used in an act relating to the adulteration of wine, the words "compounded wine" mean any wine which contains less than 75 per cent. of pure undried grape juice, and is otherwise pure, and all wines containing alcohol or any other distilled spirits not produced by the natural fermentation of pure undried grapes. Bates' Ann. St. Ohio 1904, § 4200-59.

COMPOUNDING A FELONY.

The crime of "compounding a felony" includes the taking of a promissory note as a consideration for not prosecuting for theft, and it is not necessary to return the goods taken or other goods, in order to constitute the crime. Commonwealth v. Pease, 16 Mass. 91, 93.

Compounding a felony "is the offense of taking a reward for forbearing to prosecute a felony, as where a party robbed takes his goods again, or other amends, on an agreement not to prosecute." Watson v. State, 29 Ark. 290, 301.

"Composition of criminal proceedings," as used in a statute forbidding any composition of certain criminal proceedings in which the prosecutor is entitled to a certain penalty, means "an adjustment of the demand by a payment of a part in satisfaction of the whole. To 'compound a debt' is to abate a part on receiving the residue. To abandon the whole cannot, in any grammatical or common use of the word, be said or considered to be a 'composition' with the debtor. It is in this sense that Mr. Blackstone understood the word (4 Comm. 136) when he spoke of the offense of compounding of information under the penal statute as being of an equivalent nature with champerty." Haskins v. Newcomb (N. Y.) 2 Johns. 405, 408.

COMPREHEND.

Webster defines the word "comprehend" as synonymous with the word "include." Farmers' Nat. Bank v. Cook, 32 N. J. Law (3 Vroom) 347, 351.

Where a deed describes the land as all a certain tract of land, called by a certain name and situated in a certain county, and comprehending the lots laid down in a certain survey, the word "comprehending" imports a purchase by metes and bounds, and the grantee is entitled to no more than the land within the limits of such survey. Jones' Devisees v. Carter (Va.) 4 Hen. & M. 184, 188.

COMPRESSOR.

A "compressor" (a nautical term) is a somewhat recent device, placed a little forward of the windlass, in the direction of each hawse pipe, designed to keep the hawser in place, and to steady and relieve in some measure the strain on the windlass. The Alaska (U. S.) 23 Fed. 597, 599.

COMPRISE.

Webster defines the word "comprise" as synonymous with "include." Farmers' Nat. Bank v. Cook, 32 N. J. Law (3 Vroom) 347, 351.

In a statute providing that, on an appeal from an order of the judge of a court of equity denying an injunction, the clerk shall forthwith transmit the original papers, comprising the bill of petition and exhibits and the court's order of refusal to the court of appeals, and the said court shall hear and determine the appeal, the word "comprising" should be construed as determining what are the original papers, which are only to be transmitted, and on which the decision of the court may be given, although the word "comprising" does not under all circumstances imply including only the things enumerated. Steigerwald v. Winans, 17 Md. 62, 68.

COMPROMISE.

"Compromise" is defined as an agreement made between two or more parties as a settlement of matters in dispute between them. Treitschke v. Western Grain Co., 6 N. W. 427, 10 Neb. 358 (quoting 1 Bouvier, Law Dict. 308); Chilton v. Willford, 2 Wis. 1, 6, 40 Am. Dec. 399.

A transaction or compromise is an agreement between two or more persons, who, for preventing or putting an end to a lawsuit, adjust their differences by mutual consent in the manner which they agree on, and which every one of them prefers to the hope of gaining, balanced by the danger of losing. Civ.

Code La. 1900, art. 3071; Sharp v. Knox, 4 La. 458, 460.

"To 'compromise' is to adjust a dispute by mutual concession. To 'negotiate' means substantially the same thing—to effect something, or an effort to effect something, by treaty or agreement. Negotiations and compromises exclude the idea of actual resort to hostile litigation." Attrill v. Patterson, 58 Md. 226, 245.

Taking one's property from him without consideration and against his will can no more be called "compromise" than robbery, so that the refusal of an instruction in regard to compromise was proper in such a case. Landa v. Obert, 25 S. W. 342, 346, 5 Tex. Civ. App. 620.

Concessions must be mutual.

A "compromise" is defined to be a settlement of differences by mutual concessions; a mutual surrendering of opposing claims; the surrender of some right or claimed right in consideration of a like surrender of some counterclaim. Continental Nat. Bank v. McGeoch, 66 N. W. 606, 614, 92 Wis. 286; Rankin v. Schofield, 66 S. W. 197, 198, 70 Ark. 83; Gregg v. Town of Weathersfield, 55 Vt. 385, 387.

Every compromise involves an admission or concession to some extent of the claims of the other party. Rankin v. Schofield, 66 S. W. 197, 198, 70 Ark. 83.

Compromise "is the yielding of something by each of two parties, and can only exist when something is yielded by each party to it." Bellows v. Sowles, 55 Vt. 391, 399, 45 Am. Rep. 291.

As discharge or release.

"Compromise" is defined to mean to adjust by mutual concession; to settle without resort to law; to compound. A finding that one party had discharged another of an obligation was supported by evidence that his claim against the other had been settled by compromise. Rivers v. Blom, 63 S. W. 812, 813, 163 Mo. 442.

The word "compromise," as contained in a power of attorney authorizing the attorney to "sue for, settle, compromise and adjust all matters and things," means an agreement made between two or more parties as a settlement of the matters in dispute, and, where the title to land was in dispute at the time, the agent under such power of attorney was authorized to execute releases to the property. Smith v. Cantrel (Tex.) 50 S. W. 1081, 1085.

Involves a dispute.

In order to authorize a compromise, there must be a dispute as to the amount of a claim in good faith; a mere false claim—a sham one—set up without any colorable pretense or plausible foundation, might not come within the terms or definition of a "compromise," and might not sustain it. Greenlee v. Mosnat, 90 N. W. 338, 339, 116 Iowa, 535.

Purchase of peace.

"Compromise" signifies a settlement in which there is concession on both sides. Used in that sense, the word does not describe a case in which peace is bought without an admission of liability. Colburn v. Town of Groton, 28 Atl. 95, 99, 66 N. H. 151, 22 L. R. A. 763.

COMPTROLLER.

See "State Comptroller."
Auditor synonymous, see "Auditor."

COMPULSION.

See, also, "Duress."

"Compulsion" is synonymous with "coercion," and means in general some actual or threatened exercise of power, possessed or supposed to be possessed by the party exercising or receiving payment of money or other thing, from which the latter has no means of immediate relief, and, when used with reference to the payment of money under compulsion, is the same as "duress," and which entitles the person imposed upon to avoid and recover the payment in law. Lehigh Coal & Navigation Co. v. Brown, 100 Pa. 338, 346.

"Compulsion" is the antithesis of "willingness," and the provision that no person shall be forced to be a witness against himself does not mean that he may not be a witness against himself; otherwise an accomplice could not testify. It does not mean that any person may not be called and sworn. Hence those competent and free-willed to do so may give evidence against the whole world, themselves included; but those unwilling may not be coerced, if it appear that the unwillingness arises from incriminating evidence which they are asked to give. A person summoned before a grand jury presumptively belongs to the general body of citizens competent to testify, and, if he elect to be excepted from this class, he must speak, or his relation to the proceedings must speak for him. The Constitution provides that a person shall not give incriminating evidence under compulsion. Immunity from compulsion is the right reserved. United States v. Kimball (U. S.) 117 Fed. 156, 163.

As affecting payments.

"Compulsion" or "coercion," within the rule that a payment of money not owing was voluntary, and cannot be recovered unless its payment was procured by compulsion or coercion, is to be understood as importing some actual or threatened exercise of power possessed or supposed to be possessed by the party receiving the payment over the person or property of the party making it, through which the latter has no other means of immediate relief than by advancing the money. Garrison v. Tillinghast, 18 Cal. 404, 407; Brumagim v. Tillinghast, 18 Cal. 265, 272, 79 Am. Dec. 176.

The term "compulsion," within the rule that a payment made under compulsion may be recovered, imports that such a pressure must be brought upon the person paying as to interfere in some way with the enjoyment of his rights of person and of property. The mere fact that an execution against A. is levied on the land of B. does not constitute "compulsion" which will authorize B. to recover a payment made by him and induced by such execution. Stover v. Mitchell, 45 Ill. 213, 217.

The word "compulsion," in the rule that a payment of money made under compulsion is not a voluntary payment and may be recovered back, does not characterize a payment of money in order to prevent the obligee in a bottomry bond from enforcing the same by taking possession of the vessel. Forbes v. Appleton, 59 Mass. (5 Cush.) 115-118.

The terms "compulsion" and "duress" cannot be applied to the payment of money to procure a license to transact business in a state, required by ordinance to be taken out, even though such ordinance is void; and therefore such payment cannot be recovered. Mays v. City of Cincinnati, 1 Ohio St. 268, 277.

The term "duress" or "compulsion" may be properly used to characterize an act of procuring a payment from the owner of property, against his protest, to remove a mechanic's lien based upon an unfounded claim, in order to clear the title of record so that the owner may consummate a loan upon the property, which he has negotiated in order to raise money to pay a prior overdue mortgage and other pressing debts, he having no other available means of raising the money. Joannin v. Ogilvie, 52 N. W. 217, 49 Minn. 564, 16 L. R. A. 376, 32 Am. St. Rep. 581.

Where an assessment is void on its face because made to one who does not own the property, and the true owner, with knowledge thereof, but in ignorance of the law, pays the tax under protest and to avoid a threatened sale by a tax collector, the payment is a voluntary one, and not a payment under compulsion so as to authorize a recovery back of the money in a suit against the tax collector. Bucknall v. Story, 46 Cal. 589, 598, 13 Am. Rep. 220.

In acknowledgment.

"Compulsion," as used in the certificate of a wife's separate acknowledgment of a mortgage, reciting that she executed it without compulsion of her husband, being used in reference to extrinsic power, force, or influence, as when exercised by one person on another, is synonymous with "constraint" as used in Code 1876, § 2822, providing that a wife shall acknowledge that she signed a conveyance of land without constraint on the part of her husband. Gates v. Hester, 1 South. 848, 850, 81 Ala. 357.

The certification of a deed which states that it was executed "without undue influence or compulsion" sufficiently shows a voluntary execution, and is equivalent to declaring it to be of her "own free will." Tubbs v. Gatewood, 28 Ark. 128, 131.

COMPULSORY ARBITRATION.

"Compulsory arbitration" is that which takes place when the consent of one party is enforced by statutory provision. Wood v. City of Seattle, 62 Pac. 135, 143, 23 Wash. 1, 52 L. R. A. 369.

COMPULSORY NONSUIT.

In its legal effect, a "compulsory nonsuit" is substantially the same as a demurrer to the evidence, except that the trial judge cannot give judgment for the defendant. It thus impliedly admits all the facts which the jury might have inferred from the testimony. Maynes v. Atwater, 88 Pa. 496; Miller v. Bealer, 100 Pa. 583. If there be any evidence beyond a mere scintilla, however slight, from which the jury may draw an inference favorable to the plaintiff, the case should be submitted; and, if it inadvertently happens to be withdrawn from the jury by judgment of nonsuit, the latter should be taken off by the trial court. Bastian v. City of Philadelphia, 36 Atl. 746, 747, 180 Pa. 227.

COMPULSORY PAYMENT.

In Shaw v. Woodcock, 7 B. & C. 73, the court says: "If a party has in his possession goods or other property belonging to another, and refuses to deliver such property to the other unless the latter pays him a sum of money which he has no right to receive, and the latter, in order to obtain possession of his property, pays that sum, the money so paid is a payment by compulsion, and may be recovered back." Judge Woodbury says, in speaking of the distinction between voluntary and compulsory payments, that "It can hardly be meant in this class of cases that, to make a payment involuntary, it should be by actual violence or physical duress. It suffices if the payment is caused on the one part by an illegal demand, and made on the other part reluctantly, and in consequence of that illegality, and without being able to regain possession of his property except by submitting to the payment." See, also, El- lott v. Swartwout, 35 U. S. (10 Pet.) 138, L. Ed. 373, and Harmony v. Bingham, 12 N. Y. (2 Kern.) 99, 62 Am. Dec. 142. The same doctrine is applied to payments, under protest, of unjust charges by carriers, where the payments were necessary to regain possession of the property by the owners. Where one has the advantage of another, and where delay or resort to the law is indifferent to the one but may produce serious loss and injury to the other, it is unconscionable to press such advantage to the obtaining payment of unjust demands. Beckwith v. Frisbie, 32 Vt. 559, 565.

It has always been considered that the payment under protest of an illegal tax or demand to an officer armed with a warrant authorizing him to enforce the payment by imprisonment or by seizure and sale of the property, who is about to exercise his authority, is not voluntary; nor is this proposition applicable merely with respect to personal property, but the same is true when real property is involved. Nor is it necessary, in order to constitute "compulsory payment" as distinguished from "involuntary payment," that the unlawful demand be made by an officer who is prepared to enforce it by process. There may be that kind and degree of necessity or coercion that justifies and virtually requires payment to be made of the illegal demand of a private person who has it in his power to seriously prejudice the property rights of another, and to impose on another the risk of great loss if the demand be not complied with. Thus where one by the force of the statute is unable to place on record a deed of conveyance by which he has acquired title to real estate, by reason of illegal taxes being charged upon the land, may pay such taxes, in order to secure the recording of his deed, such payment will not be deemed voluntary, but compulsory. State v. Nelson, 42 N. W. 548, 549, 41 Minn. 25, 4 L. R. A. 300.

It is well settled that the payment under stress of legal process is "compulsory," and, if unlawfully exacted, may be recovered. 2 Desty, Tax'n, 795, and cases cited. The payment of a tax by the owner of property after a warrant has been levied on it for the collection of the tax is compulsory payment. Lindsey v. Allen, 36 Atl. 840, 19 R. I. 721.

Where conflicting claims are made to money owed by a debtor to a bankrupt creditor, the payment of the money into court by the debtor, in compliance with the bill of interpleader filed by such debtor in an action brought by one of the bankrupt's creditors, is not a compulsory payment to such creditor, within the meaning of a contract between such debtor and the assignee of the bankrupt, who also claimed the money, that the assignee would hold the debtor harmless for any "compulsory payment" made to the creditor who had instigated the suit. Massey v. Schott (U. S.) 16 Fed. Cas. 1073, 1075.

A payment is not to be regarded compulsory unless made to emancipate the person or property from an actual duress imposed upon it by the party to whom the money is paid. Thus where a party had paid a large sum of money for property, and in order to obtain possession and protect the property against loss was compelled to pay an additional sum, such payment constituted compulsory payment. Loneragan v. Buford, 13 Sup. Ct. 684, 687, 148 U. S. 581, 37 L. Ed. 569.

"A payment is compulsory, and not voluntary, when it is caused on the one part by an illegal demand, and made on the other part reluctantly and in consequence of that illegality, and without being able to regain or retain the possession of the property except by submitting to the payment." Sowles v. Soule, 7 Atl. 715, 59 Vt. 131.

COMPULSORY PROCESS.

A "compulsory process," authorized by the Constitution in order to produce witnesses for the defendant in criminal prosecutions, means not only the ordinary subpoena, but a warrant of arrest or attachment for such witnesses as fail to obey or avoid service of the first subpoena or recognizance. Powers v. Commonwealth, 70 S. W. 644, 655, 24 Ky. Law Rep. 1007.

"Compulsory process for obtaining witnesses," as used in the Declaration of Rights in Const. 1874, § 10, guarantying to the accused in all criminal prosecutions the right to have "compulsory process for obtaining witnesses" in his favor, means the right to invoke the aid of the law to compel the personal attendance of witnesses at the trial, when they are within the jurisdiction of the court. It is a substantial, a real right, and not an illusory sham to be satisfied by the issue of process which is to be rendered ineffectual by hastening on to immediate trial. A reasonable opportunity to make the process effective must be afforded, else what the framers of the Constitution term "a right to be enjoyed by the accused" is only a mockery to vex. The process is for obtaining witnesses, not the less availing by the concession of a prosecuting officer that the witnesses, if obtained, would swear to the statement made by the accused. Graham v. State, 6 S. W. 721, 722, 50 Ark. 161.

The right to compulsory process does not carry with it the right to have the witnesses brought in without expense to the defendant. The provision for compulsory process has been construed to mean that the accused shall not be debarred of the right of issuing subpoenas for his witnesses as in civil cases, and not to entitle him, on application, to a decree of the court for an allowance to secure their attendance. State v. Nathaniel, 26 South. 1008, 1010, 52 La. Ann. 558.

COMPULSORY PURCHASE.

The term "compulsory purchase" has been used to characterize the exercise of the right of eminent domain. In re Barre Water Co., 20 Atl. 109, 110, 62 Vt. 27, 9 L. R. A. 195.

COMPUTING.

The word "computing," as applied to the class of scales which, in addition to weighing, indicate the price of the article weighed, is aptly descriptive of such function, and cannot be appropriated by one manufacturer as a trade-mark for his own product, to the exclusion of other makers, of whose scales it is equally descriptive. Computing Scale Co. v. Standard Computing Scale Co. (U. S.) 118 Fed. 965, 967, 55 C. C. A. 459.

CONCEAL—CONCEALMENT.

See "Fraudulent Concealment"; "Undue Concealment."

The word "concealed" means kept close or secret; hid; withdrawn from sight; covered. Dale County v. Gunter, 46 Ala. 118, 142.

"Conceal" merely means not letting come to observation. The word does not charge a criminal act. Tygar v. Falor, 63 S. W. 672, 674, 163 Mo. 234.

A neglect to communicate that which a party knows and ought to communicate is called a "concealment." Civ. Code Cal. 1903, § 2561; Civ. Code Mont. 1895, § 3420; Civ. Code S. D. 1903, § 1815.

"Hiding and concealing" may be construed as an act, and the statement that the defendant in attachment is hiding and concealing certain goods may be construed as a statement of the fact; but it is too general a statement thereof, in an attachment suit based upon the concealment of property by defendant, to comply with the statute requiring the plaintiff to state the material facts upon which the attachment is founded. Sandheger v. Hosey, 26 W. Va. 221, 224.

The use of the words "concealed and secreted" in a petition in bankruptcy is a clear and specific charge, and leaves no room for doubt on the part of the defendant as to the nature and extent of the execution, for if a defendant concealed the event, as alleged, it must be assumed that the details and circumstances of the concealment were within his knowledge, and no hardship can be involved in requiring him to answer and meet the charge of concealment as made, without further explanation of the matter. In re Bellah (U. S.) 116 Fed. 69-73.

"Conceal," as used in the bankruptcy act, wherein it was provided that, if any merchant should conceal any of his goods to prevent their being taken in execution, such person should be deemed and adjudged a bankrupt, meant an actual, and not a constructive, concealment of them by the bankrupt himself or by his procurement. Livermore v. Bagley, 3 Mass. 487, 510.

The words "conceal the facts of the crime" in the statute must be held to mean the concealment of the fact that a crime has been committed, unconnected with the fact that the accused is the perpetrator; and the concealment must be the result of some positive act of the accused, calculated to prevent a discovery of the commission of the offense with which he stands charged. And where an indictment for fornication charged the concealment of the crime, by the defendant "publicly acknowledging and claiming the said Mary Watson to be his wife," the allegation did not show any such positive act of concealment as would take the case out of the statute of limitations. Opinion by Biddle, J. Robinson v. State, 57 Ind. 113, 114.

"Conceal," as used in the bankruptcy act, shall include "secrete," "falsify," and "mutilate." U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3419.

What amounts to a concealment, under a law of Congress prohibiting any person from harboring or concealing a fugitive from justice, etc., may depend much on the circumstances. It does not necessarily require that the subject of it be secreted in a garret, cellar, barn, or covered wagon. The highway of a remote and uncultivated country like Indiana may be a better place of concealment than the highway of many other places, and the limits of the whole country as good a place to secrete a fugitive from a distant state as any that could be imagined, especially if the fugitive have a committee of sympathizers to watch over his interests and give him warning of the approach of danger. Van Metre v. Mitchell (U. S.) 28 Fed. Cas. 1036, 1040.

There is no concealment where a debtor makes a bona fide conversion of his property, and shows good faith in respect to the care of the money received therefrom; and a debtor will not be adjudged a bankrupt simply because, after selling his property for the purpose of engaging in a new business, he does not put the proceeds into a tangible shape to prevent the same being seized on process issued out of a court. Fox v. Eckstein (U. S.) 4 Nat. B. R. 373, 375.

Concealment of one's property cannot be predicated on a mere failure to pay, although the debtor has ready money which is not visible to the creditor. Roach v. Brannon, 57 Miss. 490, 493.

It is a "concealment to avoid the service of process," within the meaning of the attachment statutes of New York, no matter whether for an hour, a day, or a week, no matter whether with a view to defraud creditors, or merely to have time to make a disposition, lawful or otherwise, of his property before his creditors got at him. It is placing himself designedly so that his creditors cannot reach him with process. Cammann v. Tompkins (N. Y.) 2 Edm. Sel. Cas. 227, 230.

On a motion to quash a writ of attachment, on the ground of a defective affidavit, stating that defendant is about to assign, dispose of, or conceal, etc., the court said: "To dispose of" is a comprehensive term, and to conceal would be one method of disposing of the property." Horsman v. Bruce, 1 Mich. N. P. 255, 256.

Under a statute providing that prosecutions for larceny are barred by the lapse of two years from the time the offense is committed, and that, where the person committing the offense conceals the fact of the crime, the time of such concealment is not to be included in computing the period of limitations, the fact that the owner of the goods and his family did not know, or have good reason to believe, that the larceny had been committed, until less than two years before the prosecution, is not proof of concealment of the crime by the accused. Such crime may be openly and publicly proclaimed and known to the officers of the law and the community in general, and yet not come to the knowledge of the owner of the goods or his family. Free v. State, 13 Ind. 324, 325.

To "conceal" means "to hide, to cover up, to keep from sight;" and to "dispose of" property includes the foregoing, and to "sell," "alienate" or "put away," as the terms are used in Code, § 3895, providing, "If any mortgagor of personal property * * * willfully destroy, conceal, sell, or in any manner dispose of the property covered by such mortgage, without the consent of the then holder of such mortgage, he shall be deemed guilty of larceny." State v. Julien, 48 Iowa, 445, 447.

"Concealed," as used in St. 1846, c. 168, § 1, providing that any one suspected of having fraudulently received, concealed, embezzled, or conveyed away any of the money, goods, effects, etc., of an insolvent, may be examined, etc., applies to obtaining real estate as well as personal property; and one who takes an apparently legal title to real estate, which is void in consequence of some secret defect, is said to cover up or conceal such estate. Harlow v. Tufts, 58 Mass. (4 Cush.) 448, 453.

A concealment which entirely discharges a surety is one of facts known to the other party and not known to him, and known to be of a character to materially increase the risk beyond that assumed in the usual course of business of that kind, having a suitable opportunity to make them known to the surety. Bryant v. Crosby, 36 Me. 562, 571, 58 Am. Dec. 767.

Absconding distinguished.

When used as a ground for attachment, "concealment" is not strictly synonymous with "absconding," but the one is included in the other. Absconding is not always concealment, but concealment for the purpose of defrauding creditors or avoiding service of summons is always absconding. Where both of the terms are used either conjunctively or separately, the one refers to a concealment or absconding within, and the other without, the state; so that, an affidavit that a debtor absconds or conceals himself states but one real ground for judgment, the terms being, for that purpose, equivalent. Garson v. Brumberg, 26 N. Y. Supp. 1003, 1005, 75 Hun, 336.

Concealment is but a phase of absconding. It is with the purpose of defeating or delaying creditors by avoiding service of process. Stafford v. Mills, 32 Atl. 7, 8, 57 N. J. Law (28 Vroom) 574.

Design or intent imported.

The word "concealed," as used in an instruction that if a person acting as treasurer of a railroad corporation took the money of the corporation, which had been intrusted to him, and used it for his own purpose, knowing that he had no right to do so, and did it without the consent of the company or any of its officers, and concealed the transaction from them, it amounted to a fraudulent conversion of the money of the company, though at the time of the taking he intended to restore the money appropriated, necessarily imports the execution of some plan previously arranged or of some design which had been cautiously premeditated. This is not merely that he was still and silent or omitted to publish or disclose what he had done, but involves, by necessary implication, the idea that he had deliberately resorted to the active employment of means, which he believed would be effectual for that purpose, to secrete and hide from his employers the fact of his defalcation, in order that he might escape with impunity from its consequences. Commonwealth v. Tuckerman, 76 Mass. (10 Gray) 173, 187.

Act March 2, 1799, c. 28, § 68, provides that every collector shall have full power and authority to enter any ship or vessel in which they have reason to suspect any goods subject to duties are concealed, and that all such goods on which duty shall not have been paid shall be forfeited. Held, that the word "concealed" applies only to articles intended to be secreted and withdrawn from public view on account of the duties not having been paid or secured to be paid, or from some other fraudulent motive. United States v. 350 Chests of Tea, 25 U. S. (12 Wheat.) 486, 492, 6 L. Ed. 702; United States v. Tappan, 24 U. S. (11 Wheat.) 419, 421, 6 L. Ed. 509.

Under the statute which authorizes an attachment of the goods of a defendant who conceals himself to avoid the service of summons upon him, where a defendant absconds to avoid a criminal prosecution, and not to prevent civil suits being commenced against him, an attachment is not authorized, as in such cases the motive of the concealment is not that specified in the statute. Evans v. Saul (La.) 8 Mart. (N. S.) 247, 251.

"Concealment," as used in the Bankruptcy Act, means a willful and fraudulent concealment of the assets of the bankrupt, and not a mere omission through mistake or accident. In re Scott (U. S.) 11 Fed. 133, 134.

"Concealment," as used with reference to bankruptcy, "is the doing of an act, whether by way of conveyance or transfer, by which the true title and ownership of the debtor is kept from the view of the creditor, when done with the intent and purpose of preventing property being attached and taken on execution." O'Neill v. Glover, 71 Mass. (5 Gray) 144, 159.

It is not easy to conceive that a concealment of property can be fraudulent unless it is willful. Fraud cannot exist without some operation of the mind and the will; and, where an act is done which is fraudulent, that act must be the result of the will, but the omission may have been willful and not fraudulent. If the term "concealment" does not imply in the bankrupt act any more than "omission," willful concealment is the same as willful omission. Crooker v. Trevett, 28 Me. (15 Shep.) 271, 273.

Disguise distinguished.

"Conceal" means, first, to hide or withdraw from observation; second, to withhold from utterance or declaration. The synonyms of conceal are 'hide,' 'disguise,' 'dissemble,' 'secrete.' To hide is generic; conceal is simply not to make known what we wish to secrete; disguise or dissemble is to hide in some place of secrecy. A man may conceal a fact, disguise his sentiment, dissemble his feelings, or secrete stolen goods." The word is distinguished from "disguise," which means change the guise or appearance of, especially to conceal by an unusual dress, and therefore a murder by one concealed in the bushes is not a murder by one in disguise, within the meaning of Act Dec. 28, 1868, § 1, requiring the payment of damages by the county to the widow or husband of a person assassinated or murdered by any person or persons in disguise. Dale v. Gunter, 46 Ala. 118, 142.

Disguise of identity and removal.

"Conceal," as used in Hill's Code Or. § 16, providing that, when a cause of action shall accrue against any person who shall be out of the state or concealed therein, such action may be commenced within the terms herein respectively limited, the word "conceal" does not apply to one who lives openly in the community where he has fixed his residence in this state, without any effort or attempt in any way to baffle search or inquiry. Webster defines the word "conceal," "To hide or withdraw from observation; to cover or keep from sight; as a party of men concealed behind a wall." In Frey v. Aultman, Miller & Co., 30 Kan. 181, 2 Pac. 168, the court gave a construction to the word "conceal," used in the statute of limitations. The court said: "We think the word 'conceal' contemplates some action here; that he passes under an assumed name; has changed his occupation or acts in a manner which tends to prevent the community in which he lives from knowing who he is or whence he came." Rhoton v. Mendenhall, 20 Pac. 49, 50, 17 Or. 199.

Civ. Code, § 21, providing that the statute of limitations shall not run against one absconding and concealing himself in the state for the purpose of avoiding service of process, must be construed to refer to the acts of a party within the state. The changing of a party's name and removing from place to place, so that a debtor was unable to learn where the party had gone or her place of residence, is not a "concealing," within the meaning of the statute, where it does not appear that such acts were done within the state. Myers v. Center, 27 Pac. 978, 979, 47 Kan. 324.

As harbor or hide.

"Conceal," as used in Const. art. 4, § 4, providing that, when any person shall harbor or conceal fugitives from labor, he shall forfeit a certain sum, means to hide, to keep secret, to secrete, to cover, to disguise. Worcester. And Webster defines it as to withdraw from the observation; to cover or keep from sight. Ray v. Donnell (U. S.) 20 Fed. Cas. 325, 326.

"Conceal," as used in the Constitution, prohibiting the sale of a slave, means to hide or harbor. Cook v. State, 26 Ga. 593, 603.

To conceal a fugitive from labor he must be hidden away with the intention of eluding the claim of his master. In this connection it is said that "harbor" and "conceal" are synonymous. Driskill v. Parrish (U. S.) 7 Fed. Cas. 1100, 1103.

As holding.

Under a statute authorizing an administrator, who believes that any person conceals any part of a decedent's estate, to apply summarily for an order requiring the property to be delivered to him, the word "conceal" is not a synonym of "holding." Secrecy is an ordinary ingredient of the act of concealment; "to hide or withhold from observation, to cover or keep from sight," is the meaning technically and properly conveyed by the word "conceal." Taylor v. Bruscup, 27 Md. 219, 226.

Intentional withholding of facts.

"Concealment," according to the law of insurance, is the designed and intentional withholding of any fact material to the risk which the assured in honesty and good faith ought to communicate." Clark v. Union Mut. Fire Ins. Co., 40 N. H. 333, 338, 77 Am. Dec. 721; American Artistic Gold Stamping Co. v. Glens Falls Ins. Co., 20 N. Y. Supp. 646, 648, 1 Misc. Rep. 114.

As the term is used with reference to life insurance, "concealment" means the designed and intentional withholding of any fact material to the risk which the assured, in honesty and good faith, ought to communicate to the insurer, and every such fact wrongfully suppressed must be regarded as material, the knowledge or ignorance of which would naturally influence the judgment of the insurer in making the contract at all, or in estimating the degree or character of the risk. Goucher v. Northwestern Traveling Men's Ass'n (U. S.) 20 Fed. 596, 599; Mascott v. First Nat. Fire Ins. Co., 37 Atl. 255, 257, 69 Vt. 116.

An answer by insured to an inquiry, at the time of the application for a policy, "Have you deeded for same, or what is the nature of your title?" "Pre-emption," was not a concealment that would avoid the policy, where insured had only taken the necessary steps preliminary to obtaining a patent. McNamara v. Dakota Fire & Marine Ins. Co., 1 S. D. 342, 349, 47 N. W. 288.

"Concealment," as the term is used in the law of insurance, was said by Lord Mansfield, in his celebrated judgment, in Carter v. Boehm, 3 Burr. 1909, to be "a suppression of a fact within the knowledge of the party which the other had not the means of knowing or is not presumed to know." This definition is universally adopted by the writers of the law of insurance. Merchants' & Manufacturers' Mut. Ins. Co. v. Washington Mut. Ins. Co. (Ohio) 1 Cin. R. 408, 415.

Within the rule that a failure of an insured to disclose the true condition of the title which amounts to a concealment will avoid the policy, neglect to communicate that which a party knows and ought to communicate is a concealment. McNamara v. Dakota Fire & Marine Ins. Co., 47 N. W. 288, 290, 1 S. D. 342.

"Concealment," as used in the law of insurance, means "the designed and intentional withholding of any fact material to the risk, which the assured in honesty and good faith ought to communicate to the underwriter. Mere silence on the part of the assured, especially as to some matter of fact which he does not consider important for the underwriter to know, is not to be construed as such concealment." Daniels v. Hudson River Fire Ins. Co., 66 Mass. (12 Cush.) 416, 425, 59 Am. Dec. 192.

As lying in wait.

"Concealed," with reference to a defendant's being concealed at the time of the commission of a murder, cannot be used as a synonym of "lying in wait." People v. Miles, 55 Cal. 207, 209.

Refusal to give information.

The concealment intended by Rev. St. 1894, § 301, providing that, if any person liable to an action shall conceal the fact from the knowledge of the person entitled thereto, the action may be commenced at any time within the period of limitation after the discovery of a cause of action, means something more than mere silence or general declarations on the part of the person liable. It has reference to something of an affirmative character, something said or done, some trick or artifice employed to prevent inquiry or elude investigation, or calculated to mislead and hinder the party entitled from obtaining knowledge by the use of ordinary diligence. Dearborn County Com'rs v. Lods, 36 N. E. 772, 773, 9 Ind. App. 369; Boyd v. Boyd, 27 Ind. 429, 430. Thus a person appropriating to his own use a fund, to which an heir having no knowledge of the existence thereof is entitled, and remaining silent and refusing to give any information respecting the fund, does not conceal the fact of his being liable to an action therefor, within the meaning of the statute. Bower v. Thomas, 54 N. E. 142, 143, 22 Ind. App. 505.
